The diet of Germany, France and Italy, is by a Traveller thus censured: the Germans have much meat, but sturttishly dress't; the French little, but neatly cooked; the Italians neither the one nor the other. And to say truth, the Germans have meat enough: the people being generally of good stomachs, and either by nature or ill custome, excessive both in eating or drinking; seldom rising from the table till they have consumed all which was set before them. Inasmuch as in some places it is provided by Law, that in their feasts they shall not sit above five hours at the Table. During which time, if by intemperance either in eating or drinking, a man disgorge his soul stomach in his fellows lap, or pisse under the Table, it is no disgrace to him; nor at any time taken notice of in his reproach. Which humour of gormandizing and excessive drinking, is not only cherished among the Vulgar, but even among their greatest Princes: who beside what they do in this kind themselves, have their drinking champions, as well to answer all challenges, as to challenge all comers, contending with each other, as a point of State, whose Cellar shall afford the greatest and most capable Vessels.

The title of the Father descends to all the Children; every Son of a Duke being a Duke; and every Daughter a Dutches; a thing which the Italians hold so ridiculous, that they put it in the forefront of this facetious Satyre. The Dukes and Earls of Germany, the Dons of Spain, the Monsieurs of France, the Bishops of Italy, the Nobility of Hungary, the Lairds of Scotland, the Knights of Naples, and the younger brethren of England, make a poor company. For by this common assuming of the Fathers honour, and parting his Landes among all the brethren, the Nobility is beyond reason multiplied, and no less impoverished: there being not long since, 17 Princes of Anhalt, and 27 Counts of Mansfeld; to most of which, their Arms have been the best part of their riches; & nihil nisi arma & manus, & in his omnia; as Tacitus once said of the ancient Britains. And yet there is not one of this poor Nobility that will vouchsafe to marry with the daughter of the wealthiest Merchants; or suffer any of their sisters to be married to any under the degree of a Nobleman: nor any juster cause of a disheriting their children, then ignoble marriages; never permitting the issue of such a Bed to succeed in any of their Fees, Estates, or titles; by means whereof though they debar themselves of such accessions of wealth, as matches of that kind might bring them, yet, to the great honour of their generosity in this particular, they preserve the pure stream of their blood from running into muddy channels; and keep the spirits of brave men, though they want the fortunes.

The Languages here spoken are the French in Lorraine, and some Towns of the Bishop of Triers; the Italian in the highest parts of Tyrol, which lye next to the Common-wealth of Venice; the Sclavonian spoken in Bohemia, Moravia, and some part of Lusatia; and the high Dutch, the general Language of the Country. A language very ancient doubtless (though I am not so much a Goropian as to think it spoke in Paradise, or before the Flood,) and such by reason of the little or no impression which the Roman armies made upon this Country, hath less Commixture with the Latine, than any which is used in these Western parts, (the Welsh excepted) and is very harsh by reason of its many consonants.

This Country was esteemed by Tacitus to be rude and barren, containing nothing but unpeopled Forests, unprofitable Heaths, and unhealthfull Pools. Germaniam informem terris, asperam colostrisum cultu aspestuque, as he further addeth. And such no doubt it was in those times wherein Tacitus lived: the people not being civilized, nor the Country cultivated; nor any means found out to rectifie the sharpness of that Northern air. But he who doth observe it now, cannot but confess that there is no Country in the World either better planed, or replenished with more goodly and Gallant Cities: being being also in most parts both pleasant; healthy and profitable, abounding with mines of silver, and inferior metals; plentiful in corn and wines, with which they supply the defect of other Nations; as also with Fleish, Fish, Linnen, Quicksilver, Allom, Saffron, Armour, and other Iron-works. The Arable lands so spacious in the Eastern parts, that the Husbandman going forward with his Plough in the morning, turned not back again till noon; so making but two furrows for his whole dayes work. For this Verfagen is my Author, and if it be not credible, let him bear the blame.

Souldiers of most eminency in the elder times, were 1 Arminius, the Prince of the Cherusci, who overthrew Quintilius Varus, and the Roman Legions; 2 Wittikind, the last King of the Saxons: for the middle ages, 3 Otto the first, 4 Frederick Barbarossa, 5 Rodulph of Habsburg, Emperours and Kings of Germany, 6 Henry, surnamed the Lion, Duke of Saxony. And in the last Century of years, 7 Frederick the second Electour Palatine, who made good Vienna against the Turky; 8 Albert of Brandenburg, of whom more hereafter; 9 Ernest Earl of Mansfeld, 10 John George of Sagerndorf, 11 Albert Wallenstein Duke of Fridland, and divers other of late dayes.

Scholars of note, the elder times afforded none, nor the middle many; learning being here to rare in the middle of the eight Century, that Vigilius Bishop of Salzburg was condemned of Heresie for holding that there were some Antipodes. In the next age there flourished Rhabanus Maurus, Haimo of Halberstade, Walafridus Strabus, men learned for the times they lived in. And in the following times, Ockam, a stout defender of the rights of the Empire, against the Encroachments of the Pope; Otto Frisingensis the Historian, Albertus Magnus the Philosopher; of which last it is said, that he made the Statua of a man, which with the help of artificial Engines could speak articulately; and was the work of 50 years. Then in the days of our Grandfathers, we have, 1 Martyn Luther, that great instrument of the Reformation. 2 Philipp Melanchthon his Coadjutor in that work, but of more excellent parts, and far better temper; thence called the Phoenix of that Age. 3 Joachim Camerarius, a great friend of Philip. 4 Martin Chemnitius, a solid and laborious writer. 5 Flacius Illyricus, the chief Author of the Magdeburgian Centuries, and Father of the Rigid Lutherans. 6 Sebastian Munster, an industrious Cosmographer, and a learned Linguist. 7 Silburgius, and 8 Buxdorfius as great Linguists as he: not to descend to further instances in those, who have so filled the Marts of Frankfort in these latter times.

But the greatest excellency of this people lieth in the Mechanical part of learning, as being eminent for many Mathematical experiments, strange water-works, Medicinal extractions, Chymistry the Art of Printing, and inventions of like noble nature, to the no less benefit than admiration of the World. Amongst which I cannot chuse but instance in that work of Regiomontanus, an excellent Mathematician, and a cunning Artizan, spoken of by Keckerman; who at the coming of the Emp. Maximilian to the City of Nuremberg, made a wooden Eagle, which flew a quarter of a mile out of the Town to meet him; and being come to the place where he was, returned back of its own accord, and so accompanied him to his lodging. A thing if true (as the Relator was a man of too much gravity to abuse the world with an untruth) exceedingly beyond that miracle of a flying Dove; for which Archytas is so famed amongst the Antients. Exceeded only by himself in a like invention, which was that of an Iron Fly, (the greater Miracle of Art, because less in quantity) which at a Feast, to which he had invited some of his special friends, flew from his hand about the room, and returned again, as is affirmed by Peter Ramus. Expressed thus by Divine Du Bartas:

Once as this Artist, more with mirth than meat,
Feasted some friends, whom he esteemed great;
From his learn'd hand an Iron Fly flew out,
And having flown a perfect Round, about,
With wearied wings return'd unto her Master,
And as judicious on his arm he plac'd her.
O divine wit, that in the narrow Womb
Of a small Fly could find sufficient room
For all those Springs, Wheels, Counterpoise, and Chains;
Which stood instead of life, and spur; and reins!

And amongst these I reckon Bertholdus Swart, a Franciscan Fryer; the inventor (though by accident) of the fatal instrument, the Gun. Studious in Chymistry, he mingled dried earth, sulphur, and some other ingredients, which he had put into a Mortar, covered with a Stone; and striking fire to light a Candle; as the night came on, a spark by chance fell into the Mortar; and catching hold of the Sulphur and other Minerals, with great violence blew up the Stone wherewith it was covered: Amazed at which, he made trial severally of these ingredients, to find out which of them it was which produced that effect, which having discovered, he caused an Iron pipe to be made, crammed it with Sulphur, Salt-peter and Stones; and putting fire to it; saw with what violent noise and fury it discharged itself. This invention he is said to have first communicated to the Venitians, Anno 1330: or thereabouts; who having been often vanquished by the Genoys, and driven almost to a necessity of yielding to them, by the help of their Guns, (Bombards they were then called) gave unto their enemies a notable discomfure. And this was the first battel that ever those warlike pieces had a part in; which, not long after, put to silence all the engines and devices wherewith the antients were wont to make their batteries. The next that made use of this instrument were the Inhabitants of the Baltick Sea; and not long after them, the English, at the siege of Calice, Anno 1347; about which time, they began also to be used in Spain. The French, it seemeth, learned the use of them from the English; and towns, and amongst other Princes and free Cities of inferior note. The rest of Germany, containing the Patrimonial Estates of the house of Austria, the Dukedoms of Bavaria and Lorraine, the territories of the three Spiritual Electors, and of all the other Bishopricks in the hands of the Clergy, some of the Marquesses of Baden, part of the subjects of Cleves and but three of the Imperial Cities (and those small ones too) that is to say, Gmund, Uerlingue, and Dinkell-Snell (unless some more be added by the great late successes of the house of Austria) remain in their obedience to the See of Rome: all which together, will hardly make up one fifth part of this spacious Country, the other four being in the power and possession of the Protestant party; yet so, that there be many Protestants in Bohemia, Austria, and in other the Estates of the Papists Princes; as there be Papists in the Free Cities of Frankfort, Nuremberg, Ulm, Aken, and some other places, besides the late increase of them in both the Palatinates. Of such a speedy growth was the Reformation, that within the space of 40. years, it was not only received in all those Countries which do now profess it; but had also got some footing both in Spain and Italy.

And here perhaps it will not be improper to look upon the means which were chiefly used for the Promoting of this work, by which it came to spread so far in so little time; and next upon the stops and hindrances which were given unto it, by which it was restrained from spreading further. 1. For the means used in the advancement of this work (next under the Almighty power of the most wise God) they were these especially. 1. The translating of the Scripture into Vulgar Languages, which easily discovered the Corruptions of the Church of Rome, both in Doctrinals and Forms of Worship. 2. The diligent Preaching of their Ministry, both in Towns and Villages, for the expounding of the Scriptures, and fitting them to the capacities of the meanest Auditors, which gained exceedingly, both on the judgment and affections of the Common People, the course of Preaching having been formerly neglected by the Parish Curate, and turned off wholly in a manner to the begging Friars. 3. The publishing of Books of Practical Piety and Devotions, which mightily inflamed the hearts of all sorts of men; accustomed before to no other duties, then to tell over their Credo's, and Pater-nosters, and to keep a just account of their Ave-Maries, and that most commonly in a tongue which they understood not. 4. The education of youth, especially in Catechismes, containing the whole body of Christian Religion, which once well planted in their minds, could not so easily be pulled up and removed thence by any contrary persuasions. 5. Their continual offers of disputation with the adverse party in a publique audience; which being denied (as generally at the first it was) gave great assurance of the truth and soundness of the one side, as of the falshood, and weakness of the other. 6. Their compiling of Martyrologies, and Histories of the Church, which could not but produce an admirable Zeal and Constancy, both in the Readers and the Hearers, animated thereunto by those brave examples which therein were presented to them. One point of prudence hath been wanting, which is the calling of a General Council of all the Protestant and Reformed Churches, for the composing of the differences which have grown between them: And this I look on as the first, and greatest stop to the Reformation from proceeding further, many men (not improbably) thinking there must be some want of truth in the foundation of that building, which had such wide and open breaches in the Superstitions. The Tyranny and terror of the Inquisition, by which it is kept out of Spain, and kept down in Italy, and all other parts of the Popes obedience; together with those other policies, both to discountenance and suppress it (which we have spoken of in our description of the Papacy) may come next to this. Then add to these the care and diligence of the Jesuites, and Seminary Priests, in applying themselves to all those means which they found so effectual on the other side, thereby not only counterminding their indeavours, but fighting them upon even ground with the self-same weapons: And last of all, the plots and practices of the Papal Ministers, in working on the humours of the opposite parties, thereby intriging them not only into tongue-combats, and velitations of the Pen, but even to try it out by blows in an open war once I am sure, that by this means they have not only stopped the Progress of the Reformation, but would fain give themselves some hopes to destroy it utterly, and thereby to restore the Pope to that power and splendor which formerly he had attained unto in these parts of Europe. But of these and such like self-Flatteries, I shall say with Seneca, or rather in his words applied to my own Intention;

— Ha manus Trojam erigent?
Parvas habet spes Troja, si tales habet.
That is to say,
Shall these small jarres restore the ruin'd Pope?
Small hopes he hath, if this be all his hope.

As for the Government of their Churches, those that continue in obedience to the See of Rome, are under the old form of Archbishops and Bishops; co-eval in all Germany (as in most places else) with the faith it self. The Calvinists (by which name the Zuinglianists now also passeth, if not eaten out) submit themselves for doctrine, discipline, and forms of worship, to Calvin's Model; whereof we have spoke more at large when we were in Geneva. And for the Lutherans, they have divided the Episcopal function from the Revenues: giving those last to some of their younger Princes, with the title of Administrators of such a Bishoprick; the function or jurisdiction to some of the more eminent Clergy, with the title of a Superintendent, assigning to them a priority both of place and power before other Ministers; which they enjoy for term of life, together with some liberal maintenance in proportion to it. In other things, as orders, habits, and title of dignity, they differ not at all from the other Ministers: And

And over them in the place of Archbishops, they have their general Superintendents; all of them of each sort accountable to the supreme Ecclesiastical Consistory (as tomesly to the Provincial or National Synod) made up of Counsellors of State, and the heads of the Clergy: So that the form seems to be much the same as in elder times, but is indeed more different than it seems to be, a great part of the Alteration being in the names; and that no other in a manner, than by changing the old Greek word Episcopos, into the new Latine word Superintendent: both signifying an Overseer, though in different languages. And so ex Gracia bonis, Latinas fecerunt bonitas, in the Poets words: which brings into my mind the story of a people of Africa, who having received much hurt by Tigers, made a Decree that no man from thenceforth should call them Tigers, but give them a more harmless, or less hated name, and then all was well. And so they do conform thus far to the elder times in form of government: So do they also come up to them in their forms of worship; retaining still a settled and prescribed Liturgia for all their Churches, most of the Holy-days observed in the former ages, the Cross in Baptism, kneeling at the Communion, and many other innocent and significant Ceremonies, commended to the Church by most pure Antiquity. In point of maintenance as defective as the Calvinists are; few of their Ministers having Tithes, most of them pensions or stipends, and those small ones also; seldom exceeding two or 300 Guineas, besides wood for fuel, corn, and some other necessities.

Now because mention hath been made of the Hanse-towns and Imperial Cities, we are to understand that the Cities of this Country are of three sorts, 1. Such as are holden in possession by some of the Princes in way of inheritance, part of their patrimony, and estates, as Heidelberg, Vienna, Munich, Wismar, &c. 2. Such as are held originally of the Empire it self, which are called Free Cities, for their great Privileges of coynage, moneys, and governing themselves by their local Ordinances; Imperial in regard they know no Lord or Protector but the Emperor only, to whom they pay two third parts of such contributions as are assessed in the Assemblies or general Dietes; and 500 Florins yearly for themselves and their territories. They are in number about 60. many of which are of a fair and large estate, such as are Nuremberg, Augsburg, Ingolstadt, Spires, Wormes, &c. Of which this Guicciardini says: Those (saith he) are called Free Cities, which acknowledging by a certain determinate tribute the authority of the Empire, do notwithstanding in all other things govern themselves after their own laws, not seeking to amplify their territories, but defend their Liberties. 3. The third sort is of those which are called Hanse-towns, or Hanse-towns, that is (say some) Ansee-towns, Towns upon the Sea; such as those were who first entered into this confederacy; but at this time the name extends to many in-land Cities, and of no great trading; joyned with them in a league for their common defence and preservation. A league made first against the Danes, and the Barls of Holfst, by some of the Maritime Towns bordering next unto them; that is to say, Lubeck, Hambourg, Rostock, Wismar, Stralsund, and Luneburg: but afterwards many other of the Imperial Cities and Towns of trade, associated with them in an offensive and defensive league against all enemies whatsoever. In number about 72. those of Livonia and Prussia being taken into the reckoning: many of which are able to put to sea 150 good fail of ships; such as lie more within the land, contributing in money or otherwise to the common charge. First hanseled by Waldemar the 3d. of Denmark, whom they vanquished in a Naval battel. After that growing into credit, and driving a great trade in most parts of Christendom, they enjoyed many large and ample privileges, wherefore they came to be called amongst us sometimes by the name of Easterlings, from their Easterly dwellings; and Merchants of the Street-yards from the place where they stored their commodities; and Guilde-Tentonicorum, in regard of their nation, for the most part Dutch. But the English learning so much wit at the last, as to make use of their own shipping, they began here by little and little to decay; and are now almost worn out of memory with us, though still of good esteem and credit in other Countries.

The principal Rivers hereof, are 1. Dannbius, or the Danow, which rising out of Nigra Sylva, or Schwarzen Wald, as the Germans call it, at a little Village of Schwaben called Don Eschingen, about two Dutch miles from the shores of the Rhene; passeth through Schwaben, Bavaria, Austria, &c. by the Cities of Ulm, Regensberg, Passau, Vienna, Rab, Buda, and Belgrade. Beyond which it beginneth to be called Ister, by which name most generally known amongst the Grecians; and receiving into its channel, from the long tracts of the Alps, the Sarmatian and Compathian mountains, about 60 navigable Rivers, besides lesser Brooks, disgorgeth his full Romuch by several mouths (the names whereof we shall find in Dacia) into the lap of the Euxine sea; the whole length of his course 1500 miles. Inasmuch as we may say with a modern Poet, Cedere Dannbius se tibi Nile negat.

O seven-mouth'd Nile, I plainly see,
Danow will scarce give way to thee.

2 Rhene, (of whose original and course we have spoke more fully when we were in Belgium) which running from Switzerland through Germany and Belgium, after a course of 800 miles, emptieth it self into the German Ocean. All which shall here be added, is, that it gives the title of the Rhine-Grave to some Princes, of as good blood as the best in Germany, whose possessions and Estates bordered near unto it, and from thence so called; but of late times decayed (almost to nothing) in their Estates, and living for the most part on the entertainment of other Princes, whom they serve in their wars; the Palgrave of the Rhene, and two at the least of the three Bishops Electors, raising themselves upon the ruins of this House. 3 Elb, (Albia) which springing out of the mountain of Risenburg in the skirts of

Bohemia,

Bohemia runneth a course of 400 miles, and passeth by the Cities of Dresden, Misén, Torgaw, Witteburg, Magdeburg, and Lawenburg, Cities of the Electoral and Antient Saxony, and so betwixt the Dukedom of Holslein (now part of Danmark) and the rest of Germany. 4. Odera, which hath its fountain in the hithermost parts of Moravia; and after it hath run its course through Brandenburg and Pomerania; of some 300 miles in length, falleth at last into the Baltick Sea. 5. Vistula, or the Weser, which issuing out of the hills of Thuringia, runneth through Hassia, and Westphalen, to the City of Breme; nor far from which it falls into the German Ocean. 6. Vistula, or the Weser, which rising out of the Carpathian mountains, betwixt Poland and Hungary, first passeth by Cracovia, the chief City of Pole; then betwixt Pomeran and Prussia, and so into the Baltick Sea, the antient boundary of this Countrey, dividing it from Sarmatia Europea. 7. Moselle, which rising out of the mountain Vange, in the confines of Lorraine, and the County of Burgundy, passeth directly thorow Lorraine, and the District of Triers, by the Cities of Toule, Metz, and Trier, it self, beyond which last it falleth into the Rhene at the Town called Confluentz. 8. Salz, or Salza, which rising in the mountains of Fischelberg, in the borders of the upper Palatinat, and passing by the skirts of Misnia and Saxony, specially so called, falleth into the Elb beyond Witteburg, having first watered the Cities of Naumburg, Merseburg and Jena, very observable for being the most Eastern bounds of the Saxon Conquests; by this River passed from the Sclaves. 9. Main, or the Maine, which had its spring in the mountains of Bohemia, and passing by the Cities of Bamberg, and Wertzberg, is received into the Rhene beneath Frankford. 10. Amisus, or the Emis, which hath its fountain near Paderborn in Westphalia; and passing between the two Frislandis, falleth into the German Ocean, not far from Emden.

Chief mountains of this mighty Countrey, besides the Alps spoken of before, which run in a long tract betwixt it and Italy, are 1. Abnuba, now called Schwartenwalds (the present name both of this Mountain and the Forest of Martiana, which doth overshadow it) out of which rise the Springs of Danow, and the Neccar, two principal Rivers of this Countrey. 2. The Sudeta, incircling Bohemia, covered with the woods called antiently Gabreta and Luna, now called the Woods of Passaw and Behaim, from the places adjoining. 3. Cetina in Austria, now called Culemburg, the antient bounds betwixt Pannonia and Noricum, two Roman Provinces. 4. Pogus, commonly called Vange, and by some French writers Le Mont de Fauccites, which encircling Lorraine, divideth it on the East and South from Elzass, and the County of Burgundy. As for the Forests of this Countrey, besides those spoken of already, that of most note was the Forest of Hercinia (of which all the rest were but limbs or branches.) The beginning whereof was about the borders of Switzerland and Alsacia, from thence running Eastward along the course of the Danow unto Transilvania, and thence declining on the left hand through the vast Countreys of the Lithuanians, Moscovites and Russes; in which last there are still many vast deserts of it; the greatest part thereof in Germany being long since consumed; in place whereof are many goodly Corn-fields, and well-built Cities. A wood so formidable to the Romans, that they durst never venture to search the end of it; the length thereof, after the end of 60 dayes journey, being undiscoverable; and the further search into it quite laid aside.

These Boundaries and Landmarks being thus described, we shall the better follow the Choreography of this great continent, according to the several Principalities and Estates therein: having first taken a survey of the antient condition of it, with so much of the story as concerns the whole, before it came to be divided into so many hands. The Countrey first planted by the posterity of Gomer, who descending from the Mountains of Albania, their first seat, in memory thereof first called Gomerini; after Cimmerini, by which name known to Pliny, Ptolomy, and others of the antient writers: removed into the more fruitful plains of Phrygia, and there built the City Cimmeris which Pliny speaks of. But that small Province proving of too narrow a compass to contain his Off-spring, and the adjoining Countries being taken up in the former Plantations; they removed unto the Northwest of the Euxine Sea; where we find a City of their building called Cimmerium, mentioned both by Pliny and Strabo; and the adjoining streight or Frétrum, called by the name of Bosphorus Cimmerius, by the Greeks and Latines. Driven from these dwellings by the more powerfull Scythians, they spread themselves into the West, where they began to be called Cimbri, and by that name, and under those of the Ambrones, and Tentones, several branches of them, intended an invasion and conquest both of Gaul and Italy: wherein they had prevailed in all probability, nisi isti secundo Marius configisset, had not Marius hapned to have lived in that Age; by whom discomfited and destroyed. That these Gomerians or Cimbri were the first Inhabitants of Gaul, Germany, and all the Nations of the North and West of Europe, is generally agreed upon by all the learned; divided into several nations, and those also subdivided into lesser tribes, and more obscure families: amongst which those of Tentones, or Tuiscenes, from which the Dutch do so affect to derive themselves; might be some of the principal. There settled, and not pleased with that desert dwelling, such of them as dwelt nearest to the Rhene passed over that River; and beating the Gauls further up into the Countrey, possessed themselves of their dwellings: enjoying them (till conquered by Julius Caesar) without any Rival. But Caesar, moved with the complaints of the Gauls, and the insolencies of Ariovistus a King of the Germans (for by that name for the Reasons aforesaid, the Romans called them) marched into their Quarters: the Roman Legionaries being so afraid of this dreadful Enemy, ut testamenta passim in principis scriberentur, (saith the Historian) that many of them made their testaments at the Gates of their Camp, before they fell upon the Enemy. Vanquished by Caesar, and Ariovistus being fled over the Rhene, the Romans by command of their General, made a bridge over the River, and rather terrified than conquered the neighbouring Germans: more fully brought into subjection by Drusus, the adopted son of Augustus Caesar, from thence called Germanicus; by whom not only the Rhæti and Norici then lying out of the bounds of Ger-

Germany (now included in it) were subdued in fine, and brought into the form of Roman Provinces; but the whole Countrey, in a manner to the very Ocean, was forced to yield obedience to the Roman Empire. But this was for so short a time, that it was both won and lost during the reign and government of Augustus Caesar. So that the whole established Conquests of the Romans upon this Countrey, as it is now bounded, contained no more than the Provinces of Germania, and Belgica prima, with part of Germania secunda, belonging unto the Diocese of Gaul; the greatest part of the two Rhetia's being under the Diocese of Italy; Noricum Mediterraneum, and Ripense, with some parts of Pannonias parts of the Diocese of Illyricum. But none of these (as lying on the West side of the Rhene, and the South of the Danow) did ever pisse in the account of the antient Germany; the Germans not enduring the yoke so long, as to be brought within the number of the Roman Provinces. Provoked with the lust and insolencies of Quintilius Varus, who succeeded Drusus in that charge, they set upon him under the conduct of Arminius, a chief Prince amongst them, kill him, and utterly cut off three Legions, as we shall see more particularly when we come to Brunswick, the antient seat of the Cherusci; by whom the forces of that Emperor were driven over the Rhene. After which defeat Augustus laid aside the affairs of Germany, confining his Empire within the Rhene, which Drusus had extended to the banks of the Ocean. Hæc clade factum, ut imperium quod in littore Oceani non flecterat, in Ripa Rheni fluminis staret, saith the Historian. Nor did the Romans only forbear to revenge this loss, by making a new war upon them; but seemed more careful to defend themselves against their invasions, than to incur the hazard of a new defeat: quartering eight Legions with their several wings and Aides, on the shores of the Rhene, and four upon the banks of the Danow, to keep these people from incroaching on the Roman Provinces. But the fatal period of that Empire drawing on a pace, the French, Burgundians, Almans, and other Dutch Nations break through those Guards, dispossess the Romans of all Gaul, Rhetia, and Noricum; which they share amongst them: till in the end, the French prevailing over the rest, extend their Empire over all the modern Germany, chiefly performed by the valour of Charles the Great, created Emperour of the West by the people of Rome, and crowned with the Imperial Crown by Pope Leo the 4th. on Christmas-day, Anno 801. So that now the old Prophecie of the Druides, concerning the removing of the Empire into the West, came to be accomplished; though Tacitus in his time accounted it for a vain and idle prediction. For when Civilis raised a Rebellion amongst the Batavi (the Hollanders and parts adjoining) against Vespasian then newly made Emperour; possessum rerum humanarum, Transalpinis gentibus portendi, Druidæ canebant; the Druides prophesied of the translation of the Empire to the Transalpine nations. Accomplished, as before is said, in the person of Charles the Great, King of France and Germany. By whom divided, (for the better ordering or Governance of it) into West-France, or West-veicks, in the barbarous Latine of those times called Westraia; containing the modern France, and so much of the Netherlands as lyeth on the French side of the River Maes; and Ost-veicks (i. e. the Eastern Kingdom) in the Latine of those times Austrasia, containing so much of the modern Germany and Pannonia, as was possessed by the French, with the rest of the Netherlands. This afterwards subdivided into the Kingdoms of Lorraine and Germany; whereof the first contained all Germany within the Rhene, together with the Belgick Provinces before described, the Counties of Flanders, and Artois excepted only; the Kingdom of Germany taking up the rest. For in the time of Ludovicus Pius, the son of Charles, the great Empire of his Father was parcelled out into many members; as Italy, France, Burgundy, Lorraine and Germany; distributed amongst his sons and nephews, with the title of Kings: By means whereof the Kingdoms of Germany and Lorraine, united in the person of Lewis the Antient, in little time were alien'd from the house of Charles, and left off to be French; possessed by the great Princes of Lorraine, Saxony, Schwaben, and Bavaria; by whom dismembered into many principalities and inferiour states, all passing under the account and name of the Dutch or Germans. The Kings and Emperours of which here follow.

THE KINGS and EMPEROURS of GERMANIE.

- A.C.
801 1 Charles the Great, Emperour, K. of France and Germany.
815 2 Ludovicus Pius, King of France, Germany, and Emperour of the Romans.
841 3 Lewis, surnamed the Antient, second son of Ludovicus Pius, King of Germany, to which, Anno 876, he united that of Lorraine also.
4 Charles the Great, son of Lewis the Antient, reigned at first jointly with Carolamen, and Lewis his elder Brethren; after their deaths sole King of Germany, Anno 890, he succeeded Ludovicus Baldus in the title of Emperour, continued unto his Successors; and during the minority of Charles the Simple, by a faction of the French Nobility, was chosen King of France: the whole estate of Charles the Great, becoming once again united in the person of one Sovereign Prince.
891 5 Arnulph, the natural son of Carolamen, the brother of Charles, King of Germany and Emp.
903 6 Lewis, or Ludovicus IV. (Lewis the brother of Charles and Carolamen being reckoned for one) King of Germany and Emperour, the lawfully begotten son of Arnulph.
913 7 Conrade, the son of Conrade, the brother of Lewis the 4th. the last Prince of the masculine issue of Charles the Great. After whose death the Francones and Saxons, seeing Charles the Simple King of France, overlaid by the Normans, or embroiled by the Princes of the house of Anjou, took that advantage to transfere the Empire to themselves; and they made choice of Henry Duke of Saxony to be their Emperour. A worthy Prince, by whom some Nations of the Sclaves, the Hungarians, and part of Lorraine were subdued, or added to the Empire.

- 929 8 Henricus, surnamed Accipiter, or the Fowler, Duke of Saxony, elected by the German Princes, but designed by Conrad, as being eldest son of Otho Duke of Saxony by Luithgardis, Daughter to the Emperor Arnulph, and consequently a branch of the Caroline stock.
- 938 9 Otho, surnamed the Great, the son of Henry, Emperor, and King of Italy. 36.
- 974 10 Otho II. son of Otho the first, Emperor and King of Italy. 10.
- 984 11 Otho III. son of Otho II. Duke of Saxony, and the last of that house which had the title of Emperor and King of Italy. After whose death, all right of succession being disclaimed, the Emperours became Elective; but for the most part wholly ingrossed or Monopolized (since the Failer of the house of Saxony) by the Dukes of Franconia, Suevia, Bavaria, and Austria, notwithstanding the liberty or freedom of Election pretended to by the Electors. The business first projected in the Court of Rome, to make the Emperours less powerfull, and distract the Germans, whom they feared, into sides and factions: confirmed by a decree of Pope Gregory the fifth, being a Native of that Countrey.
- 1002 12 Henry II. surnamed the Saint, Duke of Bavaria, the first Emperor elected according to the constitution of Gregory the fifth, but so elected, that he challenged it in a manner by the right of blood, as being the grand-child of Henry surnamed Rixosus (the first Duke of Bavaria, of the Saxon race) the second son of Henry the first, and consequently the next heir male of that house after Otho the 3d. compelling some of the Electors, who opposed his title by the force of Arms to yield unto it: So that the first Emperor who came in by a clear election; but not without pretention of a title also, was
- 1025 13 Conrad II. Duke of Franconia, surnamed Salicus, Husband to Luithgardis one of the daughters of Otho the first, and consequently not a stranger to the former Family.
- 1040 14 Henry III. surnamed Niger, the son of Conrad.
- 1056 15 Henry IV. son of Henry the third, in whose dayes the Popes began to usurp authority over the Emperours: inasmuch as Leo the ninth having received the Papedom at the Emperours hands, repented himself of it, put off his Papal vestments, went to Rome as a private person, and was there new chosen by the Clergy. This done by the perswasion of a Monk called Hildebrand, who being afterwards made Pope by the name of Gregory the 7th. excommunicated this Henry, the first Prince that was ever excommunicated by a Pope of Rome. From which time till the year 1254. there were continual wars and thunders betwixt them and the nine following Emperours; some of them being excommunicated, some forced to put their necks under the Feet of the Pope; others to quit the care of the Commonwealth, and betake themselves unto the wars of the Holy-land, leaving the Pope to do what he list in Germany.
- 1106 16 Henry V. son of Henry the 4th. armed by the Pope against his Father, whom he had no sooner succeeded in the Empire, but the Pope excommunicated him, for being too stiff in the business of investitures, and raised up the Saxons against him, by whom vanquished, and otherwise afflicted by the Popes Practices, he was forced to submit unto his commands, and was the last Emperor of the house of Franconia.
- 1125 17 Lotharius, Duke of Bavaria, seized on the Empire without any election, reconciled unto the German Princes by the means of St. Bernard. He settled the affairs of Italy in two journeys thither. 13.
- 1139 18 Conrad III. son of Frederick, the first hereditary Duke of Sueve, or Schwaben, and sisters son unto Henry the fifth, vanquished Henry, surnamed the Proud, Duke of Saxony and Bavaria; and going to the holy-wars with Lewis King of France, discomfited the Turks near the Banks of Meander. 15.
- 1153 19 Frederick, surnamed Barbarossa, Duke of Sueve, crowned at Rome by Adrian the 4th. and not long after excommunicated by Pope Alexander the 3d. to whom he was slain at last to submit himself, the Pope insolently treading on his neck. He went after to the Holy-land (where he dyed) having discomfited the Turks in three great battels. 39.
- 1190 20 Henry VI. son of Frederick, and King of Sicily, in right of Constance his wife, crowned by Pope Celestine, who employed him in the wars of the Holy-land; in his journey towards which he died at Messina. 8.
- 1198 21 Philip, Duke of Sueve, brother of Henry the 6th. excommunicated by the Pope (who loved not this Family) by whose means Otho, the son of Henry the Lion, Duke of Saxony, was set up against him. The occasion of great wars among the Germans, reconciled by marriage of Otho with a daughter of Philip. 9.
- 1207 22 Otho IV. son of Henry, surnamed the Lion, Duke of Saxony and Bavaria, crowned at Rome by Pope Innocent the 3d. by whom not long after excommunicated, for taking into his hands some towns of Italy which belonged to the Empire: vanquished in Brabant by the faction raised up against him, he relinquished the Empire to his Competitor.
- 1212 23 Frederick II. King of Sicily and Naples, son of Henry the 6th. having settled Germany, disposed himself for the wars of the Holy-land, where he recovered the possession of the Realm of Jerusalem; excommunicated by the Pope at his return into Italy; not long after poisoned.
- 1250 24 Conrad IV. son of Frederick, the last Emperor of the house of Schwaben. After whose death, the Empire being distracted by the Popes Practices into many factions, each faction chose an Emperor or King of the Romans: so that at one time there were elected, Henry

Earl

- Earl of Thuringia, William Earl of Holland, Alfonso King of Castile, the renowned author of the Alfonso Tables, and
- 1254 25 Richard Earl of Cornwall, brother of Henry the 3d. of England, the best motyed man of all his time, supposed therewith to buy the suffrages of the Archbishop of Colen, and Elector Palatine, by whom he was elected and crowned King of the Romans, An. 1254. and after he had dealt in the affairs of the Empire 6 years, he returned into England, where he died. After whose death, or an Inter-regnum of 12 years from his Exit rather, the Title was at last accepted by
- 1273 26 Rodolph Earl of Habsburg, a petit Prince, (others of greater Estates and Fortunes not daring to take up the honour) the Raifer of the present Austrian Family.
- 1292 27 Adolph Earl of Nassau, who served in person under King Edward the first of England, against the French; for which distressed by the Germans, he was encountered and slain near the City of Spire.
- 1298 28 Albert, Duke of Austria, son of Rodolphus the Emperor, to whom Pope boniface the 8th. gave the Realm of France, of which he had deprived King Philip the Fair. But Albert would not meddle out of Germany, and did nothing in it.
- 1308 29 Henry, Earl of Luxembourg, made a journey into Italy to recover the rights of the Empire, (where an Emperor had not been seen in 60 years) supposed to be poisoned in the Challice, by a Fryer at Benevent, a town of the Popes. 6.
- 1314 30 Lewis, Duke of Bavaria, crowned at Aix in the wonted manner; opposed by Frederick, Duke of Austria, chose by another Faction, and crowned at Bonnas, a town of the Archbishop of Colen; but being defeated, Lewis remained sole Emperor, excommunicated by Pope John 22. 33.
- 1346 31 Charles IV. son of John King of Bohemia, and grandson of Henry the 7th. crowned with the iron Crown at Millain, 1354. the framer of the Golden Bull. 32.
- 1378 32 Wenceslaus, King of Bohemia, and Earl of Luxembourg, deformed and vicious; deposed by the German Princes. 22.
- 1400 33 Rupertus, Elector Palatine, passed into Italy for the recovery of the Dukedom of Millain, sold by Wenceslaus; but was well beat by John Galeazze, and so returned. 10.
- 1410 34 Jodocus Barbatus, Marquis of Moravia, uncle to Wenceslaus.
- 1411 35 Sigismund, brother of Wenceslaus, King of Hungary and Bohemia, and Earl of Luxembourg, crowned at Rome on Whitsunday, 1432. travelled exceedingly for establishing the peace of Christendom, distracted at that time with three Popes at once; a great promoter of the Council at Constance.
- 1439 36 Albert II. Duke of Austria, son in-law of Sigismund, whom he succeeded in all his estates and titles excepting Luxembourg. 1.
- 1440 37 Frederick III. Duke of Austria, the son of Ernest of Austria, and next heir of Albert the 2d. procured the calling of the Council of Basil for the peace of Christendom; travelling for that cause to Rome, where declared Emperor, Anno 1442. 54.
- 1494 38 Maximilian, son of Frederick, Duke of Austria, who first united the Estates of Burgundy to the house of Austria. A Prince that undertook many great Actions, but went thorow with none. 25.
- 1519 39 Charles V. King of Spain, son of Philip King of Spain, and Archduke of Austria, son of Maximilian by the Lady Mary of Burgundy. A puissant Prince, who had prisoners at the same time, the French King, and the Pope of Rome. He ruined the League made by the Protestants at Smalcald, took prisoners the Elector of Saxony, and the Landgrave of Hassia, drove the great Turk from Vienna, won the Kingdom of Tunis; and in the end resigned all his Estates, and dyed in a Monastery. 39.
- 1558 40 Ferdinand, Archduke of Austria the brother of Charles, King of Hungary and Bohemia, elected King of the Romans by the procurement of Charles, Anno 1531. Upon whose resignation he was chosen Emperor, Anno 1558. 7.
- 1565 41 Maximilian, the son of Ferdinand, elected King of the Romans in the life of his Father, Anno 1562. succeeding in the Empire after his decease.
- 1577 42 Rodolphus, the eldest son of Maximilian, had great wars against the Turk, with whom in the year 1600 he concluded a peace; but being undermined by his brother Matthias, was forced to surrender to him the Kingdoms of Hungary and Bohemia, and to content himself with Austria and the Empire only. These eight last Emperours were all of the order of the Garter.
- 1612 43 Matthias brother of Rodolphus K. of Hungary, Bohemia, and Archduke of Austria; in whose time were sown the seeds of that terrible war, which had almost destroyed the Empire. Having no children of his own, he procured Ferdinand of Graz, to be declared Successor into his Estates. 36.
- 1619 44 Ferdinand of Graz, Archduke of Austria, son of Charles of Graz, the younger son of Ferdinand the first, succeeded Matthias in all his Estates and titles. A Prince more zealously affected to the See of Rome, than any of his Predecessors; and a great enemy of the Protestant Religion; occasioning thereby that long and bloody war in the Empire of Germany, not yet fully ended.
- 1637 45 Ferdinand III. son of Ferdinand the 2d. broke the great power of the Swedes, (called in for the support of the German liberty, and against the violent resolutions of his Father) at the battle battel of Norlingen; the 12th. Emperour of the house of Hapsburg, and the 9th. of the house of Austria without intermission. The cause of which is to be attributed to Charles the first, who procured in his life time, that his brother might be chosen Rex Romanorum, as his successeur in the Empire: A policy which hath been ever since continued by his successors; and the Germans are the more willing to hearken to it, because the Austrian Princes are not only Natives of this Countrey, but better able to back out the Empire in its compleat Majesty, than any of the rest of that Nation are.

And to say truth, it is but need that some great Prince or other be elected to it, who by the power and reputation of his own estate, may preserve the honour of the Empire: confined in a manner within Germany, and there so weakened by the alienating of whole Countreys from it (some titulary acknowledgment excepted only; that it is nothing in effect, but magni nominis umbræ, the shadow of a mighty body, a meer empty title. For if we look upon the present state and condition of it, we shall find it otherwise too weak, to support the vast and swelling title of the Roman Empire. For as for the Empire it self, it hath some Countreys reckoned as parts of it, which yet acknowledge no subjection; as Belgium, Switzerland, and Denmark: Some do acknowledge a kind of subjection, but the Princes of them come not to the Imperial Diets, as the Dukes of Savoy and Lorraine, and some of the Italian Potentates. Finally, some both confess the Emperour to be their Sovereign, and that they owe service to his Courts, which are the Princes and Cities of Germany only; but those so privileged, so exempted from his commands, so absolute and uncontrollable in their own estates, that they care little for his power, and not much (if any thing) for his person; of which we shall speak more hereafter, when we come unto the form of the publick Government. In the mean time, if we would know by what occasions the Empire became so infeebled; it may be said, that the reasons and occasions of it have been very many. As first, the weakness and improvidence of the Caroline race, dismembred from it many powerful and wealthy Provinces; reserving only a bare Homage, and some slight acknowledgement. 2ly, The cunning of the Popes, who from the time of Henry the 4th, to Rodolph of Habsburg, had by their Excommunications and other practices, so exercised the Emperours with intestine troubles, that they forced them in a manner, to abandon Italy: in so much that the said Rodolph, finding the inconvenience of it, sold most of his Estates there to the fairest Chupmen. 3ly, This done, and the Popes knowing well enough that they could not wax strong in Italy, if they did not weaken the Emperours estate in Germany, first wrested out of their hands the Investiture of the Bishops, Abbots, and other Ecclesiastical preferments: who being now made their own creatures, were so encreased both in revenue and power by little and little, and fortified with so many immunities, that some of them grew in time to be Free Estates, all of them Princes of the Empire. 4ly, But fearing that this might not bring the Emperours low enough, they baited them with continual factions and perpetual broils: which put them to a necessity of making what friends they could, though they paid very dearly for them; and raking up what moneys they could of the wealthier Cities, paying them in exemptions and Royal privileges, when they could not otherwise cancel or discharge the debt. 5ly, And unto this, the making the Empire Elective gave no little help, few of them looking on the Empire, but as Trunks for term of life; and therefore were more likely to discharge such debts by impairing the Publick Patrimony, which they had no hold in, than to diminish any thing of their own estates. 6ly, But being the title of Emperour was the greatest honour, which any of that Nation could be capable of, and such as by good husbandry might be made beneficial unto their posterity, (as we see what good uses have been made of it by the Austrian family, ever since the time of Rodolph of Habsburg;) who would not part with some of the Imperial rights, to advance his own house to an equal greatness? And here in many of the Emperours were exceeding faulty, who to get the Empire to themselves, or leave it after them unto their posterity, dismembred from the same many Towns and fair possessions, given by them to the Electors for their Votes and Suffrages. 7th, A thing which the Electors understood sufficiently, and therefore were resolved to make the best of the market, knowing that the commodity could be bought of none but themselves: as in the Election of Wenceslaus son of Charles the 4th, of whom it was but ask and have, what they had a mind to. By means whereof the Princes grew in time so strong, that there were few of them who durst not undertake a war against their Emperours. And this appeareth by the story of Charles the fifth, who though the most puissant Emperour which had reigned in Germany since Charles the Great, yet found himself so over-matched by these ruffling Princes, that he was willing to resign the Empire to his brother Ferdinand.

But to proceed; By these and every of these means, the Body of the Empire came to be divided into many Estates, and those Estates to be made absolute and independent, as before is said. The principal whereof, which being described will make up the Chorographie of this great Continent, are those of 1 Cleveland, 2 the Estates of the three spiritual Electors, 3 the Palatinate of the Rhene, 4 Alsacia, 5 Lorraine, 6 Suevia or Schwaben, 7 Bavaria, 8 Austria, and its appendices, 9 The confederation of Wederaw, 10 Franconia, 11 Wittenberg, and 12 Baden. 13 the Palatinate of Northgia, or the Upper Palatinate, 14 Bohemia, and the incorporate Provinces, 15 Pomerania, 16 Mecklenberg, 17 the Marquise of Brandenburg, 18 Saxony, and the Members of it, 19 the Dukedoms of Brunswick and Lunenburg, 20 the Landgravedom of Hesse, 21 Westphalen, 22 Eastfrisia. Such lesser States as being absolute and free, are of lesser moment, shall be reduced (together with the Imperial Cities) to those several Provinces, in which they are included, or out of which they were taken. As for the Province of Holslein or Holsatia, though it be Imperial, in which respect by some accounted as a Province of Germany: yet being under the command of the King of Denmark, and by all Writers reckoned as a part of that Kingdom; I shall there speak of it. Some of these are thus censured by Auburn late late writer. They of Suevia, (saith he) are Whores; they of Franconia, Ravishers and Buggers; they of Bohemia, Heretiques; those of Bavaria, Thieves; they of Saxony, Drunkards; they of Frisland and Westphalia, Swearers; and they of the Palatinate, Gluttons. But I hope more charitably of them all than so. I know there is another division of this Countrey, made by the Emperour Maximilian at the Diet of Colen, Anno 1552. who for the better raising both of men and money for all Publick services, caused it to be divided into the ten Circles of 1 Lower Saxony, 2 Upper Saxony, 3 Westphalia, 4 of the Rhene, 5 of the four Electors of that part, 6 Franconia, 7 Suevia, 8 Bavaria, 9 Austria, and 10 Burgundy. But that before proposed being the more particular, I shall follow that, according to the order before laid down: beginning first with those, which together with the Belgick Provinces and the Dukedom of Lorraine, contained anciently the Provinces of Belgica, and Germania prima, and some part of Germania secunda; and made up the Kingdom of Austrasia strictly and specially so called.

I. CLEVELAND.

CLEVELAND, or the Estates of the Duke of Cleve, before dismembred and divided betwixt the Competitors for the Dukedom, on the death of the last Duke hereof, Anno 1609. contained the Dukedoms of Cleve, Gulick, and Berg, and the Earldom of Mark or March, all lying in a ring together. And though these two last lye on the other side of the Rhene, and so not properly within the old precincts of the Kingdom of Lorraine, or any of the Roman Provinces before named: yet being they belonged all to the same Prince, not parted by the interposition of other Countreys, they shall be handled here together as the same Estate.

1. The Dukedom of CLEVE, properly and distinctly so called, hath on the East, the Countreys of Mark and Berg, with some part of Westphalen; on the West, Guelderland, and some part of Limbourg; on the North, the Earldom of Zutphen, and the land of Over-Tselt; and on the South, Gulick and the Land of Colen. So called from Cleve the chief Town of it.

The Countrey very fruitful both for Corn and Pasturage, well stocked with Cattel of all sorts, for necessary use and pleasure; good store of Fowl, both tame and wilde: blessed also with an healthy air, and in a word, with all things needful for the life of man; well watered with the Rhene, the Ruer, the Duffel, the Esels, and the Niers, common to this and the rest of the incorporate Provinces.

Places of most importance in it, are, 1 Cleve, (in Latine Clivia) so called, because built on the sides of three little hills (which the Latines call Clivi;) gently descending towards the Banks of the Rhene, which not far off divides it self into several Channels. An ancient Town, and of great note in former time, as appears by many old foundations, and other monuments of Antiquity, continually digged up in the fields adjoining; but chiefly by an old four-square Tower, built on the highest of the three hills, of great height and state; founded by Julius Caesar as a bulwark against the Germans, inhabiting the further side of the River. For proof of which, besides the old tradition constantly maintained, there is an Inscription on the Gates of the Dukes Palace, neer adjoining to it, which saith, Anno ab Urbe DCXCII. C. Julius Dictator, his partibus subactis, hanc Arcem fundavit, i. e. that in the year 698 from the building of Rome, Julius Caesar the Dictator, having subdued those parts of the Countrey, caused this Tower to be built. 2 Santen on the banks of the Rhene, a Town of great antiquity, as the ruins of it doe declare; supposed by Pighius to be the Trajana Colonia of the Ancients. 3 Wesel, (in Latine Vesulia) a fair and rich Town, seated on the confluence of the Rhene with the River of Lippe; which rising in Westphalia, doth here lose it self: of great note for a Colledge of secular Canons, built here by Eberhard the ninth Earl, Anno 840. or thereabouts; and an Hospital liberally endowed for old impotent persons, founded by Henry de Baers, the Dukes Chancellor. A Town not subject to these Dukes, though within the Dukedom, being reckoned an Imperial City, and one of the Hanse-towns; now neither so Imperial nor so Free as formerly; possessed first for the Spaniards with a Garrison of 3000 men, (at the beginning of the war of Cleve) by D. Lewis Velasco; and from them taken by the States of the United Provinces, Anno 1628. 4 Burich, on the French side of the Rhene, over against Wesel, amongst goodly Corn-fields, and pleasant pastures. 5 Duisburg, or Twitburg, in Latine called Tento-burgum, a town of the ancient Germans, (as the name importeth) situate on the Rhene, betwixt the Angra and the Ruer, two noted Rivers. A Town formerly of great trading, and notably well built: Imperial, and one of the Hanse, but ceased to be Imperial when sold by Rodolph of Halsburg to Theodorick the ninth of that name, Earl of Cleve; together with 6 Cravenburg, another Town of this Dukedom, but of lesser note. 7 Emmerick, on the Rhene, a well-frequented Town, remarkable for a very fair School. 8 Rees, 9 Griet, and 10 Griethusen, all upon the Rhene. 11 Calcar, a Town more within the land, but not far from the River; grown wealthy by the trade of Clothing, and the best beer or ale in all these parts, sold thence abundantly into the Countrey round about. Not far from whence, at a place called Auf de Buern, it is supposed that Cesar Germanicus built his Bridge over the Rhene, when he went from Vetula Castra against the Marci, a Nation of Germany. 12 Gennep, upon the Niers or Nirfs, not far from its influx into the Mae: which together with Duisfeld and Rixewald were bought of Sigismund the Emperour by Adolph the first Duke of Cleve, for a great sum of money.

South of the Land of Cleve, betwixt it and Colen, lyeth the County of MILERS, extended all along on the banks of the Rhene; a distinct State, the Earl of which is subject to no other Prince, but the Emperour only: so called from Muer, the chief Town of it, situate on the French side of the Rhene, over against Duisburg. Next towns to which are, 2 Orsey, 3 Angur; of which little memorable. A small Territory, but in a very fruitful soil. The neighbourhood whereof to the Land of Colen (to 1475 13 William V. of Berg, and VI. of Gulick, son of Gerrard.

1511 14 Mary, daughter and heir of William, Dutchess of Gulick, and Berg, conveyed the whole Estate in marriage to John the 3. Duke of Cleve, and Earl of Mark, continuing in that Family till the expiration of it in the person of John William, the last Prince hereof, Anno 1610.

4. The Earldom of MARCH, or MARK, hath on the East, and North, Westphalia; on the West, the Dukedom of Cleve; on the South, that of Berg, or Mont. So called as being seated in the Marches of Westphalen, out of which it was taken. The Countrey for the most part like the rest of Westphalen, more fit for Pasturage than Corn: woody, and yielding store of pannage to those herds of Swine, with which it plentifully abounds.

Chief places in it are, 1 Werden upon the River Ruer, on the edge of Westphalia, the people whereof get great wealth by grazing of Cattle. 2 Soest (in Latine, Sufatum) for wealth and greatness not inferior to any in Westphalen, (except Muster only) consisting of ten Parishes, and lording it over many rich and pleasant Villages. Anciently it belonged to the Bishops of Colen; but in the year 1444. did voluntarily yield it self to the Duke of Cleve, (being then Earl of March also) and by Duke John the 4th. courageously defended against those Prelates. 3 Arnsberg, a fine and pleasant site, used for a retiring place by the Electors of the Empire; possessed by the Trutmanni, a tribe of the Suevians, from whence first called Trutmania; and at last Tremonia. 4 Dortmund, (in Latine, Tremonia) a County anciently of it self, and held immediately of the Empire; possessed by the Trutmanni, a tribe of the Suevians, from whence first called Trutmania; and at last Tremonia. 5 Blancostein, built comendiously by Adolphus the fifth of that name, and first Earl of March; as was also 6 Hum, or Hammon. 7 Unna, of which nothing memorable. 8 Altena, the first title of the Earls of this house, before they assumed that of the Earls of March, assumed first by Adolphus the 4th, on the Conquest of some Lands in the Marches of Westphalen, continuing in that Family till united with Cleve.

As for the Earldom or Dukedom of CLEVE, out of which it was taken, and to which the rest of those Estates did in time accrue; it was one of the most ancient Estates or Principalities in these parts of the world; continuing in a direct line for the space of 900 years: held by them of the Kings of France; and afterwards of the Kings of Lorraine, till the incorporating of that Kingdom with the German Empire. Begun first by Elias Grallius, companion to Charles Martel, in his wars against the Frisons, Saxons, and Bavarians; whose son Theodorick added hereto by marriage the County of Teisterbant, containing the Towns and Signewies of Altena, in Westphalen; as also of Bornel, Hensden, Buren, Culemborg, in the Belgick Provinces. By Baldwin the sixth Earl was added the territory of Twentzen (in Latine, Regio Twentana) given him by Ludovicus Pius; by Theodorick the fifth, the Town and Signewy of Duislack, settled upon him on his marriage with Maidla, the heir thereof: by Theodorick the 9th, the County of Hulkenrade, near Nuys in the Land of Colen; together with the Towns of Duisburg, and Culemborg, bought of Rodolphus Halspurgensis: by John his son, the Town and territory of Keiswerd, bought of Charles the 4th. By Adolph the 29th Earl, the Earldom of March, formerly taken out of it, was again united: by Adolph his successor, (made the first Duke hereof by the Emperour Sigismund, Anno 1417.) the Lordships of Gennep, Duisfels, and Reixwald, bought of the said Emperour; together with the County of Ravensstein, the Towns of Leoburg, Limers and Hatteren, for the ransom of William Duke of Berg, and other noble persons taken prisoners by him, Anno 1397. By John the first Duke of that name, the Town and Territory of Soest; and finally by John the 3d, the Dukedoms of Berg and Gulick, as heir thereof by his mother Mary, sole daughter and heir of William the fifth and sixth, the last Duke thereof. To which great height this ancient and noble Family had not long attained, and thereby made themselves and their sons and daughters fit matches for the greatest Princes: But it pleased God to bring it to its fatal end, and by that means to dissipate this brave estate in the hands of strangers; as shall be shewed in the conclusion of this Catalogue of

1309 26 Otho, son of Theodorick.

1325 27 Theodorick X. Brother of Otho.

1325 28 John, brother of Theodorick, and Canon of Colen; the last of the masculine issue of Elias Grallius.

29 Adolphus, the VII. of March, Son of Adolph the 6. of March, and Mary of Cleve, first Archbishop of Colen, (as six of this house of March had been (almost) successively before him) succeeded on the death of his Uncle John, to the Earldom of Cleve; inaugurated thereunto by Charles the 4th.

1389 30 Adolph II. of Cleve, and VIII. of March, created the first Duke of Cleve by the Emperour Sigismund, at the Council of Constance, Anno 1417.

1443 31 John III. son of Adolph Duke of Cleve, Earl of March, and Lord of Ravensstein.

1481 32 John II. of the rank of Dukes, and the IV. of the Earls.

1521 33 John III. Duke of Cleve, and Earl of March, &c. by descent from his Father; and Duke of Gulick and Berg in right of his wife, daughter and heir of William the last Duke thereof.

1539 34 William, son of John the 3d, and Mary his wife, daughter and sole heir of William the last Duke of Gulick and Berg: Father of the Lady Anne of Cleve, one of the wives of Henry the 8. of England. He contended very strongly against Charles the fifth for the Dukedom of Geldres; but being too weak for so great an Adversary, made his submission to him at Venlo, and so saved his Estates.

1584 35 John William, son of the former William, during the life of Charles Frederick his elder brother, was Bishop of Munster; on whose death, Anno 1575. he resigned that dignity, and in the end succeeded his Father in his whole Estates; which he managed with great piety and prudence till the year 1610: and then died issueless. The last of that ancient and noble Family of the Dukes of Cleve. After whose death, much quarrel and contention grew about the succession; betwixt the several competitors and pretenders to it: of which the principal were, 1 Leopold Archduke of Austria, pretending an investiture from the Emperour Rodolphus in the Dukedom of Juliers, to whom for want of heirs males, the Estate was said to be escheated. 2 John George, Duke of Saxony, descended from Sibyl, daughter of Duke John the third: at whose marriage with John Frederick the Elector of Saxony, Anno 1535. it was said to have been solemnly agreed upon, that on the failing of the heirs males of Cleve, the issue of that marriage should succeed therein. 3 George William Duke of Prussia, son of John Sigismund the Elector of Brandenburg by the Lady Anne his wife; eldest daughter of Albert of Brandenburg Duke of Prussia, and of Maria Eleonora, the eldest sister and next heir of the Duke deceased. 4 Wolfgangus Guilielmus, Palatine of Newburg, son of Magdalen, the younger sister of that Mary, who claimed the Estate as nearest Kinsman by one degree, to the said last Duke. And though the right seemed most apparently on the side of Brandenburg; the Estate in truth pretended by the Duke of Saxony, being formerly cut off by Imperial authority; and that pretended to by the Duke of Newburg, not of force in Germany: yet being that Leopold was in Arms, and had already forced a possession of Juliers, and of most parts of that Countrey; the two Princes of Brandenburg and Newburg soon agreed the controversy, and by the help of the Protestant Princes their Confederates, recovered the greatest part of it from the hands of Leopold. But the Palatine of Newburg not content with his partage, first married with a daughter of the Duke of Bavaria, then reconciled himself to the Church of Rome; called in the Spanish Arms under the command of Marquess Spinola; to abet his quarrel: which which made George William, son of the Elector of Brandenburg, and the Lady Anne, to call in the Forces of the States, under the command of Maurice Earl of Nassau, after Prince of Orange. The issue of which war was this, that Spinola possessed himself of Wesel, Aken, Mulheim, Dusseldorp, and most other places of importance in Berg and Gulick; and the States got into their power the Towns of Gulick, with Ries and Emmerick in the Dukedom of Cleve; and almost the whole County of Mark. And though most parts of these Estates had been delivered since to the rightful Owners: yet other places of importance are detained from them. Which, notwithstanding that they both pretend to keep them for the use of those Princes, in whose cause they stood; yet when such strong parties keep the Scales, it is most easie to determine who will win the game: Such alterations as have happened in the chance of War, by the reciprocal winning and losing of some Towns on both sides, not much conducing to the benefit of the rightful Owners.

The Arms of these Princes were 1. Gules, over an Esccheon in Fesse Argent; a Carbuncle pierced, Pommelled, and flowred Or, for the Dukedom of Cleve. 2. Or, a Lion Azure armed Gules; for the Dukedom of Gulick. The Arms of Berg and Mark I have no where found.

2. The Estates of the three ELECTOR-BISHOPS.

Adjoining to the Estates of Cleve are those of the Spiritual Electors of the Empire of Germany, Colen, Ments, and Triers; not so contiguous and continuous as those of Cleveland, and therefore to be laid out severally by their merces and boundaries: And first for

1. COLEN-LAND, or the Estate of the Archbishop and Elector of Colen, is bounded on the East, with the Dukedom of Berg, from which divided by the Rhene; on the West, with Gulick; on the North, with Cleve it self, and the County of Muers; and on the South, extending to the Land of Triers. The ancient Inhabitants hereof were the Ubii, in former times possessed of the Countreys of Berg and March; But being warred on by the Germans bordering next upon them, they were by the Clemency of Agrippa, then Lieutenant of Gaul, received into protection, and by him placed along the French side of the Rhene, as well for defence of the borders of the Roman Empire, as for their own security against that Enemy. Won from the Romans by the French in the reign and under the conduct of Childerick, Anno 412. or thereabouts; and from the French by the Emperor Otho the first, An. 949. By Otho the 2d, made a part of the Dukedom of Lorraine, or at the least given by him unto Charles of France, the first Duke thereof. After whose death, decealing without issue male, the Town of Colen, and many other pieces upon the Rhene, were seized on by Otho the 3d, and by him restored to the Empire, Since that time, the City of Colen hath remained Imperial, and of late times incorporated amongst the Hanse-Towns; but the territory near unto it, and a great part of Westphalen, subject immediately to the Bishop. The Bishops See first founded here by S. Maternus, one of the Disciples of S. Peter, as hath been constantly affirmed by old tradition: but howsoever an Episcopal See without all question, in the time of Constantine; Maternus, Bishop hereof, subscribing amongst others to the Council of Arles, An. 326. And being Colen was in those times the Metropolis of the Province of Germania Secunda, the Bishop had the power of a Metropolis, according to the rule and observation too often mentioned. Afterwards when the Empire was made Elective, these Bishops, with their brethren of Ments and Triers, were made three of the seven, which were to nominate and elect the succeeding Emperour: after which time it is no wonder that they grew both in Power and Patrimony.

Places of most importance within this Electorate, are 1. Bonn, situate on the banks of the Rhene, in the most pleasant and fruitful place of all the Countrey; the ordinary residence of the Archbishop, whose House or Palace here, is said to be one of the fairest in all Germany. By Tacitus called Bonna, and sometimes Castra Bonnenfis, the wintering Camp in his time, of the six Legion. 2. Nuy, by the same writer called Novesium, (Nivefia by Antoninus) feared on the Erp, not far from its fall into the Rhene; the break-neck of the glories of Charls Duke of Burgundy: who being resolved to get this Town into his hands, as a convenient pass into Germany, lay so long before it, that he lost the opportunity of joyning with King Edward the 4th of England, whom he had purposely invited to the war of France, and yet was fain to go without it. By means whereof he grew so low in reputation, that he was undermined by the French, defied by the Lorraine, forsook by the English, baffled by the Switzers, and at last overthrown and slain by that beggerly Nation. 3. Ernae, or Andernach, by Marcellinus called Antenacum; one of the ten Garrisons erected by the Romans on the banks of the Rhene, to secure their Province from the Germans: the other nine being Confluentz, Boppert, Worms, Bing, Zabern, Altrip, Sels, Strauburg, and Wassenberg. 4. Lintz, seated on the same River also. 5. Santina, a Town of good repute. 6. Zulp, now a village of no esteem, but for the Antiquities of it, by Tacitus and Antoninus called Tolbiacum; most memorable for the great victory which Clovis the first Christian King of the French, (upon a vow made in the heat of the fight to embrace the Gospel) obtained against the whole power of the Almans, never presuming after that to invade his territories. 7. Rhinburg, the commonly called Berk, the most Northern Town of all the Bishoprick, situate on the Rhene (as the name imports) there where the lands of this Bishop, as also of the Dukes of Cleve, and the Earls of Muers, meet upon a point. A Town which for these 60 years hath been of little use or profit to the right Owner, possessed sometimes by the Spaniards, sometimes by the confederate States; for each commodiously seated, as opening a passage up the River, and receiving great customs on all kind of Merchandise passing to and fro. But having finally been possessed by the Spaniard from the year 1606, till 1633, it was then regained for the States by Henry of Nassau, Prince of Orange, with the loss of no more than 60 men: there being found in the Town 30 Brads pieces of Ordnance,

Triers.

70 barrels of powder, with victuals and ammunition of all sorts thereunto proportionable. 8. Colen, situate on the Rhene, first built by the Ubii before mentioned, and by them called Opidum Ubiorum; afterwards in honour of Agrippina (daughter of Germanicus, and wife of Claudius) who was here born, made a Roman Colony, and called Colonia Agrippina; and sometimes by way of eminency, Colonia only; thence the name of Colen. A rich, large, populous, and magnificent City, containing about five miles in compass, in which are numbered 19 Hospitals, 37 Monasteries of both Sexes, 30 Chappels of our Lady, 9 Parishes, and 10 Collegiat Churches, besides the Cathedral, being a Church of vast greatness, but of little beauty, and not yet finished; the Metropolis whereof is Chancellor of Italy, the second of the three Electors; and writes himself Duke of Westphalen and Angrivaria. Nigh to this Town did Cesar with incredible expedition make a bridge over the Rhene, which more terrified the barbarous enemy than the reports of his valour: so powerfull is laborious industry, that it overcometh all disasters, and maketh the most unpassable waters yield to Heroick resolutions.

In this Town also is said to lie the bodies of the three wise men, which came from the East to worship our Saviour; vulgarly called the three Kings of Colen. The whole story is at large written in rabies, which are fastned unto their Tombs. The pith whereof is this. The first of them called Melchior, an old man with a large beard, offered Gold as unto a King; The second called Gaspax, a bearded young man, offered Frankincense, as unto God; The third called Balthasar with a spreading beard, offered Myrrhe as unto a Man ready for his Sepulchre. That they were of Arabia, the fable saith, is probable; First, because they came from the East; and so is Arabia in respect of Hierusalem: And 2ly, because it is said in the 72 Psalm, The Kings of Arabia shall bring gifts. As for their bodies, they are there said to have been translated by Helena, the mother of Constantine, unto Constantinople; from thence by Eusebius Bishop of Milain, removed unto Milain; and finally brought hither by Rainoldus Bishop hereof, Anno 1164. This is the substance of the History; which for my part I reckon amongst the Apocrypha, (except it be their coming from some part of Arabia) but have not leisure in this place to retell the Fable.

As for the temporal Estate of the Bishops of Colen, it came unto them specially by the munificence of the Emperours of the house of Saxony; the Dukedom of Engern, containing a good part of Westphalen, being acquired unto this See by Bruno, once Archbishop hereof, one of the younger Sons of the Emperour Henry the first, tirnamed the Fowler, with the consent of Otho the first, his elder brother. To which was added, not long after, the whole Land of Colen (as we have formerly described it) by Otho the 2d; which being formerly a part of the Kingdom of Lorraine, was taken out of it, and settled on the Bishops hereof, at such time as the Dukedom of Lorraine was erected by him: Such pieces only as are found on the other side of the Rhene (neither great nor many) being added by the wit and industry of the following Bishops: Exceedingly increased both in Power and Patrimony by the addition of Leige to this Electorate: it being of late the constant custom of the Canons of Leige, to choose the Archbishop of Colen for their Prince and Pastor.

Next to the Bishoprick of Colen lieth the land of TRIERS, extended all along the course of the Moselle, from the Dukedom of Lorraine on the South, beyond the influx of that River into the Rhene at the City of Confluentz, where it bordereth on the Land of Colen: and being bounded on the East with Luxembourg; as on the West, with that part of Franconia which lieth below the confluence of the said two Rivers; and is now called Rhinogowm; more Southward on that side with the Countrey of Wistrach, and the Dukedom of Zweibruck, parts of the Palatinate of the Rhene. The Countrey towards Lorraine, and Luxembourg, somewhat wilde and barren; more fruitful about Triers it self, and the bank of the Rhene; in all parts generally more pleasant than profitable, the greatest riches of it lying in Woods and Minerals. The Bishops See here first erected by Encherius, a Disciple and follower of S. Peter. The reality whereof, not only testified by the Martyrologies, but by Methodius, a writer of approved credit; who adds Valerius and Maternus for his next successors; the line Episcopal continuing till the Council of Arles, Anno 326. Agrippinus Bishop of Triers subscribing to the Acts thereof. From this time forwards, and before, the Bishop had the reputation and authority of a Metropolis, the City of Triers being anciently the Metropolis of Belgica prima, within which it stands. Increased exceedingly by being made one of the three Electors of the Spirituality, though the last in order, and Chancellor to the Emperour for the Realm of France: the Fortunes of which Realm it followed, till wretched from it, with the rest of the Kingdom of Lorraine, by the German Emperours.

Places of most importance in it are, 1. Confluentz, now Cobolentz, the Confluence of Antoninus, so called because feared on the confluence or meeting of the Rhene and the Moselle; the station anciently of the first Legion. A populous and well-built Town; and seated in a pleasant and fertile Countrey. 2. Emmeltstein, over against Cobolentz, on the other side of the Rhene, beautified with a strong Castle of the Bishops, mounted upon a lofty hill, which not only gives a gallant prospect to the eye, but commands both the Town and River. 3. Boppert, seated on the Rhene, and called so quasi Banport, from the commodiousness of the Creek (upon which it standeth) for the use of shipping: one of the Ports (as Confluentz before mentioned was) erected by the Romans on the Rhene, for defence of Gaul against the Germans; occasioning in time both Towns. It was once miserably waited by Richard Earl of Cornwall, and King of the Romans, because the Bishop of Triers agreed not unto his Election; but soon recovered of those hurts. The ancient name hereof in the Itinerary of Antoninus, is supposed to be Bodobrica: pawned to the Bishops of Triers by Henry the 7th and not yet redeemed. 4. Sarbrucken, on the edge of Lorraine (by Antoninus called Pons Sarvia) seated on the River or Brook called Sar, (whence it had the name) at the fall thereof into the Moselle: possessed at the present by a branch of the house of Nassau (but Homagers of this Electour) entitled hence according to the Dutch fashion, Counts

Triers.

Counts of Nassau in Sarbruck, 5 Veldents, and 6 Belftern on the Moselle, of which nothing memorable. 7 Treves, or Triers, in Latine Treveris, the principal City of the Treveri, who possessed this tract; seated upon the Moselle also, the Metropolis of the Province of Belgica Prima, and honoured with the residence of the Vicar or Lieutenant General, for the whole Diocese of Gaul; by consequence the seat of a Metropolitan when it submitted to the Gospel. Of such antiquity, that it is said to have been founded 150 years before the City of Rome: of no great beauty of it self, and as little trading; the River not being capable of ships of burden; and the air generally to cloudy and inclined to rain, that it is by some called merrily Clauca Planetarum. It passed sometimes among the number of Imperial Cities, but now acknowledgeth the Elector for the Lord thereof; by whom made an University, one of the ancientest in all Germany, and of as much repute for the study of good Arts and Sciences, as the best amongst them. 8 Ober-Wesel, or Vefalia Superior, so called to distinguish it from Wesel in the Dukedom of Cleve, which is Vefalia inferior, or the Under-wesel: the furthest place of this District, seated on the Rhene, not far from Baccharach, a Town of the Palatinate; of no great note, but that it is accounted for a Town Imperial.

This Countrey anciently was part of the great and famous Earldom of Moselle, denominated from the River Moselle, along the course whereof it was first erected. An Estate founded by the differēt fons of Clodion, second King of the French, at the same time (and on the same occasion also) in which the Earldom of Ardenne was erected by them; of which we have already spoken when we were in Belgium. This of the two the more obnoxious to the power of the Kings of Metz, as lying nearer to the Court, and so more in sight: the other being further off, in Countries far less cultivate, but more defensible. This Earldom comprehending, besides this of Triers, the Countries of Sveinbrucken and West-reich, and so much of the Lower Palatinate as lieth on the French side of the Rhine, occasioned the Princes of it to be much looked after; and they maintained their Part to the very last; inasmuch that Gisbert or Gilbert Earl of Moselle, in the time of the Emperour Henry the first, surnamed the Fowler, was thought by him a fit Husband for his daughter Gerberg; married after his decease to Lewis surnamed Transmarine King of France, and Gertrude, daughter of Theodorick, who came after Gilbert, married to Henry surnamed Gozlo Duke of Saxony and Bavaria, and by him made the mother of another Henry, Successor unto Otho the 3d, in the Roman Empire. Impoverished not a little both in power and patrimony by the erection of the Dukedom of Lorraine, there grew some feuds between those houses; occasioning the death of Albert another of these Earls, slain (as it is said by Lazius) by Godfrey son to Godfrey of Bonillon Duke of Lorraine: more probably by some other Prince of the house of Ardenne, is not being found in any other approved Author, that Godfrey of Bonillon was the Father of any Children. But this difference being reconciled by the marriage of Bertha daughter of Simon Earl hereof, with Thierry, the 5th Duke of Lorraine, and the family of these Earls expiring in a short time after; this part of the Estate was seized on by the Bishops of Triers; that part of the Palatinate which lieth on the Gallic side of the Rhene, by the Bishops of Metz, Spire, Worms, and the Princes Palatine; the rest being taken in by the Dukes of Lorraine, who do still enjoy it: the Emperours of those times being either willing to it, or not able to help it.

3. The Bishoprick of MENTZ, is not laid out by bounds and limits as the other ; becaufe the Patrimony and Eitate thereof doth not lie together : dispersed for the moſt part about Franconia, intermixed with the Lands and Towns of the Princes Palatine, the Biſhops of Wormes, Spire, and others. So that the temporal Eitate of this Elektor is every way inferiour unto thoſe of Trier, and Colen ; ſuperior unto both in place and dignity : he being the firſt in rank of the whole Electoral Colledge, Chancellor for the Empire, and in all meetings ſiteth at the right hand of the Emperour. The Biſhops ſee firſt placed here, as ſome report, by S. Creſcent, one of the Diſciples of S. Paul, of whoſe being ſent by him into Gallia (for ſo the ancient writers underſtand Galatia) the Apoſtle ſpeaketh, 2 Tim. 4. Though others with more probability ſet him at Vienna in Dauphine. But whether it were here or there, certain it is, that anciently this City was a See Episcopall ; Martine the Biſhop hereof ſubſcribing to the Acts of the Council of Colen, Anno 347. And if a Biſhop, certainly a Metropolitan Biſhop, this City being in thoſe times the Metropolis of the Province of Germania Prima. But Chriſtianity being worn out of theſe parts of Germany, by the conqueſts of the French, Almans, and other Infidels, was again reſtored in this tract by Boniſace, an Engliſhman, the firſt Archbiſhop of Mentz of this new plantation, (in and about the time of Peppin, ſirnamed the Groſs, Maire of the Palace to the French Kings, and Father of Martel) who for the Orthodoxy of his doctrine, and the number of Churches planted by him, hath been deſervedly honoured with title of the Apoſtle of Germany.

Towns of most note belonging to the Bishops hereof are, 1 Mentz it self, the Metropolitaneum of the Ancients, so called from the River of Maine, formerly Mogus and Moganus in the Latine (now better known by the name of Main) opposite to the fall whereof into the Rhene it was built of old; so having the command of both Rivers: for that cause made the seat of a Roman Officer, commonly called the Duke of Mentz, who had a charge of the Frontiers; and especially of those ten Garrisons planted on the banks of the Rhene, spoken of before. Stretched out in great length on the River side, but not of answerable breadth; well built, and populous towards the water, in other parts not so well inhabited. The publick buildings generally very large and beautifull, the houses, built according to the old Roman model; the most magnificent whereof is the Bishops Palace, who is the immediate Lord both of the Town and Territory, extended on both sides of the Rhene, fruitful in all natural commodities, and abounding with most excellent wines. Of good note also for an University here founded by Theodorick, one of the Electors: but especially for the Art of Printing which was here invented or perfected at the least, and made fit for use. 2 Bing seated on the Rhine, another of the

the Garrison Towns erected by the Romans on the banks of that River. In a small Island of which, not far from this town, is a Tower, or Castle, called the Montfirth; i. e. the tower of Mice: built by one Hans (or Hanno) Archbishop of Metz, A. D. 900: or thereabouts. Who in a year of great scarcity pre-tending to relieve the poor people oppressed with Famine, caused them to be gathered together into an old Barn, where he burnt them all; saying, they were the Rats and Mice which devoured the Corn. After which barbarous act he was so persecuted by these Vermin that to avoid them, he was fain to build a Palace in the midst of the Rhene, whither the Rats and Mice followed him, and at last devoured him. 3 Leunfeins & Harford, 5 Oxenford, 6 Alderburg, 7 Middleburg, 8 Carlostadt, the birth-place of Cargel, Stadius, of great note in the time of Luther. 9 Bischoffstein, 10 Königsberg (Monti Regis in Latin) the birth-place of Johannes de Monte Regio, a famous Mathematician, as appears by his Comment upon the Ptolemaic Astronomy. Most of which Towns being in Frankland, though of this Electorate, were not gained in gross by these Electors, as were the Land of Colen, and Diocese of Triers, but piece-meal in a manner; and by retail, partly upon the failer of the house of Schiden Dukes of Francony also, partly by the munificence of the German Emperours, but especially by making the best use of their Votes and Suffrage in the Choice of Emperours, which they did not part withall for nothing: Such Towns as hereof, as lie on the French side of the Rhene, gained by like means upon the expiration of the house of Mosle.

3. THE PALATINATE OF THE RHINE

The PALATINATE of the RHENE is bounded upon the East, with the Dukedom of Wurtemberg, and some part of Francony; with the residue thereof, and the River Main, upon the North; on the South, with Elsass, or Alsatia; and on the West, with the Land of Triers: extended in length from Comb to Genshheim, north and South, 72 miles; and in breadth from Sweibrucken to Lutzerath, East and West, 90 miles.

It is called also the Lower Palatinate, to difference it from the Palatinate of Bavaria, which is called the Upper : the Palatinate of the Rhene, because lying on the banks of that famous River. The whole Country is said to be the most pleasant part of all Germany, stored with all sorts of Fruits and Metals, abounding with those cool Wines, which growing on the banks of the Rhene, have the name of Rhenish, adorned with many goodly Towns, both for strength, populousness, and beauty ; and finally watered with the famous River of the Rhene, and the Nieck.

The Religion of this Country; and that of the Upper Palatinate which depends upon it, hath much varied since the first Reformation established by Frederick the second, according to the Form and Doctrine of the Confession of Augspurg: the Doctrine and discipline of Calvin being introduced by Frederick the third; the Lutheran Forms restored again by Leopold or Ludowick the fifth: after his death exchanged by Frederick the fourth for that of Calvin; as more conducing to the ends of some needy Swiss; who could not otherwise raise their Fortunes than by invading the Tiethen and Gleichen, and other poor remainders of the Churches Patrimony. Of which the Clergy being universally deprived throughout this Country, and reduced to miserable short stipends, by the name of a Competency, became so contemptible, and neglected by all sorts of men, that at the last the Church of the Palatinate was in the same condition with the Church of Israel, under the reign of Jeroboam, when Priests were made out of the meanest of the people. And for the Government of the Churches, though moulded to the Genevian Plat-form, as near as it might be, yet were those Princes loth to leave too much power in the hands of the Elderships; and therefore did appoint some superiour Officers to have an eye on them, whom they called Inspectors & Prepositi; their power being much the same with that of the particular Superintendent amongst the Lutherans; and over them a standing Consistory consisting of three Ministers, and as many Councillers of State, of the Princes nominating, who in his name were to take care of all things which concerned the Church. A temperament for which they were beholding to Kristian, a Doctor of Physick in the University of Heidelberg; who made this Pill to purge Presbytery of some Papish humours, which secretly lay hid in the body of it. But this whole modell and Religion of the Country is much changed of late, and the Religion of the Church of Rome restored in most parts thereof, since the Conquest of them by the Spaniards, and Bavarians, which before we spake of.

Chief Towns hereof, 1 Moffbach, a pretty neat town on the banks of the Neccar, and a Præfecture not far from the borders of Wirtemberg; 2 Ladenberg, near the influx of the same River into the Rhein; the moiety whereof was bought by Ruperts, the Emperour and Palatine, of the Earls of Hanau, Anno 1371, the other moiety belonging to the Bishop of Wormes. 3 Winnebene, a small town not far from Ladenberg, belonging once to the Archbishop of Mentz; but on some controversy arising about the title, adjudged unto the said Ruperts, and his heirs for ever. 4 Sorleffen, in the same tract, well seated, but not very large, fold with the Castle of Siralberg to the said Ruperts, by Sifride (or Sigifride) of Siralberg, the right heir hereof, Anno 1347. 5 Heidelberg, on the right shore of the Neccar (going down the water) compassed on three sides with Mountains, and lying open only towards the West, which makes the air hereof to be very unhealthy. The chief beauty of it lyeth in one long Street, extended in length from East to West; on the South-east side whereof is a fair and pleasant Market-place; and not far off a very high Mountain called Konningfels (that is to say, the Kingly seat) upon the middle ascent whereof is the Castle; where the Princes Electors use to keep their Courts; and on the very summit or top thereof, the ruins of an old Tower blown up with Gunpowder. A Town of no great bigness, nor very populous, there being but one Church, in it, which was used in the time of my Author for Prayer and Preaching: the rest being either ruined, or employed unto Palatinate of the Rhene. unto other uses, if not repaired again, since the Spaniards became masters of it, for more frequent Masses. Howsoever, it hath the reputation of being the chief City of this Palatinate; not long since furnished with a great and gallant Library, which for choice and number of Books (especially Manuscripts) was thought not to be followed in all Europe, till matched, if not over-matched by the famous Bodleian Library of Oxford: most of them, to the great prejudice of the Protestant cause, being carried to Rome, and other places of that party, when the Town was taken by Spaniards, Anno 1620. Finally for the Town it self, it was once part of the possessions of the Bishop of Wormes, from whom it was taken by the Palatines; and it is now famous, for being the seat of the Palatines, the sepulchre of Rodolphus Agricola, and for an University founded by the Emperour, and Palatine Rupertus, Anno 1346. 6 Baccharach, on the Banks of Rhene, so called, quasi Baccharach, for the excellent Wines: 7 Coub, on the other side of the water; near unto which is the old and fair Castle called Psaltis, from whence the name Psaltis-grave or Psaltis, seemeth to some to have been derived. 8 Openheim, a strong Town, which together with Keisers-Lautern, and Ingelheim, were given to the Palatines by Wenceslaus: and after seated on them, by Rupertus the Emperour and Palatine, for 100000 Florens, Anno 1402. 9 Crutznacke, called anciently Stauponesus, 10 Frankendale, lately a Monastery only, but being well peopled by Hugh of the Netherlands, which to avoid the fury of the Duke of Aves, fled hither, is now a town of principal strength. 11 Gernerheim, and 12 Manheim, a well fortified Town, seated on the confluence of Rhene and Neckar.

On the Eastern part of the Countrey standeth 13 Laden, situate on the little River Tubernus, the furthest bound of the Palatinate towards the North-east, there adjoining to the rest of Frankenland. And on the West side the Towns of 14 Neustadt, 15 Keisers-Lautern, in Latine called Cæsarea Lutra, once a Town Imperial; from which, and from its situation on the River Luter, it received this name. 16 Swibruncken, invell'd with a large and ample Territory round about, called the Countrey of Swiebrock; the patrimony and title of a younger House of the Psaltis-graves, whom the Latine writers call Principes Bisthami: the French, the Princes of Dewsponts. 17 Simmeron on the North-west points of it, whereto meets with the District of Triers; the title of another branch of the Palatine Family, called the Dukes of Simmeron, situate in that part of the Countrey which is called West-reich, of which Zweibruncken is also part. In all these are contained within the Palatinate 24 walled Towns, and 12 fair Palaces of the Prince: most of which they have added to their Estate within little more than 400 years. Such excellent managers have they been of their own Estates, so potent in ordering the affairs of the Empire both in war and peace, and so ingrafted themselves into the most notable Families of Germany, that I may well say with Trenicus, Non est alia Germaniae familia, cui plus debeat nobilitas.

Within the limits of this Countrey, and intermingled with the Lands of the Princes Palatine, are the Bishopricks of Spire and Worms: both ancient, and of great Revenue, but feudatories for a great part of their Estates, to these Electors. Of these, more towards the head of the Rhene, and on the Gallick side thereof, stands the City of Spire, by Ptolomy called Neomagus, from the newness of the building when that name was given; by Antoninus, Civitas Nemeturum, from the Nemetes, who possessed this tract; and sometimes Spira, by which name it doth still continue. A Town Imperial, and anciently a Bishop's See; Tessir the Bishop hereof subscribing to the Act of the Council of Colem, Anno 347. A neat Town, and very delectably seated. Of great resort, by reason of the Imperial Chamber, the sovereign Court of Judicature of all the Empire; capable of Appeals from the Tribunals of all the Princes and free States thereof. A Court which first followed the Emperour in all his Removes (as anciently the Kings Bench in England) by Maximilian the Emperour first made Sedentary, and fix'd at Frankfort; removed after to Wormes, and finally to this City by Charles the fifth. Sufficiently famous in that the name of Protestants was here taken up, given to the Princes and free Cities following the reformed Religion, upon their legal Protestation here exhibited. More down the water, and on the same shore thereof, stands the City of Wormes, one of those built upon the Rhene, for defence of Gaul against the Germans; by Ptolomy called Berbetomagus; by Antonine, Civitas Wormensis, whence the modern name, but generally Civitas Vangionum, from the Vangiones, the old Inhabitants of those parts, whose chief City it was. A Town Imperial as the former, and a See Episcopal as that is, and as ancient too; Viktor the Bishop hereof subscribing to the Acts of the Council of Colem, before mentioned. A Town to be observed for the first appearance which Luther made before Charles the fifth, (the Imperial Chamber then being holden in this City:) who being dissuaded from that journey by some of his Friends, returned this resolute Answer, That goe he would, though there were as many Devils in the Town, as there were tiles on the Houses. Chief Towns belonging to these Bishops, are 1 Udenheim, a Town belonging to the Bishop of Spire, whose residence it sometimes is: conveniently seated for the command of the Countrey, and therefore upon some design which was then in hand, fortified strongly by the Bishop. But this new Fortification being begun in a time of peace, gave great occasion of distrust to the neighbouring Princes; who interposed with Frederick the fifth, then Prince Elector, (of whom held in chief) to cause the Bishop to desist from the finishing of it. Which when he had refused to do, pleading a Placard from the Emperour Matthias, to compleat the work; the Prince Elector, with the rest of the Confederates, beat it down by force: for this contempt, cited to Spire the Imperial Chamber, in which it was also resolved to proceed suddenly, and severely to their condemnation. One of the chief motives which occasioned that unfortunate Prince to entertain the offer of the Crown of Bohemia; and consequently a chief cause of the German Wars. In managing whereof this Town was thought so commodious, that Marquess Spinola caused the works to be raised again, made it the strongest hold in all those Countreys, and caused it to be called by the name of Phillipsberg. 2 Rotenberg, originally belonging to the Bishops of Spire, but of late times possessed by the Princes Palatine. Others of lesser note I forbear to mention.

The first Inhabitants of this Countrey on the French side of the Rhene, were the Nemetes, and Vangiones spoken of before; on the other side, the Intueri. That on the West side of the River, first conquered by the Romans, and from them by the French; of whose Empire it remained a part, but so that it was subject more immediately to the Earls of Moselle, first under the Sovereignty and Vassallage of the Kings of Metz, and after of the Kings of Lorraine. In the dividing of which Kingdom between the Emperours of Germany and the Kings of France, it became subject to the Empire, but still possessed by those of Moselle as it was before. Elcheating to the Empire on the expiration of that Family, partly by force of Arms, partly by paying down ready Money, and partly too by selling of their voices, as they saw occasion, it was gained by the Electors Palatine: and so was also that part of it, which lies on the Dutch side of the Rhene, which being anciently and properly a part of the Frankenland, followed the Fortunes of that Countrey, till the fall of the House of Schwaben, and then divided unto the Emperors as the other did. By little and little got into the hands of the Princes Palatine, who being originally Officers of the Emperours Household (such as the Maires of the Palace to the French Kings at the first institution) had first the honour of Counts Palatine bestowed upon them; and afterwards the place of an Elector, in the choice of the Emperour. But where their Estates then lay, where they fixed their dwelling, and what Provinces or people they had subject to them; Nulla inventi scriptura, I could never find any good Record to build on, saith the learned Mannker: their habitation and possession in and of these parts (acquired for the most part by Arms and Money) not being above 450 years standing at the utmost. Likely it is, they had their residence for the most part, in the Emperours Palace, living upon their Rents, (as other great Officers of Court in these later times) the dignity and authority of so great a place seeming sufficient to content them: but called Count Palatines of the Rhene, because their Jurisdiction and Authority lay most especially in those parts of the Empire, which were towards that River. Afterwards on the marriage of Otho, the second of that name, Duke of Bavaria, with Gertrude, the Daughter of Henry the Elector Palatine, this Office, with the Electoral dignity, fell into that House: possessed at that time of those parts of Franconia and the Earldom of Moselle, who not long after on the dividing of that Estate betwixt Rodolphus and Ludovicus, the Sons of Ludovicus the 24. Elector Palatine, and Duke of Bavaria; made up this Palatinate. A State which suddenly received a great augmentation, partly by the care and good husbandry of Rupertus, Emperour and Elector Palatine; partly by the weakness and ambition of Wenceslaus, Emperour and King of Bohemia; and partly by the valour of Frederick, the Prince Elector. Of these the first bought in the Towns of Winheim, Ladberg, Scrieffen, and the Castle of Stralberg, with their lands and territories. The second gave unto the Palatines, for their voices in his election, three strong Towns of the Empire, viz. Keisers-Lautern, Ingelheim, and Openheim: and the last took in Battell, Anno 1452. the Earl of Wirtemberg, the Marquess of Baden, the Bishop of Spire, and the Archbishop of Metz, and ransomed them on what condition he pleased. More particularly the Earl of Wirtemberg (for it was not yet erected into a Dukedom) payed for his ransom 100000 Florens. The Bishop of Meurs redeemed himself for 45000 Florens. The Bishop of Spire gave for his liberty, the Towns of Kottenberg and Wersau: And the Marquess of Baden yielded up in lieu of his freedom, the Countrey of Spanheim, of which Crutznack is a part; the Towns of Bessen, and Binheim; the right which he pretended to Eppingen, a Town over against Gernerheim; and his Royalties between this Gernerheim and Selts, a Town of Allsied, in fishing and hunting. So having brought these Princes unto their Estate; let us next take a view of those who have successively enjoyed both the State and Title, as far as we can go by the light Story.

ELECTORS Palatine of the RHENE.

A.Ch.

- 1 Henry, Count Palatine in the time of Otho the third, by whom ordained to be one of the six Electors.
- 2 Sigefride, the Son of Adelheid, wife of this Henry the Elector, by a former husband.
- 3 Ezeline, and Conrade, Sons of Sigefride.
- 4 Ludolphus, Son to Ezeline.
- 5 Conrade, Elector Palatine in the time of Henry the fifth.
- 6 Frederick, Son to Frederick Duke of Schwaben, Nephew to the Emperour Conrade the third.
- 7 Henry II. surnamed the Lion, Duke of Saxony and Bavaria.
- 1195 8 Henry III. Son of Henry the Lion, and Husband of Clementia, daughter of Conrade Duke of Schwaben, and Elector Palatine.
- 9 Henry IV. son of Henry the third, in the life of the Father, the last Elector Palatine of the nomination and appointment of the Emperour, the dignity from hence forwards becoming hereditary.
- 10 Otho, Duke of Bavaria, of that name the second, Elector Palatine of the Rhene, in right of Gertrude his Wife, Sister and next heir of Henry the fourth, whom he succeeded in the Electoral Dignity, confirmed therein by the Emperour Frederick the second.
- 1269 11 Ludovicus, Elector Palatine, and Duke of Bavaria, the Son of Otho.
- 1294 12 Rodolphus, the eldest Son of Lewis or Ludovicus, succeeded his Father in the Palatinate and Electoral dignity; Northgoia, or the Palatinate of Bavaria, being added to his party to make even the scale: his younger Brother Ludovicus succeeding in Bavaria.

- Palatinate. 1315 13 Adolphus, surnamed the Simple, resigned the Electoral dignity to his Brother Rodolphus, as the fitter man to undertake it.
- 1327 14 Rodolphus II. on the resignation of Adolphus.
- 1337 15 Rupertus, the Brother of Rodolphus the second, Founder of the University of Heidelberg, Anno 1346.
- 1385 16 Rupertus II. Son of Adolphus the Simple.
- 1398 17 Rupertus III. elected Emperour in the place of Wenceslaus King of Bohemia, Anno 1406. made Knight of the Garter by King Henry the fourth.
- 1410 18 Ludovicus II. surnamed Cæcus, and Barbatus, the eldest Son of Rupertus the Emperour, married Blanch, daughter to King Henry the fourth of England.
- 1439 19 Ludovicus III. Son of Lewis the second.
- 1451 20 Frederick, brother of Ludovicus, during the minority of Philip his said Brothers Son, succeeded in the Electoral dignity; and added much to that Estate by his personal virtue.
- 1478 21 Philip, the Son of Lewis the third, pretended to the Dukedom of Bavaria in right of Margaret his wife; but, after a long and bloody War, forced to go without it.
- 1508 22 Ludovicus IV. Son of Philip.
- 1544 23 Frederick II. brother of Lewis the fourth, who first introduced the Reformed Religion into the Palatinate.
- 1556 24 Otho-Henry, Son of Rupertus, the brother of Frederick, and Lewis, the last of the direct line of this House of Bavaria.
- 1559 25 Frederick III. Duke of Simmeren, descended from Stephen Palatine of Zweibruck or Bishop, younger son of the Emperour Rupert, succeeded on the decease of Otho-Henry without issue.
- 1576 26 Ludovicus V. Son of Frederick the third, a munificent Benefactor to the University of Heidelberg.
- 1583 27 Frederick IV. Son of Lewis the fifth, married Ludovica, or Loise, daughter of William, and sister of Maurice, Princes of Orange.
- 1610 28 Frederick V. Son of Frederick the 4th, married the Princess Eliz. daughter of James, King of Great Britain. In danger of being proscribed for demolishing the works of Idenheim, he accepted the Crown of Bohemia. But worsted at the battel of Prague, and warred upon by the Bavarian and the Spaniard, he lost both that, and his own native Estates and Dignities; of which deprived by Ferdinand the prevailing Emperour: the Lower Palatinate being assigned over to and conquered by the King of Spain, the Upper Palatinate, with the Electoral Dignity, bestowed on the Duke of Bavaria. Restored to the possession of the most part of his Countrey, by the power of the Swedes, he died at Mentz, November 29. 1632. the whole Countrey falling again not long after under the Power and Government of the former Conquerours.
- 1631 29 Charles Ludowick, the Heir both of his Fathers Estates, and misfortunes too; nor yet admitted to his Honours (contrary to the fundamental constitutions of the Empire, by which the Sons of the Electors and other Princes are not involved in the guilt of their Fathers offences;) but in fair hopes to be restored thereto in part, by the Pacificadus made at Almutter this present year, 1648. which I pray God to prosper for the peace of afflicted Christendom.

Now to proceed to the Civil State, and the concernment of these Princes. The Palsgravi hath many Prerogatives above the Electors of either sort. He taketh place of the Duke of Saxony and Marquess of Brandenburg; because Henry the Palatine, was descended of Charls the great: for which cause he is also in the vacancy of the Empire, Governour of the Western parts of Germany. In which Office he had power to alienate, or give Offices, to take fealty and homage of the Subjects; and which is most, to sit in the Imperial Courts, and give judgement of the Emperour himself. And look whatsoever shall in the vacancy of the Empire, be by the Palatines enacted, that the new Emperours are bound by Oath to confirm, and ratifie.

The Revenues of these Princes were conceived to be about 100000 l. per annum; nor could they be supposed at less: the Silver Mines about Amberg only in the Upper Palatinate, yielding 60000 Crowns a year, and the passage of one Bridge over the Rhene about 20000 Crowns more; besides the Demeasns Lands, and the Lands of the Church, incorporated (since the Reformation) into their Estate.

The Arms hereof are Diamond, a Lion Topace, Armed and Crowned Ruby.

4. ALSATIA.

ALSATIA or ELSATS, as the Dutch call it, is bounded on the East with the Rhene, which parteth it from the Marquisate of Baden, and some parts of Schwaben; on the West, with the Mountain Vange, or Vogesus, which separateth it from Lorraine; on the North with the Palatinate; on the South, (where it groweth very narrow) with a point of Switzerland. A Countrey for the pleasantness and fertility of it, inferior to none in Germany: called therefore Elfsat, (as some think) quasi Edelfsat, that that is to say, a noble Seat; derived more probably by others from the river Ill, the only River of note in all this tract; and called so, quasi Ill sat, the seat or situation on the river Ill.

It is divided generally into the Lower and Higher, to which the Countrey called Sungow may come in for a third. The LOWER ALSATIA is that which bordereth on the Palatinate, so called, because further off from the Mountains, and down the water in respect of the course of the Rhene. A Countrey so abundantly fruitful in wine and corn, (with which it furnisheth some parts of Germany, and not a few of the neighbour Countries) that it is generally called Germanie nutritrix, or the nurse of Germany; by Winphelgium, the Epitome or Abstract of it. Chief Towns therein are, 1 Strasburg, so called from the multitude of Streets (the Dutch call them Strats) anciently Argentoratus, and then Argentina, from the Roman Exchequer, or Receipt, here kept in the time of their greatness; or from some Mines of silver which were found about it. A stately, rich, and populous City, well stored with public garners and cellars of wine, against times of dearth. Situate on the two Rivers Ill and Brusch, where they both fall into the Rhene; by which, and by the helps of Art, very strongly fortified: Designed from the first foundation for a Town of War; this being another of the Towns which the Romans built, to defend the Rhene against the Germans. Now an Imperial City, and a See Episcopal, the Bishop whereof is Lord of the Lower Alsacia. The Church Cathedral, one of the fairest in all Germany: much famed for a Clock of most admirable workmanship, and a Steeple of as curious a frame as that, mounted 574 foot in height, the highest of any in Christendom; higher (if the measure of it be not mistaken) by 40 foot than the Steeple of S. Pauls in London, before the firing of it. Of this thus saith the Poet in Adrianus,

*Urbs præclara sitis ripis contermina Rheni,
Maxima cui celsæ metantur mania turris.*

Strasburg on *Rhene*s inamell'd banks doth lie, Whole Tower even bids defiance to the skie.

2 Zabern, or Elfat-Savern, the Taberna of Antonine and Marcellinus, another of the old Roman Garrisons; destroyed by the Almans, and repaired again by Julian the Apostata, then Emperour. Now the chief place of Residence for the Bishops of Strasburg, and well frequented in regard of the Courts of Justice, kept by his Officers in this City, for the Lower Alsacia. 3 Altrip, so called from Alta ripa, from the high banks of the river, on which it is seated; another of the Towns or Forts, which the Romans like politic conquerors built on the West side of the Rhene, to prohibit the incursions of the barbarous Nations. And so was 4 Seltz, seated on the Rhene betwixt Strasburg and Zabern; and 5 Weissemburg more towards the Palatinate, now a town Imperial, but seated on the river Lura, not far from its fall into the Rhene; encompassed with little hills and delightful groves, the River gently washing the walks thereof, and adding much to it both of strength and beauty. 6 Hagenau, between Seltz and Strasburg, but not so near unto the Rhene as either of them: first walled by Frederick Barbarossa, Anno 1164. and since that time of great importance for command of the Countrey; but seated in a sandy and unfruitful soil, frequented chiefly heretofore by the old Lantgraves of Elfsat for the commodities of hunting. More from the Rhene; 7 Stechfeld, corruptly so called for Steffansfeld, from the Monastery of S. Stephen there founded. 8 Haste on the Brusch, &c.

Places of most importance in the HIGHER ALSATIA, are 1. Rusach, on the river Ombach, belonging to the Bishops of Strasburg, of old called Rubeacum, from the red colour of the earth, well built, invironed with a double Suburb. In ancient times of great resort by the Roman nobility, much taken with the fruitfulness and pleasures of it: and well inhabited at this day, as is all the Countrey round about it, by reason of their vigorous proceedings against Thieves; from whence the Germans have a Proverb, that the old gallows at Rusach is made of oak. 2 Ensheim, or Ensfheim, on the river Ill, anciently the station of the tenth Legion, and then called Arancis; now of most note for the supreme Court of justice there held for Brissow, Sungow, and this part of Alsacia, by the Archdukes of Austria the chief Lords thereof. 3 Colmar, an Imperial City, raised out of the ruins of old Argentaria, destroyed by Attila and the Huns: well built, and situate almost in the very Navel of Alsacia, not above an hours journey from the foot of the Mountains, but in a fruitful and rich soil both for corn and pasture, the Countrey hereabouts being very well watered with the Louch, Duro, Fecht, and Ill. 4 Schleisad, in the modern Laine, Selestadium, but by the ancients called Elcebus, the station at that time of the 19 Legion; afterwards of great fame, for a Church here built by Hildegardis Dutcheis of Schwaben, Anno 1044, according to the pattern of the Temple of Hierusalem; which in tract of time became the richest Monastery in all these parts. Situate in a very fertile and delightful soil, having the Rhene on the one side, and some spurs of the Mountain Vange, shadowed with Groves of Chestnuts upon the other: walled in the time of Frederick the second, about the year 1216. and on the East defended with impassible fens, 5 Gebweiler, and 6 Watweil, both seated near the aforesaid Mountains, and both subject to the Abbat of Murbach. 7 Keiserberg, 8 Turchein, two Imperial towns, but not otherwise memorable; as neither are many of the rest, but for name and number: there being reckoned within this small Province of Elfsat, (not including Sungow) 46 Cities and Towns begirt with walls, besides Castles, Forts, and Villages, almost innumerable; and amongst them more Free and Imperial Cities, than in any one Province of the Empire, except Schwaben only.

The Southern part of Elfsat bordering on the Canton of Basel, is commonly called by the name of SUNGOW, in Latine Sungovia, and Sungois; but in former times the Dukedom of Pfirs, from Pfir, the the chief Town of it, and the Dukes seat: the Country very plentiful in corn and wine (as the rest of Elzass) affording good store of each to the neighbouring Switzers. Chief Towns hereof, are 1 Mulhausen on the River Ill, heretofore under the command of the Bishops of Strauburg, as were also Kiesberg and Colmar: but being taken in by Rodolph of Habsburg, after his advancement to the Empire, it was made Imperial; and is now confederate with the Switzers. 2 Belfort, remarkable for a Collegiate Church there founded by the Earls of Pfirtz, in which lie buried 15 Earls, and as many Countesses. 3 Mase-mufter, so called from a Monastery of Nuns there founded by Maso, a Prince of the old Almans. 4 Thann, a neat Town, beautified with the fair Cattle of Eugenberg, mounted upon the top of a lofty hill. 5 Norf-munster, so named of an ancient Monastery there founded by the Earls of Pfirtz; most of them great builders of Religious houses. 6 Altkirk, not far from the head of the River Ill. 7 Pfirtz it self, seated on the Ill, not far from Altkirk, in a Country heretofore over-grown with Woods and Forrefts, whence it had the name. Called by the French de la Pais de Ferrette, (corruptly for le Pais de Forrest) by the Dutch moulded into Pfirtz: by which name (of the County of Ferrette) it is called by Philip de Comins, and other French writers; and by that name pawned by Sigismund the Archduke, to Charles Duke of Burgundy, made by that means too near a neighbour to the Switzers, as it proved in fine.

Westward hereof, betwixt it and the County of Burgundy, lieth the Town and Earldom of MONTBELGARD. (Montis Belgardium in the Latine) united by the marriage of Henrica, daughter and heir of Henry the first Earl hereof, Anno 1396. to the house of Wirtenberg. Chief Towns whereof are, 1 Clarewang. 2 Passewang. 3 Grans, all anciently beautified with Castles, and 4 Montbelgard, a Town of great strength, proud of a Castle Royal on the top of a fair and lofty Mountain, whence it took that name, once the seat of its proper Earls, as after of the Princes of the house of Wirtenberg; but now both Town and Cattle in the power of the French, who after their good luck in the Dukedom of Lorraine, caused a good Garrison of their own to be put into them, Anno 1633. under pretence of keeping them for the Children of a Brother of the Duke of Wirtenberg, to whom the Inheritance belonged.

The ancient Inhabitants of this tract were the Tribochi, with parts of the Nemetes and Rauraci; first conquered by the Romans, then subdued by the Almaines, after by the French, and by them made a part of the Kingdom of Lorraine: in the full of which Kingdom it was reckoned for a Province of the German Empire. Governed for the Emperours by Provincial Earls, in the Dutch language called Landgraves: at first officious only, and accountable to the Emperors: under whom they served; in the end made hereditary, and successional unto their posterities. The first hereditary Landgrave said to be Theodorick in the reign of Otho the third; after whose death the Empire being made elective, gave the Provincial Governors some opportunities to provide for themselves. In his male-issue it continued till the reign of Frederick the 2d, who began his Empire Anno 1212. and dyed Anno 1250. during which interval this Estate was conveyed by daughters to Albert, the 2d. Earl of Habsburg, Albert Earl of Hohenburg, and Lewis Earl of Ottingen. Rodolph of Habsburg, son of this Albert afterwards Emperor of the Germans, marrying with Anne the daughter of the Earl of Hohenloe, became possessed also of his part of the Countrie: which added to his own, made up the whole Upper Elzass; continued since that time in possession of the house of Austria, descended from him. The third part comprehending all the Lower Alsasia, was not long after sold by the Earl of Otingen, to the Bishop of Strauburg; whose Successors hold it to this day, assuming to themselves the title of the Landgraves of Elzass. But as for Sungow, or the County of Pfirtz, that belonged anciently to the Princes of the house of Schwaben: in the expiring of which potent and illustrious Familie, by the death of Conradine, the last Duke. Anno 1268. that great estate being scattered into many hands, it was made a distinct Earldom of it self. And so it continued till the year 1324. when Ulrick the last Earl dying without issue male, left his estate betwixt two daughters: whereof the one named Anne, conveyed her part in marriage to Albert Duke of Austria, surnamed the Short, Grandchild of Rodolphus the Emperor before mentioned; the other named Ursula, sold her moiety to the said Albert for 8000 Crowns. Since that it hath been always in the possession of the Dukes of Austria (save only for the time in which it was pawned or mortgaged, together with Alsasia, to the Duke of Burgundie) governed in Civil matters and points of Judicature, by the Parliament, or Court of Enheim in the Upper Elzass.

S. LORREIN.

THE Dukedom of LORREIN is bounded on the East with Elzass, and that part of the Lower Palatinate, which passeth by the name of West-reich; on the West, with the River Muse or Mais, with part of the Country of Barrois in France, (belonging to the Duke hereof) and part of Champagne; on the North, with Luxembourg, and the Land of Triers; and on the South, with the County of Burgundy, from which, and from the Province of Elzass, parted by the Vogesus or Vangs, wherewith encompassed on those sides. Assigned unto Lotharius, second son of Lotharius the Emperor, (who was eldest Son of Lewis the Godly) with the title of a Kingdom: from thence called Lot-reich, by the Dutch, Lot-reigne by the French; from which the modern name of Lorraine, and the Latine, Lotharingia, are to fetch their Pedegree.

The Country is in length about four daies journey, almost three in breadth: much over-grown with Forrefts, and swelled with Mountains, the spurs and branches of Vogesus, and the once vast Wilderness of Ardenne; yet so sufficiently stored with all manner of necessaries, that it needeth no supply out of other places. Some lakes it hath, which yield great quantity of fish; one more especially 14 miles in compass; the Fish whereof yields to the Dukes coffers 20000 l. yearly.

Lorraine.

It affordeth also divers metals, as Silver, Copper, Tin, Iron, Lead, in some places Pearls: Calbidonians also of such bigness, that whole drinking cups are made of them; and a matter, of which they make the purest glasses not to be paralleled in Europe. They have also a goodly breed of Horses, equal to those of Barbary, or the Couriers of Naples.

The people, by reason of their neighbourhood to, and commerce with France, strive much to imitate the French in garb and fashion; but one may easily see that it is not natural: and have much in them also of the Dutch humour of drinking; but far more moderately than the Dutch themselves. Generally they are a politic and an hardy Nation; not otherwise able to have held their estate so long against the French Kings, and the Princes of the house of Burgundy. They lived very happily in former times under their own Dukes, not being at all oppressed with taxes; which made them very affectionate towards the Prince, and useful unto one another. Their language for the most part French, as in Artois, Luxembourg, Triers, and other of the bordering Provinces, members of the French Monarchy in former times: not so refined and elegant, as is spoke in France, nor so corrupt and coarse as that of Montbelgard, and the County of Burgundy.

I know that many, in respect of the French language spoken here among them, account this Country among the Provinces of France; and usually describe it so in their Charts and writings: but I have placed it with more reason (as I conceive) amongst those of Germany. First, in regard that the Duke hereof is a Prince of the Empire: but specially because that in the division of the Kingdom of Lorraine betwixt the Emperors of Germany and the Kings of France, whatsoever lay on the East side of the River Muse, (as this Dukedom of Lorraine for the most part doth) was reckoned in the share or portion of the German Emperors.

The Rivers of chief note, are 1. Marte, or the Meuse, which receiving into it many Rivers, and passing with a swift stream by the walls of Nancie, glides along fairly for a good space within sight of the Moselle; into which at last it falls near Conde. 2. Mosa, the Muse or Mais, whose spring and course hath been already described in Belgium. 3. Moselle, famous for the design which Lucius Verus, Governor for the Emperor Nero, had once upon it. For whereas it riseth in the mountain Vange, not far from the head of the River Saône, and disburtheneth it self into the Rhene at Confluentz; he intended to have cut a deep channel from the head of this unto the other, so to have made a passage from the Ocean to the Mediterranean: the Saône emptying it self into the Rhose, a chief River of France; as the Moselle doth into the Rhene. 4. Selle, which minglith waters with the Moselle not far from Metz. 5. Saria. 6. Martane. 7. Voloy, others of less note; all of them plentiful of Salmons, Perches, Tenches, and the best sorts of fish: as in their Lakes great store of Carps, some of them three foot long, and of excellent taste.

Principal Cities in it, are 1. Metz; by Ptolomy called Divodurum; Metis, and Civitas Mediomatricum by Antoninus, the chief City of the Mediomatrices who possessed this tract. Seated in a pleasant plain at the confluence of the Sore and Moselle: the Royal Sea, in former times, of the French Kings of Austrasia, hence called Kings of Metz; long before that a Bishops See, as it still continueth. 2. Toul, the Tullum of Ptolomy, the Civitas Leucorum of Antoninus, so called from the Leuci, the Inhabitants of it and the tract about it: pleasantly seated on the Moselle, and anciently honoured with a See Episcopall. 3. Verdun, an ancient Episcopall See also, the Civitas Verodunensium of Antoninus, seated on the Muse or Mais: the Town and Territory adjoining in preceding times belonging to the Great Princes of the house of Ardenne, at and before the time that they attained the Dukedom of Lorraine; but whether they had it in right of their Patrimonial Estate, as lying in the North part of this Country towards Luxembourg as it well might; or that it came to them in the right of marriage with some daughter of the house of Moselle, or other heirs thereof, I have no where found. But howsoever it came to them, it gave unto this house the title of Earls of Verdun, used in their stile, till swallowed with the rest in that of Lorraine. The Bishop whereof, as also those of Metz and Toul (being the only ones of this Country of Lorraine) acknowledge the Archbishops of Triers for their Metropolitan. All of them in the number (heretofore) of Imperial Cities, possessed of large and goodly territories, and of great revenue: but taken by the French King Henry the 2d, Anno 1552. during the wars between Charles the fifth and the Protestant Princes of Germany, under colour of aiding them against the Emperor. And though Charles tried all ways to recover them to the Empire again, and to that end maintained a long and desperate siege against the City of Metz: yet was the Town so gallantly defended by the Duke of Guise, that he was fain to raise his siege, and go off with dishonour. Since that, they have been always under the subjection of France; a Parliament being erected at Metz for the ease of the people, as in other P.vinces of that Kingdom.

Of such Towns as immediately belong to the Duke of Lorraine, the principal are Nancie, not great; but of a pleasant and commodious site: well watered by the river Meuse or Marte; and fortified better than before, in the year 1587. on occasion of a great Army of the Germans passing into France to aid the Protestants: most commonly the Dukes seat, and famous for the discomfiture with Charles Duke of Burgundy here suffered, with the loss of his life. 2. S. Nicolas, a Town so populous, well seated, and neatly built; that were it walled, it would hardly yield precedence unto Nancie it self, so called from a Church here built to the honour of S. Nicholas, Bishop of Myra in the lesser Asia, whose body they pretend to be buried here, or at least some part or Relick of it to be here inshrined, occasioning a great resort of Pilgrims and other People. 3. Pont a Mousson, about 4 leagues from Nancie: so called from a bridge on the River Mousson, upon which it standeth; of especial note for a small University lately founded in it; and for giving the title of a Marquess to the eldest son of the Dukes of Lorraine, called commonly and contractedly Marquess du Pont, Marchio Montissimo Pontis, by our Modern Latinists. 4. Vancoleur, the birth-place of Joan the Virgin, to whose miracles and valour, the French attribute the delivery of their Country from the power of the English: But being at last taken prisoner, she was by the Duke of Bedford, then Regent of France, condemned and burned for a Witch. Of which crime I for my part do conceive her free. Nor can I otherwise conceive of her and her brave exploits, than of a lusty lass of Lorraine, tutored and trained up by the practice of the Earl of Dunnois, commonly called the Bastard of Orleans; and so presented to Charles the seventh, French King, as if sent immediately from Heaven. A project carried on of purpose (as the most intelligent of the French writers say) pour faire venir la couronne aux Francois, to revive the drooping spirits of the beaten French, nor to be raised again but by help of a miracle. Upon the sight of her Statues on the bridge of Orleans, a friend of mine did adventure on a Copy of verses in her commendation; too long to be inserted here, but they ended thus.

She did a Virgin; 'Twas because the earth
Bred not a man whose valour and whose birth
Might merit such a blessing. But above
The Gods provided her an equal Love,
And gave her to Saint Denys. She with him Protects the Lillies, and their Diadem.
You then about whose Armies she doth watch,
Give her the honour due unto her match.
And when in field your standards you advance,
Cry loud, Saint Denys and Saint Joan for France.

Next these we have, 5. Vandemont, which gave the title of an Earl to a younger branch of the house of Ardenne, succeeding at the last in the Dukedom of Lorraine, in person of Duke Rhene 2d. and since a Title of the younger son of the Dukes hereof. 6. Neuf-Chateau, on the edge of the Country towards Barrois. 7. Amanes, seven leagues on the South of Metz, sometimes the Chancery of Lorraine. 8. Riches Courtes, near the Lake called Garde-lake, out of which floweth a River which runs into the Moselle. 9. La Mothe, seated on a River which falls presently into the Moselle. 10. Charmes, seated on the Moselle, the place of treaty between the Duke of Lorraine, and the Cardinal Richelieu; the result whereof was the surrender of the Town of Nancy, and by consequence of all the Dukedom into the hands of the French, Septemb. 1633. 11. Stenay, in the extrem North of all this Country, a well fortified Town, and of great consequence and importance to the Dukes hereof; but whether properly belonging to the Dukedom of Lorraine, or wrested from the Sovereignty of Sedan, upon which it bordereth (as Jamais near unto it was) I have no where found. Of less note there are, 1. Saint Die, 2. Saint Hippolit, 3. Bouquenon, and 4. Saverden; the first Towns of this Dukedom taken by the Swedes, Anno 1633. in the war against Lorraine. 5. Saint Miel, 6. Oden Chateau, 7. Mirecourt, all taken the same year by the French, in the prosecution of that war, before the treaty, at Charmes. 8. Romberville, 9. Espinay, 10. Gerberville, &c.

The old Inhabitants of this Country were the Mediomatrici, and the Leuci (spoken of before; together with the Vivandoneses, all of them conquered by the Romans: under whom this Country and the District of Triers, made up the whole Province of Belgica Prima. From them being taken by the French, with the rest of Gaul, it was made a Kingdom; the Provinces of Germania Prima & Secunda, (containing all the parts of Germany before described, and so much of the Netherlands, as lie on the West side of the Rhine) being added to it: called first, from the Eastern situation, by the name of Oststroica, or Austrasia; the portion of Theoderick, the fourth son of Clovis, the first Christian King of the French; from the chief City of his Kingdom, called the King of Metz, whose successors follow in this order.

THE KINGS of AUSTRASIA, or METS.

- 514 1 Theoderick, the base son of Clovis the Great, vanquished the Turingians, and extended his Kingdom as far as Hassia and Turingia, as we call them now.
- 537 2 Theodebert, the son of Theoderick, repulsed the Danes infesting the Coasts of the Lower Germany; and added Provence, (taken from the Goths of Italy) unto his Estates.
- 548 3 Theobaldus, the son of Theodebert, subdued the Almans, and added much of their Country to his own Dominions.
- 555 4 Clotaire, King of Soissons, the youngest son of Clovis the Great, succeeded Theobald in this Kingdom; as afterwards his brother Childbert in the Realm of France, Anno 560. uniting in his person the whole French Dominion.
- 565 5 Sigebert, the son of Clotaire, vanquished the Hunnas, then falling into his Estates: killed in his Tent by the practices of Fredegond, the wife of Chilperick King of France.
- 577 6 Childbert, the son of Sigebert, successor to his Uncle Guntan in the Realm of Orleans.
- 598 7 Theodebert the II. the son of Childbert, vanquished and outed of his Kingdom by Lothaire the second of France, from whose eldest son Sigebert, descended the illustrious Family of the Earls of Habsburg.
- 617 8 Clotaire II. King of France, on the death of Theodebert King of Austrasia, and his brother Theoderick, King of Orleans, the sole King of the French.

9. Dagobert,

Lorraine.

- 9 Dagobert, in the life of his Father King of Major Austrasia, whom he succeeded, at his death, in the Realm of France.
- 645 10 Sigebert II. the eldest son of Dagobert, made choice of this Kingdom, for his part of the whole French Empire; therein preferring it to West-France, or France it self, which he left to Clovis the 2d. his younger brother. He brought the Suevians to obedience, and subdued the Slaves.
- 656 11 Childbert II. son of Grimoaldus, Mayre of the Palace to Sigebert, was by the power of his Father made King of Mets; Dagobert the Son of Sigebert being thorn a Monk, and sent into Scotland.
- 12 Clovis the 2d. King of the French, having vanquished and beheaded Grimoald, dispossessed Childbert of the Kingdom which he took to himself.
- 662 13 Childerick, the 2d. son of Clovis, after the death of Clotaire his elder brother, succeeding in the Kingdom of France, united all the French Dominions into one Estate. In which condition it remained (but with some enlargement of the bounds) till the partition made by and amongst the Children of Lewis the Godly; the name of Austrasia, or East France, being extended by Charles the Great, over all Pannonia; and so much of Germanie as was under the command of the French. In which division, Lewis the 2d. son, surnamed the Antient, being invested in the Kingdom of Germanie; or so much of East-France, or Austrasia, as lay on the East-side of the Rhine: Lotharius the eldest son had for his share, the title of Emperor, and therewith Italy, Provence, Burgundy, and so much of Austrasia, or East-France, as lay on the French side of the River. Afterwards subdivided into three Estates; Italy, with the title of Roman Emperor, being given to Lewis the eldest son; to Charles the youngest, Provence, with the Kingdom of Burgundy; and to Lothaire the second son, Austrasia on this side of the Rhine, from hence called Lot-reich, Lot-reigne, and Lotharingia, as before was said. But Lothaire dying without issue, the Kingdom of Lorraine, containing all the Netherlands, (except Flanders and Artois) and all the parts of Germany before described, became divided betwixt Charles the Bald, Emp. and K. of France, and Lewis surnamed the Antient, K. of Germany, the one calling himself K. of Lorraine on that side, the other K. of Lorraine on this side of the Maas, the river Maas or Aduse parting their possessions. But this Partition held not long amongst their successors; For Lewis and Caroloman King of France (the sons of Ludovicus Balbus) resigning their part hereof to Charles the Grosse, Emp. of the Romans, and K. of Germany, the said Charles, Arnulph, Lewis, and Conrade, successively Emperors of the Romans, and Kings of Germany, (together with Zwentobald the Bastard son of Arnulph interloping in the very middle of them) enjoyed it wholly to themselves. And so did also Charles the Simple, King of France, on the death of Conrade, till forced thereto by Henry the first (who succeeded Conrade in the Empire and Kingdom of Germany) he gave way to the old partition spoken of before: the Germans after that encroaching more and more on that part hereof which of right belonged unto the French, till in the end (after much vicissitude and interchangeableness of affairs) both Princes laid aside the title of Kings of Lorraine, incorporating so much as they held hereof into the rest of their Estates: Otho the third of Germany, and Lewis the fifth of France, being the last that pleased themselves with that broken title. In the mean time, this Countrey of Lorraine it self, as it is now bounded, together with the Countrey of Luickland, a great part of Brabant, some parts of the Land of Triers, Colen, and as some say the Countrey of Gulick also, (but in this of Gulick I demur, as before was said) being taken out of it, were by Otho the second made a Dukedom, Anno 981. and by him given with the title of Duke of Lorraine, to Charles of France, son of Gerborge his Aunt, by Lewis the 4th. of France surnamed Transmarinus son of Charles the Simple. Charles thus advanced by his Cousin, and forgetting that he had been made Duke of Brabant not long before by Lothaire the French King, his brother, shewed himself so alienated from the French, and wedded to the Germans: that the French, after the death of his Nephew Lewis the fifth (whose next Heir he was) rejected him, and accepted Hugh Capet for their King. Otho the son of this Charles, dying without issue, left his estate to Geoffrey Earl of Ardenne, Bouillon, and Verdun, his near kinsman by the mothers side: from whom the present Dukes of Lorraine do derive themselves. From Hermingrade one of the daughters of this Charles, married to Albert (some call him Charles, and others Godfrey) Earl of Namur, by Alice their daughter, married to Baldwin the 5. of Hainault, descended Baldwin Earl of Flanders and Hainault, the Father of the Lady Isabel of Hainault, wife of Philip the 2d. King of France, thereby uniting the blood of Pepin and Hugh Capet to the great content of Lewis the 9th. her Nephew: of whom it is said, that being a man of a tender conscience, he never joyed in the Crown of France, till it was proved that he was lineally descended by his Grandmother, from Charles of Lorraine, whom Hugh Capet had so unjustly dispossessed. But to return again to the Dukes of Lorraine, I find not any great improvement made of the Estate by any of them, more than the accession of the remaining Patrimony of the Earls of Ardenne, in the person of Godfrey, or Geoffrey, the third Duke hereof: and the adding of the Duchy of Barr, in France, by Rene Duke of Anjou, and titular King of Naples; but on the contrary, a great weakening and distraction of it by the Dukes hereof: Luickland and the Dukedom of Bouillon being sold unto the Bishops of Liege, by Godfrey, surnamed of Bouillon, after King of Hierusalem; Brabant torn from it by Geoffrey Earl of Lovain in the time of Baldwin, brother of Geoffrey; and Gulickland, by Enstace the brother of Baldwin; the Bishops of Triers not being negligent all this while, of the opportunity. Besides which, somewhat had been done by the Emperor Otho the 3d. to the diminution of this Estate, who seeing that Otho the second Duke, son of Charles of France, had no issue male, and thinking this estate to be great enough without those additions, and some other pieces on the Rhene by him restored unto the Empire. The rest of this Estate confer'd on Geoffrey of Ardenne, and not without good reason neither: it being probable enough that as it was first given by Otho the hallow any thing: and 3. Stripping him of his Prietly habit, he is clothed in a lay attire, and to delivered over to the Secular Magistrate. But to return again to the City of Constance, being proscribed by Charles the fifth for refusing the Interim, and not able to withstand such Forces as were raised against them; they put themselves under the Protection of Ferdinand, then King of the Romans, and brother of Charles. But herein they fell out of the Frying-pan into the fire, as the saying is: For Ferdinand being possessed of the Town, seized on the common Treasury, and upon all Records and writings which belonged unto them; set out an Edict, that all the Ministers, within eight days, should depart the City, and that no Citizen from thenceforth should wear any weapon. And so instead of a Protector, he became their Master.

Chief Cities in the part hereof lying towards Bavaria, which is called the ALGOW, are 1. Buchau, on the lake called Feder-see, a Town Imperial. 2. Ravensburg, a Free City, seated amongst mountains, whereof one hangeth over it the River Ach running by it in a bed so narrow, that not able to receive the waters, which fall down from the hills, it much endamageth all the Country by frequent Land-floods. 3. Woenen (the Nemavia of Antoninus) Imperial also. 4. Kempten, the Campidunum of Strabo: and 5. Mimmigen, the Drusomagus of Strabo, both Imperial Cities; the last about 3 miles in circuit, populous, rich, and very well traded. 6. Pfullendorf. 7. Zenkirk. 8. Bibrach; all three Imperial; the last supposed to be the Brigodunum of the Antients. 9. Ausburg, on the River Lech, looking into Bavaria, first made a Roman Colony by Augustus Caesar, and by him called Augusta Vindelicorum. The principal City in those times of Vindelici, a potent people of this tract. A City of great wealth and state, containing about 9 miles in circuit, and very strongly fortified; by nature on the East and North, where the ground lies low, and under water; and on the West and South by Art. The buildings for three parts of it, are of clay and timber; but on the West part seated on a hill, built of Free-stone, six or seven stories high; in which are many fair houses of the principal Citizens, and many stately Palaces; which belong to the Fuggassa family of very great (almost Princely) Revenues; possessed of many goodly dwellings both in the City and the Suburbs, and adjoining Territories. Who though they have of late obtained the honour of Barons, in regard of their wealth; still keep themselves (contrary to the custom of Germany, where traffick is counted a disgrace to a Noble man) to the trade of Merchandize. The publick Edifices of it very decent, especially the Cathedral Church, a Majestic building; the other Churches, ten in number; and the Religious houses, correspondent to it. Of old time Ceres was here worshipped, from whence (or from the fruitfulness of the soil) the City gives a sheaf of corn for the Armes thereof. Since their conversion unto Christianity made a Bishops See, Destroyed by Attila and his Hunnes, it was after built more beautifully than it had been formerly; at last made Imperial, and the Mistress of a large territory as most Cities of Germanie. Famous for the confession of faith, exhibited in this place to Charles the 5th. by the Protestant Princes, hence called Confessio Augustana, Anno 1530. 2. For the Interim, or mixt form of Doctrine, containing some points of Protestantism, but most of Popery, here tendered to both parties by the said Emperor (but received by neither) to be subscribed to, and observed, till the differences could be settled by a General Council. And 3. for the publick allowance here given by Decree of all the States of the Empire, to the Protestant party, to profess openly their Religion without any impeachment, Anno 1555. A Limitation only laid on the Ecclesiasticks, that if they changed their Religion, they should lose their preterments; which were to be bestowed on others more addicted to the See of Rome.

In the third part hereof called BRISGOW, lying on the East of the River Rhene, and the West of Wirtenburg, and on the South closed in with the Canton of Basil; Places of most importance are, 1. Friburg, upon the Triesse, and other streams descending from the mountains of Swartzen-wald, under which it lyeth: founded by Berchthold the third, Earl or Duke of Züringen (the Castle of Züringen founded by Berthold the first, son of Gebizo, the youngest son of Gunnram, the 2d. Earl of Habsburg, once the chief seat of those Princes, being then near adjoining to it) in the reign of Henry the fifth Emperor, Anno 1112. or thereabouts. Famous in those days for silver mines, now for an University here established, Anno 1459. and being in present estimation the chief of the Country, of which more anon. 2. Offenbach, 3. Gengenbach, both upon the Kintzich, and both Towns Imperial: the first so named from Offa an Englisch Saxon, the Apostle of these parts of Germanie. 4. Hockberg, which gives the title of a Marquess to the Marquess of Baden, who are Lords thereof. 5. Zel, once Imperial, but of late times belonging, as doth also 6. Badenweiler, to the Marquess of Baden, this last accruing to them by the marriage of Rudolphus the sixth of that name, Marquess of Hockberg, with a sister of John Earl of Friburg, the then Lord thereof. 7. Waldshut upon the Rhene, in a barren, cold, and mountainous Country, but well stored with woods. 8. Brisach, by Antoine called Mons Brisacensis, a garrison in his time against the incroaching Almans; and situate at that time on the French side of the Rhene, the course of the River being since turned on the other side, where now it runneth. Built Castle wise on the top of a round hill, in which there is also a strong Tower or Fortresse, raised by Berchthold the third, for defence of the place; otherwise strong enough by its own natural situation. And might be made impregnable, but for want of water, which is all drawn from one deep well in the heart of the Town, or brought with great charge and trouble from the Rhene, which runs underneath it. The Town fair, populous, and well built, once of most note in all the Country, from hence called Brisac-gow, or Bris-gow; but after the building of Friburg by Berchthold the 4th. it grew by little and little to be less frequented; the other being seated more conveniently for trade and business. Here also not far off from the Castle of Züringen, stood that of Kiburg, somewhat the antienter of the two; of such authority and repute in those elder times, that the Emperours do still retain the title of Earls of Kiburg, in the Stile Imperial; descended on the house of Habsburg by the marriage of Elizabeth, daughter and heir of Hartman the last Earl hereof, to Eberhard of Habsburg, Cousin German to the Emperor Rodolph, on the expiring of which line, Anno 1356. it fell, together with many fair Estates, among the Switzers, to Albert Duke of Austria, surnamed the Short.

Finally, in the fourth and last part hereof called NORTH-SCHWABEN, because on the North-side of the Danow, the places most observable are 1. Gmund, on the Rheims; 2. Dinkel Spuel, on the Warnitz; two Imperial Towns; which with Überlingen or Werlingen, (all three but mean in building, territory, or estimation) spoken of before, are the only three Imperial Cities in all Germany, which totally adhered unto the Doctrines of the Church of Rome. 3. Böpingen, on the Egra, an Imperial City. 4. Norlinger, on the same River, but in a low and moorish ground, yet of great resort, populous and well traded. Most memorable for the defeat here given the Swedes, by Ferdinand the third, now Emperor, at his first entrance on the Government: in which, Bannier, one of the principal commanders of that nation, was slain on the place; Gustavus Horn, another of as great eminence, taken Prisoner, their whole Forces routed; and thereupon so strange an alteration of the affairs of Germany, which they had almost wholly conquered (though not for themselves;) that the Palatinate, not long before restored to its proper owner, was again possessed by the Spaniards, Frankland by the Imperialists, and the remainder of the Swedes forced to withdraw into their holds, on the Baltick seas, Anno 1637. 6. Rotweil, not far from the head of the Neccar, an Imperial City, and a Confederacy of the Switzers. 7. Donawerds, seated on the confluence of the Danow and the Werdt, whence it had the name; most commonly called only Werdt, an Imperial Town: the habitation of John de Werdt, once a Brewer herein, but afterwards a chief Commander of the Forces of the Duke of Bavaria, in the late German wars. 8. Villingen, on the Bregen, a small River falling into the Danow; a Town belonging to the Princes of the house of Austria. Not far from which stands 9. Furstenburg, an ancient Castle, the Earls hereof are Princes of the Empire, and Lords of a great part of the Country; descended lineally from Eginow, or Eggon, the youngest son of the Lady Judith, sister and heir of Berthold the fifth, the last Duke of Züringen, and consequently a branch of the illustrious house of Habsburg, exceedingly increased both in power and patrimony, by the marriage of Frederick Earl hereof (in the time of Charles the fifth, under whom he served in his wars against the Protestants) with Anne the daughter and heir of Christopher the last Earl of Werdenberg, possessed of many fair estates amongst the Zwitzers, and the adjoining parts of Schwaben. In a Village of this Earl called Don-Eschingen is the head of Danubius. 10. Ulme, an Imperial City, situate on the meeting of the Blave, the Iler, and the Danow; the principal City of North-Schwaben: about six miles in compass, rich, populous, well fortified; and stored with an Armory, for Ordinance and all manner of Ammunition, not inferior to any in Germany. The Town but new, taking its first rise from a Monastery here founded by Charles the Great, which after grew to be a great City; and took the name of Ulme from the Elmes about it. At first it belonged unto the Monks; of whom having bought their freedom in the time of Frederick the third, it became Imperial. The Danow hereabouts begins to be navigable, having so violent a stream that the Boats which go down the water use to be sold at the place where they land; it being both difficult and chargeable to bring them back again. Not far hence on the banks of the Danow lie the Suevian Alps, and amongst them, the old Castle of Hohenberg; the Lord whereof, on the ruine of the house of Schwaben, became possessed of a great estate here, and in Upper Elsass; sold afterwards to Rodolph of Habsburg, the founder of the now Austrian Family.

The ancient Inhabitants hereof were the Brixantes, Suanetes, Rugusii, and Calucones, who together with the Vindelici (of whom more hereafter) and other tribes of the Rhetti, (of whom somewhat hath been said before in the Alpine Provinces) possessed themselves of that Country which lyeth betwixt the River Ino, and the head of the Rhene, east and west; Danubius, and the Alps of Italy, north and south. Within which compass are the greatest part of the Grisons, the Dukedoms of Schwaben and Bavaria, on this side the Danow, and part of the County of Tirol; and not a few of the Cantons of Switzerland. Subdued by Drusus and Tiberius Nero, sons-in-law of Augustus, it was made a province of the Romans: divided into Rhetia Prima, taking in all the Countries from the Rhene to the Leck, or Lycus; and Rhetia Secunda, lying betwixt the Leck and the River Inn, which by another name was called Vindelicia. By which account all Schwaben on the South side of the Danow, was part of the Province of Rhetia Prima, continuing so till vanquished, and subdued by the Almans, in the time of Valentinian the third, Emperor of the Western parts. As for the Almans who succeeded in possession hereof, they were originally some tribes and families of the Suevi, the most warlike nation of the Germani, inhabiting upon the Banks of the River of Albis: who jealous of Cæsars great successes, brought against him 430000 fighting men; of which 80000 were slain, and many drowned. They used to stay at home, and go to the war by turns: they which staid at home, tilling the Land; to whom the rest returning, brought the spoil of the Enemies. But after this blow, we hear little of them, till the time of Caracalla, the son of Severus; During whose reign, descending towards the banks of the Rhene and the Danow, and mingling with other nations as they passed along; they assumed first the name of Almans; either from that promiscuous mixture of all sorts of men; or (as I rather think) from Mannus the son of Tuisco, one of the great and national Gods of the Germani. And though well beaten by him at their first coming down, near the River Mannus; and afterwards more broken by Dioclesian, who slew at least 60000 of them at one time; in Gaul; yet never left they to infect the Provinces of the Empire, which lay nearest to them: till in the end, following the tract of the Hunns, who had gone before them, and beaten down many of the Forts and Garrisons which were in their way; they made themselves Masters of Rhetia Prima, Germania Prima, and part of Maxima Sequanorum, containing besides the Countries spoken of before, Alsatia, and so much of the Lower Palatinate.

Suevia.

as lies on the French side of the Rhene. But quarrelling with the French their next neighbours (of whose growth and greatness they began to be very sensible) they were first vanquished by Clovis the first Christian King of the French, in that great and memorable fight at Zulpf, near Colen: and afterwards made wholly subject to the Conqueror, by whom oppressed with an heavy and lasting servitude: About this same they returned again to their old name of Suevians; their citate being erected into a Dukedome, called many times the Dukedome of Almain: and when so called, divided into the Upper Almain, comprehending the Country of the Grisons, with some parts of Switzerland, and Tirol; and the Lower or the Proper Almain, which contained the rest of the Estates of the ancient Almans, called for the most part by the name of the Dukedome of Suevia or Schwaben, and finally transmitted that name to this Province only, the best part thereof. These Dukes at first officary only, removeable at the will of the Emperor, and accountable to him: nor seldome many at one time, especially whilst under the command of the French; some of them being Dukes of the Upper, and others of the Lower Almain. So that there is no great certainty of their succession nor much care to be taken in searching after it; though otherwise men of great Authority and Command in their several times. The most remarkable amongst them was Rudolph, Earl of Reinsfelden, and Duke of Schwaben, (descended from the Earls of Habsburg) in the reign of Henry the fourth; against whom he was chosen Emperor, by the practice and procurement of Pope Hildebrand: but overcome and wounded at the battle of Effer, he died not long after of his wounds, with great repentance for rebelling against his Sovereign. After his death, some Provinces being dismembred from it, and other lesser Estates first erected out of it: it was made Hereditary in the person of Frederick, Baron of Hohenstauffen, surnamed the Antient, by the munificence and bounty of the said Henry the fourth, whose daughter Agnes he had married. His successors follow in this order.

The DUKES of SCHWABEN.

- 1 Frederick the antient, the first Hereditary Duke of Schwaben.
- 2 Frederick with one eye, son of Frederick the Antient.
- 3 Frederick III. surnamed Barbarossa, son of Frederick with one eye, Duke of Schwaben, and Emperor; he succeeded the Emperor Henry the fifth, in the Dukedome of Franconia; and left the same unto his successors.
- 1190 4 Frederick IV. second son of Barbarossa; his elder brother Henry succeeding in the Empire, by the name of Henry the sixth.
- 5 Conrad, brother of Frederick the fourth.
- 6 Philip, brother of Conrad; after the death of Henry the 6th. elected Emperor.
- 1207 7 Frederick V. son of Henry the sixth; elected Emperor by the name of Frederick the second; King of Naples and Sicily also in the right of his mother.
- 1250 8 Conrad II. son of Frederick the fifth, King of both Sicily, and Emperor of Germany, after the death of his Father; poisoned, as was supposed, by his base brother Manfred, who succeeded in his Kingdom of Sicily.
- 1254 9 Conradine, the son of Conrad; pursuing his right unto the Kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, was overcome and taken prisoner by Charles of Anjou, successor unto Manfred in those Estates; and by his command beheaded at Naples, Anno 1268. After whose death (being the last of that powerful and Imperial Family:) this vast Estate was brought unto a second dismembering, and divided amongst the Bishops, Princes, and Free Cities hereof: of which last there are more within the old Precincts of this Dukedome, than in all Germany besides. So that beholding it in the first and second dilapidation, we find many goodly Patrimonies and fair Estates (besides what belongeth to the Cities and Episcopal Sees) to have been raised out of the ruins of this great Dukedom: that is to say, the Dukedomes of Zeringen and Wirtenberg, with the Marquissate of Baden, dismembred from it, when conferred on Frederick of Hohenstauffen; the Earldoms of Pfirt, Hohenberg, and Friburg, (besides a great improvement of the Earldom of Habsburg) advanced out of the second ruine. How Pfirt and Hohenberg were united to the house of Austria, hath been shewn already: and what becomes of Wirtenberg and Baden, shall be shewn hereafter. Here it is only to be noted, that the Family of Zeringen possessed of almost all Brisgow, and great part of Switzerland, owe their Original to Berthold, the son of Gebizo, a younger son of Guntram the 2d. Earl of Habsburg. Which being extinguished after a succession of seven Princes only, in the person of Berthold the fifth (who died the same day in which the Emperor Rodolph of Habsburg was born) Anno 1218. the rights hereof descended on the Earls of Friburg, the principal City of that Country. Cuno the first that bare the title of Earl of Friburg, being the eldest son of Judith, sister and heir of Berthold, the last Duke of Zeringen. Eggon, the last Earl of which house, being overlaid by his undutifull and rebellious Subjects, sold his Estate therein, for 12000 Ducats to Albert and Leopold, Dukes of Austria, sons of Albert the Short; whose successors enjoy all Brisgow to this very day.

The Arms of Schwaben were Argent, 3 Leopards Sable. as is said by BATA: But Paradise will have them to be three Leopards Sable, crowned Gules, in a Field Or.

7. BAVARIA.

Bavaria

7. BAVARIA.

BAVARIA is bounded on the East with Austria; on the West, with the river Leck, or Lycus, which parts it from Schwaben, on the North, with Northgoia, or the Upper Palatinate; and on the South, with the Earldom of Tirol, and Carinthia. It containeth the whole Province of Rhetia Secunda; and so much of Noricum Mediocranum, as now maketh up the Bishoprick of Salisburg: and by a distinct name was called Vindelicia, as being the antient habitation of the Vindelici; so named from the two Rivers of Vindis and Lycus (now the Werd and the Leck) upon which they lived, According whereunto it is thus verified by a German Poet.

Respicit & late fluvijs Vindimque, Lycumque,
Miscentes undas, & nomina Littoris; unde
Antiquam Gentem, populumque, Urbemque vocarunt Vindelicam.

In English thus:

Vindis and Lycus, floods of noted Fame,
He next beholds, mingling their streams and name;
To which the old Vindelici do own
The name of both of their Nation, and their Town.

Meaning by their Town, as I conceive, Augusta Vindelicorum, their Metropolis or Capital City. But after such time as the Boii or Boiarians had driven out the Romans, and got possession of this Country, the name of Vindelicia, and Rhetia Secunda, grew into disuse: that of Boiaria succeeding in the place thereof, mollified or corrupted into Bavaria, the present name of the Country amongst the Latines; but by the Dutch called Bayeren, by the French Bavier.

The whole divided into three parts; the Higher, lying towards the Alpes of Tirol; the Lower, extending all along the banks of the Danow; and the District of Saltzburg, situate betwixt the Inn, and the Dukedome of Austria: all three much over-spread with woods and forests, the remainders of the Hercynian forest described before. But more particularly the higher lying towards the Alpes, is cold and barren, affording no wines, and but little corn: the Lower being more fruitful, and better planted, for some parts (especially about Regensberg, and Landshut) inferior unto none in Germany, for the richness and pleasantness of the situation. Of the District of Saltzburg we shall speak by itself; because by some not reckoned as a part hereof. In all, great quantity of fuel for the fire, and of Timber for building; no less of Swine fattened in the woods, and sent away by numerous herds into other Countries.

The Christian Faith first preached here amongst the Boiarians, by Rupertus Bishop of Wormes; driven from his See by Childebert, King of the French, Anno 540. or thereabouts: and here made the first Bishop of Saltzburg; corrupted at this time with the Leaven of the Church of Rome, to which this Country (setting aside the Imperial Cities) is more intirely devoted, than any other in all Germany.

Principal Cities in the higher, are 1. Munchen, (in Latin: Monachium) the Dukes seat; seated on the Isar, or Isarius, in a very sweet and delightful soil, among Ponds and Groves; daintily interlaced with pretty Riverets, and enriched with many excellent Gardens; that of the Duke being hardly to be paralleled in all this Continent. First founded by Henry Duke hereof in the time of Otto the first, Anno 972. now grown a large and populous City; the publick buildings, as Churches, Turrets, Libraries, the Senate-house or Guild-hall, and common Market-place, of such excellent Structure, that they serve not only for use and Ornament, but for Admiration. Amongst them none more eminent than the Library in the Ducal Palace, wherein is conceived to be 10000 Volumes, the most part of them Manuscripts. A town made choice of by Maximilian the now Duke of Bavaria, to be the receptacle of the spoils got by him in the wars of Germany: here being found (at such time as the Town was taken by the King of Sweden) 140 braile Peeces (besides other great Guns) hidden under the ground, one of the which was charged, instead of Powder and Shot, with 30000 Crowns in Gold. 2. Landshut, upon the Leck or Lycus, near the Alpes of Tirol; once of great strength, because a Frontire towards Schwaben: but proving a dangerous neighbour to the Swedish Garrison planted in these parts, during that war against the Duke of Bavaria, was by them taken and dismantled, and is now an open Village only. 3. Martenwald, now a place of no note or beauty; heretofore the Intrium of Prology, seated near the Alpes. 4. Friburg well fortified by Duke Ludowick, or Lewis the second, for a Bulwark against those of Ansburg. 5. Here stood also the old Castle of Schyre, built by Arnulph, 2d. son of Arnulph the first Duke of Bavaria; the Seat and honorary title of his posterity (Dynasty Schyrenses, in the Latine) till Otto of Wittelsbach, by the favour of Frederick Barbarossa, and his own good fortune, did attain that Dukedome.

In the LOWER Bavaria, there first offers it self to consideration, the town of 1. Rain, seated on the Leck, not far from the fall thereof into the Danow: memorable for the skirmish near to it betwixt the Swedes and Bavarians, at the first passing of the Swedish forces over that River, in which John Earl of Tilly, so famous for his long and fortunate conduct of the Imperial Armies, received his death's wound, of which he died at Ingolstadt within few weeks after. 2. Newburg upon the Danow, not far from Rain; the first town of Bavaria taken in by the Swedes, after the said defeat of Tilly. 3. Ingolstadt, said to be built by a Tribe, or Nation of the Sueves, called Angeli, and thence called Angeltadium, or Angeltade: first made a City by Ludowick of Bavaria, Duke and Emperor; and in the year 1410. made an University, much privileged by Duke Lewis or Ludowick the fifth, and Pope Pius the second. A Town so strong strongly fortified both by Art and Nature, that it seems impregnable: and indeed proved so to Gastinus the late King of Sweden; who here found the first check to his prosperous Fortunes, being incited to raise his Siege without endangering it, and finde work elsewhere. 4 Regensburg (in Latine Ravibona) on the Danow also, where it receives the River Regen, whence it hath its name: built in the place of Tiberina, or Augusta Tiberii, so called of a Colony brought thither by Tiberius Caesar, about the time of our Saviours passion; afterwards called Rhetopolis, or the City of the Rhetians, the chief of Rhetia secunda. At this time a fair, rich, and populous City, beautified with an infinite number of Churches and Religious Houses: antiently an Episcopall See, and of late made the ordinary place for the general Diets of the Empire. In former times the seat of the Kings and first Dukes of Bavaria, then made Imperial; and now mixt, or both. For being still Imperial, at the least in name, it was seized on unexpectedly by the now Duke of Bavaria; when the Swedes first got footing within his Dominions; held by him with a very strong Garrison, after the loss of Munchen his chief place of residence, till at last won from him by the Swedes, Anno 1633. 5 Passaw, by the modern Latinists, Patavia; but by some thought to be the Boiodurum of Ptolomy, then a Roman Garrison. Seated on the Danow, where it meeteth with the Inn, and the Ills; by which divided into three Towns, Passaw, Insbrade, and Illade: the whole Compositum being a rich, fair, and well-traded City. A See Episcopall, and subject immediately to the Bishop, as chief Lord hereof; who hath his dwelling in the Castle of Oberhusen, adjoining to that part hereof which is called Ilstade. A place remarkable for many meetings and consultations of the German Princes: especially for that of the year 1552, in which all former quarrels being laid aside, the Protestants were first permitted the free Exercise of their Religion, by the consent and Edict of Charles the fifth, who had most laboured to suppress it. More in the Land is Frising, on the swelling of a fine round hill, near the River Ambr, which runs beneath it; called antiently Praxinum: conceived to be built by some of the Presidents, or Lieutenants, for the Roman Emperors; honoured with an Episcopall See about the year 710. One of the Bishops whereof, commonly called Otho Frisingensis, was the best Historian of his time. 7 Landshut, upon the River of Isar, in the richest and most pleasant Country of all Bavaria, a beautiful and well built City, the work of Lewis Duke hereof, in the year 1208, adorned with a Church of most curious building for the service of God, and a magnificent Palace for the use of the Duke. 8 Freist, the onely Imperial Town, (except Regensburg) in all this Dukedome. The whole number of Cities and great Towns in both Bavaria's, is supposed to be 80; that is to say, 34 Cities, 46 great Towns: of which these the principal.

The Bishoprick or District of SALTZBURG, being the third part of Bayeren or Bavaria, (according to our former division of it) extendeth from the Inn, or Oenus, towards the confines of Anstria. The soil hereof rocky, dry, and barren, excepting some few valleys onely, as seated in the midst of the Julian Alps; the habitation heretofore of the Norici Mediterranei, of whom more hereafter. The principal Town hereof is Salzburg, seated upon the River Salzach, whence it had the name: raised out of the ruins of Juvania, placed hereabouts by Antoninus, the station of a cohort of Roman Souldiers belonging to the first Legion. An Alpine City, strongly situate among the Mountains; but no less beautiful than many of the lower grounds. The Royal seat of some of the Bavarian Kings; after of the Archbishops hereof; the most powerful Prelates for Revenue or jurisdiction of any in Germany: the See first fixed here by Rupertus or Ruberius, the first Apostle of these parts, spoken of before; whose image or impress is stamped to this day on the coins of this Bishoprick. At the time when Luther first endeavoured a Reformation, Cardinal Matthaus Langius was Bishop here; who did ingenuously confess, that the Mass did not want its faults, that the Court of Rome was much corrupted, and the lives of Priests and Friars fit to be reformed: Sed quod misellus Monachus omnia reformet, id non esse tolerabile; but that such a sorry fellow as Luther should attempt the work, was by no means to be endured. 2 Newkirch, on the same River, near the head thereof. 3 Rotenbourg, on the East side of the Inn, bordering on Bavaria. 4 Traunshaim, upon the Traun, issuing out of the Lakes. 5 Wildesmet, one of the farthest Northwards; and 6 Bischofsstoe, one of the most Southern in all this tract.

The first Inhabitants of Bavaria (excluding the District of Salzburg) were the Vindelici, as aforesaid: A people so resolutely bent to maintain their Freedom, against the incroachment of the Romans; that when Drusus the Son-in-law of Augustus, and Father of Germanicus Caesar, made war upon them, the very women thereof took the Alarm; & deficientibus telis, infantes in ora militum adversi miserunt; and when their darts were spent, threw their young infants (saith the Historian) at the heads of the Romans. After them, in the declining of the Empire, succeeded the Boiarians, some of the many tribes of the Bois, the most diffused and multitudinous Nation of Gaul and Germany. Originally of Gaul, inhabiting the Dukedome of Bourbon, from whence some of them passed with the Senons and others of the Gauls, to the further side of the Alps (in respect of them;) where they took up the Country between the Apennine and the Po. Wearied with many bickerings, at last with sharp and bitter wars against the Romans, and by them deprived of half their Country; some of them passed into Germany, and mingled themselves with the Taurisci, then dwelling in those parts which we now call Suermark: others advancing further, thrust themselves into the Norici, (of whom more anon) and some retired themselves into the shelters and fast places of the Hercinian Forest. Driven from this last by the Marcomanni, they fell into the Countries of the Hermunduri and Norisci (now the Upper Palatinate) who mingled into one Nation with them, took the name of Boiarians, and by that name first known in the time of Clovis, the 5th King of the French: by whose persuasion, in the 17 year of Akastius Emp. of the East, they passed over the Danow, and possessed themselves of Vindelicia, or the second Rhetia with some part of Noricum, to which they gave the name of Boiaria, as before was signified. Governed first by Kings (as all Nations were) of whom we meet with none but Aldigerius (and he the last of that race) slain, fighting on the side of the Almans against the French, at the great battel of Zulp, near Colens: after which made subject to the Conquerors, as their neighbors and confederates the Almans were; but suffered to live under the command and government of their own Princes, by the name of Dukes. Of these, from Theodo, the son of Aldigerius, to Tassilo the last Duke, outed of his estate and honours by Charles the Great, for conspiring with the Lombards against him, are reckoned fifteen Dukes in all: whose names (for there remaineth little of them but the empty names) we shall subjoyn in the ensuing Catalogue of the Dukes of the BOIARIANS.

- 493 1 Theodo, son of Aldigerius the last King; from whose younger brother Uilo, descended Pepin the Father of Charles the Great.
- 511 2 Theodo II. surnamed the Great.
- 537 3 Theodebert.
- 545 4 Theodo III. the first Christian Prince of the Boiarians.
- 565 5 Tassilo, son of Theodebert.
- 598 6 Garibaldus.
- 612 7 Theodo IV.
- 630 8 Tassilo II.
- 650 9 Theodo V.
- 10 Theodebert II.
- 11 Theodo VI. son of Grimoldus, the brother of Theodebert the second.
- 708 12 Grimold.
- 13 Hugobert, brother of Grimold.
- 735 14 Uilo.
- 765 15 Tassilo III. the last Duke of the Boiarians. Of whom more anon.

Amongst these, few of any note, but 1 Theodo the first, son of Adalgerius, who abandoning the name of King, because less pleasing to the French, who had newly conquered them, assumed that of Duke: and passing over the Danow, extorted the whole Province of Rhetia secunda, with part of Noricum, from the Romans, Anno 508. or thereabouts. 2 Theodo the second, named the Great, for his great and many victories against the Romans, whom he outed of all Noricum, and Vindelicia; and whatsoever they held on the Dutch side of the Alps. 3 Theodo the 3d of that name, and the 4th in number of the Dukes, converted with his people to the Christian Faith, by the preaching of Rupertus before mentioned, Anno 580. 4 Tassilo the third of that name, and the last of their Dukes of the race of Adalgerius, or of the old Boiarian blood: who being deposed by Charles the Great, the whole Country became immediately subject to the French, governed at first by their Lieutenants. Dismembred from the French Empire by Lewis the Godly, it was made a Kingdom (Pannonia being added and united to it) by whom conferred on Lotharius his eldest son, who was afterwards Emperour of the Romans: after his death possessed by the Kings of Germany, but as a distinct Kingdom both in name and title, till the decease of Lewis the son of Arnulph the last of the direct line of Charles the Great. He being dead, and the Bavarians loth to be made a subject Province to the Kingdom of Germany; one Arnulph of the issue of the said Charles, with the general liking of the Boiarians, took upon himself the title of King; but being opposed therein by Conrade the brother of Lewis, Emp. and King of Germany, and also by Henry the first who succeeded, he changed the title of King into that of Duke, the Founder of the present house of

The Dukes of BAVARIA.

- 1 Arnulph, of the house of Charles the Great, first Duke of Bavaria.
- 2 Eberhard, son of Arnulph, deposed by Otho the first.
- 3 Berchbold, the brother of Arnulph, confirmed in the estate by the said Emperour Otho. After whose death, it was conferred on Henry, the brother of Otho the 1. who had married Judith, daughter of Arnulph the first Duke, and sister to Eberhard.
- 4 Henry, brother of Otho the first, surnamed Rixofus, or the Quarrelsome.
- 5 Henry II. son of the former Henry, surnamed Hezzelo.
- 6 Henry III. surnamed the Saint, son of Henry the 2d, the first Emperour who came in by election, according to the Order made by Pope Gregory the 5th. After whose coming to the Empire this Dukedom was transferred for 14 successions from one great Family to another, according to the power and pleasure of the present Emperour, in manner following.
- 7 Henry IV. surnamed Hezzel, brother to Gunegund the renowned wife of Henry the Saint; by whom preferred to this Dukedom, and by him deposed.
- 8 Henry Guelf, son of Robert Earl of Alsace in Schwaben, (of the strange Original of which Family we shall speak in Brunswick) made Duke by the Emperour Conrade the 2d.
- 9 Guelfo, son of Henry Guelf, or Henry the 5th.
- 10 Ernest, created Duke hereof by the same Conrade the 2d, by whom deposed again for conspiring against him.
- 11 Henry VI.

Bavaria.

- 12 Cuno, accused of conspiracy, and displaced by Henry the 3d. to make room for 13 Henry VII. son of the said Emperor Henry the 3d. whom he succeeded in the Empire by the name of Henry the 4th.
 14 Agnes, the mother of the said Henry the 4th. by the gift of her son.
 15 Otho, by the gift of the Empress Agnes, deposed not long after by Henry the 4th.
 16 Welfo III. son of Coniza the daughter of Guelph the 2d. by Axon, an Italian Marquis; made Duke hereof by the said Emperor Henry the 4th.
 17 Welfo IV. son to Welfo the 3.
 18 Henry VIII. surnamed the Proud, brother of Guelpho the 4th. by the marriage of Gertrude daughter of Lotharius the 2d. Duke of Saxony also. Deprived of both by the Emperor Conrade the third.
 19 Leopald, son to Leopald the 4th. Marquis of Austria, made Duke by the said Conrade the 3d.
 20 Henry IX. brother of Leopald, after Marquis, at last Duke of Austria.
 21 Henry X. surnamed the Lion, son of Henry the Proud, restored by the Arbitrement of Frederick Barbarossa (the Duke of Austria being otherwise satisfied:) by whom not long after proscribed and deprived of both his Dukedoms. After which this estate became fixed and settled, in the person and posterity of 1180 22 Otho of Wittelsbach, so called from the place of his birth or dwelling; descended lineally from Arnulph the Lord of Schyre in the Upper Bavaria, and 2d. son of Arnulph, the first Duke hereof; advanced unto this honour by Frederick Barbarossa, sensible of the too great power of the former Dukes: the whole extent of this estate being reduced by this time, to the limits of the modern Bavaria, and the Palatinate Northgoia.
 1183 23 Ludovick, or Lewis son of Otho.
 1231 24 Otho II. son of Lewis, who by marrying Gertrude the sole daughter of Henry Count Palatine of the Rhene, brought the Electoral dignity into the house of Bavaria.
 1290 25 Henry Duke of Bavaria, and Count Palatine of the Rhene, the son of Otho the 2d.
 1294 26 Ludovick, or Lewis II. brother of Henry, Duke of Bavaria, and Elector Palatine of the Rhene.
 1312 27 Ludovick, or Lewis III. second son of Lewis the 2d. succeeded in the Dukedom of Bavaria; Rodolph, the eldest son, succeeding in both Palatinates, and the Electoral dignity. He was afterwards elected and crowned Emperor, known commonly by the name of Ludovick Bavaria.
 1347 28 Stephen, the eldest son of Ludovick the Emperor; William and Albert his two brethren successively enjoying the Earldoms of Hainault, Holland, &c. in right of their mother.
 1375 29 Stephen II. son of Stephen the first, his brothers Frederick and John sharing with him parts of the estate.
 1413 30 Ludovick II. surnamed Barbatus, deposed and imprisoned by his own son Ludovick, who yet died before him without issue.
 1447 31 Henry II. son of Frederick, the second brother of Stephen the 2d. succeeded on the death of Ludovick Barbatus.
 1450 32 Ludovick V. surnamed the Rich, the son of Henry the 2d. banished the Jews out of his estates, and seized their goods.
 1479 33 George, surnamed the Rich also, the Founder of the University of Ingolstadt: whose sole daughter and heir was married to Rupertus Prince Elector Palatine; with the Dukedom of Bavaria for her Dower. But Maximilian the Emperor not liking so much greatness in the German Princes, confirmed the same on 1503 34 Albert III. son of a former Albert, Nephew of John Munchen, by his son Ernestus: which John was youngest brother to Stephen the 2d. who by the power and favour of Maximilian the Emperor, succeeded unto George the Rich: The cause of a long and unhappy war betwixt the Electors of the Rhene and Dukes of Bavaria; the worst whereof, besides the loss of this Estate, fell upon the Palatines, proscribed and outed of their Country upon this quarrel; but upon their submission, restored again.
 1508 35 William the son of Albert the 3d.
 1577 36 Albert IV. a great Champion of the Doctrines and Traditions of the Church of Rome; and so extremely affected unto the Jesuits, that he built Colleges for them at Landsberg, Ingolstadt, and Munchen, his three principal towns.
 1579 37 William II. son of Albert the 4th. as zealous as his Father, in the cause of the Church of Rome; in which exceeded very much by 38 Maximilian, eldest son of William the 2d. who chiefly out of the same zeal sided with Ferdinand the 2d. in the wars of Germany, An. 1620. and took upon him the conduct of the Armies of the said Emperor, against Frederick Count and Elector Palatine, chosen King of Bohemia. In which having done great service to the Imperial and Romish interests, he was by the said Ferdinand invested in the Upper Palatinate, called antiently (but not more properly than now) the Palatinate of Bavaria, together with the Electoral dignity: This last conferred at first upon him but for term of life, in the Diet at Regensburg, 1623. the Electors of Mentz, Saxony, and Brandenbourg, then protesting against it; but afterwards in the Diet at Prague, Anno 1628. conferred upon him and his heirs for ever: to the great prejudice of the Princes of the Palatine Family, who by reason of their immunities investiture with the first of their house, are not to be deprived of their estates and dignities for the

the offence of their Fathers; the punishment not being to extend beyond the person of the offender. But notwithstanding their pretensions, and allegations, the Duke is still possessed of the title and dignity; confirmed therein by the conclusions of the Treaty of Munster: a new Electorate being to be erected for the Palatine Princes.

The Arms of this Duke are Lozenges of 21 pieces in Band, Argent, and Azure.

8. The ARCHDUKEDOM of AUSTRIA.

The Archdukedom of AUSTRIA, reckoning in the incorporate Provinces, and the Members of it, is bounded on the East, with Hungary, and part of Sclavonia; on the West, with Bavaria, and some parts of the Switzers, and the Grisons; on the North, with Bohemia, and Moravia; and on the South, with Hispania, and some part of Friuli, in Italy. Within which circuit are contained the several Provinces of Austria, properly so called, Stiria, Carinthia, Carniola, and Tirol: the quality of the whole will be best discerned by the Survey of particulars.

The antient Inhabitants of the whole, were the Norici of the Romans, parted into the lesser Tribes of Sevates, Aunni, Ambisfontii, Ambilici, and Ambidrauni: succeeded by Drusus, son-in-law to Augustus Caesar, and made a Province of the Empire. After by Constantine the Great divided into Noricum Mediterraneum, comprehending the Countries of Carinthia, Carniola, Stiria, and some parts of Tirol; with the Bishoprick of District of Saltzburg; of which Solyn was the Metropolis, or Capital City: and Noricum Ripense, containing only Austria, and those parts of Bavaria which lie Eastward of the River Inn; extended all along on the banks of the Danow. Known by no other names while possessed by the Romans; from whom being conquered by the Avars, and other Nations, it gained those several names, and appellations, specified before.

1. AUSTRIA, properly so called, hath on the East, the Kingdom of Hungary; on the West Bavaria; on the North, the Bohemian Mountains towards the West, and on the other side, the Teyn, which separates it from Moravia; on the South, Stiria, or Stiermark. Called by the Dutch, Osterrich; and contracted Ostreich, that is to say, the Eastern kingdom (a part assuming to itself the name of the whole) this being the extreme Province of East-France, or the Eastern Kingdom of the French: in the barbarous Latine of those times, called by the name of Austrasia, whence the modern Austria.

The air is generally very healthy, and the earth as fruitful; yielding a plentiful increase, without help of compost, or other soiling; and of so easie a tillage to the husbandman, that on the North side of the Danow, it is ploughed and managed by one horse only. Exceeding plentiful of grain, and abundant in wine, with which last it supplyeth the defects of Bavaria: great store of Saffron, some provision of Salt; and at the foot of the Mountains, not far from Haimburg, some Ginger also. Nor wants it Mines of Silver in a large proportion. Divided by the River Danow into the Lomer, and the Higher: that lying on the North side of the River, towards Bohemia, and Moravia; this on the South side, towards Stiermark.

Places of most importance in the HIGHER AUSTRIA, are 1. Gmund, seated on a Lake called Gmundner-See, bordering on Bavaria, at the efflux of the River Draun, which ariseth out of it. 2. Lints, seated on the confluence of the said Draun, with the famous Danow; the Ardeate of Plomy: A Town before the late wars almost wholly Protestant; but then being put into the hands of the Duke of Bavaria, began to warp a little to the other side. 3. Walkenstein on the Enn or Anisn, near the borders of Stiermark. 4. Enn, on the fall of that River into the Danow; raised out of the ruins of Laureacum, sometimes the Metropolis of Noricum Ripense, the Station at that time of the second Legion: afterwards an Archbishop's See, made such in the first planting of Christianity amongst this people, by S. Severine, Anno 464. On the Reviver whereof, (suppressed by the Hunnos, Bavarians, and others of the barbarous Nation) by the diligence and preaching of S. Rupertus, the Metropolitan dignity was fixt at Saltzburg. 5. Waidhoven, near the head of the River Ips. 6. Ips, seated at the influx of that River, and from thence depopulated; the Gefodunum of Plomy and other antients. 7. Newfall, on a great Lake so named. 8. Wels, on the main stream of the Danow. 9. Haimburg, on the confluence thereof, and the River Markh: Near to which at the foot of the Mountains now called Haimburgerberg (from the Town adjoining) but antiently named Montus Cognimus, is some store of Ginger: a wonderful great variety for these colder Countries. 10. Newstat, first called so from the newness of it, being built of late. 11. Vienna, by the Dutch Wien, the principal of all these parts, by Plomy called Juliobona; Vindobona, by Antonine; the Station in their times of the tenth Roman Legion: of whose being settled here, there are many Monuments both within the City, and without. Seated it is on the banks of Danubius, well built, both in regard of private and public edifices: each private house having such store of cellars for all occasions, that as much of the City seems to be under the ground, as is above it. The streets for the most part spacious, and all paved with stone, which makes them very clean and sweet in the midst of winter: fenced with a mighty wall, deep and precipitous ditches on all parts of it; and many Bulwarks, Towers, and Ramparts, in all needfull places: the walls hereof first raised with some part of the money paid unto Leopald Duke of Austria, for the ransom of King Richard the first of England, taken prisoner by him as he passed homewards through this Country, from the Holy Land. Et seemed to this day the strongest hold of Christendom against the Turks, and proved experimentally so to be, in that most notable and famous repulse here given them, An. 1526. At what time 200000 of them, under the conduct of Solyman the Magnificent, besieged this City; but by the valour of Frederick the second, Elector Palatine of the Rhene, and other German Princes, gallantly resisted, and compelled to Tirol.

TIROLIS is bounded on the East, with Frinly, and Marca Trevigiana; by the interpoling of which or some parts thereof, disjoyned from Carniola; on the West, with the Grisons, and some part of Switzerland on the North, with Bavaria; and on the South, with Lombardy. Extended over the greatest part of the Alpes Rhetice, and some part of the Julia: yet intermixt with many rich and fruitful valleys, those specially which lye on the banks of the Inn, and the River of Adist. Nor are the hills so void of profit unto the Inhabitants, but that they afford good store of metals digged out of them, especially of Brasse, and Silver; which last have yielded to the Archduke 230000 Crowns yearly.

Towns of most note, 1 Oenipons, or Innspruck, so called from a Bridge on the Inn or Oenus, which gave denomination to the second branch of Austria, descended from Ferdinand, the second son of the Emperor Ferdinand; the house of Gratz issuing from Charles, the third son of that Emperor. Most memorable for the hasty flight of Charles the first, upon the news that Duke Maurice, whom he had lately made Elector of Saxony, was coming against him with his Forces. Which so terrified him, that he fled away by torch-light, with some of his followers; the residue of this Court (most of which were persons of great eminency) trudging in the dark on foot, with the Black Guard and the Skullery. The Town being many times the residence of the Dukes of Austria, who have here a very Royal and magnificent Palace. And to say truth, the Town deserveth to be so honoured; amongst pleasant Meadows, spacious cornfields, and shady mountains sweetly seated: the houses fairly built of stone, enriched by the Courts of Judicature here settled for all the Country, and provided of a gallant Armory. 2 Trent, (Tridentum it is called in Latine) situate in the confines of Germany, and Italy; for which cause the Inhabitants speak both languages. Built on the banks of the River Athesis, or Adist: honoured with an Episcopal See, but made more famous by the Council which was there begun by Pope Paul the third, Anno 1545. against the Lutherans. For 22 years together before their meeting, dashed by one Pope, and animated by another, advanced by Charles the fifth upon worldly Policies, and for as worldly Policies retarded by the Court of Rome: for 18 years after this first Convention of it, at sundry times, assembled, suspended, and dissolved. And finally, when fixed here seriously by Pope Pius the fourth, Anno 1562. managed with so much art and cunning by the Papal party, that nothing was determined among the Prelates, but what had formerly been resolved on in the Roman Conclave, and certified accordingly by especial Posits: occasioning that most bitter jest of one of the Hungarian Bishops who was present at it, that the Holy Ghost was sent unto them in a Clock-bag from Rome. The affects of which Council, so artificially carried on by the strength of wit, I cannot better describe than in the words of the History of it, which are as followeth. This Council, desired and procured by "godly men to reunite the Church which began to be divided, hath so established the Schism, and made the parties to obstinate, that the discords are irreconcilable. And being managed by Princes for Reformation of Ecclesiastical Discipline, hath caused the greatest deformation that ever was "since Christianity did begin: and hoped for by the Bishops themselves to regain the Episcopal Authority, for the most part usurped by the Pope, hath made them lose it altogether, bringing them into "greater servitude. On the contrary feared and avoided by the See of Rome, as a potent means to "moderate the exorbitant power thereof, mounted from small beginnings, by divers degrees, to an "unlimited excess; it hath so established and confirmed the same over that part which remained subject unto it, that it was never so great, nor soundly rooted. So far the words of the History. The next of note is, 3 Falkenstein, remarkable for mines of Brasse; as 4 Hal upon the Inn for Saltwicks; and 5 Schnas for the richer mines of Silver. 6 Mulk, near the head of the River Athesis. 7 Pollen, upon the borders of Italy, by the people whereof called Bolgiano, and Bolsano. 8 Tirol, an ancient Cattle, the first seat of the Earls or Governours hereof, and giving name for that reason to the Country adjoining. 9 Meran, neighbouring the old Castle of Tirol, which gave the title of Dukes to a branch of the Caroline race, descended from Rathboldus, a base son of the Emperor Arnolph; possessed of many large estates in these Alpine Countries, now appertaining to the Princes of the house of Austria. From one of which Dukes called Otho of Meranie, married to Beatrice, heir of the County of Burgundy, the Earls of Burgundy (since that time) do derive themselves.

The Earls hereof, were at the first no other than Provincial Officers; when made Proprietaries, I am yet to seek. The first of whom we have any certainty, was Mainard, Earl of Tirol and Goritz, who died in the year 1258, leaving his Earldoms to that Mainard who by Rodolphus Halspurgensis was enfeoffed with the Dukedom of Karnten. But Henry the second of this last Mainard dying without issue male; his daughter Margaret, by the consent of all her people, settled her estate therein on the sons of Albert, called the Short: continuing ever since in the house of Austria, though sometimes made the portion and inheritance of the younger Princes. By Ferdinand the first, it was given in Appenage to his 2d. son Ferdinand, surnamed of Innspruck for that reason, who by marrying with Philippina a Burgers daughter of Augsburg, so displeased his brethren, that to buy his peace of them, and enjoy his own content with her; it was finally agreed upon amongst them all, that Tirol should not descend upon his Children of that venter. In pursuance whereof after his decease, Tirol fell to the house of Gratz: his eldest son Charles being made Marquess of Burgh, and Andrew his youngest, Cardinal of Brixia. Who were the old Inhabitants of the Roman Austria, we have seen already. The old inhabitants of the other part are supposed to be the Qualli, in that part which lyeth next to Bohemia; the Marcomanni, in those parts which are next Moravia; who intermingled with the Boii, and united with them into the name of Boiarians, won from the Romans the whole Province of the Second Rhetia, and so much of Noricum as lyeth betwixt the Inn and the Enns, leaving the rest to the Avars, who possessed that and the two Pannonias, extorted also from the Romans in the fall of that great and mighty mighty Empire, as we shall shew more fully when we come to our description of Hungary. But these Boiarians being conquered by Clovis the Great, and the Avars driven out of Pannonia by Charlemagne; both Provinces became members of the French Empire, till the subduing of Pannonia by the Hungarians. To oppose whom, and keep in peace and safety these remoter parts, some Guardians, or Lords Marchers, were appointed by the Kings and Emperours of Germany, with the title of Marquesses of Ostreich. At first Officiaries only, but at last hereditary. Made so by the Emperor Henry the first, who gave this Province to one Leopold, surnamed the Illustrious, the son of Henry Earl of Bamberg, of the house of Schwaben; and therewithall the title of Marquess, Anno 980. This Marquisate was by Frederick Barbaross raised to a Dukedom, 1158. Henry being the first Duke, whose Nephew Leopold took Richard the first of England, prisoner, in his return from Palestine: for whose ransom he had so much money, that with it he bought Stiermark, together with the Counties of Neubourg, and Lintz; and walled Vienna. His son Fredericus, surnamed the Warlike, was made King of Austria by the Emperor Frederick the second, Anno 1225. Eleven years he continued in this dignity; at the end of which he was spoiled of his royal ornaments by the same hand, for denying his appearance at the Emperours summons, unto whom for some outrages he had been complained of. Finally, he died in the year 1246. discomfited and slain in battel by the King of Hungary. Leaving no issue of his body, this estate of right should have descended on Frederick, son of Hermannus, Marquess of Baden, and of Gertrude his wife, the Niece of this Frederick the Warlike, by his brother Henry, who was afterwards beheaded at Naples by Charles of Faloi, Anno 1268. But Ottacar, son of Primislavus King of Bohemia, pretending to it in the right of Margaret his wife, one of the Sisters of the said Frederick the Warlike, by a strong hand possessed himself of the Dukedom of Austria, which he increased by the addition of Carinthia, and Trevigiana; all which he held, together with the Kingdom of Bohemia, till the year 1278. in which he was vanquished and slain by Rodolphus of Habsburg, not long before advanced to the German Empire. Rodolphus thus possessed of these great estates, conferred them on Albertus his eldest son, who had then married Elizabeth, daughter of Meinard Earl of Tirol, by Elizabeth (or Agnes) his wife, the daughter of Gertrude, and sister and sole heir at last of Frederick, so cruelly murdered at Naples, as before was said. By means of which marriage and investiture, Albert was quietly possessed of the Dukedom of Austria, Stiermark, Carinthia, Corniola, together with Marca Trevigiana, to which the Earldom of Tirol, and many of other fair estates in Schwaben and Alsaia were after added. By whom it was first raised to the title of Arch-duke, is not yet agreed. Some attribute it to Rodolphus of Habsburg, at the investiture of his son Albert into these Estates, Anno 1298. Others to Charles the fourth, advancing to that honour Rodolph the Ingenious, Anno 1360. Some make it to be first given to Albert Duke hereof, in the year 1430. and others posit it lower to the marriage of Philip, son of Maximilian of Austria, and of the Lady Mary of Burgundy, with Joan Princess of Spain. But by whomsoever given at first, it is now the constant and hereditary title of all this Family: the successive Princes whereof from the first investiture, follow in the ensuing Catalogue of

The MARQUESSSES, DUKES, KINGS, and ARCH-DUKES of AUSTRIA.

- 926 1 Leopold of Bamberg, the first Marquess.
- 988 2 Henry, son of Leopold.
- 1014 3 Albert, son of Henry, surnamed the Victorious.
- 1056 4 Ernestus, son of Albert.
- 1075 5 Leopold II. son of Ernest, a companion of Godfrey of Bouillon.
- 1096 6 Leopold III. son of the second, founder of the Abby of Newbourg.
- 1136 7 Leopold IV. son of the third, by his half brother Conrade the third, then Emperour of the Germans, made Duke of Bavaria.
- 1141 8 Henry II. brother of Leopold, Marquess of Austria, and Duke of Bavaria; made the first Duke of Austria by Frederick Barbaross, Anno 1158. the whole Countrey betwixt the Inn and the Enns, being added by the said Emperor unto his estate, on his relinquishing of Bavaria to the Duke of Saxony.
- 1177 9 Ludovick, son of Henry, built Enns and Newstat; of great note in the wars of the Holy Land.
- 1193 10 Leopold V. son of Ludovick, the irreconcilable enemy of our Richard the first, taken prisoner by him in his passage homewards, and put unto a grievous ransom, the Dukedom of Stiermark being purchased with a part thereof.
- 1230 11 Frederick the Warlike, son of Leopold the fifth, made King of Austria by the Emperor Frederick the second; the last of the male issue of the house of Bamberg.
- 1246 12 Ottacar, son of Wenceslaus King of Bohemia, pretending the right of Margaret his wife, sister of Frederick, possessed himself of this Estate: adding thereto the Countreies of Carinthia and Carniola, which he bought of Ulrick the last Prince thereof; but dispossessed of all by Rodolph of Habsburg.
- 1283 13 Albert II. son of Rodolph of Habsburg, by his father made Duke of Austria, married Elizabeth, the lineal and direct heir of Gertrude, one of the Nieces, and (on the death of that Frederick, who was slain at Naples) the next heir of Frederick King and Duke of Austria; after his Fathers death chosen Emperour also.

1308 14 Rodolph

- Veteravia.* 1308 14 Rodolph the Ingenious, his other brother sharing with him in the estate.
 1315 15 Albert, surnamed the Short, the youngest and surviving brother of Rodolph, succeeded in the whole Estate; a great advancer of this house.
 1358 16 Albert IV. son of Albert the Short.
 1365 17 Albert V. son of Albert the fourth.
 1404 18 Albert VI. son of Albert the fifth, King of Hungary and Bohemia, in right of Elizabeth his wife, daughter and heir of Sigismund the King thereof.
 1439 19 Ladislaus, son of Albert and Elizabeth, King of Hungary and Bohemia, and Duke of Austria.
 1457 20 Frederick II. on the death of Ladislaus without issue, succeeded into the Dukedom of Austria as the direct heir of Leopold the 9th. one of the younger sons of Albert the Short; chosen also Emperor.
 1493 21 Maximilian, son of Frederick, enriched his house with the marriage of the heir of Burgundy.
 1519 22 Ferdinand, Grandchild to Maximilian by his son Philip King of Spain, and Archduke of Austria, succeeded his Grandfather in this Dukedom: King of Hungary, Bohemia, and Emperor of Germany.
 1565 23 Maximilian II. son of Ferdinand.
 1577 24 Rodolphus III. son of Maximilian the second.
 1612 25 Matthias, brother of Rodolphus.
 1619 26 Ferdinand II. surnamed of Gratz, son of Charles Duke of Austria, of the house of Gratz, the youngest son of Ferdinand the first (the numerous Off-spring of Maximilian the second being all dead without issue) succeeded in the estates of Austria, chosen Emperor also, King of Hungary, and Bohemia, &c.
 27 Ferdinand III. son of Ferdinand the second, now living Anno. 1648. Archduke of Austria, King of Hungary and Bohemia, and Emperours of the Germans.

The Arms of these Earls when distinct from the house of Austria, were Argent, an Eagle Sable, membered Or.

Thus have we seen by what means and under what Princes, all these Provinces belonging unto several Lords, became united and incorporated into one Estate. Besides which, there was added to it by Rodolph of Halbspurg, all the Upper Elzette, the Cattle and Territory of Halbspurg itself, with many fair Estates amongst the Switzers; by Albert the Short, the Countrey of Sunow; and by his sons, the Advocateship of Friburg, or the Countrey of Brigow. So that these Princes are undoubtedly the greatest for power and patrimony, of any in Germany: and would be of a great revenue, if the ill neighbourhood of the Turks did not put them to continual charges: and make the borders of the Countrey to be thinly planted, and not very thorowly manured. Howsoever, it is thought that they may yeeld yearly two millions of Crowns and upwards, to the Archdukes Coffers.

The Arms of these Princes are Gules, A Fels Argent; assumed by Marquess Leopold at the siege of Acon, or Ptolemais in the Holy Land; because his whole Armour, being covered with blood, his Belt only remained white. The Arms thereof in former times having been six Larks Or, in a field Azure; supposed to have been taken by the first Marquess, because they possessed those six Provinces, for defence of which the tenth Legion called Alanda, had been fixed at Vienna.

And now we are to take our leave of the Roman Empire, which we shall meet withall no more till we come to Hungary; the Countries of the North side of Danubius, and the East side of the Rhene, being almost as soon abandoned, as conquered by them. So that in our survey of these Northern Countries, we are not like to find such matter of Antiquity as we have before; but must content our selves both with Towns and Villages of a later date, and a lesser continuance. In which we shall begin with those Countries which lye on the other side of the Rhene, bordering on the Estates of Cleaveland, and the Bishop-electors; and so proceed on Eastward till we come to the furthest parts of Germany, and the confines of Hungary; afterwards turning to the North till we meet with Denmark, which is next of all to be considered.

9. VETRAVIA.

VETERAVIA, or WETERAW, is bounded on the West, with the Bishoprick of Colen; on the East, with Frankeland; on the North, with Hassia, and Westphalen; and on the South, with the Lower Palatinite. It containeth a combination of many small estates, which being joyned in a common league for defence of each other in the preservation of their Laws, Liberties, and Religion; are called the Confederation of the Weteraw. The principal of the States which are thus confederated, are the Earls of Nassau, 2 Hanau, and 3 Solms; 4 the Lord of Lichtenberg, and the Imperial Cities of 5 Friedberg, and 6 Weizelaur.

The County of NASSAW (for fruitfullness of soil, and delightfomness of situation, not inferior to most parts of France) lyeth at the foot of the Mountains, which divide Hassia from Engern, and Westphalen; antiently called Melibocus; a branch of the long ridge of Mountains which were called Abnobi. Chief Towns hereof, are 1 Nassaw, situate on the South side of the River Lon, not far from the fall of it into the Rhene; the first seat and honourary Title of this famous family, and still in the possession of the Princes of Orange, the first branch hereof. 2 Dillingbourg, the usual seat of the Earls of Nassaw, before their settling in the Low Countries; hence named the Earls of Nassaw of the house of Dillingbert, to difference them from others of the same family. 2 Catzenelbogen which gives the title of an Earl to the owners of it; in Latine, Catti Meliboci, which shews the name to be compounded of the Catti, antiently possessed of these parts of Germany, and the mountainous parts of Melibocus, then inhabited by them. The possession of this town much controverted between the Earls of Nassaw, and the Landgraves of Hassia. Concerning which, we are to know, that Henry the second son of Lewis, Landgrave of Hassia, surnamed the Mild, married with Anne, daughter and heir of Philip the last Lord hereof, and by her had a son called William, who died without issue; and a daughter named Elizabeth; married to John the 3d. of Nassaw, to whom she brought Henry and William, Earls of Nassaw. Elizabeth on the death of her brother William, laid claim to the estate, as the next heir to him; followed in the pursuit thereof, by William Count of Nassaw, her surviving son. Against which, William the 2d. of Hassia did alledge a grant or donation of it from his Cousin William, the brother of Elizabeth, as before said, and having possession of the Town, and the members of it, was made thereby the better able to defend his Title. But at the last it was surrendered by Count William of Nassaw (father of William Prince of Orange) unto Philip the Landgrave, in the time of Charles the fifth, for the sum of 60000 Crowns: the house of Nassaw notwithstanding retaining it amongst their Titles. 3 Herborn, a small University, or Schola Elusitris, founded at late by the Earls of Nassaw: in which Piscator was Divinity Reader, and Alfedijs (both famous in their times) Professor for the Arts and Sciences. 4 Idstein, lying south to Catzenelbogen; and 5 Wisbad, directly south of Idstein, betwixt that and the Main; these being the title and possessions of the second branch of this Family. 6 Weillborongh on the Lon, not far from Weitzelver; which gives Title to the third branch of this house, called the Earls of Nassaw in Sarbuck; and Weillborongh.

As for the Princes of the house of Nassaw, they are very antient; Otho of Nassaw being made Earl of Guelderland in the year 1079. Another Otho of this house, but proceeding from a different branch of it, dying Anno 1190. the founder of the present Family of the Princes of Orange; and of the house Wisbad and Idstein, out of which descended Adolphus Earl of Nassaw, chosen Emperor, in the year 1292. By the marriage of Engelbert, the seventh Earl of this house of Dillingbert, with Mary daughter of Philip, Lord of Breda in Brabant, they came first to be possessed of Estates in the Netherlands: and by the marriage of Henry, great Grand-child of this Engelbert, with Claude of Châlons, they got the Principality of Orange in France. A family as much honoured for the personal merit of the Princes of it, as any other in Europe; of some of which, although we have already given a Catalogue (in the description and story of Provence) as Princes of Orange; yet take here the whole succession of them, as

Fr. nevin.

Franconia. 1648 17 William III. son of Henry the 4th. successor to his Father in all his Honours and commands; A Prince of great hopes and expectations.

The Arms of the Earls of Nassau are Quarterly, 1 Azure a Lion Or, Armed Gules; 2ly. Or, a Lion-Leopard Gules, Armed and Crowned Azure; 3ly. Gules, a Fels Argent; and 4ly. Gules, two Leopards Or, armed and membered Gules.

Bordering on Franconia and Frankenland, lyeth the County of HANAW, so called from the chief Town of it: in which the places of most note, are 1 Hanaw it self, in Latine called Hanovia, honoured with a Schola illustriis also; and much enriched by the trade of Printing, with which they use to furnish annually the Mints of Frankfort, distant from hence about ten Dutch miles. 2 Pfaffenhofen, of no note formerly, but like to be remembered in the stories of succeeding times, for the great defeat there given to the Duke of Lorraine, July 31. 1633. who lost his whole Forces, all his Ordnance, Ammunition, and baggage; and which was worst of all, his Countrey: taken in part from him by the Conquering Swedes, who followed him close into his home; but wholly by the French King upon that advantage. 3 Liechberg, which gives Title to a second branch of the house of Hanow, called the Lord of Liechberg. A family of good esteem, since the time that Otho of Hanaw was ennobled with the title or Earl thereof, which was about the year 1392. before that, Princes of the Empire; and after that, advanced unto great fortunes, by the addition of the Barony of Mintzberg, in the person of Philipp, the first Earl; of the County of Rheineck, in the person of another Philipp, the third of that name, great Granchild of the former Philipp; and finally, of the Lordship and Estate of Liechberg, accreuing to this house by the marriage of a third Philipp, the youngest son of Reynard the third Earl hereof, with Anne the daughter and heir of Ludovick, Lord of Liechberg. The title and possession of the second branch of the house of Hanaw, called Lords of Liechberg, and Hofenstein, and Earls of Bischo: this last being an estate in Lorraine, accreuing to them by the marriage of a fourth Philipp, (the fifth in name and order of the house of Liechberg) with Margaret, sole daughter and heir of Ludovick the last Earl thereof.

Betwixt the Counties of Nassau, and Hanaw, on both sides of the River Lon, lies the Earldom of SOLMS, the first Earl whereof, (of whom there is any good Constat) was Henry, honoured with this title, Anno 1220. But being I find them in the Catalogue of the Counts Imperial, made before that time, I must conclude them to be antienter than the date aforesaid; though that sufficient to enable a far greater Family. By the marriage of Conrade the ninth from Henry, first with Elizabeth, one of the daughters of Wil. of Nassau, Prince of Orange, and after with the widow of the Earl of Egmond, they came to be of such authority amongst the Netherlands, as to be privileged with a place and suffrage in the Council of the States General: there seated at the present in their greatest honour, especially since the marriage of Henry of Nassau, Prince of Orange, with a daughter of Earl Conrade by his second wife; the mother of William of Nassau, now Prince of Orange, and husband to the Princess Mary, the eldest daughter of Great Britain. But besides their Estates there, they are possessed in this tract, of 1 Brunsfels, which gives Title to the first branch of the house of Solms. 2 Cronenberg, the possession of the second branch of this Family; and 3 Solms, on the North side of the Lon, the root of both.

Of the Imperial Cities in this Confederation, the first is Friburg, called for distinction sake, Friburg in Weteraw; to difference it from another Town of that name in Brissgov; situate in the middle of delicious and most fruitful fields, and memorable for the stout resistance which it made to Adolphus of Nassau, at that time Emperor: who when he could not get it by force, or famine, obtained it by fraud; and put to death no less than 40 of the chief Nobility, whom he found in the Castle. So hated for that bloody fact, that he was shortly after deprived of the Empire, and slain in fight by Albert of Austria, his Competitor. The 2d. of the two is Wetzelaer, seated on the Lon, where it meets with the Dille, which rising near Dillenberg, a Town of the Earl of Nassau, doth here lose its name into the greater. A Town Imperial, confederate with Friburg, and the Princes before mentioned, for maintaining their common liberties, and the Religion publicly professed amongst them; being that of the Reformed Churches of Calvins Platform.

10 FRANCONIA.

FRANCONIA or FRANKENLAND, is bounded on the East, with the Upper Palatinate, and part of Uelaland; on the West, with the Confederates of Weteraw, and part of the Rhene; on the North, with Hassia and Thuringia; and on the South, with the Palatinate of the Rhene, and some part of Schwaben. So called from the French, Franci, or Francones, in whose possession it was, when they were first known unto the Romans; the residence of their Dukes or Princes in this noble Province, appropriating the name unto it. Called also Francia Orientalis, to difference it from the Realm of France, which lay more towards the West. At that time of a larger extent than it is at the present, comprehending to much of the Lower Palatinate as lieth on the same side of the Rhene; but subdued from it, and made a Province of it self in these later Ages.

The Countrey on the out parts overgrown wholly in a manner with Woods and Forests, and environed almost with mountains, part of the old Hercinian Woods; is within, pleasant, plain, and fruitful: sufficiently plentiful both of corn and wines, but abundantly well stored with Rape and Licorus, and yielding good pasture for Cattel. So that we may compare it to a fine piece of Clash, wrought about with a coarse List: or an excellent fine piece of Lawn, with a canvas Selwege.

Chief

Chief Rivers of it, are 1 The Main, or Mœnus, which running through the midst of it, is received into the Rhene below Frankfort. 2 The Sala, whence the adjoining French had the name of Salii; and Conrade, Emperor of the Germans, the surname of Salicus. 3 Radiantis, 4 Sinna, 5 Tüvero, 6 Assur, &c.

The people of it are ingenious, patient of labour, strong of body, and very industrious, not suffering any to be idle that can earn his living, of what sort soever. The offspring of the ancient French, who having over-mastered Gaul, and the parts adjoining, left here the seminary of their strength, and a stock of their antient Princes: Marcomir, brother of Pharamund the first King of the French, governing in these parts as Duke, and leaving the estate and title unto his posterity. The catalogue of which Princes, take in order thus:

The PRINCES of the FRANKS, and DUKES of FRANCONIA, of the old FRENCH Race:

- A. Ch.
 326 1 Genebaldus, the son of Dagobert, descended from the old Regal stock of the Sicambri, united with other Dutch nations about 60 or 70 years before, in the name of Franks; having subdued those parts which lay towards the River Mœnus, became the first Prince of the Eastern Franks, or Lord of Francia Orientalis.
 356 2 Dagobert, the son of Genebaldus, who added the district of Triers unto his Estates.
 377 3 Clodovæus, or Ludovicus, the son of Dagobert.
 398 4 Marcomir, the son of Clodovæus, who extended his Dominion Eastwards towards Bavaria and Bohemia.
 402 5 Pharamund, or Waramund, the son of Marcomir, the first of this line which took upon himself the title of King of the French: on the assuming whereof, (aiming at matters of more importance) he left Franconia, or East France, with the Title of Duke, to his brother Marcomir.
 419 6 Marcomir, the brother of Pharamund.
 423 7 Prummesser, by some called Priamus, the son of Marcomir.
 435 8 Genebaldus II. the son of Prummesser.
 455 9 Sunno, the son of Genebald the second.
 478 10 Clodomirus, or Luitomarus, the son of Sunno.
 515 11 Hygobaldus, the son of Clodomir, who became a Christian, and added Wormes and Mentz unto his Estates.
 541 12 Helenus, by some called Herméricus, a Christian also, who passing over the Rhene, subdued that tract bordering betwixt Triers and Lorraine, which the Dutch call Westrich.
 571 13 Gotofridus, the son of Helenus, a Christian also, but not able to persuade his people to the same belief.
 595 14 Genebaldus III. the son of Gotofrede.
 615 15 Clodomir II. the son of Genebald the third.
 638 16 Heribert, the Nephew of Clodomir the second.
 668 17 Clodovæus, or Clovis II. the Cousin-German of Heribert.
 680 18 Gosbertus, the son of Clovis the second.
 706 19 Gosbertus II. the son of Gosbert the first.
 720 20 Heraunus, the son of Gosbert the second, the last Duke of Franconia of this line. Who dying without issue male, Anno 740. bequeathed it at his death to Pepin, who afterwards was King of France, Father of Charles the great; according to a former contract made between those Princes. And Charles no sooner had it in his possession, but he bestowed the greatest part of it on Burchard the first Bishop of Wurtzburg, Anno 752. made Bishop of that City by Boniface, Arch-bishop of Mentz (the first Apostle of this People) but a year before. The Bishops of Wurtzburg by this grant were possessed hereof, as long as any of the house of Charles the Great did possess the Empire. But his posterity failing in the person of Conrade, Anno 910. Otho the first (who next but one succeeded Conrade) invited Conrade, husband and to Luitwardis his daughter, with this Countrey; giving him withall the title of Duke of Francony. Four Princes of this house possessed it: that is to say, this Conrade surnamed Salicus; and after him three Henries, Father, Son, and Nephew, successively enjoying the Imperial dignity, by the name of Henry the third, fourth, and fifth. This Henry, the last Prince of the male line of Conrade, dying without issue, Franconia fell to Frederick Barbarossa, Duke of Schwaben, as next heir to Henry, by the Lady Agnes his sister, married to Frederick the Antient, Duke of Schwaben, the grandfather of Barbarossa. But that house being also extinct in the person of Conradine, Anno 1268. and no one heir pretending to the rights thereof; the Bishops of Wurtzburg challenged it on the former grant: content to let some great ones have a part of the spoils that he and his successors might enjoy the rest. By means whereof it came to be divided betwixt the Bishops of Wurtzburg, Bamberg, Mentz, the Elector Palatine of the Rhene, (for antiently so much of the Palatinate and the Bishoprick of Mentz as lay on the Dutch side of the Rhene, were but parts of Frankenland) the Marquess of Oroldsbach, the Earls of Swartzenberg, Hennenberg, and Hohenloe, and as many of the Free or Imperial Cities as are seated in it. Thus every one did gather sticks when the great Oak fell: the title of the Duke of Francony, remaining notwithstanding to the Bishops of Wurtzburg.

i WURTZB.

Franconia.

WURTZBURG, the Metropolis of Franconia, the seat and residence of the Bishop, who is Tum-lar Duke hereof, is situate on the Mein, or Mannus, in a pleasant plain environed with Meadows, Gardens, and fruitful Mountains; and very well fenced with walls, trenches, bulwarks, and other Arts of modern fortification: well peopled, and for the most part handsomely and neatly built. Passing over the Bridge built of free stone on many large and spacious Arches, you come unto a fair and pompous (though ancient) Castle; the ordinary dwelling of the Bishop: and yet so strong, that the many vain attempts of the Bores and Citizens, apt to pick quarrels with their Prince, made it thought impregnable; to which the situation of it on the top of an hill added some advantage, but it proved otherwise when besieged by the King of Sweden, Anno 1631. who after a short, but stout resistance, took it by assault. Other Towns of most note which belong to the Bishops of Wurtzburg, are 2 Forchheim, where it is said that Pontius Pilate was born. 3 Gemund, at the meeting of the Mein and the Sal, or Sala. Bre-ta upon the Salz, or Sala, not far from Gemund: remarkable enough, if for nothing else, for being the birth-place of Melanchthon that renowned Scholar, the Phoenix of Germany as some call him, and that not unfitly. 4 Chronach. 5 Stapfheilstein. 6 Hochstadt, of which little memorable.

But to return unto the Bishop as chief Lord of all; he is called in the refined Latine of these times, Herbipolitanus, but commonly Wurtzburgensis; differing in sound, but not in sense: for Wurtzburg is no other than a Town of Worts, situate among plants and gardens, as before is said; and Herbipolis made up out of several languages, doth signify no more than a City of Herbs. By whom the Episcopal See was here first erected, and how the Bishops hereof came to be entituled unto their Estates, hath been shewn already. The manner how the new Bishop is admitted, and the old interred, may beworth our knowledge. On the decease of the former Bishop, the Lord Elect attended with a great train of horse is to make his entrance. As soon as he come within the Gates, he alights off his horse, and putteth off his robes, and being attired in a poor and deplorable habit, begirt about with a rope, bare-headed, and bare-footed, he is conducted by the Earls of Henneberg, Castell, Wortheim, and Reineck, to S. Salvator's Church, being his Cathedral. The Dean and Canons there meeting him, ask him what he would have: to which he modestly replyeth, that though unworthily, he is come to discharge the office unto which he is called. Then the Dean thus, I admit thee in the name of this Chapter, committing to thy care this Church of Saint Saviours, and the Dukedome thereunto belonging, in the name of the Father, Son, and holy Ghost. Which done he putteth on his Episcopal habit, sayeth Mass, and from thence passeth to the Castle, where he gives entertainment to all the Company. The living Bishop thus invested, proceed we next unto the burial of the dead: whose body being imbowelled, is kept in the Chappel of his Car-stle, his heart preserved in a vessel of glass. The next day he is carried to the Monastery of Saint James, holding a Crozier Staff in his right hand, and a sword in his left; buried with which the next day after, in the Church of S. Saviour. As for the Revenues of the Bishop, they must needs be great; the Bishop hereof in the time of Charles the first, compounding for his peace with Albert, Marquess of Brandenburg, at the price of 220000 Crowns in ready money, and entering into a bond to pay all his debts, which amounted to 350000 Crowns more. By which we may partly guess at the richness of his Exchequer, and partly at the greatness of his Intrado.

2 The second great Lord of Franconia is the Bishop of BAMBERG, a City seated on the Mein, not far from Wurtzburg; the little River Rednitz falling there into it: supposed by Mercator to bethe Brannionarium of Ptolomy, and to have took this new name from the hill Baba (so called from Baba, daughter of Otho Duke of Saxony, and wife of Albert once Earl hereof) upon which it is situate: the right name being Babenberg (remember that Berg in Dutch signifieth an Hill) and contractedly Hamberg, a City delightfully seated amongst mountains and pleasant gardens, and in a soil exceeding fruitfull of all necessaries, and yielding Liquorice in great plenty: the birth-place of Joachim Camerarius, one of the great lights of Germany, and a See Episcopal, the Bishop of which is exempt from the power of the Metropolitan, subject immediately to the Pope, and Lord of many fair Towns and territories in this Country; but much diminished since the time of Charles the first: the Bishop thereof then being, giving to Marquess Albert above mentioned, for a cessation from arms, Anno 1530. no less than 60 of his Lordships (most of which fall unto the share of the Marquess of Onaldbach) besides the titulage of Bishop of his Wards and Clients. Of those which are remaining in the hands of the Bishops, the principal are 1 Bräunlingen, 2 Schlitz.

3 The third great Lord to be considered is the Marquess of Onaldbach, or Ansbach, who is Master of no small part of this Country; but his Estate (as those of the other German Princes,) confused and intermixed with his Neighbours. His chief Towns, 1 Onaldbach or Ansbach, the usual residence of these Marquesses, and the birth-place of most of their Children. 2 Hallwurm, on the edge of Wittenberg; walled in, about the year 1085. and honoured with some publick Schools there founded by Marquess George Frederick, Anno 1482. 3 Pleinfeld, not far from Nuremberg. Such places as they hold in Voitland, we shall meet with here.

These Marquesses are of the puissant family of Brandenburg, by whom this fair estate was wrested from the Female Heirs of Wolframus, the last Lord hereof. The first who did enjoy this Estate and Title was Marquess George Frederick, the Son of Albert Marquess and Elector of Brandenburg, called the Achilles of Germany; the Father of Albert the first Duke of Prussia, and of George, the first Marquess of Legation; and the Grandfather of that Marquess Albert, who in the dayes of Charles the first harassed this Country. But his Male-issue by Casimir his eldest son, failing in that Albert, Anno 1557. it returned to the Electoral house; and by Sigismund, a late Elector was given to Joachim Ernestus, one of his younger Brethren, who by the Princes of the Union for defence of the Protestant, was made chief Commander of their Forces, Anno 1620. A charge in which it was supposed posed, that he carried himself neither so faithfully nor so valiantly, as he should have done; being much condemned for suffering Spinola with his Army to pass by unfought with, when he had all advantages that could be wished for, to impede his march: the greatest part of the Palatinate being lost immediately upon that neglect; and by degrees the rest of the United Princes, either taken off from their engagement, or ruined for adhering to it with too great a constancy. To him succeeded his Son Christian now possessed hereof.

As for the other secular Princes which have any considerable estates in this Country, they are the Earls of Henneberg, Hohenloe, Rheineck, Castell, Wortheim, Horpach, and Swartzenbourg, together with the Lords of Limburg, and Rheichsburg: all of them named so from the chief Town of their Estates, and all those Towns enriched with some suitable Territory. Of these the Earls of Henneberg, Rheineck, Castell, and Wortheim, are Homagers to the Bishop of Wurtzburg, and are to do him service at his Inthronization: the Earldom of Rheineck being now united to that of Hanow, as was shewn before; and that of Henneberg most famous, in that one of the Earls hereof was Father of that incredible increase of Children (as many as there be dayes in the year) produced at one birth by the Lady Margaret his wife, sister of William Earl of Holland, and King of the Romans. A Family of as great Antiquity as most in Germany, fetching their Pedegree as high as to Charles the Great, without help of the Heralds. But they of greatest power and parentage amongst them, are the Earls of SWARTZENBURG, deriving themselves from one Witkindus, of the house of Saxony: who fighting for his Country against the French, Anno 779. was taken Prisoner, carried into France, and there baptized at the perswasion of Lewis the Godly, son of Charles the Great. Witkindus his Son and Successor, being baptized at the same time also by the name of Charles, was the first Earl of Swartzenburg, a Castle of his own building on the edge of Thuringia, Anno 796. whose posterity do still hold the same, but much improved in their Estates by marriages and other accrements. A race of Princes which have yielded many of great influence, in the affairs of Germany: amongst them Guntar Earl of Schwartzenburg, elected Emperor of the Romans, against Charles the fourth, by Rodolph Elector Palatine, Ericus Duke of Saxony, Ludovick Marquess of Brandenburg, and Henry Archbishop of Mentz. By which last solemnly inaugurated at Aken, (or Aquisgrane) Anno 1349. But being unworthily poisoned by his Competitor, though he died not of it, yet he was made so weak and unfit for action, that he was forced to surrender his pretensions to his mortal enemy; receiving in compensation for his charges 22000 marks in silver, and some Towns in Thuringia.

Of the Imperial Cities, which share amongst them the remainders of Frankenlandt, the principal are 1. Frankford on the Meine, so called from its situation on the River Meine, to difference it from Frankford in the Country of Brandenburg. Divided by the River into two parts, joynted together by a Bridge of stone; the lesser part, situate on the right-hand shore of the River, being called Saxenhausen; the greater part, properly called Frankford, seated on the other. Both under one Magistrate, and both together making up a fair, rich, populous, and well-traded Town, of great both riches and repute by reason of the famous Marts here held, in the midst of Lent and September yearly; and the Election of the Emperor, or King of the Romans, as occasion is. The City of a round form, compassed with a double wall, beautified with some walks without the Town on the banks of the River, amongst Vineyards, Meadows, and sweet Groves: called thus, as some say, from Francus the son of Alarconmir, supposed to be the founder of it, or a Francorum vado, as the Ford of the Franks, before the building of the Bridge. 2. Schweinford, on the Meine also, in a fruitful soil. 3. Rotenburg, on the River Tuber. 4. Winsheim. Here is also the Town of 5. Koburg, which belongeth to the house of Saxony, and gives title unto some of the younger Princes of it, called from hence Dukes Saxen-Koburg. And hereto may be added 6. the fair City of Nuremberg, conceived by most to be within the Upper Palatinate; but by the Emperor Maximilian made a member of the Circle of Franconia, in regard most of the Estates and possessions of it lie within this Country. Of which indeed they have so plentiful a share, that when Maurice Elector of Saxony, and his confederates, had driven Charles the first out of Germany, Marquess Albert before mentioned (whose Sword was his best Revenue) picking a quarrel with this City, burnt no less than an hundred Villages belonging to it, 70 Mannors and Farm-houses appertaining to the wealthier Citizens, 3000 Acres of their Woods; and after all this havoc made of their estate, compelled them to compound with him for 400000 Crowns in Money, and six pieces of Ordnance. But being the City it self seems rather to belong to the other Palatinate, we shall there meet with it.

Amongst these Prelates, Princes, and Imperial Cities is the great Dukedom of Franconia, at this time divided; the title still remaining in the Bishop of Wurtzburg, and some part of the Country: but both the Country and the title of Duke of Francony, not long since otherwise disposed of. For the Swedes having taken Wurtzburg, Anno 1631. as before is said, together with the City of Bamberg, and all the Towns and Territories appertaining to them; conferred them upon Barnard Duke of Saxon-Weymer, with title and title of Duke of Franconia. Inaugurated therein in the Cathedral Church of Wurtzburg, July, 19. 1633. the Nobility and Gentry of the Country doing homage to him, and all the Magistrates and Officers of the several Cities taking the oaths of Allegiance; the new Duke also making Oath, that he would carefully maintain them in their rights and Priviledges. In the solemnities of which day, the first great Gun discharged in the way of triumph, broke in the going off without any hurt done, but the wounding of one Souldier only. An omen that all this solemn Act would prove but a Pageant, and break in pieces at the first giving fire unto it. And so accordingly it did: the victory at Norlingen, which followed not long after this, putting the Bi-

Wurtemberg, shops once more into their possessions; and leaving nothing to the new Duke, but an hungry title. And therefore leaving both the old and new titular Dukes, we will here add the Catalogue of those who were Dukes indeed, and had, together with the Title, the full possession of the Country.

DUKES of FRANCONIA of the DUTCH or GERMAN RACE.

- 974 1 Conradus, surnamed Salicus, created Duke of Franconia by Otho the first, whose daughter Luitgardis he had married; after the death of Henry the second, elected Emperour, by the name of Conrad the second, Anno 1025.
- 1040 2 Henry, the son of Conrad, Duke of Franconia, and Emperour, by the name of Henry the third.
- 1056 3 Henry II. of Franconia, and IV. of the Empire.
- 1106 4 Henry III. of Franconia, and V. of the Empire.
- 1125 5 Frederick II. (surnamed Barbarossa) Duke of Schwaben, Nephew of Frederick the Antient, Duke of Suevia, and of Agnes his wife, the sister and next heir of Henry; succeeded in the Empire after the death of Conrad the third, his Uncle, Anno 1153.
- 1190 6 Frederick II. the second son of Barbarossa, Duke of Franconia and Schwaben.
- 7 Conrad II. brother of Frederick the second, succeeded in both estates.
- 8 Philip, the younger brother of Conrad, succeeded in both Dukedoms after his decease; and on the death of Henry the sixth his eldest brother, was elected Emperour, Anno 1198.
- 1207 9 Frederick III. of Franconia, and the V. of Suevia, son of the Emperour Henry the sixth, whom he succeeded in the Kingdom of Naples, and Sicily, Anno 1202. and on the death of Otho the fourth, Anno 1212, was elected Emperour, of that name the second.
- 1250 10 Conrad III. of Franconia, the II. of Schwaben, and the IV. of the Empire, the son of Frederick, the third, whom he succeeded in all his Titles and Estates.
- 1254 11 Conradin, son of Conrad the third, Duke of Franconia and Schwaben dispossessed of his Kingdoms of Naples and Sicily by Manfred the Base brother of his father: and finally beleaked by Charles of Anjou, who succeeded Manfred in those Kingdoms, Anno 1268. After whose death this Royal house being quite extinguished; the Bishops of Wurtzburg did again resume the titles of Dukes of Franconia; content to let some of the greater Lords and Prelates which lived near unto him, to share in the possession of it, as before was noted.

The Arms of the antient Dukes of Franconia, before they were incorporated with the house of Schwaben, were Azure, a Lion Barry of eight pieces Argent and Gules, crowned Or, which why it is now born by the Lanigraves of Hassia, we shall tell you there.

II. WIRTEMBERG.
12. BADEN.

These I have joyned together, though distinct Estates, because both of them taken out of the great Dukedom of Schwaben; erected both about one time, and lying very close in a round together: bounded upon the East, and South, with the Schwaben properly so called; on the North, with the lower Palatinate; on the West, with the Rhene, and that part of Schwaben which is called Brigow: parted asunder by the Mountainous ridge of hills called Schwartzwald; Wurtemberg lying on the East-side thereof and Baden betwixt it and the Rhene.

And first for WIRTEMBERG, the air there of is very healthy, neither too hot in Summer, nor too cold in Winter: the soil near Swartzenwald lying on the West, and the Alpes of Suevia on the South, of it self barren and unprofitable; but in some places by the industry of the Plough-man, made to yield good corn. But in the middle parts thereof which lye towards the Neccar, little inferior for fruitfulness both of Corn and Wine, unto any in Germany; besides some silver mines near Wiltberg; and about Puckach, a small Town, such abundance of brass, that the Foundations of the houses seem to be laid upon it.

It took this name from the Cattle of Wurtemberg, the first seat of the Princes of it; as that did from the Intuerger, inhabiting the Dutch side of the Rhene; or from the Virthingi, as Beatus Rhenanus thinketh, mentioned by Trebellius Gellio in the life of Aurelianus; to which the word Berg being added for a termination, made it first Turging-berg, or Virthin-berg, and after Wurtemberg.

Places of most importance in it, are 1. Stutgard, the Dukes seat, a fair, rich, and populous town, and the chief of the Dukedom; seated in a pleasant and fruitful Plain, not far from the Neccar, yielding a quantity of wine almost incredible. 2. Tubingen, on both sides of the Neccar, united into one with a fair stone Bridge. A Town well built, situate in a very rich soil, and finally adorned with an University here founded by Eberhard, the first Duke of Wurtemberg, Anno 1477. in which Leonardus Fuchsius that great Herbalist and Restaurator of Physick, was once a Professor of that Faculty. 3. Constat, upon the Neccar also, not far from which on top of an hill, stands the old Cattle of Wurtemberg.

berg, before mentioned. 4. Wiberg, of great esteem for its Mines of silver. 5. Archingen, inhabited chiefly by Jews. 6. Schorndorf upon the Rheims, much resorted to by reason of the hot baths there; as is also 7. Nemburg, on the Entz. 8. Heidenheim, 9. Grieningen, 10. Marbach; of which little memorable. There are also within the limits of this Dukedom many Towns Imperial; as 1. Wimpfen, and 2. Hailbrum on the Neccar. 3. Gepping, upon the River Vils. 4. Weil. 5. Reutling, on the Neccar also, made Imperial by Frederick the 2d. Anno 1240. otherwise of no great note but for the Paper mills. 6. Erling.

The first Inhabitants hereof, were the Charitini of Ptolomy, and part of the Intuerger, spoken of before; made subject with the rest of these parts to the Almaini, after to the French, and finally a member of the great Dukedom of Schwaben. From which dismembred in the time of Henry 4th after the dangerous war raised against him by Duke Rodolphus, advanced by the practice of Pope Hildebrand to the Throne Imperial, it came to have Princes of its own: the first Earl being Conrad, in the year 1100. by the grace and favour of the said Emperour Henry. Increased by the addition of the Earldom of Montbelguard, and many other accretments, it was made a Dukedom in the person of Eberhard the 6. by Maximilian the 1. Anno 1495. The Earls and Dukes whereof follow thus in order:

The EARLS and DUKES of WIRTEMBERG.

- 1 Conrad the first Earl.
- 2 Ulric son of Conrad.
- 3 John, son of Ulric.
- 4 Lewis, son of John.
- 5 Henry, son of Lewis.
- 6 Eberhard, son of Henry.
- 7 Ulric II. son of Eberhard.
- 8 Eberhard II. son of Ulric.
- 1325 9 Ulric III. son of Eberhard.
- 1344 10 Eberhard III. son of Ulric.
- 1394 11 Ulric IV. son of Eberhard.
- 12 Eberhard IV. son of Ulric.
- 1417 13 Eberhard V. son of Eberhard the 4th, by his marriage with Henrica, or Henriette, daughter of Henry Earl of Montbelguard, added that Earldom to his house.
- 1419 14 Lewis, or Ludovick II. son of Eberhard the 5th.
- 1456 15 Eberhard VI. son of Lewis, Founder of the University of Tubingen, created by Maximilian the first, the first Duke of Wurtemberg, Anno 1495. He deceased without issue, Anno 1496.
- 1496 16 Eberhard VII. son of Ulric, the younger brother of Lewis the 2d. succeeded on the death of Eberhard, his Cousin-German.
- 1504 17 Henry, the brother of Eberhard the 7th.
- 1519 18 Ulric V. son of Henry the 2d. expelled out of his Dukedom by Charles the 5th. for the sack of Reutling an Imperial City; and his Estate conferred on Ferdinand of Austria, the brother of Charles: but after 15 years exile, restored to his Dukedom, by Philip Landgrave of Hessia. He reformed Religion, and liberally endowed the University of Tubingen.
- 1550 19 Christopher, the son of Ulric the 5th a follower of his Fathers steps in Reformation of the Church, and Advancement of Learning.
- 1568 20 Ludovick, or Lewis III. son of Christopher.
- 21 Frederick, son of George Earl of Montbelguard, the brother of Ulric the 5th. made Knight of the Garter by Queen Elizabeth, Anno 1597.
- 22 John Frederick, son of Frederick the first.
- 23 John Eberhard, eldest son of the former Duke, now living, Anno 1648.

The Revenues of this Duke are supposed to be equal unto those of the Electors Palatine, spoken of before; and were it not for the silver mines in Saxony, little inferior to those of that Duke. But for provisions of war, (excepting Powder only) he is meanly furnished. A main defect, considering the ill terms he stands in with the Imperial Cities, betwixt whom and the house of Wurtemberg, there have been always open wars, or secret jealousies.

His Arms are Or, 3 Attires of a Stag born Palie-barrie, Sable.

As for the Marquissate of BADEN, lying on the Westside of Schwartzwald, betwixt it and the Rhene, it is for the most part, except towards those Wolds, a very pleasant and fruitful Country; and much of the same nature, with the rest of Wurtemberg; so called from Baden, a neat Town, where the Marquess keeps his seat in Winter; and that so named from the hot Baths there; as is also Baden (called for distinction sake, the Upper Baden) amongst the Switzers; in which respect the City of Bath in Somersetshire had antiently the name of Caer-Baden also. Of these Baths it is supposed that there are in this City at least 300, profitable for many diseases and exulcerate sores, drawing a great resort of people from the neighbouring Countries. This is the chief Town of this Marquissate, from whence the Princes have the Title of Marquesses of Baden. The next to this is 2. Durlach, or Turlach, which gives Title to a second branch of this house; called also sometimes Marquesses of Durlach only, but commonly the Marquesses of Baden-Durlach. 3. Liebenzell, amongst the hills of Schwartzwald, famous for hot medicinal Springs. 4. Lichtal, remarkable for a Monastery, the burial place of the first Marquess. 5. Gerspach, in the very heart of that Mountainous tract. 6. Pfortheim, adjoining to the Wood Hagenscheis, a branch of Schwartzwald. 7. Rotelen, 8. Badenwile, and 9. Susenburg, all seated in the Northgoia. Upper-Baden, being that part hereof which lies next to Brisgaw. 10. Milberg, beautified with a fair Castle, the usual retiring place of these Princes in the heats of Summer.

This Marquisate being also taken out of the great Dukedom of Schwaben, was founded in the person of Herman, of Verona in Italy, who deserving well of the Emperor Henry the 5th, was by him seized in some Lands about these parts, An. 1120. and after marrying with the daughter of an Earl of Baden, was by the Emperor Frederick Barbarossa created the first Marquess of Baden, Anno 1155. The Estate was after much increased by the addition of the Earldom of Hochberg, and the Appendixes thereof in Schwaben; into which Christopher the 13th Marquess hereof, succeeded on the death of his Cousin Philip, the last Earl of Hochberg; both Princes descending originally from two brothers; of which the eldest in right of the Lady Judith his wife, was Earl of Hochberg; the second by the favour of the said Frederick Barbarossa, was made Marquess of Baden. They were Masters also of many fair Estates in the Lower Palatinate, which the Palatines of the Rhene (as was there said) are since possessed of. Other particulars shall be shewn (if occasion be) in the ensuing Catalogue of

The MARQUESSSES of BADEN.

NORTHGOIA,

OR

The UPPER PALATINATE.

The County of NORTHGOIA, so called from the Northern situation of it in regard of Bavaria, is sometimes also called the Palatinate of Bavaria, because antiently belonging to that Estate; but generally Ober Pfaltz, or the Upper Palatinate, to difference it from the Lower. It is bounded on the East with Bohemia; on the West, with Franconia, and part of Schwaben; on the North, with Voitland; and on the South, with Bavaria. The Countrey for the most part somewhat rough and mountainous, rich principally in mines of iron, which it yieldeth in most places, and some of silver about Amberg; extended from Haimbourg to the edge of Bohemia, 80 miles; and from the hill Felchtelberg in the edge of Voitland, to Welsenberg near the banks of the Danow, 68 miles.

Observable things touching this Province, are chiefly two. First, that out of the mountain Fichtelberg, before mentioned, arise 4 Rivers running to the four quarters of the world; that is to say, the Eger towards the East, the Mein or Mann towards the West, the Sala or Salza to the North, and the Nab Nabus to the South; so that it may be probably thought, to be the highest hill in all Germany. 2ly. That in the Southwest corner of it are two little Rivers, the one called Almul, which falleth into the Danow; and the other Rahnitz, which runs into the Mein, and finally into the Rhene: between the heads whereof, being not much distant, Charles the Great once began to dig a Channel, for making a passage out of the Rhene into the Danow. In which work he employed many thousand men: but partly by excess of rain, and partly by some strange affrightments (all which they did in the day, being undone in the night) he was fain to desist. Some parts of the intended water-course are to be seen near Walsenbourg, spoken of before, which standeth in the middle way betwixt both Rivers.

Chief places of this Countrey which belong to the Electoral Family, are 1. Amberg, on the River Vils, enriched chiefly by the commodity of iron digged out of the neighbouring hills; here fashioned into all sorts of Utensils, and hence conveyed in great abundance to the parts adjoining, but prouder of its mines of silver than those veins of iron, affording to the Princes Coopers 60000 Crowns yearly. 2. Monheim, in the midst of a fruitful valley, near a wood of Juniper. 3. Nenburg upon the River Swartzbach, which gives title to the second branch of the Palatine house, called the Count Palatine of Nenburg, competitors with the Marquess of Brandenburg, for the whole Duesdom of Cleveland, and finally possessed of Galick, and the members of it. 4. Keibaim, at the meeting of the Danow, with the River Almul. 5. Cham, on the edge of Bohemia, near the River Regen; which passing thence falleth into the Danow, near the City of Regensburg. 6. Castel, where the Electors for the most part hold their Residence, when they are in this Countrey. 7. Averbach, 8. Salzbach, 9. Weiden, 10. Nenm.

There are also in this Countrey some Towns belonging to the Lantgraves of Luchtemberg, one of the four old Lantgraves of the Empire; the other three being Duringen, Hassia and Alsatia: 10 called from Luchtemberg an old Castle, situate on a lofty hill not far from Pfrend, the chief Town and ordinary seat of these Lantgraves, seated on the River Nab. 2. Gronsfelden, 3. Schonbussen, an ordinary pass and bating place, in the way from Prague to Nuremberg.

But the chief City of this Countrey, and perhaps of Germany, is Nuremberg itself, Nori-bega in the modern, but Noricum in the antient Latine. So called from an antient Castle called Castrum Noricum, the ruins of which are still remaining: encompassed with a deep but dry ditch, now of no use nor ornament to the City at all; but revered for its antiquity as the Mother of Nuremberg. The Castle said by some to be built in the time of Claudius Caesar. More probably by some of the Norici, who terrified with the invasion of Attila, in the decline and wain of the Roman Empire, relinquished Bavaria, where before they dwelt, and passed over the Danow, there to provide themselves of a safer dwelling. Conquered by the Bavarians, it became, together with their Conquerours, subject to the French: in the time of Lewis the 3d. it became Imperial; and was walled and fortified during the reign of Charles the 4th. From that time it increased so fast both in wealth and beauty, that it is counted the greatest and wealthiest City in all this Continent, there being reckoned in it 11 stone bridges for passage over the Pegnitz, which runneth through it; 12 Conduits of fresh water; 13 common Baths, 116 publick Wells, and 128 Streets. Of figure square, environed with a triple wall of 8 miles in circuit, and plentifully stored with all sorts of Ammunition. The Marquesses of Brandenburg in former times were the Burggraves of it; an office of great power and jurisdiction; but sold for a good sum of money by Frederick the 3d. Anno 1414. Albert his son attempting to recover the old office again, besieged the Town, having no less than 17 Princes on his side, and yet could not force it. That for an Argument of its strength. A proof and evidence of the wealth of it we have seen before; in that great stock made of their Towns and Villages, and the great ransom they were put to by another Albert, spoken of in Franconia. And it adds much unto the commendation of the people, that this great wealth is gotten by their indefatigable industry; the Town being situate on a barren and sandy soil, and destitute of those helps which commonly a navigable River brings into a City: those great possessions which belong to the State hereof, being gotten out of the fire, as the saying is, by their continual working of iron and other manufactures; occasioning a resort hither of Merchants from all parts of Germany.

Other Towns of chief note within this Palatinate, are 1. Altorf, where the Nurembergers founded an University for the study of all Arts and Sciences, Anno 1575. 2. Erspruck, a great Town and well seated, belonging to the State of Nuremberg also. 3. Eistad (Aichstadium in the Latine) an Episcopal See, situate on the River Almul. 4. Walsenbourg, an Imperial City on the Borders of Schwaben. Here was also in this Province (if not still remaining) the Town of Winberg, memorable for the piety and gallantry of the women of it. For the Town being besieged and distressed by the Emperor Conrade the 3d. for siding against him with the Guelfs then Dukes of Bavaria, no other conditions could be gotten at the surrender of it, but that the women might have leave to depart in safety; and carry all their Jewels with them. Which being obtained, they took their husbands on their backs, and so left the Town: and by that noble act so moved the affections and compassion of the angry Prince, that he spared the Town, and gave them all a general pardon. It is said by some, that the odious names of Guelfs and Gibelines (with which the peace of Christendom was so long distracted) took their beginning at this siege: the first so called from Guelso, brother of Henry the Proud, Duke of Bavaria, in whose cause they fought: the other from Veibling, (the French and Italians speak it Guelbling) a Town of Frankenland, in which that Emperor was born. Another original hereof, we had in our description of the State of Florence: but I take this to be the more probable of the two, though neither certain.

The antient Inhabitants hereof were the Narisci of Tacitus. Afterwards some of the Norici fearful or grown impatient of the Roman yoke, came over the Danubius to them, and built that famous Castle called Castrum Noricum, where now stands Nuremberg. Overpowered by the Romi, and uniting with them in the name of Boiarians, they followed the fortunes of Bavaria, till the year 1339. when Ludovick, the Emperor and Duke of Bavaria, on the partition of the estate betwixt him and Rodolphus his elder brother, relinquished it for ever to the house of the Palatines. Returned for the present to the Dukes of Bavaria, on whom conferred, together with the Electoral dignity, by the Emperor Ferdinand the 2d. in recompence of the great service done him by Maximilian the now Duke thereof, in the war of Bohemia; and the great charge he had been at, in the reduction of that Kingdom to the house of Austria. How long it will continue thus, is known only to God, the disposer of all things. Yet neither the Bavarians formerly, nor the Palatines since, have been so fully Masters of it, but that the Lantgrave of Luchtemberg, and the City of Nuremberg, have put in for a share.

The Arms of which great and puissant City are Azure, an Harpie displayed, crowned, crined, and armed, Or.

13. The KINGDOM of BOHEMIA.

The Kingdom of BOHEMIA, containing Bohemia it self, with the incorporate Provinces, is bounded on the East, with Poland and Hungary; on the West, with the Upper Palatinate, Voithland, and Misnia; on the North, with the Marquissate of Brandenburg, and some part of Misnia; and on the South, with Austria, and Bavaria. It comprehends in it, besides Bohemia it self, the Marquissate of Moravia, with the Dukedoms of Silesia and Lusatia.

1. BOHEMIA, encompassed about with woody Mountains, part of the Hercynian, is bounded on the East, with Moravia; on the West, with the Upper Palatinate, and Voithland; on the North, with Misnia, Lusatia, and some part of Silesia; on the South, with parts of Bavaria and Austria.

It took this name from the Bemi, or Boiemi, the old Inhabitants hereof. By Pomponius Mela called Bemi, with the Addition of Gens magna; by Tacitus they are called Boiemi, who make them the Descendants of the Boii, a Gallick Nation, who to avoid the servitude which they feared from Rome, put themselves into these Hercynian Deserts, which from them was named Boio hemum; by which name it occur-reth in Pelleius Paterculus. And though the Marcomanni first, and the Slaves and Croatians afterwards, became Masters of it, these last continuing their possession to this very day: yet it retaineth still the name of Bohemia amongst the Latines, as that of Bohemerland amongst the Dutch.

It contains in compass about 550 English miles. The soil indifferently fruitful, and enriched with mines of all sorts, except of Gold. Tinne they have here in good plenty, the mines whereof were first found out by a Cornish-man, banished out of England, Anno 1240. which discovery of Tinne in these parts, was, as saith my Author, in magnam jacturam Richardi Comitis Cornubie, (he meant that Richard which was afterwards King of the Romans;) and no marvel, for in those times there was no Tinne in all Europe, but in England. Wood they have here good store; and in some of their Forests a Beast called Lomie, which hath hanging under its neck a bladder full of scalding water; with which, when she is hunted, she so tortureth the Dogs, that she easily escapeth them. Of corn they have sufficient for their own use, and sometimes also an increase above their spending, wherewith they do supply their neighbours of the Upper Palatinate: but they want Wine, the Air being too sharp and piercing to produce a good Vintage. And it yields also store of Saffron, nowhere to be bettered; with plenty of medicinal drugs.

The principal Rivers hereof, are 1. the Elb, or Albis, having here its spring; of whose course we have spoken elsewhere. 2. Egra, 3. the Muldaw, or Muldavins, and 4. the Warts; all three exonerating themselves into the Elb, which runneth through the middest of the Countrey.

The Kingdom is not (as others) divided into Counties, and Provinces; but into the Territories and possessions of several Lords; who have great authority and command over their Vassals. The figure of the whole in a manner Circular, the Diameter whereof reacheth every way some 200 miles: containing in that compass 700 Cities, walled Towns, and Castles; and (as some say) 30000 Villages. Inhabited by a people given to drink and gluttony; and yet valiant, and with sense of honour: this last belonging to the Nobility, and Gentry; the former to the common people; but more moderately than most others of the German Nations. All of them, Princes or Plebeians, rich, poor, noble, and base, use the Slavonian language, as their mother tongue.

The chief Bohemian Captain that ever I read of, was Ziska; who in eleven battels fought in the defence of the Hussites, against the Pope and his confederates, prevailed, and went away victorious: in-fomuch, that at his death he willed the Bohemians to flea him, and make a drum of his skin; persuading himself, if they so did, they could never be overcome. A fancy like to that of Scipio African, and Vortimer King of Britain, spoken of before. Scholars of most note, John Hus, and Hugom of Prague, two eminent Divines, of whom more anon.

The Christian faith was first preached by S. Methodius, the first Bishop and Apostle of the Moravians, (whom some call Borissinus) Anno 900. or thereabouts: Borissinus, the 8th Duke from Cro-cus, being the first Christian Prince, and next to him, Wenceslaus the second. This last most cruelly murdered by Boleslaus, his brother, at the instigation of Drabomir, an obstinate Heathen, mother to them both: who having caused the Ministers of the Lord to be butchered, and their bodies to lie un-buried for two years together, was swallowed, coach and all, in that very place where their bodies lay. Confirmed by this prodigy, they continued constant in the Faith to this very day; though not without the intermixture of some notable vanity. For one Picardus coming out of the Low-countries, drew a great sort of men and women unto him, pretending to bring them to the same state of per-fection, that Adam was in before his fall; from whence they were called Picards and Adamites. They had no respect unto marriage; yet could they not accompany any woman, until the man coming to Adam, said unto him, Father Adam, I am inflamed towards this woman; and Adam made answer, In-cresse and multiply. They lived in an Island which they called Paradise, and went stark naked; but they continued not long: for Ziska hearing of them, entred their fools Paradise, and put them all to the sword, Anno 1416. But to make amends for this folly, they were exceeding zealous of the Reformation. For much about the same time, the works of Wickliff were brought into Bohemia, by a certain scholar who had been Student in the University of Oxford, which hapning into the hands of John Husse and Hierom of Prague, (two men whereof this Countrey doth much boast) wrought in their hearts a de-sire to reform the Church. A business which they prosecuted so earnestly, that being summoned to the Council of Constance, they were there condemned for Hereticks, and burned, Anno 1414. yet had their their doctrine such deep root in the hearts of the people, that it could never be destroyed by the Tyrannies of war, or persecution (though both were used) to this very day; multitudes of the Professors of it living in this Kingdom under the names of Calistini, and Sub utraque, as before is said; but much both strengthened and increased by the writings of Luther, Melanchthon, Calvin, and such other of the Protestant Doctors, as travelled in the work of Reformation. But this increase of strength and numbers proved their greatest weakening. For growing insolent upon the sense of their strength and power, they joined themselves into a party, got many of the Romish-Catholics to adhere unto them under colour of asserting their Civil rights, and in the heat of some disputes, caused certain of the Emperors Council to be thrown out of the windows of the Counsel-chamber; and finally about the later end of the reign and Empire of Matthias, they brake out into open Arms. In the course whereof, the Calvinians being of most power, and having got a King of their own opinions, so disoblighd the Lutherans, and more moderate Papists, who had concurred with them at the first: that being invaded on the one side by a Lutheran Army under the command of the Duke of Saxony, and a Papish Army on the other by the Duke of Bavaria, they were, in fine, utterly suppressed, and made inconsiderable: the conquering and success-ful Emperor (Ferdinand the 2d.) taking this occasion, to extirpate the Protestant Religion out of his Dominions.

Places of most importance in it, are 1. Budweis, (conceived to be the Marobodurum of Protonius) a town towards Austria. 2. Augst, near the head of the Elb. 3. Tabor, a strong Town built by Ziska, to be a retreat for the Hussites. 4. Jaromir, and 5. Molmuck, both upon the Elb. 6. Litomissel, an Episcopal See, bordering on Moravia. 7. Pilsen, the last town of this Kingdom which yielded to the prevailing Imperialists, in the late long war about that Crown: and then also betrayed to Count Tilly for a sum of money; by some of the Souldiers of Count Mansfeld, who was then absent, and had so long defended it against the Enemy. 8. Elbogen, much esteemed for the hot medicinal Baths; situate on the River Egra. 9. Egra, so called of the same River, on which (near to the borders of the Upper Palatinate) it is strongly situate: a large fair City, containing three miles in compass. Imperial once, but sold by the Emperor Ludovicus Bavarius, to John, King of Bohemia, for 400000 marks of Silver: in compass less, for sweetness of the place, elegance of the build-ings, pleasantness of site, and richness of soil, superiour farre to Prague it self. 10. Prague, the Metropolis of the Kingdom; situate in the middest thereof, on the River Muldaw: consisting of four several Towns, each of which hath its several Customs, Laws, and Magistrates. The principal is called the Old Town, adorned with many goodly buildings, a spacious Market-place, and a stately Counsel-house: the second called the New Town, separated from the Old, by a Ditch of great depth, and wideness. The third, called the Little Town, is divided from the Old, by the River Mul-daw, joynd to it by a beautiful Bridge, consisting of 24 Arches. And in this part thereof is the hill Rachine; on the sides of which are many fair and stately houses belonging to the Nobility, over-looked by the strong Castle of St. Wenceslaus (situate on the top thereof) a magnificent Palace, wherein the Bohemian Kings, and the later Emperors, have kept their Residence. The fourth town is that of the Jews, who have here five Synagogues, and live according to their own Law. The whole City rather large than fair, the streets being in winter very dirty, of ill smell in the summer; the build-ings for the most part of clay and timber, clapt up together without Art, and of little beauty. And though encompassed with Walls and Ditches, it is conceived to be but an open town (so poor and weak are the defences) in-fomuch, that whosoever is master of the Field, will be master of the City also. And yet besides the honour of being the Royal Seat; it hath also of long time been an Arch-bishops See; and by Charles the fourth, Emperor and King of Bohemia, made an University. Near unto this Town was fought that memorable battel, between the Duke of Bavaria, and Count Buc-owy, Lieutenant for the Emperor Ferdinand the second, with 50000 men on the one side; and Frederick newly elected King of Bohemia, with the Prince of Anhalt, the Count of Thurne, and 30000 men, on the other side. It was fought on the eighth of November, stylo novo, wherein (such was the unsearchable will of God) the victory fell unto the Imperials: the young Prince of Anhalt, Thurne, and Saxon-Weimar, with divers others, being taken prisoners; the Bohemian Ordnance all surpris'd, Prague forced to yield unto the Victor, and King Frederick with the Queen, compelled to flee unto Silesia. A most lamentable and unfortunate loss, not to this people only, but to the whole cause of the Reformed Religion. Yet it is not unworthy of our observation, that this great battel was fought upon a Sun-day, the 8th of November, about the time of morning Prayer: in the Gospel appointed for which day (being then the 23. after Trinity Sunday) is that famous passage, Reddite CÆSARI, quæ sunt CÆ-SARIS; i.e. Render unto Cæsar, the things which are Cæsars; which seemed to judge the quarrel on the Emperors side.

But whether of the two Pretendents had the juster Cause, may best be seen by canvassing the Records of that State and Nation (for the success of War is no standing Rule for measuring the equity, and justice of the causes of it;) by which it will be clearly seen, that since the erecting of that King-doms by the Slaves or Croatians, it hath been evermore disposed at the will of the Emperor, or by election of the States, and People. But I intend not at the present to dispute that point, but only lay down the story of the Kings and People, as in other places; since the first coming of the Slavi. A Nation not known by that name till the time of Justinian; at what time they inhabited on the banks of the Ister; but on the further side thereof, opposite to Illyricum and Thrace, imperial Provinces. Grown famous by their good successes against that Empire, their name was taken up by the rest of the Sarmatians of Europe; who either waning room, or not liking of their colder Countries, passed on more Westwards: and by degrees possessed themselves of those parts of Germany, which formerly had Moravia. 1619 35 Frederick, Elector Palatine, the strongest German Prince of the Calvinists, and most potent by his great alliances; was elected King of Bohemia, and crowned at Prague, together with his wife, on the fifth day of November. The Prince derived his descent from the Lady Sophia, sister to Ladislaus the 2^d. King of Poland and Bohemia; and married Elizabeth, daughter to James King of great Britain, and Anne of Denmark; which Anne descended from the Lady Anne, daughter of Albertus of Austria, and elder sister to Elizabeth, mother to Ladislaus the 2^d. above named; from whom the claim of Austria is derived.

1621 35 Ferdinand III. son of Ferdinand the 2^d. elected King of Bohemia, during the life both of his Father, and of Frederick the Prince Elector also; after whose death he succeeded in this Kingdom both in right and fact: King of Hungary also, Archduke of Austria, and Emperor of Germany, now living, Anno 1648. more moderate in his Counsels than his Father Ferdinand, and more inclinable to peace; (though honored with a more signal victory against the Swedes, in the battle of Norlingen, than his Father was in all his life;) which the Conclusions made at Munster are sufficient proof of.

Of the Revenues, Arms, and other things which concern this Kingdom, we shall speak hereafter, when we have took a view of the rest of the Provinces which are incorporated into it.

2. MORAVIA is bounded on the East, with Hungary; on the West, with Bohemia; on the North, with Silesia; and on the South, with the lower Austria, and the River Teia: fenced on the West, by the Woods and Mountains of Bohemia, parts of the Hercynian Forrest; on the North, by some spurs or branches of it, called Asclurgius by Ptolemy; on the two other sides open like an half moon, or semicircle. The most fruitful place of corn in all Germany, and hath no small store of Frankincense; which, contrary to the nature of it, growth not on a tree; but out of the earth: and that too (which adds much to the miracle, if Dubravium do report it rightly) in the shape and figure of those parts, which men and women do most endeavour to conceal.

The former Inhabitants of this Province were the Marcomanni, and part of the Quadi, against whom, when M. Antoninus the Emperor made war, he had unawares run himself into such a straight, that his Army was environed with Mountains one way, and enemies the other. To this (as calamities seldom go alone) was added the extraordinary heat and drought then being. To the Emperor thus put to his plunges, came the Captain of his Guard, telling him, that he had in his Army a legion of Christians (Milites he calleth them) which by Prayer to their own God could obtain any thing. The Emperor lendeth for them, desiring them to make supplication for the Army; which they did, and God Almighty that never turneth a deaf ear to the Prayers of his servants, when they are either for his glory, the Churches, or their own good; scattered and vanquished the Quadi, with thunder, shot and artillery from heaven; and refreshed the faint and dying Romans with many a gentle and pleasant shower. This miracle purchased to that legion the surname of νεκρωβία, i. e. the thunderer; and induced the Emperor to honour men of that holy profession, and to make an end of the fourth persecution, A. Ch. 174. Thus Xiphilius hath it in his Dion; which coming from the pen of an Heathen, as his Author was, is of more credit in a matter of such concernment unto Christianity, than if it had proceeded from Secrates, Sozomen, or any other Ecclesiastical Writer.

Places of most note herein, are 1. Olmütz, on the River Marck (or Mora) the chief town of the Country, and a small University; near which, out of the hill Odenberg bordering on Silesia, springeth the great river of Odra, whose course we have before prescribed. 2. Brinn, on the River Schnaitz, the seat of the ancient Marquesses. 3. Radisch, and 4. Cremser, both upon the Marck or Mora. 5. Svatini, on the Teia; 6. Niclasberg, (Mons Nicolai in the Latine) bordering on the Lower Austria. 7. Iglau, 8. Newburg, 9. Weiskirchen. 10. Bosertitz, of which little memorable. 11. Gratisko, near to which (and to this place only) the Frankincense is found to grow in the shape and form before mentioned.

The old Inhabitants hereof (as before is said) were the Marcomanni and the Quadi; after them that Tribe or Nation of the Slaves, who from their habitation on the River Mora, called themselves Moravians, and the Country which they dwelt in by the name of Moravia, (the Dutch call it Merhern.) Extended at that time over all the Lower Austria, to the banks of the Danow on the South, and as far as to the River Tibiscus (over-spreading a great part of the Upper Hungary) towards the East. Governed at the first by their own Kings, the first, whose name occurs, being Ruslari, in the time of the Emperor Leuis the Godly; by whom taken Prisoner, and his Realm made Tributary to the Empire. After him succeeded Harmodanus, and then Suantopulcus, in whose time the Moravians and other Nations of the Slaves, received the Gospel, by the preaching of Cyrl and Methadius two Grecian Doctors: officiating all divine Services in the Slavonian or vulgar Language. For which when they made sure to the Pope then being, to whose authority (as Patriarch of the Western Empire) they were made obnoxious, and that the Pope and Cardinals delaid the business, a voice was heard, as if it had come from Heaven, saying these words, Omnis Spiritus laudet dominum, & omnia Lingua confiteatur ei. Upon which miracle their sute was granted at the last, and a Letter Decretal sent unto that effect from Pope John the 8th to Suantopulcus (or Sfantopulcher as some call him) above mentioned. A privilege by them enjoyed full 200 years, and then reverted by Gregory 7th, commonly called Pope Hildebrand, in his letters to Uratiflaus the first King of Bohemia, Anno 1086.

But to return unto the story, Suantopulcus son to Suantopulcus, succeeded next, deposed, or rather beaten out of his Country, by the Emperor Arnulph, for denying the accustomed tribute. A prince of great spi-pirit, and of as great command; having at one time under him, not Moravia only, according to the largest limits, but Silesia, Bohemia, and Polonia also. Arnulph not able otherwise to effect this purpose, called in the Hungarians (though at that time Pagans) by whose help the Moravian was subdued, and his Kingdom shattered into pieces: seized on by the Hungarians, Poles, and other Nations; and finally reduced to the present limits. Afterwards it was made a Marquisate, (but by whom we find not) one of the Marquesses hereof being Jodocus Barbatius, elected Emperor, Anno 1410. After whose death, Sigismund his next heir, Emperor and King of Bohemia, gave it to his son-in-law, Albert Duke of Austria, Anno 1417. who in the end succeeded him in all his Estates, since which time it hath alwayes gone along with the Crown of Bohemia.

The Arms of the old Dukes or Princes of it, were Azure, an Eagle chequered Or and Gules, membred and langued of the same.

2. SILESIA, (or SCHLESIA, as the Dutch call it) is bounded on the East, with Poland; on the West, with Lusatia; on the North, with Brandenbourg; and on the South, with Moravia. Wholly encompassed with Mountains, except towards the North; which lets in a sharp air upon them: the midland part being full of Woods, but withal of Minerals.

Chief Cities are Jagendorfe, or Jegerndorfe, of late the Patrimony of John Georgius of the Family of Brandenbourg, commonly called the Marquess of Jagendorfe. The Lands and Estates in his possession, first given by Ladislaus King of Bohemia, to George surnamed Pius, one of the Sons of Frederick of Brandenbourg, the first Marquess of Aspach of this house, for the many good services he had done him. But his posterity being extinct, they fell to the said John Georgius, brother to Sigismund the Elector: profcribed by Ferdinand the second, for adhering to the party of Frederick Prince Elector Palatine: A Prince of great note and activeness, in the beginning of the late German and Bohemian wars. 2. Munsterberg, which gives the title of Duke to the posterity of George Pogebrazz, once King of Bohemia, advanced by him unto this honor and a fair Estate. 3. Glatz or Gletz, the last town of Bohemia, which held out for Frederick the Elector, against that Emperor. 4. Glogaw, a strong town on the River Odera. 5. Niest, on a River so named, an Episcopal See. 6. Breslaw, in Latine Cracovia, so called from Cracivus, the founder of it; once one of the Dukes of this Province, by whose procurement it was made an Episcopal See, Anno 970. or thereabouts. It is situate on the River Odera, all the water wherein could not save it from being burnt down to the ground, Anno 1341. but it was presently re-edified with fair Free-stone; and is now one of the pretiest Cities (for the bigness of it) in all Germany: fair, populous, and well contrived, with open and even streets; the chief of the Countrey. 7. Oppolen, on the Odera also, well fortified both by Art and Nature, barricadoed by the River on the West, and on the East with good out-works, strong walls, and a fair Cattle. 8. Straten. 9. Reichenbach, both made towns of war, since the beginning of the Bohemian troubles.

There are also within this Province the two Seigneuries of Prignitz, and Crossen, so called from the chief Towns thereof, belonging to the Elector of Brandenbourg; the two Dukedoms of Opwitz, and Zator, appertaining to the Crown of Poland; as also the Dukedom of Lignitz, and Sweinitz, all of them bearing the names of their principal Towns; of which two last, Sweinitz is in the immediate possession of the Kings of Bohemia; and Lignitz hath a Duke of its own, but an Humager and Tributary of that King.

The first Inhabitants hereof were the Marsigni, Burii, Gothini, and some part of the Quadi. In the partition of the Eastern parts of Germany amongst the Slaves, laid unto the Dukedom or Kingdom of Poland; continuing part thereof till the time of Udalissius the second: who being driven out of his Kingdom, by his brethren, was by the mediation of Frederick Barbarossa, elected in this Countrey, to be held under the Sovereignty of the King of Poland. Divided betwixt his three sons, and afterwards subdivided amongst their posterities, according to the ill custom of Germany, it became broke at last into fourteen Dukedoms, of 1. Breslaw, 2. Oppolen, 3. Ratibor, 4. Cessin, 5. Bethom, 6. Glogaw, 7. Segan, 8. Olents, 9. Steinaw, 10. Falkenbourg, 11. Sweinitz, 12. Lignitz, 13. Opwitz, and 14. Zator. Of all which only the two last do remain to Poland; the five first being made subject to the Kings of Bohemia, by Venceslaus the second; the five next, by King John of Luxembourg; Lignitz remaining in the possession of a Proprietary Duke (as before was said) and Sweinitz given to Charles the fourth Emperor and King of Bohemia, by the Will and Testament of Boleslaus the last Duke: all Silesia by this means (except the Dukedoms of Opwitz and Zator) being added to the Crown of Bohemia: of which it is rather an incorporate, than subject Province.

4. LUSATIA, by the Dutch called Lausnitz, is bounded on the East, with Silesia; on the West, with Misnia; on the North, with Brandenbourg; and on the South, with Bohemia. The Countrey rough and full of Woods, yet plentiful enough of corn, and of such fruits, as naturally arise out of the earth: so populous and thick set with people, that though it be but a little Province, it is able to arm 20000 Foot, as good as any in Germany. Most commonly it is divided into the Higher, and the Lower; the first confining on Bohemia, the last on Brandenbourg.

Places of most note in the higher Lausnitz, are 1. Bautzen, (Badissium the Latine call it) the first Town attempted and taken in by the Duke of Saxony, when he took upon him the execution of the Emperors Bann, against Frederick Elector Palatine, then newly chosen King of Bohemia: The poor Prince in the mean time in an ill condition, the Saxon being the head of the Lutheran; and the Bavarian chief of the Papist party, arming both against him. So jealous are both sides of the active and restless Calvinian spirit; as to leave no means unassayed for the suppressing of it. Seated it is upon the Brandenburg.

Spre, and for the most part is the seat of the Governor, for the King of Bohemia. 2. Gorlitz, upon the River Nisse, which gave the title of Duke to John, brother of Sigismund Emperor and King of Bohemia; and Father of Elizabeth the last Dutchess of Luxembourg, before it fell into the hands of the Dukes of Burgundy. A fine near Town, well frequented, and strongly fortified: founded about the year 1231. and not long after so consumed by a merciless fire, Anno 1301. ut ne unica domus remaneret, as my Author hath it, that there was not one house left of the old foundation. But it was presently re-built in a more beautiful form, and more strong materials, than before it was; both publick and private buildings, very near and elegant. 3. Zittau, on the same River, bordering on Bohemia. 4. Lützen, Lubben, 6. Camitz, of which little memorable: but that together with the former they make up those 3 towns which are confederate together in a stricter league, for their mutual defence and preservation; but under the protection, and with the approbation, of the Kings of Bohemia. Then in the LOWER Lusatia there is 7. Spreenberg, so named from its situation on the River Spre, which runneth through the whole Countrey; and in ancient times was called Suevici; supposed by some (and not improbably) either to give name to the Suevians, or to take it from them; that potent Nation, inhabiting originally betwixt this and the Elb. 6. Trabell, upon the Nisse. Cottbusse upon the Spre, or Suevici; which together with some parts of the Lower Lusatia belongs unto the Marquesses of Brandenburg.

The first Inhabitants hereof are by some supposed (and but supposed) to be the Senones of Tacitus; in the partition of these parts of Germany amongst the Slaves, made subject to the Winithi, or Venedi, the greatest and most spreading Nation of all these People. When, and by whom first made a Marquissate; I am not able to say for certain, but sure I am, it hath been very much given to the change of Masters. It had first a Marquess of its own. Conrade the Marquess hereof, who died in the year 1155. being by the Emperor Henry the fifth made Marquess of Misnia, added it unto that Estate; remaining for some time united to it. After, being seized on by the Poles, it was sold to Frederick the second, Marquess and Elect of Brandenburg: who keeping Cottbusse and some other towns bordering next upon him, in his own possession, surrendered the rest on composition, to George King of Bohemia; claiming it from a Grant made by Henry the fourth to Wratiscus the first Bohemian King, Anno 87. A grant on which no possession followed, unless it were the Hommage and acknowledgement of the Princes of it; holding it afterwards of that Crown, as the Lord in chief.

Thus have we brought these four Provinces into the power and possession of the Kings of Bohemia: remaining still distinct in their Laws, and Governments (as several limbs of the great body of the Slaves, made up into one Estate) though joined together in the person of one supreme Governor: who is severally admitted and acknowledged by each Province distinctly, for it self; and not by any one of them, in the name of the rest. Out of all which so laid together, there may be raised the sum of three millions of Crowns yearly, for the Kings Revenues; towards the defrayment of all charges.

The Arms of this Kingdom are Mars, a Lion with a forked tail, Luna, crowned Sol. Which Arms was first given by Frederick Barbarossa to Uladislaus the third, made by him King of Bohemia, in regard of the good service he had done him at the siege of Millain. And though Uladislaus was deposed by the States of that Kingdom, because never formally and legally elected by them; yet his successors keep those Arms to this very day.

14 BRANDENBOURG.

The Marquissate of BRANDENBOURG, is bounded on the East, with the Kingdom of Poland; on the West, with the Dukedom of Saxony; on the North, with Pomerania, and parts of Mecklenbourg; and on the South, with Misnia, Lusatia, and Silesia. So called from Brandenburg the chief town of it, and because once the Marches of the Empire against the Slaves: divided afterwards into the Old, the New, and the middle Marches; according as they were extended further towards Poland, by little and little as the Emperors were able to get ground of those potent people.

The Countrey containeth in length from East to West, 60 Dutch or 240 Italian miles, and is of correspondent breadth; the whole compass making up 540 miles of the last account. Within which tract are comprehended 55 Cities or walled Towns; 80 Towns of trade, (Mark-Stecken, or Market-Towns, as they commonly call them: 38 Castles or Mansion-houses of Noblemen, 17 Monasteries, and 10 Parks well stored with beasts of game: the Countrey otherwise (considering the extent thereof) but thinly inhabited; nor well provided of necessaries; excepting Corn, of which these North-East Countries afford very great plenty.

The Religion of this Countrey is for the most part according to the form and doctrine of Luther: first introduced and authorized by Marquess Joachim the first. In which estate it continued till the breach betwixt George William, the Father of the present Elect, and the Palatine of Newburg. At which time the Palatine having married a daughter of Bavaria, the most potent Prince of the Papish party, reconciled himself to the Church of Rome, the better to assure himself of the aid of Spain: and this Elect having married a sister of Frederick the fifth, Prince Elect of Palatine, the most potent Prince of the Calvinians, declared himself to be of that party and opinion, the better to assure himself of the aids of Holland, Anno 1614. But when, on the persuasions of his wife, he set out an edict for suppressing the Lutheran forms, and authorizing the Calvinian only throughout his Dominions, (which was the year 1615) the people of this Marquissate rose in Arms against him: the difference being thus composed, that the Lutheran forms only should be used in all the Churches of the Marquissate of Brandenburg.

denbourg, for the contentation of the people; and that the Marquess should have the exercise of his new Religion for himself, his Lady, and those of their opinion, in his private Chappels.

1. ALTE MARK or the OLD MARK, so called because the ancient Marches of the Empire against the Slaves, lyeth betwixt Lauenbourg and the Elb; with which it is bounded on the East. Chief Towns thereof, 1. Tangermünd, on the Elb, where it receives the River Tunagra or Angra, honoured sometimes with the Residence of Charles the fourth. 2. Stendall, the chief of these Old Marches. 3. Solwedel, divided into two Towns, the old and the new. 4. Gurdeleben, fortified with the strong Castle of Eislimpe. 5. Ostberg. 6. Senhansen, said by some, but falsely, to be so called from the Senones, whom they would make the old Inhabitants of this Countrey (by all good Writers made to be originally a Gallick Nation,) 7. Werh, of which little memorable.

In the MIDDLE-MARCHES or UPPER MARCH, lying betwixt the Elb and the River Odera, the Towns of most note are 1. Butzam, a Commandatory of the Templers in former times. 2. Spandaw upon the Spre, a well fortified piece. 3. Oderburg, called so from that River, on which it is situate: remarkable for a strong Castle built by Marquess Albert the second, at which all passengers by water are to pay their Toll. 4. Brandenburg, on the River Havel, a Bishops See, the Seat of the Lords Marchers in former times, taking name from hence. By some said to be built by Brinnus, Captain of the Gauls, more truly by one Brando a Prince of the Fraconians, Anno Ch. 140. 5. Franckfort (for distinction sake) named ad Oderam, on which River situate; the soil about it being so plentifully stored with Corn and Wines, that it is not easie to affirm whether Bacchus or Ceres be most enamoured of it. It was made an University by Marquess Joachim, Anno 1506. and is also a flourishing and famous Empire, though not comparable to that of the other Franckfort, seated on the Mein. 6. Berlin, the ordinary Residence of the Marquess, situate on the River Spre, (or Suevici) which rising in Lusatia falleth into the Albis. 7. Havelbourg, on the River Havel, a Bishops See, who acknowledgeth the Archbishop of Magdebourg for his Metropolitan.

3. In the NEW MARK, extending from Odera, to the borders of Poland; and called so because last conquered, and added to the account of the German Empire; there is Custrine, a very strong and defensible Town, seated on the two Rivers Warts and Odera; fortified with great charge by John, son of Marquess Joachim, and by him intended for his seat. 2. Sunnerburg; and 3. Landsberg, both upon the Wart. 4. Soldin, in former times the chief of this March. 5. Berlinch, or New Berlin: and 6. Falkenberg, a strong Town, and fortified with as strong a Castle towards Pomerania.

The first Inhabitants of this Countrey, were the Varini and Naitbones, part of the great Nation of the Suevians; and after them, the Helvoldi, Wilini, Beirani, and other Tribes of the Winithi, the greatest Nation of the Slaves, who possessed themselves of it. But Brandenburg being won from them by the Emperour Henry the first, Anno 920. (at what time the Gospel was first preached amongst them) the Countrey hereabouts was given by him to Sigifride, Earl of Ringelheim (eldest son of Theodorick, the second Earl of Oldenburg) a valiant Gentleman, with the title of Marquess, or Lord Marcher, Anno 927. conditioned that he should defend those Marches (the old March, as they now call it) against the Slaves. These Marquesses at the first Officiary, at the appointment of the Emperour, and to him accountable. Sigard the fourth from Sigifride, governing here for Otho the third, was the first Elect of these Marquesses, and Endo the second of that name, and third from Sigard, the last that held this honour at the Emperours pleasure; that dignity after his decease being made Hereditary, in the person of Albert of Anhalt surnamed Ursus, by the Emperour Frederick Barbarossa. Which Albert having very much enlarged his border by the conquest and extermination of the Slaves; caused their unpeopled Countrey to be planted with new Dutch Colonies, out of Holland, Zeland, Flanders, and those parts of the Netherlands. The house of this Albert being extinct in John the fourth, it was given by the Emperour Lewis of Bavaria, to Lewis his son; by Otho the brother of that Lewis, sold for 200000 Ducats unto Charles the fourth; by Sigismund the son of Charles, to Jodocus, Marquess of Moravia: but afterwards being redeemed again, it was by the said Sigismund conferred on Frederick Burgrave of Nuremberg, in recompence of his faithful service in the Wars of Hungary and Bohemia. In his posterity it remaineth; but much increased in power and patrimony, by the additions of the Dukedom of Prussia, Cleve, Gulick, and Berg, the Marquissates of Anspach, and Legendorfe; the Earldom of March in Westphalen, now a part of Cleveland; the Lordships of Prignitz, and Crossen, in Silesia; the Towns of Hoff, and Colmebach, in Voiteland; with the Countrey of Raphin, and the Town and Territory of Cohus, in the Lower Lusatia. Inasmuch that this is now the most powerful Family in all Germany. The Marquesses hereof from Sigifride to Albert, the son of Ursi, &c. follow in this order:

The MARQUESSSES of BRANDENBOURG.

A. Ch.

- 927 1. Sigifride, Earl of Ringelheim, made the first Marquess of this border, by the Emperour Henry the first.
2. Gero, by the appointment of Otho the first.
3. Brnno, Earl of Witthi, created Marquess hereof by the same Emperour:
4. Hugh, the son of Brnno, by the favour of Otho the third.
5. Sigard, the brother of Hugh, made by the same Emperour, the first Marquess Elect.
6. Theodorick, the son of Sigard, outed of his command by Mistivoin; one of the Princes of the Slaves, named Ostoviti.

- 7 Udo, Earl of Soltwedel (the Slaves being beaten and expelled) created Marquess and Elector, by Conrade the 2d.
- 8 Udo II. son of Udo the first, proscribed by Henry the 4th. for joining with Rodolph Duke of Schawben in the war against him.
- 9 Promislau, King of the Obotriti (the Ancestor of the Dukes of Mecklinbourg) advanced unto these honours by the said Henry the 4th. and by him held unto his death. After which, made hereditary by the Emperour Frederick Barbarossa, in the person of Albert of Anhalt, the son of Ursus.
- 1152 10 Albert of Anhalt, the first Hereditary Marquess; father of Bernard, who was created Elector and Duke of Saxony, in the place of Henry surnamed the Lion, by the Emperour Frederick Barbarossa.
- 11 Otho, son of Albert.
- 12 Otho II. son of Otho the first.
- 13 Albert II. brother of Otho the 2d.
- 14 John, son of Albert the 2d.
- 15 John II. son of John the first.
- 16 Conrade, brother of John the 2d.
- 17 John III. son of Conrade.
- 18 Waldemar, brother of John the 3d.
- 19 Waldemar II. Nephew of Waldemar the first, by his brother Henry.
- 20 John IV. brother of Waldemar the second, the last Marquess of the House of Anhalt; the Marquissate escheating to the Empire, for want of heirs.
- 21 Lewis of Bavaria, created Marquess and Elector of Brandenburg, by his father the Emperour Lewis of Bavaria, on the said escheat.
- 22 Lewis II. surnamed the Roman, on the resignation of his brother, succeeds in the Marquissate, and Electoral dignity.
- 23 Otho, brother to Lewis the first and second, who sold the Marquissate and Electoral dignity to Charles the fourth.
- 24 Wenceslaus, son of Charles the fourth, afterwards King of Bohemia, and Emperour of the Romans.
- 25 Sigismund, brother of Wenceslaus, Emperour of the Romans, King of Hungary and Bohemia, Earl of Luxembourg; who sold this Marquissate to Jodocus, Marquess of Moravia, and having afterwards redeemed it, conferred the same on
- 1417 26 Frederick Burgrave of Nuremberg, solemnly invested herein at the Council of Constance, Anno 1414. for which investiture he paid unto the Emperour the sum of 400000 Crowns.
- 1440 27 Frederick II. son of Frederick the first, to whom the Emperour Frederick the 3d. gave the Dukedom of Pomerania.
- 1470 28 Albert brother of Frederick the 2d. called the Achilles of Germany, relinquished to Bugislaus the 10th. the possession of Pomerania; but his Successors ever since have retained the Title, and kept on foot their pretensions to it. From Frederick his second son, descended Albert, the first Duke of Prussia, Frederick the first Marquess of Anspach, George the first Marquess of Jagendorf, and Albert called the Alcibiades of Germany, who so harassed Francia in the days of Charles the fifth.
- 1486 29 John son of Albert.
- 1499 30 Joachim, son of John, who founded the University of Frankford, Anno 1506. and authorized the Reformation of Religion in his time begun.
- 1535 31 Joachim II. son of Joachim the first.
- 1571 32 John George, son of Joachim the 2d.
- 33 Joachim Frederick, son of John George.
- 34 John Sigismund, son of Joachim Frederick, who had to wife the Lady Anne, daughter of Albert Frederick, the second Duke of Prussia, and of Mary Eleanor his wife, eldest daughter of William the first, Duke of Cleve.
- 1620 35 George William, son of John Sigismund, and the Lady Anne, claiming in her right, the Dukedoms of Cleve, Gulick, and Berg, the Earldoms of Mark, and Ravensburg, and the Seigneurie of Ravensstein; which he possessed a while, divided with his Cousin Wolfgangus Palatine of Newburg, son of Magdalen the younger sister of Mary Eleanor. But falling out about their partage, the Palatine of Newburg, called in the Spaniard; and the Father of these Marquess in behalf of his Son, called in the Confederate States of the Netherlands to assert their Titles. After the death of Bugislaus the last Duke of Pomerania, he was to have succeeded also in that Estate, then possessed by the Swedes. Of the agreement made between them, and the great accretment thereby following to the house of Brandenburg, We shall speak more there.
- 36 Frederick William, son of George William, now Elector of Brandenburg.

The Territories of this Family are the greatest, as before is said, of any in Germany, but a great part of it is very barren, and his Subjects in those parts as poor as the Country: much of his new accessions yielding little but the titles only. So that neither in Revenue or Power, he is able to keep rank with the the Duke of Saxony: his ordinary Revenue hardly amounting at the utmost to 200000 l. per annum, which is but half of the receipts of the Duke of Saxony.

The Arms hereof are Argent, an Eagle Gules, membered and beaked Or.

15 POMERANIA.

POMERANIA is bounded on the East, with Prussia, from which parted by the River Wesoh, or Vistula; on the West, with Mecklenburg, divided from it by the River Bartze; on the North, with the Baltick Sea, extended on the Coast hereof for the space of 200 English miles; and on the South, with the Marquissate of Brandenburg. So named from the Pomortzi, or Pomerani, a Nation of the Slaves, to whose share it fell; or from the situation of it on the Sea shore, as the word in the Slavonian doth seem to import.

The Country is for the most part plain, abundantly fruitful in Corn; carried hence to Dantzic, and transported thence to all parts of Christendom, in their times of scarcity: yielding also good store of pasturage, and great herds of Cattel; with plenty of butter, cheese, honey, and some reasonable quantities of flax. Populous, and those people of very strong constitution, as living under a sharp and piercing air. The whole divided into the Continent, and the Islands; the Continent into: 1 the Upper Pomerania, bordering upon Mecklenburg, extended from the Bartze to the River Odera; 2 the Lower, reaching from the Odera, to that part hereof which is now called 3 Powocella, betwixt it and Prussia, subject of long time to the Crown of Poland, and there we shall hear further of it.

Chief places in the UPPER, are 1 Bartze, at the mouth of the River Bartze, taking name from thence; a well traded Town, and many times the seat of the Dukes of this hithermost Pomerania. 2 Wolgast, upon the Baltick Sea, over against the Isle of Usedom, the chief of this part of Pomerania, from whence the Dukes hereof are called the Dukes of Pomerania-Wolgast: the first Town taken in by Gustavus Adolphus, King of Sweden, in his famous War for relief of Germany, Anno 1630. 3 Straelsund, a Town of great Trading, and much resort, seated upon the same Sea also, opposite to the Isle of Rugen; a Town of great name in the course of the German Wars. 4 Griffswald, on the same Sea, betwixt Wolgast and Straelsund, made an University, Anno 1456. 5 Anclam, upon the River Pote. 6 Tribsta, situated on a lake, out of which the said River hath its course.

Then in the LOWER Pomerania, there is Camin, an Episcopal See, situate on the Baltick shore, over against the Isle of Wollin. 8 Collurg, a strong Town on the same shore also, at the fall of the Perfant into the Sea. 9 Coslin, the last Sea-Town of this Tract, lying towards Prussia. 10 Stargard, on the Isna, more within the Land, as is also 11 Griffenberg upon the Roga, and 12 Stetin on the Odera, once a poor fisher-town, now the Metropolis of this part of the Country; rising to this greatness (after the embracing of Christianity) by the fall of Wineta, formerly the chief Mart Town of all these parts. The Ordinary seat of the Dukes of the Lower Pomerania, the Dukes of Pomerania Stetin, as for distinction sake they are used to call them.

The Islands hereunto pertaining, are those of Rugen, Wollin, Usedom, touched upon before; but now more punctually to be handled: That of most note is RUGEN, over against Straelsund, from which divided only by a narrow Strait, in length seven Dutch miles, and as much in breadth; so that the compass of it, if it were exactly round, would amount to 20 German, or 100 Italian miles; and yet once bigger than it is. But in the year 1309. by the force of an outrageous tempest, a great part of it lying towards the South-east, as far as to the Isle of Buden (then conjunct hereto) was torn away, and sunk so deep into the bottom of the Sea, that now the greatest ships that be, fall over it. The Island plentiful of Corn, the Granary of Straelsund, as they call it commonly; and reasonably well stored with Cattel: full of Bays, Creeks, and winding shores, with many and vast Promontories thrusting into the Sea, which gives them great increase of fishing: Anciently it belonged to the Crown of Denmark, till given by Waldemar the third, to Bugislaus, and Barnimius, Dukes of Pomerania; continuing ever since part of that Estate. The chief Town of it is called Berga, situate in the midst of the Island, but not containing above 400 Families; others of less note and estimation, being 2 Sugart, 3 Pick, 4 Bingst, &c. small Towns compared with Villages upon the Continent; but the best they have. And yet so populous is the Island that they are able to arm 7000 good fighting men, if there be occasion.

The second of the three, in repute and bigness, is that of Wollin, situate over against Camin: so called from Wollin, the chief Town (Julianum it is called in Latine) made an Episcopal See by Wartislaus, the first Christian Prince of this Nation, and on the sackage of this City removed to Camin. A Town which once so flourished in Traffick, that it gave place to none but Constantinople; The Russians, Danes, Saxons, Vandals, &c. having here their particular streets. But being miserably sacked by Waldemar, King of Danemark, Anno 1170. most of the Trade hereof was removed to Lubeck, since which time it never could come near its former glories. The last in reputation is that of USEDOM, seated betwixt both, not far from Wolgast; so called from Usedom, the chief Town in it, of which little observable. All three the habitation of the ancient Rugii, who under Odoacer, King of the Herruli, subverted the Western Empire, conquered Italy, and made themselves masters of it, till subdued by the Goths. Those which remained in these Islands became after subject to the Slaves, and had once Kings of their own: the first whose name occurs in Story, being Crito, the son of Ratze, a puissant Prince, extending his Dominions into Holfz, Dumast, and the City of Lubeck, which he built, about the year 1100. afterwards beautified and enlarged by Adolph the 2d. Earl of Holfz, by some esteemed the Founder of it. But his issue male failing in the year 1326. it fell by compact made between them, to the Dukes of Pomeran, to whom these Islands ever since have continued subject. And as for Pomeran it self, the old Inhabitants thereof were part of the Rugii before mentioned, the Reudigni, Longi-nani, and Longi-Didani, with parts of the Peruli and Burgundians: into whose void rooms, the Pomortzi and other Tribes of Winitibi, (the most potent Nation of the Slaves) did in fine succeed; extending their Dominions to the banks of the Vistula, the parts adjoining unto which, to difference it from Pomeran, were called Pomerella. But that part of it being given by Meslavinus the last Prince thereof, dying without issue, Anno 1295. to Primislaus Duke of Poland: the name and power of the Princes or Dukes of Pomerania, became confined within narrower bounds than at first they had. The first Prince of it whom we meet with on good record, was one Barnimus, of the noble Gryphonian Family, Anno 933. whose Grandson Suantiworus, commanded over all this Tract. But his Dominions being parted betwixt his sons, Bugislaus who had Pomerella, retained the Language and old customs of the Slavonians; the Wartislaus who possessed the residue, conformed himself to the Laws and Language of the Saxons; the Country being by that means accounted for a part of Germany: added unto the Empire and accompted thereof in the time of Frederick Barbarossa, by whom Bugislaus and Casimir, sons of Wartislaus, were made Princes of the Empire, and Dukes of Pomeran. The Estate being afterwards divided betwixt Bugislaus and Otho, sons of Barnimus the first; and the house of Otho failing in the person of Otho the third, that part hereof was given by the Emperour Frederick the third, to Frederick the second, Marquess, and Elector of Brandenburg: the cause of much contention amongst these Marquesses, and the other house of the Dukes of Pomeran, but thus agreed upon at last; that both Princes should continue the Arms and title, the possession of it to be yielded to the Duke of Pomeran, on the failing of whose issue-male, it should descend upon the heirs of the house of Brandenburg. The succession of these Princes followeth in this order:

The DUKES of POMERANIA.

- 1 Wartislaus, the first Christian Prince of the Pomeranians, baptized by Otho Bishop of Bamberg, Anno 1124.
- 1128 2 Bugislaus, son of Wartislaus, created by Frederick Barbarossa the first Duke of Pomeran.
- 1188 3 Bugislaus II. son of Bugislaus, planted the void parts of Pomeran with Saxon Colonies.
- 1222 4 Barnimus, son of Bugislaus the second, after whose death Pomeran was divided into two Principalties.

 - 16 Bugislaus V. and 14th. son of Bugislaus the fourth, born in the year 1580. succeeded in Pomeran of Wolgast; as Philip Julius son of Ernestus Ludovicus did in that of Stetijn. After whose death Bugislaus became Lord of all Pomerania; in a fair way to have lost all to the prevailing Imperialists, had not the timely coming in of the King of Sweden stopped their violent Progress. But Bugislaus dying without issue in the time of the War, and in him the male-issue of the house of Bugislaus the tenth being quite extinguished, George William Marquess and Elector of Brandenburg put in his claim for the Estate; according to the compact and agreement spoken of before. Betwixt whom and the Swedes, (who under colour of aiding the last Duke, had possessed themselves of all the strongest places in the Country) it was accorded and concluded at the Treaty of Munster, that all the Higher Pomeranias, with the Isles of Rugen and Wollin, and the Town of Stetijn, should from thenceforth belong to the Crown of Sweden; the Lower Pomeran to be enjoyed by the house of Brandenburg, so long as the male issue lasteth; on default whereof, that also to be added unto that Crown; the Arms and Titles to be used by both promiscuously. And in regard the Marquess of Brandenburg was to part with the Upper Pomeran, for the contentation of the Swedes, (without which no firm peace could be made in Germany) it was also there agreed upon, that the temporal estates of the Bishops of Halberstadt, Minden, and it was also there agreed upon, that the temporal estates of the present Bishop should be for Camin, together with that of Magdeburg, (after the decease of the present Bishop) should be forever added to the possessions of that house; the Marquesses and Electors of it to be thenceforth entitled Dukes of Magdeburg, Princes of Halberstadt, and Minden. But what will be the issue of these conclusions, future times must shew.

The Arms of Pomeran, are A Gryphon.

Mecklenburg

16 MECKLENBURG.

THE Dukedom of MECKLENBURG, is bounded on the East, with Pomerania; on the West, with Holstein, a Province of the Kingdom of Denmark; on the North, with the Baltick Sea; and on the South, with Brandenburg, and Saxen-Lauenburg. So called from Mecklenburg, or Megalopolis, (both names in several languages of the Dutch and Greeks, signifying a great City,) a great Town of that name here being in the time of the Heruli and the Vandals, (the old Inhabitants of these parts) whose chief City it was; but on their leaving of this Country, decayed to nothing. The Country of the same nature as Pomerania, and as rich in Corn.

Places of most importance in it, are Wismar, a noted Port, on a Creek or Bay of the Baltick Sea; raised out of the ruins of old Mecklenburg before mentioned, about the year 1240. The Haven hereof capable of the greatest vessels, to which it gives a safe and assured Station, whence the name of Wismar; the word signifying in the Slavonian Language, idem ac certum mare (as my Author hath it) as much as a quiet or safe Sea. Now one of the Hanse Towns, and being it lyes conveniently for the use of the Swedes, allotted to that Crown by the Treaty of Munster; the Duke of Mecklenburg being in recompence thereof to have the temporalities of the Bishops of Swerin and Ratzenburg. 2 Swerin, seated upon the South side of the Lake so named; an Episcopall Sea, and honoured with giving the title of a Barony to the Dukes of Mecklenburg. 3 Mulearn, first walled by Niclot Prince of the Vandals, Anno 1270. 4 Ratzenburg, an Episcopall See, spoken of before. 5 Rostoch, the next in reputation of all the Hanse Towns, to Lubeck and Danwick. Large, rich, and much frequented by all sorts of Merchants; in compass almost six English miles, situate on the River Warn, near the fall thereof into the Baltick. Honoured with an University here founded by John Duke of Mecklenburg, Anno 1419. the first Professors in it being brought from Erford in Saxony. 6 Stargard, which once gave the title of Duke, to the younger Princes of this house. 7 Sarentine, memorable for a Nunnery there Founded by Duke Magnus the second. 8 Lau, built and fortified by Duke Henry the second, as an out-work to Rostoch, which he had lately bought of Christopher, then King of Denmark. 9 Sternberg, of which little memorable. 10 Fridland, on the edge of Pomeran, not far from Stargard, which gave the title of Duke to Albert of Wallenstein, after that called Duke of Fridland, that eminent and prosperous Commander of the Imperial Forces, in the late War of Germany: but miserably murdered after all his services, by command of the Emperour. 11 Fichtel, both pleasantly and strongly seated, on the edge of a Lake. 12 Dammin, a strong Town on the Marches of Brandenburg.

The Ancient Inhabitants of this Country were the Vandals, with the rest of the Heruli, and Burgundians. But the Burgundians being reckoned as a part of the Vandals, were not much took notice of, till their irruptions on the borders of the Roman Empire, made them more considerable: the Princes of these Nations using no other title than Kings of the Heruli and Vandals. Of these the first is said to be one Anthyrus, son of an Amazonian Lady, who learned his first rudiments of Warfare under Alexander the Great. Out of his loins descended a long race of Kings, amongst whom Rhadaguse, who together with Alarick and Goths, invaded Italy, (I know not by what warrant) is accounted one. Gunderick the seventeenth of these Kings, weary of so cold a dwelling, passed towards the South; and having harassed Gaul and Spain, shipped himself over the Straits of Gibraltar, and erected the Kingdom of the Vandals in Africk; whose Successors we shall meet with there. By Vitalis, the youngest son of Genserius, the son of Gunderick, the line of these Princes is continued; who after mingling with the Obotriti, and other of the Slaves, succeeding into the void places of the Vandals, left off the title of Kings of the Vandals, and called themselves Kings of the Heruli and Obotriti: continuing it to Pribislavus, or Primislaus the second, who wrote himself, Pribislavus Dei gratia, Herulorum, Wagriorum, Circulanorum, Palumborum, Obotritorum, Kissinorum, Vandalarumque Rex. Making herein a general Muster of those tribes of the Slaves and Heruli, which remained under his command. But he being vanquished by Henry surnamed the Lion, Duke of Saxony and Bavaria, the title of King was laid aside; his Successors contenting themselves with that of Princes. Divided betwixt Henry and Niclot, the Nephews of Pribislavus by his son Henry, into two Estates: Henry assuming to himself the title of Prince of the Obotriti; and Niclot that of Prince of the Vandals. But the posterity of Niclot failing in William, the last of that line, Anno 1430. his title, with the lands thereunto belonging, fell to Henry the Fat, the fourth Duke of Mecklenburg; to which honour, Albert and John, the sons of Henry the fourth, descended from the elder house, had been advanced by the Emperour Charles the fourth, at Prague, Anno 1348. The succession of which Family from Pribislavus, take in order thus.

The PRINCES of the HERULI, and DUKES of MECKLENBURGH.

- 1158 1 Pribislavus, the last King, and first Prince of the Heruli, after their subjection to the Saxons; restored to this title and his former estate by the bountiful Conquerours, to be held under the right and homage of the house of Saxony.
- 1179 2 Henry son of Pribislavus, baptized, with all his people, in his fathers life-time, by the perswasion of Henry, Duke of Saxony and Bavaria, by whom restored to their Estates.
- 3 Henry II. son of the former Henry, dividing the estate with his brother Niclot.

- Saxonic.* 1228 4 John surnamed the Divine; so called, because created Doctor of Divinity in the University of Paris, whither he was sent by his Father to learn good Arts.
- 1260 5 Henry III. surnamed of Hierusalem; because of his expedition thither against the Saracens.
- 1302 6 Henry IV. surnamed the Lion, for his valour and undaunted constancy.
- 1319 7 Albert and John, the sons of Henry, going to Prague with a Princely train, to attend on the Emperor Charles the fourth, were by him created Princes of the Empire, and Dukes of Mecklenburg, Anno 1348.
- 1380 8 Magnus, son of Albert.
- 1384 9 John, son of Magnus, the Founder of the University of Rostock, Anno 1419.
- 1423 10 Henry V. surnamed the Fat, who on the death of William the last Prince of the Pandals, succeeded into his Estate.
- 1447 11 Magnus II. son of Henry, Founder of the Cathedral Church of Rostock.
- 1503 12 Albert II. son of Magnus the second.
- 1547 13 John Albert, son of Albert the second, endowed the University of Rostock with the lands of some dissolved Monasteries; and authorized in his Estatutes, the Reformation of Religion begun by Luther.
- 1578 14 John III. son of John Albert.
- 1592 15 Adolph Frederick, and John Albert, sons of John the third, dispossessed hereof by the Emperor Ferdinand the second, Anno 1628. their Estates, with the title of Duke of Mecklenburg, being conferred on Albert of Wallenstein, Duke of Fridland. Who had not long enjoyed the Title, when Gustavus Adolphus, King of Sweden, the Assertor of the liberties of Germany, restored it to the proper owners. The heirs to whose Estates is Gustavus Adolphus, the only son and heir of John Albert; the other of these two Brothers being without issue.

The DUKEDOM and ESTATES of SAXONIE.

THE Dukedom and Estates of SAXONIE (not reckoning those which now pass under other names, and shall hereafter be described in their several places) are bounded on the East, with Bohemia, Lusatia, and part of Brandenburg; on the West, with Hassia, Brunswick, and parts of Lunenbourg, and Holstein; on the North, with other parts of Brandenburg, and part of Mecklenburg; and on the South with Franconia, and some parts of the Upper Palatinat.

It is (we see) an aggregate body, consisting of two General limbs. 1 The Dukedom of Saxonic; 2 The Estates of Saxonic, or Saxonic properly so called; The first containing the whole Provinces of 1 Obersax, or the Upper Saxonic, the proper seat of the Duke-Elector; 2 Misnia, 3 Voiteland, and 4 Turingia: The other, those of 1 Anhalt, 2 Mansfeld, 3 Meysenbourg, and 4 Lauenbourg. And as it is an aggregate body, so is it comprehensive of all those honourary titles, by which the Princes of Germany are distinguished from one another; that is to say, the Electorship of Saxonic, the Dukedom of Lauenbourg, the Bishoprick of Meysenbourg, the Principality of Anhalt, the Marquisate of Misnia, the Lantgravedom of Turingia, the Earldom of Mansfeld, and the Seigneury or Lordship of Voiteland. Of these eight Provinces, the 4 first mentioned are wholly situate without the limits and precincts of the ancient Saxonic; and yet now are, and have been called long before, the Dukedom of Saxonic, because they make up the whole Patrimony and Estate of the Dukes Electors, who since the proscription and deprivation of Duke Henry, surnamed the Lion, Anno 1180. in some or other of these Countries have had their fixed seat and habitation. The four last being parts of the ancient Saxonic, and heretofore in the possession of the Dukes hereof, do still pass under the account and name of Saxonic, though in the hands of several Owners; all of which do acknowledge a superiority in the Duke-Elector, if not some great relation to him, and dependance on him: so that we have an heterogeneous body to discourse upon, and therefore must consider severally of the parts thereof, but so, that either first or last we shall find them all in the succession and affairs of the Dukes of Saxonic; 1 then,

The Dukedom of Saxonic is bounded on the East, with Bohemia, Lusatia, and part of Brandenburg; on the West, with Hassia, and part of the proper Saxonic; on the North, with the proper Saxonic only; and on the South, with Franconia, and the Upper Palatinat. So called, because the proper Seat and Patrimony of the Duke-Elector; of very different nature both for Air and Soil, but the last especially; as we shall see by looking over the particular Provinces of 1 Obersax, 2 Misnia, or Meissen, 3 Voiteland, 4 Turingia, by the Dutch called Duringen.

1 OBERSAX, or the Upper Saxonic, is bounded on the East, with the Marches of Brandenburg; on the West, with Mansfeld, from which parted by the River Salza; on the North, with Meysenbourg; on the South, with Misnia. The reason of the name we shall see anon. The Air hereof somewhat sharp and piercing, the soil sufficiently fruitful, but therein not to be compared with Misnia, and much less with Duringen, being both of them of a richer and more liberal nature.

Places of most importance in it, are 1 Torge, or Torgow, by some placed in Misnia, but by Merca- tor in this Province. Built on the West side of the Elb, in form orbicular, and falling every way from the sides of a Mountain: beautified with a stately and pleasant Castle, belonging to the Elector of Saxony, who is Lord hereof; built by John Frederick the Elector, Anno 1535. Near to the City is a Lake of a mile in compass; for which the Citizens pay yearly to the Duke 500 Guldens. 2 Wartitz upon the Elb, once a Commandery of the Templers. 3 Weissenberg, lying towards Brunswick. 4 Kemberg, on the Elb. 5 Bitterfeld, betwixt the Elb and the Mulda, and 6 Wittenberg, on the Elb, in an open plain; but strongly fenced with walls, ramparts, and deep ditches. The chief beauty of it lieth in one fair street, extending the whole length of the City; in the midst thereof is the Cathedral Church, a large Market place, and the Common-Council house. In former times the seats of the Dukes Electors, till the Electoral dignity was conferred on the house of Meissen, who liking better their own Country, kept their Courts at Dresden. But so, that Wittenberg is still acknowledged for the head City of the Electorate; and was made an University for Divines by Duke Frederick, Anno 1508. It was called Wittenberg, as some conjecture, from Wittikindus, once Lord of Saxonic, when the extent thereof was greatest: famous for the Sepulchres of Luther and Melanchthon, but chiefly for that here were the Walls of Papery first broken down, and the Reformation of Religion begun by Luther, of the wonderful success whereof we have spoke already.

Of the affairs of this little Country we can say but little, more then the means by which it came into the hands of the Dukes of Saxonic, and consequently to the name which it still retains. Concerning which we are to know, that on the Deprivation of Duke Henry, surnamed the Lion, whose greatness was grown formidable even to the Emperours themselves: the Dukedom of Saxonic was dismembered into many parcels; Brunswick and Lunenbourg being given unto the Children of the Duke deprived; the lower parts of Westphalen seized on by Philip Archbishop of Cölen; the parts thereof about the Weser, by the Bishop of Paderborn; Herman the Lantgrave of Turingia laying hold of that part of this Estate which was nearest to him; Lubeck and many other of the principal Cities made Imperial, or governing themselves as Free Estates; the Ancestors of the Princes of Anhalt, and the Earls of Mansfeld, endowed with large possessions also out of this great Patrimony, the Emperor not only conning at it, but willingly consenting to that dissipation, the better to reward and content those Princes, who had assisted him in his Wars against the Duke. By which means there was nothing left of the ancient Saxonic to be Elected upon Barnard of Anhalt, whom Frederick Barbarossa had created Duke-Elector in the room of Henry so deprived. And though Duke Barnard for his many good services to the Empire had been before gratified with the City of Wittenberg by Conrad the 3d. and had conquered from Duke Henry the whole Country of Lunenbourg, yet all being found too little to maintain the Port of a Duke-Elector, it pleased the Emperor Frederick to bestow upon him all those Lands and Territories which lay between the Salza and the Elb, on the North of Misnia, to make Wittenberg the Electoral City, and give unto the County thus united to it, the name of Obersax, or Upper Saxonic, which it continueth to this day.

2 MISNIA, or Meissen, is bounded on the East, with Lusatia; on the West, with Duringen; on the North, with Saxonic, specially so called, and some part of Brandenburg; on the South, with Voiteland, and some part of Bohemia. The Country once overpread with Woods, and full of Bogs, rendering the air unwholesome, and the soil unprofitable: both rectified by the care and industry of the people; now yielding some mines of silver, and great plenty both of Corn and Pasturage: well watered with the Rivers Salza, Plisse, Elster, and Mulze.

Places of most observation in it, are 1 Dresden, seated on the Albis, having continually on her Walls and Bulwarks, 150 Pieces of Ordnance; a Stable of the Dukes, in which are 128 horses of service; and a Magazine, out of which 30000 Horses and Foot may be armed at a days warning. The Town itself situate on both sides of the River, by which divided into the old Town and the new, joined into one by a Bridge of 800 paces in length: the Country round about it very rich and pleasant, able to sustain great multitudes; for that cause made the ordinary seat of the Dukes of Saxonic, who have here a strong and stately Castle. 2 Nannburg, 3 Mersburg, both seated on the River Saale, two Episcopal Seats. 4 Lipsique, as famous an University for Philosophers, as Jene in Lorraine is for Physicians. It seemeth the Scholars and Citizens will not suffer their Beer to perish, of which here is so much drunk and exported, that the very Custom of it due unto the Duke, amounteth to 20000 pounds yearly; yet is this Town of no more than two Churches; but wealthy, populous, and built for the most part of fair Free-stone, honoured with the Courts of Justice for all the Country. Though seated on the meeting of Pisse, Parde, Elster, 3 Rivers which lye almost on all sides of it: yet it is not strong, having been thrice taken by the Imperialists in less than 2 years, during the late German Wars. Sufficiently famous (if for nothing else) for the great battle fought near it, between the late K. of Sweden, and the Count of Tilly: the honour whereof falling to the Swedes and Saxons, (with the death of 15000 of both sides, and the loss of all the Baggage, Arms, and Ammunition of the Imperialists) freed all these parts of Germany from that civil and spiritual bondage, which was intended by the Emperor to be put upon them. 5 Mulberg, on the Elb, where John Frederick the Elector was discomfited and taken prisoner by Charles the fifth, by whom deprived not long after of his Estate and dignity. 6 Meissen, on the West side of the same River, in a hilly and uneven ground, built by the Emperor Henry the first, for defence of the Empire against the Slaves: a Bishops See, and the first Seat of the Marquesses of this Country, both which, together with the Burgrave of the Town had their Palaces, or Mansion houses standing close together on the top of a hill, over-looking both the Town and Country. From this Town the whole Province had the name of Meissen. 7 Erlberg, near the Lauenbourg. was called Leopolis, or Leobourgum, and Lauenbourg for the same reason by the Dutch or Germans: on the proscriptio of which Prince, the Country being wasted, and the Towns destroyed, Barnard of Anhalt designed his Successor in the Dukedom of Saxony, liking the situation of it, caused it to be re-edified in stronger manner than before, a great part of the materials of the Town of Erdenbourg, being carried cross the Water to enlarge this place. Afterwards being razed by the said Duke Henry, in the course of that War, it was re-built again by D. Barnard, the new Elector, who is therefore by some Writers made the Founders of it. Other places of note herein, are 2 Erdenbourg, a well fortified piece, opposite to Lauenbourg, on the higher side of the Elb; not so large now as heretofore, the Town of Lauenbourg being made greater by the lessening of this. 3 Raceburg, an Episcopal See, founded here by Duke Henry surnamed the Lion, upon his gaining of the Slaves to the Christian Faith, and of late times the Sepulture of this Ducal Family. 4 Moeln, on the further side of the Elb, not far from Lauenbourg, the cause of much contention betwixt the Dukes hereof, and the Town of Hambourg, who pretend a title thereunto.

This Country being for the most part under the Command of the Slaves, was from them Conquered (together with the whole Country of Mecklenburg) by Duke Henry the Lion, and by his care converted to the Christian Faith: but he being proscribed, and this Signeury extorted from him, by Duke Barnard of Anhalt his Successor in the Electoral dignity, it was by Albert, the son of this Barnard, conferred on John his second son, from whom the Dukes of Saxony, commonly called Dukes of Saxon-Lauenbourg, do derive themselves; who being pretermitted by the Emperor Sigismund at the death of Albert the 3d. the last of the direct line of Barnard; or else not caring for a title, which carried with it too great fail for so small a Vessel, as the Estate of the Elector at the present was, have since contented themselves with their ancient Patrimony.

It is now time we should proceed to the Story of Saxony; the ancient Inhabitants of which Tract, were the Longobardi, or Lombards of Magdeburg; and part of the Cherusci about Mansfeld, and Wittenberg. Overcome by the prevailing Saxons, they became part of their name and Country, which in the full extent thereof was once far greater than now it is: containing all the Countries betwixt the Rhine and the River Eydore in the Cimbrick Chersonesse; and from the River Saltza, to the German and Baltick Oceans. These said by some to be a people of Asia, and there called the Saca; who finding that small Territory (now a part of Tartaria) too narrow for them, forsook their Country, and at last fixed themselves in the Cimbrick Chersonesse: where they first took the names of Sacafons (or Sac-fons) that is to say, the sons of the Saca. The improbability of this we have there disputed. Omitting therefore that and the like Originations of them, I conceive them (for my part) to be natural Germans; some tribe of that most populous and potent people of the Suevi: but for the reason of the name, let every man enjoy the pleasures of his own opinion. Certain I am that in Protophies time, they were possessed of those parts beyond the Elb, and thence extended to the Eydore, part of which Tract is now known by the name of Holstein: and were accounted in that time to be no new-comers. Afterwards, as they grew in number, they enlarged their quarters, and passing over the Elb in the time of the later Roman Emperours, possessed themselves of the void places which were left by the French, then busied in the conquest of more fruitful Countries; communicating their name to all the Nations which they overcame, as the French had formerly done before them. So that in fine, they stretch themselves from the River Saltza on the East, to the German Ocean on the West, and took up the now Dukedoms of Holstein, Lunenbourg, and Brunswick; the Bishopricks of Bremen, Verda, Hildersheim, Halberstadt, and Magdeburg, the Marches of Brandenbourg, the Earldom of Mansfeld, Westphalen, both Friesland, Over-Yssel, with as much of Gelderland, and Holland, as lay on that side of the Rhene. By which account the present Electoral Family hath not one foot of the old Saxony in their possession: the seat and Patrimony of the Electors being removed into other Countries, upon the alterations and changes which have happened in that Estate: the name and title of Saxony being given to the Country about Wittenberg, for no other reason, but because it was the chief seat of the Duke Electors. But to proceed, about that valiant Nation questionless they were, the Conquerours of the Isle of Britain; and the last people of the Germans, which yielded up their Country unto Charles the Great; by whose means gained unto the Gospel, Anno 785. Their last King was called Wittichindus, from whom descend the Kings of France, since the time of Hugh Capet; the present Kings of Denmark, of the house of Oldenburg; the Dukes of Burgundy and Savoy; the Marquesses of Monferrat, besides many other noble and illustrious Families, though of lesser note. The right or direct line of the male-issue of Wittichind (whom Charles the Great created, of a King, the first Duke of Saxony) determining in the person of Otho the third, Emperour of Germany, it was by him conferred on Barnard Lord of Lunenbourg, (but the precise time I find not:) Henry surnamed the Saint, who succeeded this Otho, the next in the collateral line, being pretermitted, either because at that time settled in the great Dukedom of Bavaria, or because there was no hope of Posterity by him, or for some other private grudge, which I read not of. And it continued in this line, till on the forfeiture incurred by his posterity, in the person of Duke Henry the Lion, it was bestowed by Frederick Barbarossa, upon Barnard of Anhalt, Anno 1180. whose issue in the right line failing, it was finally eittied by the Emperour Sigismund, on Frederick Landgrave of Turingia, and Marquess of Misnia, Anno 1423. In his Family it hath since continued, but not without a manifest breach in the course of the succession: which hapned, when John Frederick being deprived of the Electoral dignity and estate; his cousin Duke Maurice was invested in them by Charles the fifth. For that religious but unfortunate Prince (if he may justly have the title of unfortunate who suffered in so good a cause, for so good a Conscience) being discomfited and taken prisoner at the battle of Mulberg before mentioned, was the next day condemned to die; but pardoned at the last upon the intercession of some powerfull Friends, upon condition that he should resign the Electoral dignity, and all the rest of his Estates, into the power of the Emperour: Which done, the Emperour gave him back again of his own accord the Castle of Gotha, and the Town of Weymar, with all the Lands and Territories thereunto adjoining; from which last place his Posterity are now called Dukes of Saxon-Weymar. It was also much insisted on, that he should relinquish his Religion, and reconcile himself to the Church of Rome; but thereto he opposed with such Christian stoutness, that in the end it was omitted. These matters being thus transacted, the Emperour (with the general consent of the Electors) invested Maurice, Cousin German to the Duke deprived, in the Electoral Dignity, and all the Lands, Honours and Estates (the Signeuries of Gotha and Weymar excepted only) which formerly had belonged to him; which though it were a great wrong both to the Person and Posterity of the Duke John Frederick; yet it is observed by some grave Writers, to have fallen out not unhappily for the advancement of the Reformation then contended for. 1 In regard of John Frederick, whose Christian patience and magnanimity during the whole time of his imprisonment, added great reputation to the cause for which he suffered. 2 In respect of Duke Maurice, who was a man of far greater parts to advance the work, and every way as zealous in pursuing of it, as the other was. And 3 In relation to the Children of the deprived Duke, men not to be relied on in a matter of such weight and moment; inasmuch as it was said of him after his decease, Quod filios reliquerit sui dissimulatos. It is now time we should proceed to the Investiture of the new Elector. And because these Translations of State be not ordinary, I will briefly relate the Ceremonies thereat used, as I have collected them out of Sleiden. There were at Wittenberg Scaffolds erected, on which sat the Emperour, and the Princes Electors in their Robes. On the back side of the State, were placed the Trumpeters; right against it standeth Duke Maurice with two bands of Horse-men; The first in a full career run their horses up to the Pavilion: Out of the second issued Henry Duke of Brunswick, Wolfgang Prince of Bipont, and Albert Duke of Bavaria. These when they had in like manner coursed their Horses about, alighted, ascended to the Throne, and humbly requested the Emperour, that for the common good he would advance Duke Maurice to the Electorship. He consulted with the Electors, made answer by the Bishop of Mentz, that he was content, to Duke Maurice would in person come and desire it. Then came forth Duke Maurice, with the whole Troop; before him were born ten Ensigns bearing the Arms of as many Regions, wherein he desired to be invested. When he came before the Throne he kneeled down on his knees, and humbly desired the Emperour to bestow on him the Electorship of Saxony, and all the Lands of John Frederick late Elector. His Petition was granted. Then the Bishop of Mentz read unto him the Oath, by which the Electors are bound unto the Empire: which Oath, when Duke Maurice had taken, the Emperour delivered unto him a Sword, which was a sign of his perfect investiture. Duke Maurice, now the Elector of Saxony, arose, gave the Emperour thanks, promised his fidelity, made obeysance, and took his place amongst the Electors. This Solemnity was on the 24 day of Febr. Anno 1548. Which said, we now proceed unto the Catalogue of

The Dukes of SAXONIE.

- 785 1 Wittikind, the last King of the Saxons, vanquished, and created the first Duke by Charl the Great.
- 825 2 Bruno, the Brother of Wittikind.
- 843 3 Luitpoldus, Son of Bruno.
- 855 4 Bruno II. Son of Luitpoldus.
- 876 5 Otho, Brother of Bruno the second.
- 916 6 Henry, surnamed the Fowler, Son of Otho, Emperour of the Romans, and King of Germany.

- laying hold of that which lay nearest to him, by means whereof this great Estate being parcelled and divided into many parts; the title of the Duke Elector of Saxony, was given by the said Emperor to
- 1180 17 Barnard of Anhalt, son of Albert, Marquess of Brandenbourg, and grandchilde of Eliza, another daughter of Duke Magnus: to whom for his Seat and Habitation, the Emperour gave the City of Wittenberg; the head since that time of this Electorate.
- 1212 18 Albert, Son of Barnard, from whom the Dukes of Lunenbourg, doe derive their Pedegree.
- 1273 19 Albert II. Son of Albert the first.
- 1327 20 Rodolph, Son of Albert the 2d.
- 1356 21 Rodolph II. Son of Rodolph the first.
- 1373 22 Wenceslaus, Son of Rodolph the 2d.
- 1389 23 Rodolph III. Son of Wenceslaus.
- 1419 24 Albert III. Son of Rodolph the third, the last Elector of Saxony of the House of Anhalt.
- 1423 25 Frederick, Lantgrave of Düringen, and Marquess of Misnia, (on the falling of the house of Anhalt, Anno 1422.) created Duke of Saxony by the Emperour Sigismund; the house of Lunenbourg pretermitted for want of putting in their claim; by the advancement of which Prince, the title of Duke of Saxony returned again to the House of Witkind (the first King and last Duke hereof) after it had been alienated into other Families for the space of 200 years.
- 1428 26 Frederick II. Son of Frederick the first.
- 1464 27 Ernest, Son of Frederick the second.
- 1486 28 Frederick III. Son of Ernest.
- 1525 29 John, Brother to Frederick the third.
- 1532 30 John Frederick, Son of John the first; a great advancer of the Reformation of Religion; imprisoned, and deprived of his Electorship by Charles the fifth.
- 1547 31 Maurice Cousin German to the Duke John Frederick (as being the Grandson or Nephew of Albert, the younger Brother of Ernestus the Duke Elector) created Duke Elector by Charles the fifth, whom afterwards he drove out of Germany; and was slain in the battel of Sieffridshuse, against Marquess Albert of Brandenbourg.
- 1553 32 Augustus, Brother of Maurice.
- 1586 33 Christian, Son of Augustus.
- 34 Christian II. Son of Christian the first.
- 35 John George, Brother of Christian the second, who first sided with the Emperour Ferdinand the second against the Elector Palatine, and after with the King of Sweden against the Emperour.

The Revenues of this Duke are thought to be the greatest of any one Prince of Germany (the Imperial Family excepted) amounting at the least to 400000 l. per annum; though in multitude of Vassals, and greatness of Territory he come short of some of them. And to make up this sum (or perhaps a greater) it is conceived that the profit which ariseth to him out of Silver mines, is no less than 130000 l. yearly; the Impost laid on Beer in Leipsich only, a City but of two Parish Churches (by which conjecture at the rest) being farmed at 20000 l. per annum. Then hath he the Tenths of all sorts of Increase, as of Corn, Wine, &c. the Salt-houses at Hall, and some other places; very fair Lands belonging unto his Domain; and besides this, a standing and perpetual Tax laid upon the Subject, towards the maintenance of the war against the Turk; granted at first in times of danger and hostility; but gathered ever since in the times of peace (as to that Enemy) under colour of being ready and prepared against him. According to the quantity of his Intrado so he keeps his State, well served, and better attended, than any other of the Electors: there being at one time in the Court of Christian, the Father of the present Duke, three Dukes, three Earls, and five Barons of other Nations (besides the Nobility of his own) all Pensioners and Servants to him; one of the Princes of Anhalt, and one of the Earls of Mansfeld, both Homagers unto the Saxon, being two of the number.

The Arms of Saxony, are Barre-wife of six pieces Sable and Or, a Bend flowred Vert. Which Bend was added to the Coat by the Emperour Frederick Barbarossa, when he confirmed Barnard of Anhalt in this Dukedom. For Barnard desiring of the Emperour to have some difference added to the Ducal Coat; (being before only Barry, Sable and Or) to distinguish him and his Successors from those of the former House: the Emperour took a Chapler of Rur, which he had then upon his head, and threw it cross his Buckler or Esccheon of Arms, which was presently painted on the same.

18. BRUNSWICK, and 19. LUNENBOURG.

THE Dukedoms of BRUNSWICK and LUNENBOURG, being both originally taken out of this great Dukedom of Saxony, extracted both from the same root, and many times united in the person of the same one Prince; shall be joyned together in the story, though severed in the Chorography, or description of them; bounded on the East, with Magdebourg and Mansfeld in the Upper Saxony; on the West, with Westphalia; on the North, with Denmark; on the South, with Hassia. The Air in all parts hereof very cold and comfortable, but found and healthful; the soil towards the old Marches of Brandenbourg, but meanly fertile; towards Düringen and Hassia, mountainous and woody; in in other parts very plentifull of Corn, and well provided also of such other commodities, as usually doe Brunswick grow in those colder Climates.

But to take the Chorography of them severally, BRUNSWICK is bounded on the East, with the Earldom of Mansfeld; on the West, with Westphalia; on the North, with Lunenbourg; on the South, with Hassia. So called from Brunswick, the chief City, and the head of this Dukedom.

Places of most importance in it, are 1 Goslar, upon the River Gos, whence it had the name; Of a poor Village, made a City by Henry the first, much beautified and enlarged by Henry the third, who founded here two Churches and a stately Palace; Now one of the Imperial Cities. 2 Helmstedt, in the middle way betwixt Brunswick and Magdeburg; first fortified by Charles, Son of Charles the Great, for a bridle to the neighbouring Slaves; and being after given to the Abbots of Herda, was by them sold to William the Duke of Brunswick, 3 Quedelnsberg, built also by Henry the first, much increased since by the neighbourhood of a very rich Nunnery, the Alteffe whereof had formerly the privileges of a Prince of the Empire. 4 Hildesheim, an ancient City, honoured with an Episcopal See by Charles the Great, at the first conversion of the Saxons. 5 Grubenhagen, which gave title to a younger branch of the house of Brunswick; a Principality and a member of the Empire. 6 Hannover, on the River Lein, well built, very strongly fortified; and not meanly traded. 7 Brunswick, upon the River Onafter, which passeth through it, passed over by many handfom Bridges; the Metropolis of the ancient Saxony, and at this time the chief of this Dukedom: though of it self Imperial, and one of the Hanse. The City of a Quadrangular form, seated in the midst of a Plain, very fruitful of Corn; in compass about two Dutch, or eight English miles; somewhat larger than Nuremberg, and less than Erford: containing in that compass not above twelve Churches, whereof two have Steeples covered with Lead, a third with Brass, all the rest with Tile. Rich, populous, and strongly fortified, on some sides with a double, on others with a treble wall; within which walls are five Cities, distinguished by Privileges, but united by Laws. The whole first built by Bruno, Son to Ludolphus Duke of Saxony, and Uncle to the Emperour Henry the first, about the year 861. from whence it had the name of Brunswick, or Brunonis Vici; by the more elegant Latinists, Brumopolis. 8 Hamel, on the East side of the Weser, or Visurgis, encompassed with a deep moat, (occasioned by a stream cut out of the River) round about which are divers fortifications, and planted with Ordnance. Nigh unto this Town is the Mountain called also Hamel, unto which the Pied-piper (as they call him) led the Children of Hallerstad, where they all sunk, and were never more seen; but of this story more hereafter, when we come to Transylvania. 9 Wolfshaiten, or Wolfen Lutel, where the Duke doth keep his Court. For though Brunswick giveth him his title, yet will it not yield him any obedience, but repeteth her self among the Hanse towns; for which cause there have been great wars between the Dukes and the Citizens. 10 Hallerstede, a Bishops See; the late Bishop (or Administrator of the Bishoprick) being Christian Duke of Brunswick, that noble young souldier, who had vowed his life and fortune to the service of Elizabeth Queen of Bohemia, his Cousin-german; created by King James one of the Knights of the Garter. A Bishoprick of great Revenue, and a very large Territory, since the alteration of Religion, given with the title of Administrator, to the Sons of Brunswick; but now by the conclusions at Munster, assigned over to the Elector of Brandenbourg, with the title of Prince of Hallerstede, the Family of Brunswick being to be recompensed with an alternate succession in the Bishoprick of Osna-burg, and some other additions. 11 Husfeld, the seat sometimes of the old Palatines of Saxony; but not else observable. 12 Amelungsbame, another Town of the said Palatines, by one of which called Sigfridus, it was beautified with a very fair Abby; the principal Towns (in those dayes) of this Palatinate, which bordering on that part of the Turingians which is now called Hessia, was taken in by Herman, one of the Lantgraves of that Countrey, on the proscription of Duke Henry surnamed the Lion; but on the fall of his line, recovered for the most part by the Dukes of Brunswick, the right heirs of Henry.

The Dukedom of LUNENBURG hath on the East, the Diocese of Magdebourg; on the West, the Diocese of Bremen, a part of Westphalia; on the North, the Elb; and on the South, the Dukedom of Brunswick. So called from Lunenbourg the chief City, once the seat of the Dukes.

Places of most observation in it, are 1 Lunenbourg it self, situate on the River Elbenaw, an Imperial City, and one of the principal of the Hanse; so called from the Alsen here worshipped in the times of Idolary. Of a round form, and seated in a pleasant Valley; but with mountains near it: on one of which called Calberg, is a very strong Castle, of right belonging to the Duke, but in the power of the Citizens; who without this Fort, could not be matters of their Liberties. The walls about it are of earth, high and broad, and the Ditches deep; the buildings generally fair (for the most part of brick) the chief whereof is the Common-Council house; the Streets broad and long, with two spacious Market-places; but of no very pleasing smell: the whole about a mile and an half in length, half a mile in breadth; containing six Parish Churches. But the thing most considerable in it is the Fountain of Salt, (the greatest riches of this City) and the house in which the Salt is boiled, containing 52 rooms, and in each room 8 leaden Pans, in which are boiled daily 8 tuns of Salt, every tun being sold for 8 Flemish shillings, bought by the Hamburghers, Lubeckers, and other Merchants; some part of the profits of it belonging to the Duke, some to the City, the rest to the Adventurers who employ their stocks on it. 2 Cella, the seat of the Duke of Lunenbourg. 3 Gethern, of no great bigness or estimation, but for a strong Castle of the Dukes. 4 Oldendorp, situate betwixt the Venaw and the River Esca, memorable for the great battel fought near unto it, Anno 1633. betwixt the Imperialists and the Swedes, the honour and benefit whereof fell unto the Swedes, who killed upon the place 5000 of the Enemy, besides such as were found dead in the fields and high-ways, all covered over with dead bodies; took gallant prospect over the Town and Countrey. 9 Geissen, a Town belonging to the Lantgraves of Cassels, and a small University also. 10 Dietz, upon the River Loon, belonging also to the House of Cassels. 11 Cassels, the chief Town and ordinary residence of the Lantgraves of the elder house, who are hence sometimes called the Lantgraves of Cassels: commodiously seated in a pleasant and fruitful soil, and well fortified with strong earthen walls, and deep ditches; but the houses in it of no great beauty, being composed for the most part of wood, thatch and clay.

Within the limits of this Province is the County of WALDECK, nor subject to the Lantgraves of Hassia, though included within the bounds of it before laid down, taking up the Western part thereof, where it meets with Westphalia: in figure very near a square, each side of which is of the length of six ordinary Dutch, or 24 English miles. The soil much of the same nature with the rest of Hassia, save that it hath some veins of Quicksilver, and inexhaustible Mines of Coal, which the other wanteth; these last in greatest plenty about Veldung, and the strong Castle of Eisenburg, two of the best Towns and places of it. Others of chief note, 3 Waldeck itself on the River Eder, the first seat of the Earls hereof, who have here an ancient Castle, from whence the whole Countrey takes its name. 4 Mengerhuse, in a fair Castle whereof live the present Earls. 5 Witterberg, in a pleasant and fruitful Soil, betwixt the Rivers Twist and Alra. 6 Corbach, famous in the times of Albertus Magnus, for its golden Mines, yielding great profit to these Earls. The Pedigree of which Earls is fetched from one Witichind Earl of Snalenberg, whom Charles the Great made Advocate or Patron of the Church of Paderborn in Westphalia, being an Office in those times of great Jurisdiction. By Witichind the second, one of his Successors, this Office was surrendered into the hands of the Chapter, for the sum of 300 marks in Silver: and to cut off all further claims, Henry, the nephew of this Witichind, by his Son Otho, was by the Chapter gratified with the Town of Waldeck, of which he was the first Earl: whose nephew Henry, surnamed Ferrens, subdued Corbach, Anno 1366. and added it to his Estate. By a third Henry, grandchild of this Ferrens, or Man of Iron, this Earldom formerly held in Fee of the Church of Paderborn, was first under the Patronage and Protection of the Lantgraves of Hassia, Anno 1428. as it continueth to this day: the Earls hereof content with their own Estates, and more addicted to the Book, than unto the Sword, have acted little in the Wars to improve their Fortunes.

The ancient Inhabitants of the whole, both Waldeck and the rest of Hassia, and also of the County of Nassau in Vettravia, near unto adjoining, were the Catti, or Chatti, mentioned by the Ancients: first conquered (after the withdrawing of the Roman Forces) by the Hessi, and both subdued not long after by the Thuringians. Subject unto the Lantgraves of Duringen, till the death of Henry, the last of the male issue of Lewis of Orleans. In the division of whose Estate, the Western moiety of Duringen fell to the share of Henry, Duke of Brabant, one of the Competitors, who leaving the title of Lantgrave of Duringen to the Marquess of Misnia, took to himself the title of the Lantgrave of Hessen, in memory of the Hessi spoken of before. Of his Successors the most puissant was that Philip, who in the time of Charles the fifth, much swayed the affairs of Germany, Anno 1520. he discomfited King Ferdinand, and restored Ulrick to the Dukedom of Wirttemberg; Anno 1530. he united all the Protestant Princes and Cities of Germany in a common league at Smalcald; for the defence of the Protestant Religion; Anno 1545. he undertook the cause of Goslar against the Duke of Brunswick, whom in a set battle he took prisoner, together with his Son, and possessed his Countrey; Anno 1548. he united all the Princes and Cities of Germany in an offensive and defensive League against Charles the fifth. But that War succeeded not prosperously. For the Duke of Saxony, his perpetual Confederates, being taken prisoner, he submitted himself to the Emperour at Kale, or Hale in Duringen, his Sons-in-law, Duke Maurice, the Marquess of Brandenbourg, and Wolfgang Prince of Deuxponts, having given their bonds for his return. The conditions of his Pardon were, First, That he should dismantle all his Towns except Cassel. 2ly, That he should yield up unto the Emperour all his Munition. 3ly, That he should pay unto the Emperour 150000 Crowns. The same night he was by the Duke of Alva invited to supper, his Sons-in-law of Saxony and Brandenbourg accompanying him. After supper, he was contrary to the Laws of Hospitality, and the Emperours exact promise, detained Prisoner. The fallacy stood thus: In the Emperours compact with the three Princes, the words were, that the Lantgrave should be kept, Nicht in einig gefengenes, that is, Not in any prison: which the Emperours Secretary by a small dash of his pen, turned into Nicht in ewig gefengenes, that is, Not in everlasting Prison. Well, in prison he staid five years; which being expired, he was again set at large by Duke Maurice, the overthrower and restorer of the German liberty. The residue of these Lantgraves in their several times, occur in the ensuing Catalogue of

The LANTGRAVES of HASSIA.

- 1263 1 Henry of Brabant, Son of Henry, Duke of Brabant, and of Sophia his wife, daughter of Lewis the sixth, Lantgrave of Thuringia; after a nine years War betwixt him and the Marquess of Misnia, divided the Estate, and took unto himself the title of Lantgrave of Hessen.
 1308 2 Otho, and John, sons of Henry.
 1323 3 Henry II. and Lewis, sons of Otho.
 1376 4 Herman, the son of Lewis.
 1414 5 Lewis II. son of Herman, surnamed the Milde.

1458 6 Lewis

Westphalia.

- 1458 6 Lewis III. Son of Lewis the Milde.
 7 William, the eldest Son of Lewis the third, dispossessed of his Estate by 8 William II. his youngest Brother.
 1509 9 Philip, the famous Lantgrave spoken of before, Son of William the second.
 1567 10 William III. eldest Son of Philip, succeeded in one moiety of the Estate, and resided at Cassels: the other moiety being divided betwixt his Brethren Ludowick of Marpurg, and George of Darmstadt, Father of Ludowick of Darmstadt before mentioned.
 1590 11 Maurice, eldest Son of William the third.
 12 William IV. Son of Maurice, now living, 1648.

The Arms of these Lantgraves are Asure, a Lion Barry of eight pieces, Arg. and Gules, Crowned Or. Which being properly and originally the Arms of the ancient Dukes of Francony, were given by Caradus Salicu, Duke of Franconia, and Emperour, to Lewis of Orleans, at such time as he invested him in the Lantgravedom of Thuringia: on the expiration of whose line, challenged and born by the Lantgraves of Hassia, as the direct Heirs of Lewis the 6th, and his Brother Henry, the last made Princes of that House.

WESTPHALIA.

WESTPHALIA is bounded on the East, with Hassia, Brunswick, and part of Lunenbourg; on the West, with the Bishoprick of Colen, Cleveland, Over-ysell, West and East-Frisland, and the German Ocean; on the North, with the Elb, and the Dukedom of Holstein; and on the South, with Munster, and some part of Hassia.

It was thus called of the Westphali, a tribe or division of the Saxons, distinguished heretofore into the Transalbinos, inhabiting beyond the Ell, or Albis, in the County of Holstein, now a part of Danemark: the Ostphali, betwixt the Elb, the Ocean, with the River of Saliza, and the Weser; taking up the Bishopricks of Breme, Verden, Hildesheim, Halberstat, and Meyding, with the Dukedoms of Lunenbourg and Brunswick: the Angriuariani, taking up the north-west part of the modern Westphalen, betwixt the Bishoprick of Breme, and the Earldom of Oldenburg: and finally, the West-phali, or Western-Saxons, inhabiting the rest of the modern Westphalen, with the Earldoms of Mark, Berg, Zutphen, the Seignoury of Over-ysell, and some parts of Guelderland, and Holland: but the Saxons being subjugated by the power of the French, and several new Estates erected out of that old Stock; the remnant of the Westphali and Angriuariani, (the Bishoprick of Breme being added unto the account,) were comprehended and united in the name of WESTPHALEN.

The Soil, according to the several parts of it, is of different natures: the parts adjoining to the Weser being desert, and barren; those towards the Earldoms of Mark and Bergen, mountainous and full of Woods; the Bishoprick of Bremen, except towards the Elb, full of dry lands, heaths and unfruitful thickets, like the wilde parts of Windfor Forest betwixt Stanes and Fernham. In other parts exceeding plentiful of Corn, and of excellent Pasturage; stored with great plenty of wild fruits, and (by reason of the many Woods) abundance of Acorns: with infinite herds of Swine (which they breed up with those natural helps) of so good a relish, that a Gammon of Westphalian Bacon, is reckoned for a principal Dish at a great mans Table.

The old Inhabitants hereof were the Chauci Majores about Bremen, the Chanani, Angriuarii, and Bructeri, inhabiting about Munster, Osnaburg, and so towards the Land of Colen; and part of the Cherusci (before spoken of) taking up those parts which lie nearest unto Brunswick, and Lunenbourg. All of them vanquished by Drusus the Son-in-law of Augustus; but soon restored to their former liberty, by the great overthrow given by the Cherusci, and their associates, to Quintilius Varus. Afterwards uniting into one name with the French, they expelled the Romans out of Gaul: leaving their forsaken, and ill-inhabited seats, to be taken by the Saxons; with whom the remainders of them did incorporate themselves both in Name and Nation. Of that great body it continued a considerable Member (both when a Kingdom and a Dukedom) till the proscription and deprivation of Duke Henry the Lion: At what time the parts beyond the Weser were usurped by Barnard Bishop of Paderborn; those betwixt the Weser, and the Rhene, by Philip Archbishop of Colen, whose Successors still hold the title of Dukes of Westphalen: the Bishopricks of Breme, Munster, Paderborn, and Mindaw, having been formerly endowed with goodly Territories, had some accretments also out of this Estate: every one catching hold of that which lay nearest to him. But not to make too many subdivisions of it, we will divide it only into these two parts; viz. 1 Westphalen specially so called, and 2 the Bishoprick of Bremen.

In WESTPHALEN specially so called, which is that part hereof which lyeth next to Cleveland, the places of most observation are, 1 Geseke, a Town of good repute; 2 Brala, a Village of great beauty; 3 Arnsberg; and 4 Fredeborch, honoured with the title of Præfectures; 5 Wadenbrich; 6 Homburg, lording it over fair and spacious Territories. All which, with two Lordships, and eight Præfectures more, dispersed in the Dukedom of Engern, and County of Sarland, belong unto the Bishop of Colen; the titular Duke of Westphalen, and really of Angriuariani (Engern) as he stiles himself: the title and possession of Duke Engern, being acquired unto this See by Bruno Archbishop hereof, Son of Henry the first, Emperour and King of Germany, surnamed the Fowler, with the consent of Otho the first his elder brother. 7 Montenabour, (perhaps Mont-Tabor) seated in that part hereof which is called Westernald; a Town of consequence belonging to the Elector of Triers. 8 Rhenen; 9 Schmalat;

Westphalen, and Bremen.

9 Schamlat, and 10 Beckem, reasonable good Towns, all of the Bishoprick of Munster. 11 Munster it self, famous for the Treaty, and conclusions made upon that treaty, for the peace of Germany; seated upon the River Ems, and so called from a Monastery here founded by Charles the Great, which gave beginning to the Town; supposed to be that Mediolanum, which Ptolomy placeth in this tract. A beautifully, and well fortified City, and the See of a Bishop, who is also the Temporal Lord of it. Famous for the wofull Tragedies here acted by a lawless crew of Anabaptists, who chose themselves a King (that famous Taylor, John of Leiden) whom they called King of Zion, as they named the City New Jerusalem; proclaimed a community both of Goods and Women; cut off the heads of all that opposed their doings: and after many fanatical and desperate actions, by the care and industry of the Bishop and his Confederates, brought to condign punishment. The Story is to be seen at large in Sleidan, Mr. Hoekers Preface, and some modern Pamphlets; wherein, as in a Mirrour, we may plainly see the face of the present times. 12 Osnaburg, first built, as some say, by Julius Caesar; as others, by the Earls of Engern; but neither so ancient as the one, nor of late a standing as the others make it; here being an Episcopal See founded by Charles the Great, who gave it all the privileges of an University. Liberally endowed at the first erection of the same, and since so well improved, both in Power and Patrimony, that an alternate succession in it by the Dukes of Brunswick hath been concluded on in the Treaty of Munster, as a fit compensation for the Bishoprick of Halberstadt, (otherwise disposed of by that Treaty) of late enjoyed wholly by that Family. 13 Quakenburg, on the River Hase. 14 Warendorp; and 15 Wildhusen, Towns of that Bishoprick. 16 Paderborn, an Episcopal See also, founded by Charles the Great, at the first conversion of the Saxons; more ancient than strong, yet more strong than beautiful. 17 Ringelsstein; and 18 Osnaburg, belonging to the Bishop of Paderborn. 19 Minden, upon the Weser, another of the Episcopal Sees founded by Charles the Great, and by him liberally endowed with a goodly Patrimony: converted to Lay-uses since the Reformation, under colour of Administration of the Goods of the Bishoprick; and now by the conclusions at Munster, settled for ever on the Electors of Brandenburg, with the title of Prince of Minden. 20 Rintelin, a strong Town, conveniently seated on the Weser, not far from Minden; to the Bishop whereof it doth belong.

Hitherto one would think that Westphalen had formerly been a part of Saint Peters Patrimony, belonging wholly to the Clergy; but there are some Free Cities, and secular Princes, which have shares therein. As 1 Warburg, a neat Town, but seated on an uneven piece of ground, near the River Dimula; a Town which tradeth much in good Ale, brewed here, and sold in all parts of the Countrey: heretofore a County of it self under the Earls hereof, now governed in the nature of a Free Estate, and reckoned an Imperial City. 2 Brakel, accepted of as Imperial also. 3 Herforden, a Town of good strength and note governed by its own Laws and Magistrates, under the protection of Colen. 4 Lemgow, belonging heretofore to the Earls of Lippe; but by them so well privileged and enfranchised, that now it governeth it self as a Free Estate. Here is also 5 The Town and County of Ravensburg, belonging anciently to the Dukes of Cleve, and now in the rights of that House, to the Elector of Brandenburg: As also 6 the Town and County of Lippe, lying on the west side of the Weser; the Pedigree of the Earls whereof some fetch from that Sp. Manlius, who defended the Roman Capitol against the Gauls, (they might as well derive it from the Geese which preserved that Capitol;) others with greater modesty look no higher for it, than to the times of Charles the Great; one of the noble Families of the ancient Saxons. 7 Here also stands the Town and Castle of Aremberg, commanding over a large and goodly Patrimony thereto adjoining; which being much increased by the accession of Sedan in the neighbouring Belgium, was by the Heir general of this house conveyed in marriage to Engelbert, the 9th Earl of Mark, whose second Son called Eberhard (but the only one he had by this vent) succeeded in his Mothers Estates and honours; which were kept undivided, till Eberhard the 6th Lord thereof of the House of Mark, contenting himself with the titles and Estates of Aremberg, left Sedan and the pieces which belonged unto it, to his younger Brother Robert. The Great Grandchild of this Eberhard, called also Robert, created the first Earl of Aremberg, left his Estates and Titles to his Sister Margaret, married to John Lord of Brabant, a person of great note and power in the Belgique Provinces, and faithful to the last in the cause and quarrel of King Philip the 2d, in which finally he lost his life, Anno 1568, leaving both his Estates and title unto Charles his Son, frequently mentioned by the name of Charles Earl of Aremberg in the Stories of the Belgique Wars, in which he was no less considerable for his eminent valour, than for his singular fidelity to his Lord and Master. Some other Lords and Earls here are, but these most considerable: all of them Homagers of the Empire, but their acknowledgments hereof little more than titular; though since in danger of performing more real services; the Emperor Ferdinand the 2d, after the surprize of Holstein, and some part of Denmark, Anno 1627, gaining so far upon this Countrey, that had not the King of Sweden come in so seasonably, he had made himself absolute master of it; and by the opportunity of the situation of it on the back of the Netherlands, forced the United States to some great extremities. As for the title of Duke of Westphalen and Engern, it hath been long used (as before was said) by the Bishops of Colen: as also (but with better right, as to that of Westphalen) by the house of Lawenburg, descended from the ancient Electoral Family; writing themselves in that regard Dukes of Saxony, Westphalen, and Angriwaria or Engern.

2. The Bishoprick of BREME lyeth on the other side of the Weser, extending as far as to the Elb, and the German Ocean. So called of 1 Breme the principal City, seated on the Weser, there broad and navigable; the City by that means well traded, populous, and rich; beautified with fair and even even streets, and very strongly fortified, against all invasions, both by Art and Nature; the Town being so feared amongst Fens, occasioned by the overflowings of the River, that it may be easily drowned on all sides, to keep off an enemy. Adorned also with a spacious Market-place, a fair Counsel-house, and a large Cathedral, the See of the Arch-bishop; who is the temporal Lord of the Town and Territory. Other Towns of special note are 2 Osnaburg, not far from Breme, from whence great quantity of Linnen is brought yearly to England, and other places. 3 Arnheim, on the Weser also. 4 Osnaburg, on the River Bolla, not far from the fall thereof into the Ocean. 5 Buxterrade, on the Elb, not far from Hamburg, but on the hither side of the water. 6 Stade, Stadt, or Stadium, seated on the River Zuinghe, near the fall thereof into the Elb; accomplished the ancientest Town in all Saxony, and one of the first which was enrolled amongst the Hanse; and by special privilege had the pre-emption of all the Rhenish wine that passed by them, and the right also of coining money. But being over-topped by the power and trade of Hamburg, (5 Dutch miles from it) it grew at length so poor, and in such decay, that their yearly Revenues came but to 90 l. per annum, so that they were fain to sell their privileges to the Town of Hamburg, and put themselves under the protection of the Bishops of Breme. Revived again upon the coming thither of the English Merchants, who finding some hard measure from the Hamburgers, fixed their Staple here: by means whereof the Citizens in short time grew exceeding wealthy; the buildings fair and beautiful, the Town strongly fortified. Situate in a place so easily overwhelmed with water, that the people in ostentation of their strength and security, used to have Ordinance of Stone planted over their Gates. But the late German wars have made them sensible of their folly: when notwithstanding their new works, and an English Garrison under Sir Charles Morgan, they were compelled to submit themselves to the Earl of Tilly, Anno 1627, recovered after by the Swedes in the course of their victories.

As for the Bishoprick of Bremen it was first founded by Charles the Great, in the person of Willibode an English Saxon, one of the first Preachers of the Gospel in these parts of this Countrey. The Town before that time a poor Village only, being made an Archiepiscopal See, and the Metropolitan of all the Churches of the North, quickly grew up into esteem, as the Bishop did in power and patrimony, till they became Lords of this tract. Governed since the Reformation of Religion, by Lay-Bishops, or Administrators of the Rents of the Bishoprick; which under that title they inverted to their proper use. And now of late, by the Conclusions made at Munster, settled as an Inheritance on the Crown of Sweden, to be enjoyed, together with the Bishoprick of Verden, by the Kings thereof; with the title of Dukes of Breme, and Verden: the ancient liberties of those Cities, formerly granted by their Bishops, being still preserved.

EAST-FRISELAND.

EAST-FRISELAND is bounded on the East, with the River Weser, by which parted from Westphalen; on the West, with the River Ems, which parteth it from Groyningen, and the rest of West-Friesland; on the North, with the German Ocean; and on the South, with the Earldom of Mark, a part of Cleveland. So called from the Frisii, who casting out the old Inhabitants, possessed themselves of it, and called it by their own name, Friseland: divided by the Ems or Amisus, into the Western; spoken of amongst the Netherlands; and the Eastern or East-Friseland, in which now we are.

The nature of the soil we shall see anon, when we come to the subdivisions of it. Chief Rivers, besides those of Ems, and 2 Weser, spoken of elsewhere, 3 Jada, which falleth into a great Bay or Arm of the Ocean, called from hence Die Jadic. 4 Dalliari, on which standeth the City of Emden. 5 Delm, and 6 Honta, neighboured by Delmenhorst, and Oldenborch, Towns of this Countrey. The whole divided into 1 the County of Emden, or East-Friseland properly so called; and 2 the Earldom of Oldenburg.

1 EAST-FRISELAND specially so called, hath on the West, the River Ems; on the North, the Ocean; on the East, and South, the Earldom of Oldenborg: called also the County of EMDEN, from the fair Town of Emden, the chief City of it. The soil hereof is very fruitful both in Corn and Pasturage; sending great store of Oxen, Horses, Wooll, Swine, Butter, Cheese, and all sorts of Grain, into other Countreys; all of them excellent in their kind, nor easily to be bettered (if equalled) in any place whatsoever. Chief Towns herein are 1 Emden, so called from the Ems, on which it is situate; Dolkart a small River falling here into it: a noted and well-traded Town, beautified with a Haven so deep and large, that the greatest Ships with full sail are admitted into it. The people rich, affirmed to have 60 Ships of 100 tons apiece, and 600 lesser Barks of their own; besides 700 Busses and Fisher-boats, maintained for the most part, by their Herring fishing on the Coasts of England. The buildings generally fair, both private and publick, especially the Church, the Town-Hall, and Earls Palace. This last a strong and stately Castle, situate at the mouth of the Haven, and on all sides compassed by the Sea, and yet not strong enough to preserve the Townsmen in their due obedience: who in the year 1595, taking advantage on the absence of their Earl, keep him out of their Town, because he seemed not to approve the Calvinian humor; and have since governed in the nature of a Commonwealth, confederate with the States of the United Provinces, for their better establishment and support. So easily is Religion made a mask to disguise Rebellion. 2 Aurick, by some called Anseling, seated in the Inlands, rich, and well walled, of great resort by reason of the pleasure of hunting, afforded very liberally in the Forrests and Woods adjoining; drawing hither the Nobility and Gentry in great abundance. 3 Efen, on the Sea-shore, which gives the title of an Earl to the Lord thereof; as doth also also 4 Jevero, situate on the West of the River Ida, but both Earls subject to the Earl of East-Friseland. 5 Uredeborg (that is to say, the Free Village) is called from some Immunities granted by the Earls; possessed a while by those of Branswick, who fenced and garrisoned it for themselves, but in the end recovered by Ezard the 2d Earl. 6 Broick, the seat and proper Government of the Ancestors of these Earls; from whence the parts adjoining are called Broickmurland. 7 Norden, another Præfecture or Captain-ship of the said Ancestors. 8 Dumort, a strong Castle and retiring place of the Earls. 9 Linghen, upon the Emis, a strong Town well fortified and as well garrisoned; belonging to the King of Spain; as Vicar to the Empire over all Friseland; even to Diltmerf and the Confines of Danemark. A dignity procured by Maximilian, Grandfather to Charles the 5th of the Emperour Frederick the 3d; in right whereof, the King of Spain, as Heir of the House of Burgundy, hath some preheminance over Emden, of little use to him since the falling off of the Belgick Provinces. More Towns of note I find not in it, but of Castles, stately dwelling houses, and well-built Villages, an incredible number; standing so thick, that in many places they joyn together: some of them being withall so large, so well peopled, and of Streets so spacious, that they may compare with many Cities in Germany; of all which the most City-like is named Leere.

The ancient Inhabitants hereof were the Chauci Minores, described by Pliny to be so barbarous a people, and so destitute of all necessary Provision for the life of man; that they had no drink but rain water, preserved in great Troughs before the doors of their Cottages. These outed or subdued by the Frisons, a neighbouring people, possessing North-Holland, the District of Utrecht, with the Countreys of Grœnyng and West-Friseland: who having once passed over the Emis, extended their Dominions as far as Danemark. Governed by Kings, but intermingled with, and overpowered by, the Saxons, till the time of Charles the Great, by whom the last King Roboald overcome in fight was persuaded to receive the Sacrament of holy Baptism. But being told that his Friends and Kinsfolks were in Hell, because no Christians: Neither will I (saith he) be of that Profession, for I love to be amongst my Kindred. After this, Friseland was a member of the French Kingdom, till the erecting of the Earldom of Holland by Charles the Bald, Anno 893. at which time all Friseland on the West side of the Emis, was conferred upon him: possessed, but not without much war and bloodshed, by his Successors; the Frisons ever and anon rebelling against them, and killing divers of them in the open field. Those parts of it on the other side of the Emis, remained unto the German Empire; governed by Deputies, Lieutenants, and Provincial Earls, accountable to the Emperors for the Administration, till the year 1453. in which Ulrick Governour hereof for the Emperour Frederick, having got the Town of Emden out of the hands of the Hamburgers, was made Earl of East-Friseland; transmitting the Estate and title unto his Posterity.

EARLS of EAST-FRISELAND.

- 1453 1 Ulrick, Son of Enno, the Son of Ezardus, Captains or Governours for the Empire in Brück and Norden, made the first Earl of East-Friseland by the Emperour Frederick.
 1466 2 Ezard, the Son of Ulrick, who got Uredeborg from the Citizens of Branswick.
 1528 3 Enno, the Son of Ezard, who regained Greetzil, formerly usurped by the Dukes of Gueldres.
 1540 4 Ezard II. Son of Enno, who married Katherine daughter to Gustavus the first of Sweden.
 5 Enno II. Son of Ezard the 2d, and the Lady Katherine.
 1586 6 Rodolphus Christianus, Son of Enno the 2d, who being well affected to the Lutheran Forms, (first introduced in the time of Enno the first) was by a Calvinian party grown up in Emden, dispossessed of that City, Anno 1595.
 1608 7 Enno Ludovicus, Son of Rodolphus Christianus, succeeded in this Earldom on the death of his Father, and is still living for ought I can hear unto the contrary.

The Arms of the Earls of East-Friseland, are Argent, four Bendlets Azure, charged with ten Hearts Or, 4. 3. 2. 1.

2. The Earldom of OLDENBURG, containeth that part of this Countrey which lyeth on the West side of the Weser, betwixt the Bishoprick of Münster and East-Friseland specially so called, and so extending Northwards to the German Ocean. So called from Oldenburg the chief City of it, and the head of this Earldom.

The Soil hereof exceeding rich, but in Pastures specially, which breed them infinite Herds of Cattel: and furnish not this Countrey only, but some of their German neighbours, and many of the more Northern Nations with Horses, Beeves, Sheep, Swine, Butter, Cheese. Here is also good store of Pulse, Barley, and Oats; plenty of Fruits, and trees of all sorts. Large Woods, and those well stored with Kenison, which yield unto the Gentry the delights of hunting. But the air cold and foggy in some exrentry; especially in Winter, and nigh the Sea.

Chief Towns hereof are, 1 Oldenborch, on the River Honta, repaired, if not built, by Otho the Great, who founded the Church of S. John Baptist. A Town of no great state or beauty, the houses generally of Clay, but the Castle (the dwelling place of the Earls) of well-hewn stones; of an Orbicular Form with deep ditches of water, the Town and Castle both being strongly fortified. 2 Delmenhorst, on the River Delm, a strong place and of great importance, built in the year 1247. by Otho brother of Earl Christian the 2d, and having been 65 years in possession of the Bishops of Münster, was suddenly surprised on Palm-Sunday morning, by Anthony Earl of Oldenburg, Anno 1547. continuing ever since part of this Estate. 3 Beckhusen, on a River, which falleth not far off, into the great Bay or Arm of the Sea, which is called Die Jade. 4 Equarten. 5 Ovelgard, both seated on a long Languet or Dumy Island, bebetwixt the said Die Jade, and the River Weser, called Baltada: both taken, and the last well fortified by John Earl of Oldenborch, Anno 1520. belonging formerly to the Prefecture of East-Friseland, but never brought under the command of the Earls thereof. 6 Westerberg, the chief Town, of a spacious Territory. 7 Wietade, a strong piece, on the River Jade, built by Earl Christian, one of the younger branches of the House of Oldenburg, about the year 1400. 8 Mellum, 9 Ladelle, places of principal importance; the one on the River Jade, the other near the Ocean. Here is also within this Earldom the Province of Amerlander, supposed by some to have been the seat of the Ambroses; who accompanied the Cimbri and Tentones in their expedition towards the Roman Provinces; and were slain by Marins.

As for the Earls of Oldenburg, they derive themselves from Walpert, one of the Nephews of Witkind, the last King and first Duke of the Saxons: who having about the year 850. built a strong Castle on the borders of Bremen, in the honour of his wife Alteberg, (whom he dearly loved) called it Alteburgum, so called by the Latinists to this day, by the Germans Oldenborch. But his male issue failing in Frederick the 7th Earl, it came to one Elimar, the Son of Hajo, a Noble man of the Frisian blood; who had married Richsa, the Daughter of John, the first Earl of this Family. From him in a direct line descended Christian or Christiern, eldest Son of Theodorick; who being fortunately advanced to the Crown of Danemark, Anno 1448. left his Estate in this Earldom (but reserving the title, according to the fashion of Germany) to his Brother Gerrard, the better to take him off from his pretensions to the Dukedom of Sleswick, and the Earldom of Holf; in which he did pretend a share. The Patrimony of it much improved, by the additions of the Countreys of Rustingen, Oyffingen, and Wangerland, all lying on the German Sea; bequeathed by the last Will and Testament of the Lady Mary, Countess of Jever in East-Friseland, to John Earl of Oldenburg, the third from Gerrard. The succession of these Earls, in regard the Royal line of Danemark, and by consequence of Great Britain, is descended from them, I have here subjoined, in this ensuing Catalogue of

The EARLS of OLDENBURG.

- 850 1 Walpert, of the race of Witkind the first Earl of Oldenburg.
 856 2 Theodorick, the Son of Walpert.
 3 Theodorick II. the Son of Theodorick the first.
 4 Otho, Son of Theodorick the 2d.
 5 John, the Son of Otho, accompanied the Emperour Henry the 2d, in his wars against the Greeks, and Saracens, Anno 1007.
 6 Huno, surnamed the Glorious, Son of John.
 7 Frederick, Son of Huno, fortunate in his Wars against the Frisians; the last of the male line of this House.
 8 Elimarus, the Son of Hajo, a Noble man of the Frisian blood, and of Richsa his wife, the daughter of John the fifth Earl.
 1120 9 Elimarus II. Son to Elimar the first.
 10 Christianus, Son of Elimar the 2d, surnamed the Courageous, or the Warlike, a professed enemy of Henry the Lion Duke of Saxony; from whom he took the City of Breme.
 11 Maurice, the Son of Christian, an associate of Arnulph Earl of Holfstein, in his wars with Danemark.
 12 Christian II. Son of Maurice.
 13 John II. Son of Christian the 2d.
 14 John III. Son of John the 2d.
 15 Conrade, the Son of John the third.
 16 Christian III. Son of Conrade, a Student in Coleu, where initiated into holy Orders, which he relinquished much against the will of his Brother Maurice, on the death of his Father.
 17 Theodorick, Son of Christian the 3d, the first Earl of Delmenhorst of this line; which fell to him at the death of Nicholas Archbishop of Breme, descended from a younger Son of John the second.
 1440 18 Christian IV. Son of Theodorick, and of Hedwigis Sister and heir of Gerrard and Adolphus Dukes of Sleswick and Earls of Holfstein; elected on the commendation of his Uncle Adolphus, to the Crown of Danemark, Anno 1448.
 1448 19 Gerrard, the Brother of Christian the 4th; a Prince of an unquiet spirit, alwayes in wars, and alwayes worried; he lost the Town of Delmenhorst to the Bishop of Münster.
 1500 20 John IV. Son of Gerrard, repaired the ruins of his Estate, and settled the distractions of it in the time of his Father, being then in exile; and after very much enlarged it by the reduction of Baltada.
 1526 21 Anthony, the son of John the 4th, by a sudden surprise recovered Delmenhorst from the Bishop of Münster, Anno 1547. which he strongly fortified.
 1573 22 John V. Son of Anthony, enlarged this Earldom with the Provinces of Rustingen, Oyffingen, and Wangerland; bequeathed to him by the last Will of the Countess of Jever in East-Friseland.
 23 Anthony II. Brother of John the 5th, in whose life-time he was Earl of Delmenhorst, and after his death of Oldenburg also: still living, Anno 1648. for ought I can learn unto the contrary.

And

And thus we see the present estate of Germany, distracted and divided amongst many Princes, Princes, Princes, and Incorporate Towns, the chief of which are herein mentioned and described. But besides these there are many others of less note, and smaller Territories, which yet are absolute and free: inasmuch, that in one dayes-riding, a Traveller may twice or thrice meet with divers Laws, and divers Coins; every free Prince and free City (whose laws the Emperours are sworn to keep inviolable) having power to make what Laws, and Coin what Money they will. And hence in the confuſure of Kingdoms, the King of Spain is said to be Rex hominum, because of his Subjects reasonable obedience; the King of France, Rex Animarum, because of their infinite Taxes and Impositions; the King of England, Rex Diabolorum, because of his Subjects often insurrection against, and depolition of their Princes: but the Emperour of Germany, is called Rex Regum, because there is such a number of Reguli, or Free Princes which live under his command; or rather at their own command, (for they do even what they list) as the Emperour Maximilian the first, well noted.

And to say truth, the publick Government hereof is nothing less than Monarchical: the Emperour being accompanied amongst the Princes, but as the chief Officer of the Empire; not reckoned of by Bodin, and others of our great Statists and Civilians, as an absolute Monarch; such as the Kings of England, France, and Spain, are confessed to be. For the Priviledges of the Free Cities being made perpetual, the great Estates hereditary, and the Empire Eligible; the Emperours were brought at last to such low condition, as to be made accountable to the States of the Empire: who if they be persuaded in their Conſciences, or but think they be so, that he is likely by his mal-administration to destroy the Empire, or that he will not hearken unto good advice, ab electorum Collegio Cæsarea maiestatis privati potest (as my Author hath it) he may be deprived by the Electors, and a more fit and able man chosen into the place: and that too, as the Emperour Judocus Barbatus hath declared in one of his Constitutions, Anno 1410, ſine infidelitatis vel Rebellionis crimine, without incurring the crimes of treason or disloyalty. So that the supreme power and majesty of the Empire, seems to reside especially and contractedly in the Electoral Colledge; diffuſedly, in the Imperial Diets; by way of execution in the Chamber of Spires, and other the Supreme Courts of the several Circles. But that which makes that body which they call the Empire, is the Assembly of the Prelates, Princes and Commissioners of the Free Cities, in their Diets or Parliaments; the Emperour presiding in them: whom he that saw adorned in his Royal Robes, with the Imperial Crown and Scepter, with the titles of Cæsar and Augustus given at every word, would think that the whole action did take life from him: whereas indeed, he hath not so much privilege as a negative voice, but is to put in execution such Decrees and Sanctions, as these Estates assembled have thought fit to make; nor able to do any act by his own authority, which may speak him Emperour. But on the other side, the Princes take power unto themselves, of making Laws for, and imposing Taxes on their Subjects: of railing war upon one another, or against a third, and doing many other acts of supreme authority, which in the Emperour would be counted matters of mal-administration. Such points as these, together with the appointing of Judges and the like chief Magistrates, (as they relate unto the Empire) are not to be concluded off, but in the general Diet; which may be summoned by or without the Emperour, as occasion serveth. And to this weakening of the Majesty and Power Imperial, the neighbouring Princes have afforded their best assistance: jealous of their own interests and decrease of power, if that vast body so well limbed should be strongly jointed; and all the several members of it united under the command of one supreme head. Clear proof whereof we have in those solemn Leagues, and Confederations, made in their several times against Charles the fifth, and the late Emperour Ferdinand the 2d, as soon as they began to be in some possibility of setting the Imperial Majesty in its proper Splendour, and bringing down the Princes of it to a lower pitch.

As for the means by which the Empire is attained, it is, and hath of long time been by the way of Election, as before was noted. The business first projected in the Court of Rome, by Gregory the first, then Pope, who being a Native of this Countrey, thought it the most expedient course to continue the Imperial Title among those of his Nation. But whatsoever was pretended, the design of it chiefly was to make the Emperours less powerfull, and distract the Germans (whom they feared) into parts and factions: that so the Popes might have the better opportunity to grow great in Italy. And that the Emperour might be such as the Pope should like of, the matter was so ordered, that the one half of the Electors should be always of the Ecclesiasticks, who being obnoxious to the Popes, and for the most part driving on their interests, were very like to serve him on all occasions. The Electors only fix in number, that is to say, 1 The Archbishop of Mentz, Chancellor of the Empire; 2 The Archbishop of Colen, Chancellor of Italy; 3 The Archbishop of Trier, Chancellor of France; 4 The Count Palatine of the Rhene, Arch-Sewer; 5 The Duke of Saxony, Lord Marshal; and 6 The Marquess of Brandenburgh, Lord Chamberlain. Upon equality of voices the Duke of Bohemia (now King) was to come in for a Seventh; who by Office is to be chief Cup-bearer in all great Solemnities. For upon dayes of great Solemnities, as Elections, Inaugurations, the first dayes of the Imperial Diets, and the like to these, these Offices are performed only: and then performed in this manner following, either in person, or by Proxy. Before the Palace Gate stands an heap of Oats, so high that it reacheth to the breast of the Horse on which the Duke of Saxony rideth; having in his hand a Silver wand and a Silver measure, both which together are to weigh 200 Marks. The Duke still sitting on his Horse, filleth up the measure with Oats, then sticks his wand in the remainder of the heap, delivereth the measure of Oats unto some of his Servants who stand nearest unto him; and so attends the Emperour into the Court. The Emperour being entred and fare down at the Table, the three spiritual Electors standing orderly together, lay the Grace before him. Then cometh the Marquess of Brandenbourg on horse-back also, with a Basin of water in his hand (the Basin being of the weight of 12 Marks of silver) and a fine clean Towel on his arm: which, alighting from his horse, he holds to the Emperour till he wash. Next comes the Palatine of the Rhene, mounted on his horse, with four silver platters full of meat, every one of the weight of three marks of silver; which, descending from his horse, after due reverence made, he carrieth and placeth on the Table. And finally the Duke (or King) of Bohemia, entering the great Hall on Horseback, as the others did, with a Napkin on his Arm, and a covered Cup in his hand of the weight of 12 Marks in silver, alighteth from his horse, and presenteth the Cup unto the Emperour. But we must know, that of late times these offices are seldom or never performed by the Electors in their own persons. It is enough if they send their Ambassadors, or substitute some one or other of the Emperours Court to do it for them.

The Election is usually celebrated at Frankford on the Main, to which place the Electors or their Deputies are to make repair, upon the day appointed by the Archbishop of Mentz; (whose office it is (as being Chancellor of the Empire) to issue out the Summons for this Assembly. In their passage unto Frankford, they are to be sufficiently guarded by every Prince, throw whose Territories or Dominions they are to travel; their Attendants not to exceed the number of 200 horse, of which 50 only to be armed. When they are met they go into St. Bartholomews Church (the most capacious of that City) where after the high Mass is said, the three spiritual Electors laying their hands upon their breasts, and the Temporal Princes on the Book, make oath to choose a fit temporal Head for the People of Christendom. Upon equality of voices, as it sometimes happeneth, the Bohemian hath the casting voice, and concludes the business; if in the space of 30 days they have not agreed upon a man, then must they have no other allowance, but of bread and water, nor be suffered to go out of the City; till that necessity compelleth them unto some agreement: which being at the last resolved on, and declared accordingly, the Prince so elected is presently saluted by the Title of King of the Romans; the Title of Emperour not properly to be given unto him, until he have received the Imperial Crown at the hands of the Pope; though since the time of Charles the fifth, without any such trouble to themselves, or the Popes of Rome, the Title of both Emperour and Imperial Majesty is usually conferred upon them from their first Election. The election being finished and signified to the party chosen, the Inauguration was held antiently at 3 several places; viz. 1 At Aquisgrane, or Aken, in the Land of Gullick, where he received the silver Crown for the Kingdom of Germany. 2ly. At Milain, by the Archbishop whereof he was crowned with the Iron Crown for Lombardy, or the Realm of Italy. 3ly. At Rome, where, at the hands of the Pope himself, he was crowned with a Golden Crown for the Roman Empire. But since, those journeys unto Rome and Milain have been long laid by; the Emperours holding their Elections to be strong enough to make good their title to that dignity, being merely titular, and their inauguration at Aken, to be as effectual, as if they had also visited the two other Cities. The form of which Elections, the Priviledges of the Electors and other fundamental Constitutions of the German Empire, we find summed up together in the Golden Bull of Charles the 4th, by whom first promulgated, Anno 1359. But we must know that since the publishing of that Bull, the business of election hath received some change as to the number and the persons of the Parties interested. For first it pleased the Emperour Ferdinand the 2d, on the Proscription of Frederick, the first Electeur Palatine, to transfer the Electoral dignity, with the office of Arch-Bishop, or Arch-Sewer, from that house to the Duke of Bavaria, the Title of Electeur of Bavaria; with all the powers and priviledges which belonged unto it, to be infeofed upon him and his heirs for ever. Which action of the Emperour being protested against by some of the Electors, in favour of the Palatine Family, and in due care unto themselves; in not admitting such a dangerous precedent for the time to come; it was at last concluded and agreed on by the Pacification made at Munster, Anno 1648, that the Duke of Bavaria and his heirs enjoying the said Electoral dignity, with the Upper Palatinate, according to the translation of it from the Palatine family spoken of before; an eighth Electorate should be added to the former number, to be enjoyed together with the Lower Palatinate, by Charles Ludovick, the now Prince Electeur Palatine, and his heirs, who also on the failure of the Line of Bavaria, are to be repossessed of their ancient rights, the title of Arch-Treasurer, being given unto them at the present instead of that of Arch-Bishop, or Arch-Sewer, which they had before.

Now as a step unto the Empire, and for the better assurance of the Imperial Dignity, to the Austrian Family, it was cunningly projected by Charles the fifth (having received the Imperial Crown from Pope Clement the 7th.) that his Brother Ferdinand should be chosen King of the Romans, whilst himself was living, and by that means be the more certain of the Empire after his decease. Which policy being followed by all his Successors, the title of Rex Romanorum, or King of the Romans, is grown to be the Title of the Heir apparent, or designed Successor, in the present Empire of the Germans; as that of Cæsar was from the time of Adrian, in the Empire of the antient Romans. In so much as Rex Romanorum is now defined to be one, who is already so far estated in the Empire, than on the death, deprivation, or resignation of the present Emperour, he is immediately to succeed. And so accordingly it hath happened since this act of Charles. Who thought he laboured under-hand to leave the Empire unto Philip his son and heir, whom he found capable enough of so high an honour: yet he could not do it; it being thought by many understanding men, that on notice of this under-hand practice, his brother Ferdinand, who had the like mind to transmit the Empire to his own Posterity, did secretly lend Duke Maurice his helping hand to drive him out of Germany, as in brief he did. As for the reasons, or to say better, the pretences, upon which Charles did institute this Rex Romanorum, (for questionless the true reason of it was to perpetuate the Empire in the Austrian Family) they were these that follow. 1 Because that having the command of many Nations, he could not always personally Cimbrick Chersonese. querours of England. 4 Waldemare the 3d. a right valiant Prince; but unsuccessful in his wars against the Hanse-Towns, then newly entered into league. 5 Christiern the 2d. a great Commander in the wars; but of greater cruelty. 6 Christiern the 4th. little inferior unto many of his Predecessors: to whom we subjoyn (though of different sex) On. Margaret, the Semiramis of these Northern Countries; a Lady of a Masculine Spirit, and not more fortunate than daring in all enterprises, as she declared in the conquest of Sweathland, and subjection of Norway, by her united to this Crown.

The Christian faith was first preached to those of Holstein (the next neighbouring Countrey unto Germany) by S. Angarius, Bishop of Bremen, the general Apostle of those Northern parts, in the year 826. Lewis the Godly then being Emperour of the West. In whose time Harald King of Denmark being expelled his Kingdoms by the sons of Godfrey or Gottricus, was baptized at Meuz with a great number of that people which attended on him, by the hands of Elbo Archbishop of Rhemes, employed by the Emperour in that service: the conversion of the whole Nation following not long after, by the power and diligence of the Emperour Otho the first, assigned by the Ministry of one Poppo the first Bishop of Arhusen; Sueno, or Swain, then reigning amongst the Danes. The Norwegians came not in till after, converted in the reign of Olaus the third, Anno 1055, or thereabouts: the English assisting in the work, and the good King so zealous in it, that he was canonized a Saint, after his decease. Relapsing for the most part to their ancient Gentilism, they were finally regained unto Christianity, by the means of Pope Adrian the fourth, an English Man, about the year 1156, before his assuming of the Popedom, called Nicolaus Breakspear. But by whomsoever first converted, the Popes of Rome would needs pretend some power and jurisdiction over them. Which when they began to exercise with too much authority, Waldemar the third, is said to have returned this answer, Naturam habemus à Deo, Regnum à Subditis, Divitias à Parentibus, Religionem à Romana Ecclesia, quam si nobis invades renunciamus per presentes; that is to say, We hold our life from God, our Crown from our Subjects, our Riches from our Ancestors, our Religion from the Church of Rome; which if you envy us, we do here remit it by these presents. But this renunciation though then threatened, was not made till afterwards: when the whole mass of Papery was abolished by King Frederick, the first, using therein the Ministry of Bugenhege, a Divine of Pomerania; by whom reformed according to the doctrine of the Lutheran Churches.

As for the Government of the Church since that Reformation, it continueth as before it was, by Archbishops and Bishops, in number as before; but much abridged of their Revenues, and a great part of their power. For Frederick, though he found it necessary to remove the old Bishops, (not one of which would be perwaded to the change of Religion) yet he substituted others in their places, allowing them a convenient maintenance, with a power of Presidence in all Church Assemblies, where they are to take the advice of other Presbyters along with them; and out of such Assemblies, to receive complaints, to provide remedie against scandals, and to order all matters, as peculiar Inspectors, which concern the Church. So that in all the Kings Dominions there are two Archbishops, and thirteen Bishops: that is to say, the Archbishop of London, the Bishops of Roschild, Olenfse, Ripen, Wiborch, Arhusen, Sleswick, and Hadersleve, for the Kingdom of Denmark; the Archbishop of Nidrosia, the Bishops of Bergen, Anslo, Streffanger, and Hammar, for the Realm of Norway; and the Bishops of Halar, and Schalbels, for the Isle of Island: the Churches of Holstein, (formerly under the Bishops of Hamburg and Lubeck) being governed by Super-intendents, as the rest of the Lutherans.

The whole body of the estate (as appears by this) consisteth chiefly of three members; viz. 1 the Dukedom of Holstein, containing Wagerland, Ditmarsh, Stormarsh, and Holstein, specially so called; 2 the Kingdom of Denmark, comprehending both Futlands, part of Scandia, and the Hemodes, or Baltick Islands; and 3 the Kingdom of Norway, consisting of Norway it self, and the Islands of the Northern Ocean. Which parts we shall survey in order, as before laid down, premising first a word or two of the Cimbrick Chersonese, in which the Dukedom of Holstein, and the two Futlands are contained.

The CIMBRICK CHERSONESE.

THE CIMBRICK CHERSONESE, hath on the East, the Baltick Sea; on the West, the main German Ocean; on the North, a part of the Ocean bending into the narrow Strait or Fretum, which they call the Sundt; on the South-west, the great River of Albis; on the South-East, the small River of Trave; betwixt which is the Neck or Isthmus, which unites it to Germany. I know that some contract it into narrower bounds, and limit it upon the South, with the River Eydore: but I have drawn it down to the Elbe & the Trave, which give it more resemblance to a Chersonese or Demy Island, than the other doth dissenting in this point from the common opinion. It had the name of Chersonesus, ἀπὸ τῆς χερσὸς ὅτιον αὐτῆς ἐστὶν ἡ γῆ καὶ ἡ νῆσος, it being the same with a Peninsula in the Latin; of which name there are 5 most famous, that is to say, first, Peloponnesus in Greece, which is now called Morea. 2 Iberacia Chersonesus in Thracia, near the Sea Propontis. 3 Tanrica Chersonesus in the Euxine Sea, now a part of Tartaria. 4 Anarea Chersonesus in India, which we now call Malaca (of all which we shall speak in their proper places) and 5 Cimbrica Chersonesus, where now we are. This last so called from the Cimbric, the first Inhabitants hereof, originally descended from Gomer, the son of Japhet; thence called Gomerii, and Cimmerii, by contraction Cimbric. Leaving the Plains of Phrygia, as too narrow for them, they sought out new dwellings, and are said to have first dwelt in the banks of Palus Maeotis; where they gave name to Bosphorus Cimmerius, there being. Being overcome by the Scythians, they removed their seats more Northward, into a Countrey bound-bounded, according to Plutarch, by the great Ocean, on the one side; and the forest of Hercynia, on the other; within which bounds is the Peninsula or Countrey where we now are. They were a people of extraordinary big stature, having blew and red eyes, and lived most upon theft; so that for their sakes, Kluppes ἡννοῦντο τὰς ἡμετέρας τοὺς ἀνδρᾶς, the Germans called all thieves Cimbers. It hapned that the Ocean overflowing a great part of their Countrey, compelled them to seek new seats: whereupon in great multitudes abandoning their dwellings, they petitioned the Romans, then lordling over a great part of the World, for some place to settle in. This request being denyed, they proceeded in another manner, winning with their swords, what their Petitions could not obtain. Manlius, Silvanus, and Cepio, all Roman Consuls, perished by them; so that now (saith Florus) Altum esset de Imperio Romano, nisi illi sculo Marius contigisset: for he, as we have elsewhere told you, utterly overthrew them. The next Inhabitants hereof were the Saxons, Jutes, and Angles; upon whose removal into Britain, the greatest part of it was peopled by the Danes, who still possess it.

It containeth in length about 100 Italian miles, and 80 of the same miles in breadth; and comprehendeth in that tract or extent of ground, 30 walled Towns, 6 Episcopal Sees, (besides those of Hamburg, and Lubeck, which are under the Archbishop of Bremen) and 20 Royal Castles and Palaces, as well for the reception of the Nobles and great men of the Countrey, as the private retirements of the King. The soil naturally more fit for paiturage than tillage; feeding such multitudes of Oxen, that from hence no fewer than 50000 are sent yearly to Germany. Divided at the present into the Duke of Holstein, and the Province of Futland.

1. HOLSTEIN.

THE Dukedom of HOLSTEIN, taketh up the Southern part of the Cimbrick Chersonese, where it joins to Germany, extending as far North, as the River Eydore, which divides it from Futland. So called from the Dutch word Holt, which signifies a Wood, or Forest, according to the nature of it; the Countrey being low, marshy and full of Woods, as it continueth to this day. It contains in it these four Provinces, 1 Wagerland, 2 Stormarsh, 3 Ditmarsh, and 4 Holt, or Holstein specially so called.

1 WAGERLAND is that part of Holstein, which lies on the South East of this Chersonese, bounded on the East, with Mecklenbourg and the Baltick sea; on the West, with Holstein specially so called; on the North, with the Sea Baltick also; on the South, with some part of Mecklenbourg. So called from the Wagii, a Tribe or Nation of the Slaves, who possessed this tract; from whence the name of Wageria, in our Latine writers.

Chief Towns hereof are, 1 Lubeck, pleasantly seated on the confluence of the Trave and the Billow near the fall thereof into the Baltick, from which distant five Italian miles. The River capable of ships of a thousand Tun, which commonly they unlade at Tremisren, the Port Town to the City, seated upon the very brink of the Sea, where the united Rivers have their fall into it. It was first built by Adolph, the second Earl of Holstein, Anno 1143. but so well privileged by him and his next successors, that in short time it bid defiance to its founders, (the cause of many differences betwixt it and those Princes) and was made a Dukedom of it self. By Frederick the first it was united to the Empire, after whose death they chose themselves another Duke; who having governed them five years, was subdued by the Danes, and the City made subject to that Kingdom: remaining so, till delivered by the Emperour Frederick the second. By whom again once enfranchised, it became Imperial: afterwards listed amongst the Hanse towns, and the first in estimation of all the company; having above 600 ships of all sorts (some of a thousand Tun and upwards) which belong unto it. But being their Trade is for the most part on the Baltick Seas, which are generally free from Pirats, they are most of them built for burden, and are slow of sail, and little serviceable, if at all, for a fight at Sea. But to return unto the City, it is built upon all the sides of a rising hill, on the top whereof standeth the Church of Saint Mary, (once the Cathedral of the City, for it was Episcopal) whence is a descent to all the gates of the City, according to the Eye a most pleasing prospect. The buildings very beautiful, and all of brick, the streets streit and even; the Churches (ten in number) in good repair, adorned with excellent imagery, and much admired even by skillfull workmen: and unto every private house a pipe of water is conveyed from the publick Conduit; according to the pattern whereof, it hath been observed that the Conduits were first made in London, and other places. In a word, there is not any City of Germany, or the more Northern Countries, which can equalize it, either for the beauty and uniformity of the houses, the pleasant gardens, fair streets, delightful walks without the walls, or for the Citizens themselves, who are much commended for their civility to strangers, and strict execution of justice without partiality. The whole in compass about six miles, fortified with a double wall, deep ditches, and unfordable Rivers. 2 Segeberg, on the River Trave, four Dutch miles from Lubeck, and near the head of that River. 3 Oldeslo, on the same River, in the midst betwixt both. 4 Gronneburg, and 5 Newkirk on the Baltick shore: and 6 Stendorp, more within the land; near the edge of a Lak, out of which runs the River Suentin.

Southwest of Wagerland, lyeth STORMARSH, betwixt the Elb and two less Rivers called the Bellen and the Store: from which last, and the marshiness of the situation, or from that River and the Marsh, once the Inhabitants hereof, comes the name of Stormarsh. Places of most importance are 1 Crempe, on a little River so named, which falls not far off into the Store, and both together not much further into the Elb. A Town well fortified by Christian the fourth, and reckoned one of the Keys of the Kingdom; as well appears by the resistance which it made to the Duke of Futland, against whom whom it held out 13 moneths, and yeelded at the last upon good conditions, Anno 1628. 2 Tychenberg, (Tychapoli's my Author calls it) a Dutch mile from Crempe, but on the very bank of the River Elb, where it receives the Rhin, a small River, upon which it is feated : first built, and afterward well fortified by Christiern the fourth, of purpose to command the Elb, and put a stronger bridle in the mouths of the Hamburgers Anno 1603; now held to be the strongest piece of all his Dominions ; the only Town of all this Dukedom, which yeelded not to the prevailing Imperialists in their late wars against the Danes, Anno 1628. 3 Brendenberg, a strong town, belonging to the Banzovos, one of the best pieces of the Kingdom ; remarkable for the stout resistance which it made to Wallestein, (Duke of Friland) in the war aforesaid : who at last taking it by assault, put all the Souldiers to the sword. 4 Pippenberg, another strong place, and of very great consequence. 5 Jetzabo, on the River Store. 6 Gluckstade, upon a Creek or Bay of the German Ocean, repaired and fortified by the said Christiern the fourth (who much delighted in the place) to command the passage up the Elb. 7 Storö. 8 Hamburg, upon the Billen, where it falls into the Elb ; an antient City, built in the time of the Saxons, repaired by Charles the Great, and walled by the Emperour Harro the fourth. Accounted since that time an Imperial City, and made one of the Hanse, on the first incorporating of those Towns. Which notwithstanding, on a commanded one of the Hanse, about that time, betwixt the Earl of Holftein and the people hereof, it was adjudged to troverlie arising about that time, betwixt the Earl of Holftein and the people hereof, it was adjudged to belong to the Earls of Holftein ; and that determination ratified by Charles the fourth, Anno 1374. In pursuance whereof the Hamburgers took the Oath of Allegiance, to Christiern Earl of Oldenburg, the first King of Denmark of that house, as Earl of Holfst ; acknowledging him and his successors for their lawful Lords : though since they have endeavoured to shake off that yoke, presuming very much on their power at Sea, and the assistance which they are assured of upon all occasions from the rest of the Hansetowns. As for the Town it self, it is feated in a large plain, with fax and rich pastures round about it : well fortified by art and nature ; the Haven being shut up with a strong iron chain. The buildings for the most part of brick, but more beautifull than well contrived, and the streets somewhat of the narrowest. The publick structures very fair, especially the Counsel-house, adorned with the Statues of the Nine Worthies, carved with very great Art ; the Exchange, or meeting place for Merchants, and nine large Churches. The Citizens generally rich, matters of many as great ships as sail on the Ocean, some of them 1200 tun in burden ; which bring in great profit ; besides the great resort of Merchants, and their Factors, from most places else ; sometimes the Staple-town for the Cloth of England, removed on some dissentors to Stede, and from thence to Holland. It is observed, that there was in this town at one time 177 Brewers, and but 40 Bakers, nor more than one Lawyer and one Physician. The reason of which disproportion was, that a Cup of Nims was their only Physick ; their differences sooner ended over a Can, than by order of Law ; Bread being accounted but a binder, and so not to be used, but in case of necessity.

betwixt the Rivers Store and Eydore, coasting along the German Ocean, lies the Province of DITHMARSH, most properly called Tyitchmarsh, from the marshiness of the ground, and the Dutch Inhabitants; or from a mixture of those people with the Marsj, spoken of before. The people being naturally of the Saxon race, retain much of the stomach and animosity of the antient Saxons: never brought under the command of the Earls of Holfst (as Wagerland, and Storemarsh were) till Holfst himself was joyned to the Crown of Denmark. And though it was alienated from the Empire by Fredrick the third, and given in Fee to Christiern Earl of Oldenburg, the first King of that house, Anno 1474; yet would they not submit unto his authority: but held it out against him and some of his successors, whom in the year 1500 they vanquished in the open field; till broken, and made subject, by the valour and good fortune of King Frederick the second, Anno 1559. Chief places in it are 1 Meldorp upon the Ocean, the chief Town of the Province; the Inhabitants of which are so wealthy, that many of them cover their houses with copper. 2 Londen, opposite to a Peninsula or Demi-Island called Eldersfede, on the West side whereof it standeth. 3 Heinnekse, and 4 Tellinckse; of which nothing memorable.

morale. And as for HOLSTEIN it self, the fourth and last member of this Estate, though the first in power and reputation, it taketh up the Inland parts, betwixt Stormarsh and Fustland, save that it hath an outlet into the Baltick, on the Northwest of Wagerland. Chief places in the which are, 1 Kyel, (Chilonium in Latine) seated upon a navigable Arm of the Baltick Sea, parting Wagerland from the Dukedom of Sleswicke: a Town well traded, and having a capacious Haven, seldom without good store of shipping from Germany, Lifeland, Sweden, and the rest of Denmark. 2 Rendesberg, the best fortified place in all this Province. 3 Neimnuffer, on the Northwest of the Store, not far from the head of it. 4 Welfse, on a small River so called. 5 Bramfede, 6 Borkholms, not much observable, but for a Monastery in which Henry one of the Earls hereof (of a younger house) turned Monk and dyed Anno 1241.

Anno 1241. The ancient Inhabitants of this and the other three, were the Saxons, Sigalons, and Sabalingii, placed here by Protolmy; whom I conceive to be no other than some Tribes of the Cimlri, of whom this Cherlonefe took name. The two last passing into the name of the first, and in the declination of the Roman Empire marching over the Elb, and spreading all along the Coasts of the German Ocean, molested with their piracies and depredations, the shores of Britain. Known by that means unto the Britans, they were invited to assist them against the Scots and Picts, which action with the aid of the Fris and Angli, (Inhabitants together with them of the Cimbrick Cherlonefe) they performed so honestly, as to make themselves masters of the best part of the Island. Such as remained behind not being able to defend their own against the Slaves, were fain to quit the parts lying next to Mecklenburg: which being peopled by the Vagrii, took the name of Wagerland. But the Saxons being vanquished by

by Charles the Great, these on the North side of the Elb, became a part of the great Dukedom of Saxony; and so continued till dismembered by Lotharins both Duke and Emperour : who gave the proper Holt (or Holstein, especially so called) with the Province of Storckmarsh, to Adolph Earl of Schawmburg, who had deserved well of him in his wars, with the title of Earl of Holstein, Anno 1114. By Adolph the second, his successor, settled in this house, who having made a full conquest of it, caused it to be planted with Colonies of Dutch or Germans, from Holland, Westphalen, and Friesland ; by which means the name of Sclaves was at last worn out. By Gerrard the fifth, the Dukedom of Sleswick was also added ; conferred upon him by the bounty of Margaret Queen of Denmark , in whose wars he served. Adolph the last Earl of this house dying without issue, the whole Estate fell on Christiern, son of Theodorick, Earl of Oldenburg, and of Hedwigis his wife, sister and heir to Adolph before mentioned : who being called to the Crown of Denmark , compounded with his brother Gerrard for the sum of 50000 Marks : and having gotten Dismarsh also of the Emperour Frederick the third, prevailed so far, as to have the whole Estate erected into a Dukedom, Anno 1474. to be held by him and his successors of the sacred Empire. Which fact, we will next add the Catalogue of

The E A R L S and D U K E S of H O L S T E I N.

- 1114 1 Adolph of Schamburg, by Lotharius, Emperour, and Duke of Saxony, made the first Earl of Holstein.
1137 2 Adolph II. son of Adolph the first.
1164 3 Adolph III. son of Adolph the second, vanquished by Canutus, King of the Danes, lost himself and his Countrey.
1232 4 Adolph IV. in his fathers life time recovered his estate from Waldemar the successor of Canutus, overcome by him in a well-fought battel, Anno 1226. his father then prisoner to the Danes.
1261 5 Gerrard, the 2d. son of Adolph the fourth, his elder brother John making choice of Wagerland, succeeded in Holstein.
1281 6 Henry, the son of Gerrard, the first that set up a Customs-house at Hamburg, for receipt of his tolls and taxes.
1310 7 Gerrard II. son of Henry, slain treacherously by the Danes.
1339 8 Henry II. son of Gerrard the second.
1381 9 Gerrard III. son of Henry the second, created the first Duke of Sleswick, by Queen Margaret of Denmark.
1404 10 Henry III. son of Gerrard the third.
1427 11 Adolphus V. commonly called the XII. (those of the younger houses being reckoned in) the last Earl of this house.
1459 12 Christiern of Oldenburg, King of Denmark, Sweden, and Norway, son of Theodorick Earl of Oldenburg, and of his wife Hedwigis, sister of Henry, and Adolphus, the two last Earls, succeeded in the Earldom of Holstein: enlarged with the addition of Dietsmarsch, and erected into a Dukedom by the Emperour Frederick the third, Anno 1474. But seeing that Otho Earl of Schamburg, pretended a right unto the whole, as the next heir male, according to the constitutions of the Empire of which it was holden: and Gerrard the brother of Christiern put in for his share, according to the ill custom of Germany, of which it was then counted part: he was fain to buy his peace of both: giving to Otho 43000 Florens in ready money, with the Towns of Pinnenberg, Haltzburg, and Bramfede, the ancient possessions of the Earls of Schamburg; and 50000 Marks to his brother Gerrard, besides his whole interest in the Earldom of Oldenburg, as before was said. By this means Holstein was united to the Crown of Denmark, the Kings whereof as Dukes of Holfst, being counted Princes of the Empire; but neither fend unto the Diets, nor contribute any thing at all to the publick taxes, nor acknowledge any kind of subjection to it, more than merely titular. Only it was ordained at the request of the Subjects, when first they were incorporated into that Kingdom; that in case of any grievance, or unjust sentence in the ordinary Courts of Justice, wherein they found no remedy in the supreme Council of the Province; it might be lawfull for them to appeal to the Imperial Chamber, as they had done formerly. Which as it was granted to content them at the present time, on sufficient caution; so hath it seldom or never been put in practice: the very grant or privilege (if such it were) being in a manner worn out of memory. But since this uniting of the two Estates, the title of Duke of Holstein, and a good part of the Countrey, was given unto Adolphus, brother of Christiern the 3d. (created by Queen Elizabeth one of the Knights of the Garter, Anno 1560.) who governed it interchangeably with the King in their several turns: after whose death, and the death of all his children dying without issue male, the Title of it was conferred on Ulrick, son of Frederick the second, and brother of Christiern the fourth; created Knight of the Garter by King James, Anno 1605. In whose posterity it remains till this present time.

FRITLAND.

JUTTLAND, containeth all the rest of the Cimbrick Chersonese, divided from the Dukedom of Holf by the River Eydore, the ancient boundary betwixt the Saxons and the Danes: but principally by a long trench and wall from one Sea to the other, of such breadth that a chariot or two horsemen men a breast might ride upon it. First built in imitation of the Piſts wall in England, by Godfrey King of Denmark, in the time of Charles the Great: either to hinder the daily incursions of the Saxons, as some, or to stop the current of the victories of the said Charles, as others think. The tract whereof, it is still very easie to be seen, is call'd Dennewerk, (or the Danes work) to this very day.

It was so called from the Jutes, who together with the Angli, and neighbouring Saxons, made a conquest of the best part of Britain. The Country so abounding in Cattel, that it sendeth yearly into Germany 50000 Oxen, besides great store of Butter, Cheese, Tallow, Hides and Horses: divided commonly into North-Jutland, and South-Jutland; or Jutland specially so called, and the Dukedom of Sleswick.

SOUTH-JUTLAND, or the Dukedom of SLESWICK, is that part of the Cimbrian Chersonese which lies next to Holstein: called South-Jutland, from the Southern situation of it: and Sleswick, from the chief town of it, and the head of this Dukedom. The Country, for the most part, plain, little swelled with mountains: the fields whereof do interchangeably yeeld both fish, and corn. For during one three years they sow it constantly, and reap the fruits of it; and for the next three let the Pooles overflow the land, to the end the fish may eat up the grafs (whom they catch as often as they please) and the mud which is left behind enrich the soil. But besides their Pools, they have also on the Baltick shores many goodly Bays; not only commodious for Merchants, but well-stored with fish, and with Salmons specially.

Chief Towns herein are 1 Flensburg, seated among very high Mountains, on the shore of the Baltick Sea, where there is a Port so deep, so safe, and so commodious, that all the Inhabitants thereof in a manner may lade and unlade their ships close to their houses. 2 Husum, upon the German Ocean, not far from the mouth of the River Eydore. 3 Haderslave, a Bishop See, if not rather some Town or Manor of the Bishops of Sleswick, situate on a navigable inlet of the Baltick Sea, where with it is almost incompass'd: beautified with the fair Castle of Hansburg, begun by John the eldest son of King Christiern the first, then Duke of Holf; but furnished by Frederick the second, King of Denmark. 4 Lundberg, in the Peninsula called Elderstede, over against De Surantis, an Island of the German Ocean. 5 Sternberg, the ordinary residence of the Governour for the King of Denmark. 6 Gottorp, a strong Fort or Castle of the Duke of Sleswick, at the end of a large Bay or inlet of the Baltick also: remarkable for the Toll-booth, or custom-house there erected, at which there is Toll paid one year with another for 50000 Oxen, sent out of the North-Jutland into Germany. 7 Sleswick, originally by the Danes called Heydelui, built, as they say, by Hethe, a Queen of that Nation; but by the Saxons called Sleswick, as the Town upon the River Slea, there running into the Baltick, and giving to the Town a fair and commodious Haven. This of long time hath been accounted the chief Town of this Province, honoured with an Episcopal See, and being made the head of the Dukedom; so giving name unto the whole. A Dukedom first erected by King Henry of Denmark, who gave it to Waldemar, great Grandchild of Alel, a former King, Anno 1280. to be held by him under the right and sovereignty of the Kings thereof. But the male-issue failing, it returned to the Crown, and was by Margaret Queen of Denmark conferred on Gerrard, Earl of Holstein, as before was said, Anno 1386. Repenting afterwards of that Act, she extorted it out of the hands of the Widow of Gerrard; again recovered by the valour and good fortune of his son Adolphus. After whose death it fell, together with Holstein, upon Christiern of Oldenburg, King of Denmark, as before related; by whom incorporated with that Crown; never since aliened, but assigned sometimes in portion for the younger Princes; the Patrimony at this time of the sons of Alexander, surnamed of Sunderburg, (the place of his Nativity) son of John, one of the younger sons of King Christiern the third.

NORTH-JUTLAND, the most Northern part of all the Chersonese, hath on the South, the Dukedom of Sleswick; but on all other parts the Sea. Divided commonly, according to the number of the Bishopricks, into four Dioceses, or Dioceses, that is to say,

1 the Diocese of RIP or Ripen, bordering next to Sleswick, containeth 30 Prefectures or Herets, (as they use to call them) seven Cities, or walled Towns, and ten Castles. The chief of which are 1 Ripen, the Episcopal See, situate near the German Ocean. 2 Koldins, on a Creek of the Baltick Sea; where Dorothy the Dowager of Christiern the third, built a publick School, (one of my Authors calls it an University.)

2 The Diocese of ARTHUSEN lying on the North of Ripen, but more towards the Baltick, containeth 31 Herets or Prefectures, seven Cities, or walled Towns, and five Castles. The chief whereof are 1 Arhusen, the Episcopal See, seated on the Baltick, enjoying a commodious Port, and well frequented; the first Bishop hereof being that Poppo, who converted this Nation: Christinnity and Episcopacy going, for the most part, hand in hand together. 2 Schunderburg, on the South of Arhusen. 3 Kalka, a going, for the most part, hand in hand together. 2 Schunderburg, on the South of Arhusen. 3 Kalka, a strong Castle of the Kings, seated in the inmost part of a large Bay, occasioned by the Premontory, or Cape of Hikenis; extending hence two Dutch miles to the high hill of Ellemanberg. Opposite whereunto, and pertaining to this Jurisdiction, lie the Islands of 1 Samſue, 2 Holm, 3 Tuen, 4 Hiarne, (perhaps Gerno) 5 Hilgen, and others.

3 The Diocese of WIBORCH, on the North of Arhusen, containeth sixteen Herets, the Islands of 1 Jegen, 2 Hansholm, 3 Ofholm, 4 Cisland, 5 Egholm, and 6 Bodum: three Cities, or walled Towns, and as many Castles. The principal of which are 1 Wiborch, the Episcopal See, an Inland City; but situate on a water which runneth into the Bay of Limsford. The ordinary seat of Judicature, for both the Jutlands; for all Causes, as well Criminal, as Civil: the Court continually sitting from one day to another, unless perhaps the Judges do sometimes adjourn it for their own refreshments.

Baltick Islands.

4 The Diocese of BURGAVE, or Vandalia, lying further North, is commonly subdivided into four parts or members; that is to say, 1 Thyland, lying South of the Bay of Limsford, on the Baltick side, whose chief Town is 1 Alborch; the ordinary seat and residence of the Bishop of Vandalia, from hence many times stiled Alburgensis situate on the Bay aforesaid, which opening into the Baltick Sea, extendeth through the main Land Westwards, almost as far as the German Ocean. 2 Morſee, lying on the Ocean, and containing three Prefectures, or Herets, the Town of Nicopen, the Castle of Lunſted, and the Isle of Ageroe. 3 Hanheret, on the north-west of the Bay of Limsford, containing four Herets, as that of Kolding; the Castle of Ornme, and the Island of Oland, and Oxholm. There is in this part also, the high Rock called Skaringe lint, a noted Sea-mark; fitly serving to give notice to the Sailer, of the Quickſands which lye underneath it, and about this Coast. 4 Venſſel, Venſſia, or Venſſie, that is (as Mercator doth expound it) Vandalorum ſedes, the seat of the Vandals; taken up all the rest of the north of Jutland, containing six Prefectures, the Islands of Groyſholm, 2 Hartzholm, and 3 Tydholm; three Towns, and one Castle, the most remarkable of which is Schagen, with the most northerly point of all this Chersonese. In this part is a very high mountain called Mount Alberg, in which are found some marks and remainders of the ancient Gyants, as the Inhabitants believe; and report accordingly.

The Inhabitants of both Jutlands in the time of Prolomy, and before, were the Cobandi, Chali, Phundſi, Charudes, and in the most Northern tracts the Cimbri; of whom the four first were but Tribes or Nations. These moving towards the South in that great expedition against Spain, made by the neighbouring Vandals, on the Roman Empire, occasioned the Jutes and Angli to enlarge or shift their dwellings: each taking up the parts which lay nearest to them. The Jutes, or Guta, being a people of Scandia, and there placed by Prolomy, took up the Northern parts thereof from them, named Jutland: the other being a people of the Suevi, dwelling on the South of the Elb, possessed them of those parts which lay next the Saxons, their old friends and confederates, (their chief Town being Sleswick) where Angelen, now an obscure Village, once of greater note, doth preserve their memory. But these uniting with the Saxons, in the conquest of Britain, and leaving none behind which were fit for action, or not enough to keep possession of the Country against the new Invasors; gave opportunity to the Danes to come in upon them. By whom the Countries being conquered, as far as to the River Eydore, were planted by Colonies of Danes, and made a part of that Kingdom; of whom we shall say more in the close of all: first taking a survey of the Baltick Islands, and such Provinces on the main land of Scandia, as properly make up the Kingdom of Denmark.

2. The BALTICK ISLANDS.

THE BALTICK ISLANDS are in number 35. and are so called, because they lye dispersed in the Baltick Ocean. At this day it is called by the Germans, De Oſt zeen; antiently by some, Mare Suevicum; by Pomponius Mela, Sinus Codanus; by Strabo, Sinus Venedicus; but generally, Mare Balticum, because the great Peninsula of Scandia, within which it is, was by some Writers of the middle and darker times, called Balbia. It beginneth at the narrow passage called the Sund; and interlacing the Countries of Denmark, Sweden, Germany, and Poland, extendeth even to Livonia, and Lithuania. The reasons why this Sea being so large, doth not ebbe and flow, are 1 the narrowness of the strait, by which the Ocean is let into it; and 2 the Northern situation of it, whereby the Celestial Influences have lesser power upon it. The principal of this great shoale of Islands, are 1 Seland, 2 Fuinera, or Fionia, 3 Langeland, 4 Lanland, 5 Falſtre, 6 Aeze, 7 Alen, 8 Tesigne, 9 Wheden, 10 Fimera, and 11. Bornholm. Some others of less note we shall only name, and so pass them over.

1 SELAND, the greatest Island of the Baltick Seas, is situate near the main Land of Scandia, from which parted by a narrow Strait or Fretum, not above a Dutch mile in breadth, commonly called by the name of the Sands, or Sund. A Strait thorow which all ships which have any trading to, or from the Baltick, must of necessity take their course: all other passages being barred up with impassable Rocks; or otherwise prohibited by the Kings of Denmark, upon forfeiture of all their goods. So that being the only safe passage which these Seas afford, one may sometimes see two or 300 ships in a day pass thorow it; all which pay a toll or imposition to the King, according to their bills of lading. And to secure this passage, and command all Passengers, there are 2 strong Castles, the one in Scandia, called Helsingborg, whereof more anon; the other in this Island, which is called Cronenberg.

But before we come to this Castle, we must view the other parts of the Islands being in length two dayes journey, and almost as much in breadth: the soil so fertile, that without any manuring or charge at all, it yieldeth plenty of all necessities for the life of man. It was antiently called Codanania, and containeth in it fifteen Cities or walled Towns, and twelve Royal Castles. The principal whereof, are 1 Huffen, or Hafnia, the Metropolis of the Islands; by the Dutch called Copenhagen, or the Haven of Merchants, situate near the Sea, with an handsome Port; the Isle of Amager which lye on the East-side of the Town, making a very safe road for all kinds of shipping. The Town of an orbicular form, and reasonably well fortified; but the buildings mean, for the most part of clay and timber, only to be commended for a spacious Market-place. Yet herein, as the chief Town of all the Kingdom, and situate in the heart of those dominions, in the Palace Royal; built of Freestone, in form of a Quadrangle, but of no great beauty or

Norway. 1376 39 Margaret, daughter and heir of Waldemar the third, married with Aquin King of Norway, so uniting the Kingdoms: of whom and their successors we shall speak hereafter; when we have took a view also of the Kingdom of Norway, and the Appendixes thereof.

3. NORWAY.

NORWAY is bounded on the East, with Swethland, from which parted by a perpetual ridge of rough and wild mountains, called the Dofrine hills; on all other parts by the Sea: that is to say, by the frozen Sea upon the North; the German or Norwegian Ocean upon the West; and on the South, with the Danish Sea, interpoling betwixt it and the Cimbriick Chersoneis. Being in breadth from Schagen, the most Northern point of Jutland, to Congell, the most Southerly town of Norway, no less than 250 miles.

It is called Norway, quasi tractus seu via Septentrionalis, from the Northern situation of it, containing in length 1300 miles, in breadth not above half so much: inhabited by a people given to hospitality, plain dealing, and abhorring theft. Antiently they were great warriors, and became terrible to all the more Southern Nations; by whom called Normans, (that is to say, Homines Boreales, or Northmen, as Wilhelmus Gemiticensis rightly hath it:) being at that time a mixture of all the Northern Nations together, or of the Norwegians and Swethlanders apart from the Danes; whose steps they followed in their frequent or rather continual Piracies, on the Coasts of England, France and Ireland. By Helmoldus in the same sense, they are called Nordmichi, a name made into Latine, out of the Dutch word Nord, and the French word lien, signifying men of a Northern place or Nation.

Of the position of it in regard of the Heavens we have spoke already; but more particularly it reacheth from the first Parallel of the twelfth Clime, where the Pole is elevated 58 degrees 26 minutes, as far as to the 71 degree of latitude. By which account the longest day in the Southern point is but 18 hours; whereas at Wardhuys, being situate furthest North of all this Countrey, they have no night for almost three whole moneths together.

The Countrey for the most part rocky, mountainous and barren, full of vast woods, extreme cold, and but ill inhabited. In the best parts thereof it affords little corn; and in the most Northern none at all: insomuch that the common sort of people are fain to use dried fish (that which we commonly call Stock-fish) instead of bread. But the better (that is, the richer sort) buy corn of such Merchants as come to traffick with them. Their chief commodities are Stock-fish, rich Furs, train Oyl, Pitch, and Tackling for Ships, as Masts, Cables, Deal-boards, and the like; which the Inhabitants exchange for Corn, Wine, Fruits, Beer, and other necessities for mans life. The Countrey is exceedingly troubled with certain little beasts which they call Lemmers. They are about the bigness of a Field Mouse, and are by the Inhabitants said to drop out of the clouds in tempestuous weather. They devour, like the Locusts, every green thing on the earth; and at a certain time dye all in heaps (as it were) together: and with their stench so poison the air, that the poor people are long after troubled with the jaundies, and with a giddiness in the head. But these beasts come not so often to infect the land, as the Whales do to terrify and molest the shores, the Western Seas being very deep, and therefore a fit habitation for those great Leviathans: against whose violence and fury, the Mariners and people of the Sea coast have found a Remedy, which is by casting out some water intermixed with the Oyl of Cassor; the smell whereof doth force them to retire immediately. Without this help there were no fishing on these Coasts, which is the greatest Staple commodity (besides materials for shipping) which the Countrey yieldeth.

The Towns here, are exceeding thin, and in them the houses for the most part very poor and miserable; commonly patched up of dirt and hurdles, not much unlike our ordinary Cottage houses in the Fen-Countries. Distributed into five Prefectures or Governments, according to the number of the Castles which command the same. Of these,

1 The first most towards the South is the Castle of BOHUS, to which are subject the Towns of 1 Marsfrand, seated in a Demi-Island begirt with Rocks; of most note for the infinite quantity of Herrings caught hereabouts. 2 Congell, upon the Sea, a town of Merchandise, opposite to Schagen in Denmark. 3 Oldenald.

2 AGGERHUIS, the second of the five Royal Castles, hath under its commands the Towns of 1 Anslo, or Afsola, on a Bay or Guller opposite to Jutland, an Episcopal See, and of most esteem of all the Countrey, by reason of the Courts of Judicature which are therein held. 2 Tonsberg, or Koningsberg, that is to say, the Kings or the Kingly mountain, formerly a retiring place of the Kings of Norway. 3 Frederichsrad, built by one of the Fredericks, Kings of Denmark. 4 Schin or Schon, remarkable for its mines of iron and copper. 5 Salzburg. 6 Hammar the greater, and 7 Hammar the less, divided by the interpoling of the Bay called Sinnu Maasannus, in former times the See of a Bishop, since removed to Afsola; or rather thereunto united in these latter times, as many poor Bishopricks be in Ireland.

3 BEGGER-HUSE is the third Castle of command herein. Subordinate whereunto are 1 Bergen, the principal Town of the Countrey, an Episcopal See, and the ordinary residence of the Governor for the Kings of Denmark; situate amongst high Mountains, at the bottom of a deep Creek or Arm of the Ocean called Carnesum. A noted Port; and much resorted to by Merchants of most foreign Nations; bringing in Corn, Meal, Bread, Beer, Wine, and Aqua-vite, to supply the natural wants and defects hereof: and in exchange transporting hence Fish, Furs, Cordage, and other materials for shipping.

ping. In which regard, accounted formerly one of the four chief Staple Towns of the Dutch Merchants of the Hanse: the other three being London in England, Novogrod in Muscovie, and Bruges in Flanders. But of late time this Bergen hath lost most of its trade, removed hence to Wardhuys, nearer unto Muscovie: as the great town of Novogrod, by reason of the change of Navigation from the Baltick into that of the Northern passage, hath given way to S. Nicolas; and Bruges was deprived of her traffick by Antwerp, from whence it is removed to Amsterdam. For the Hollanders, by blocking up the haven, but especially by keeping Bergen ap Zone, have such a command over the River, that no Vessel can pass or repass without their licence. 2 Staffanger, an Episcopal See also, but not else observable.

4 The Castle of TRUND-HEIM, is the fourth, situate in the Town of Trondheim, formerly called Tronden, and in Latine, Nidrosia; the See of an Archbishop, who is the Metropolitan of Norway. A beautiful City heretofore; but since the subjection of this Countrey unto the Danes, reduced to a Barrough. So called of the River Nider, upon which it is seated, and Rofu the name then of the principal Church: which in time gave place to the Cathedral, for greatness and neatness of the fabrick, all of polished stone, not giving place to any in Europe; about the year 1530. much defaced with fire, which began at the Altar, the damage done by it being estimated at 7000 Crowns. A great sum of money in those times, and so poor a Countrey. So that by casting up our reckoning, we find in Norway, one Archbishop, and four Bishops, that is to say, the Archbishop of Trundheim or Nidrosia, the Bishops of Bergen, Anslo, Staffanger and Hammar: Of the same power, jurisdiction, and revenue, since the Reformation, as those of Denmark; whereof, and of the first conversion of this people to the Christian Faith, we have spoke already.

5 The fifth and last Castle which commands this Countrey, is that of WARDHUYS, so called of the Town of Wardhuys; as that is from the Isle Ward, in which it is seated. A small Castle, and the Town in former times but mean and poor, situate in the extreme North point of all this Kingdom; but in those times accounted (as it easily might) for the chief of this Prefecture, and honoured in the summer time with the seat and residence of the Governour; retiring more Southwards in the winter; at what time, by reason of the extremity of the cold, and long absence of the Sun for some months together (the Town lying within the Artick Circle) it is hardly habitable. But of late times it is much improved both in wealth, and building; by reason of the removal of the English trading from Novogrod, near the Baltick Sea, to the Town of S. Nicolas, not far from hence; drawing by that means the trade of Muscovie, and Norway, more neer together. So that now it is not only useful unto the Danes, in regard that it somewhat aweth the neighbouring Lappians, and commandeth the Natives; for that cause fortified very strongly by King Frederick the second: but made very profitable to him also, by the resort of Dutch, and English, who must of necessity touch at it (if they make no stay here) in their way to Muscovie. Other Towns in these two last Prefectures are not worth looking after.

And so much for the Continent or mainland of Norway; let us next look upon the Islands in the Northern Ocean, which belong unto it.

The ISLANDS in the NORTHERN OCEAN.

THE NORTHERN SEA, so named from its Northern situation, is by some called Mare Scythicum, because it coasted along the shores of Scythia; by Juvenal called Oceanus glacialis, because often frozen; by Pliny in the same sense, Mare Amalchium, the word in the Scythick language signifying frozen, or congealed; by the Russes, or Muscovites, Myrmaniskoy More; by the Cimbrians in their tongue, Marimornsa, that is to say, the dead Sea, because of the slowness of its motion, often clogged with ice; and in the same sense, mare pigrum by Tacitus. This Tacitus doth best describe it, from whom take it thus, Trans Sueones Mare aliud pigrum & prope immotum, &c. Beyond the Swedes, there is another Sea, so slow and almost immovable, that many think it to be the bounds which compass the whole world. Some are persuaded that the sound of the Sun is heard, as he ariseth out of this Sea; and that many shapes of gods are seen, and the beams of his head, Illic usque (& fama vix) tantum natura. At this Sea (the report is credible) is the end of nature and the world. The English were the first of all civil people, who adventured to open and discover the passages of it, under the conduct of Richard Chancellor, arriving by this way in Russia, An. 1553. and tracing out the way, which others of that Nation, together with the Flemings, Hollanders, and some Towns of the Hanse, have since followed. Of which more in Muscovie. The principal Islands dispersed in it, are 1 Greenland, 2 Island, 3 Freeeland, belonging to the Crown of Norway, to be surveyed at the present; Nova Zemla, and Sir Hugh Willoughbies Island, appertaining (if to any) to the Knez, or great Duke of Muscovie of which more hereafter.

1 ISELAND is situate under the Artick Circle, in length 144 German miles; 65 in breadth, so called from the abundance of ice in it, and about it, frozen continually for the space of 8 months, and so vehemently chilled with Northern winds, that it yieldeth neither Corn nor Trees, except Juniper only: yet there is grass in such abundance, that the people are of opinion, that if they do not sometimes keep their cattle from feeding, they are in danger to surfeit and dye with fullness. Beasts for labour here are, both Horses and Oxen; the Oxen and Kine without horns, but the Sheep not so: and they have also here a fine breed of little Doggs, known amongst us by the name of Island doggs, the delight of Ladies; as also white Faulcons, and white Ravens, Eagles with white tails; with Hares and Bears of the same colour. By reason of their want of corn, the people eat Freeze-land. Stock-fish (as in Norway) instead of bread; yet notwithstanding, by reason of the benefit of the Sea, and of access of strangers, they have all things necessary brought unto them (even to wood and timber) of which the richer sort make use: giving the Merchant in return, sometimes the flesh of Beesves and Mutton; but ordinarily, Butter, Skins, Horses, Hawks, Brimstone, and Fish especially, the staple commodity of the Country. Of which they have such plenty, and of so good condition, that a piece of Island Ling is counted with us, as a fit dish for a Nobleman's Table.

The people, for the most part, are of a plain and simple nature, living (as in the Golden Age) on that which Nature gives them, without help of Art, more than that of making Cheese and Butter: the Mountains serving them for Towns, and the Rivers for drink, and lodging all under one roof, with their Horses and Oxen. They use neither Physick, nor Physicians, yet live so long (and probably the fair, but they know not how to attire themselves; nor is there any difference in Apparel betwixt the Sexes, so that it is not ealie to know one from another. Few of them but have some familiar Spirit to do them service: and notwithstanding the endeavour of the Ministers to purge them from this impicity; yet it is so grafted in them, that they cannot leave it.

It is observable, that notwithstanding the cold condition of this Island, yet in many places it is full of heats, and fire under the ground; which by the Antiperistasis of the cold air, stopping the pores of the earth, and taking from it the liberty of evaporation, doth burn more vehemently: inasmuch that there are three high Mountains, whose tops are always covered with Snow, and yet continually burning. The names of them are Hecla, Helge, and La-Croix, but the first the principal; by some called Hicelfort, which sometimes casts out fire, sometimes flaming water, then black ashes, and pumice stones in great abundance, that it darkneth the Sun, and makes the Country for six miles round about it to be uninhabited. Stranger things are not spoken of Atna, than of these three Mountains: and here the superstitious people have the same opinion which they have in Sicil. viz. That underneath must needs be hell, and the habitations of the damned. But to judicious men the natural reason of these flames is plain and obvious; occasioned by those veins of brimstone (great quantity whereof they send into foreign parts) on which the foundation of the hills is laid: here being many Bathes, and Fountains of hot waters, which have Sulphur swimming at the top.

At the first planting of this Island, the people did not trouble themselves with building Towns, but every one feared himself where he thought convenient; and dwelling in cells, and caverns digged in the bottom of the Rocks. By means whereof the inland parts have not many houses: but the Sea coasts, since the coming of so many strangers to them, begin to be built in many places; the build-ings for the most part being of timber, roofed with flags, with an hole on the sides of the roof to let in the light. So that we are not to expect many fine Towns or Cities: the principal of them which are, being 1 Halar in the North, and 2 Schalholt in the southern part; both Bishops Sees; having a petty Schools, consisting of 24 scholars a piece, to whom the Latine tongue is taught at the charge of the Bishops. 3 Haffnord, an Haven Town, where under Tents the Dutch Merchants barter their commodities: and 4 Bedsted, a Castle, the ordinary residence of the Governour for the Kings of Denmark.

It hath been generally conceived that this Island is that Thule, which the Poets so often speak of; as Tibi serviat ultima Thule, in Virgil; Nec sit Terris ultima Thule, in Seneca, the Tragedian: nor did there want some reason to persuade them to this opinion; this being indeed the furthest part of the old known world. But greater reasons are against it. For when Solinus saith, multa sunt circa Britannicam insulam, à quibus Thule ultima; I hope Thule must be one of the British Isles. And when Tacitus saith of Agricola, insulam quam Orcadas vocant domuit, despecta est & Thule; I am sure that Island was so far from being kenne'd by any one of the Orcades, that it is at least eight degrees distant. So that Thule must be sought for in another place, and where that is, hath been shewed already. As for Island it was so far from being known unto the Antients, that it was hardly known unto those of Norway, till the year 874. when some of the Norwegians driven out of their Country by Harald the first, who first suppressing the many petty Kings of the Norwegians, made many of them seek new dwellings; of which some few arrived here: where finding room enough to plant in, and no great loss (if any) by change of their dwelling; they invited many of their friends and Country-men to come unto them, by the year 1070. they were converted to the Gospel by some Preachers sent hither from Adelbert the Archbishop of Breme. By whose persuasion and procurement they founded two Episcopal Sees; adding thereto in tract of time, eight Religious houses: that is to say, the Monasteries of Pingore, Rensfode, Moder, and Monk-niere, under the Government and jurisdiction of the Bishop of Hallar; and those of Vede, Perrebar, Kirkebar, and Skirde, under the Bishop of Schalholt. In the year 1260. it was first brought under the Crown of Norway, following since that the fortunes of it, in all changes both of Church and State: made subject with it to the Kings of Denmark; together with it reformed in matters of Religion, according to the confession of Ausbourg; retaining still their Bishops, with a limited power, and turning the Revenues of their Monasteries unto other uses, as there they did, according to the will and pleasure of their Lords of Denmark.

II. Southwest of Island lies another, and as cold an Isle, commonly called by the name of FREEZE-land, from the continual Frosts unto which it is subject. By the Latines it is called Frislandia, to distinguish it from Frisia, or Frisland, in Germany. Situate under the North Frigid zone; but not so much within the Arctic as Island is: the longest day here in the height of Summer, not exceeding 20 hours: and yet the soil so cold and barren, that it beareth neither corn, nor fruit, the Inhabitants living most on fish: which as it is their only food, so is it also their chief com-commodity, wherewith to entertain or invite the Overchums. And it is not here such abundance caught upon their coasts, that they are never without the company of Hansemen, Scots, Hollanders, Danes, and English; by which last so frequented in these later times, that it hath been called by some, the Western England. For quantity it is somewhat bigger than Island; but by reason of the bitter air, and the defects above mentioned, very thinly inhabited. The chief Town of it is called Freeze-land, by the name of the Island; situate on the Eastern shore of it. Besides which, there are some others set down in the maps, as 2 Samsfoot, 3 Andersfort, 4 Sorund; but not much of service. Weitward hereof, as Zieglerus (and out of him Maginus) telleth us, is a less Island called Icarum, giving the name of Mare Icarum to the Sea adjoining: so called (by his mistake or translation of the fable) from Icarus the son of Dædalus, a King of Scotland, who did once (but no body knows when) Lord it over these Islands.

III. GROENLAND, so called, as some say, from the green's of it in the Summer; as others say by Antiphrasis, because never green, by reason of the sharpness of winter. But the former Etymologie is more agreeable to the state of the Country. For though it be continually covered with Snow, except in June, July, and August, (inasmuch that though the people be always clad with Furres and Skins, yet they feel no heat) yet in those months it is exceeding fresh and green, and affords good pasture. It is situate for the greatest part, within the Arctic, between the 65 and 77 degrees of Northern Latitude: so that the longest day in the Southern part is 21 hours and an half; and in the most Northern, they have no night for three months and two weeks. The known length of it is affirmed to be 600 miles, and may be much longer than to for ought that any body knows: there being no perfect discovery made of it hitherto; though much frequented by the English and Hollanders, (two great Sea-faring Nations) for the benefit of whale-fishing, much there in use. Their chief commodities are Fish, white bears, wild Deer, and some store of Cattel there bred upon their Pastures; but housed for the most part all the Winter: the greatest part of the people dwelling in the Caves, and delight in Necromancy, to which more wilfully addicted than those in Island, because less acquainted with the Gospel.

Places of most importance in it, are 1 Saint Thoma, (in which there is a Monastery of Dominican Friars) seated in the North-East part of the Island; concerning which Morcar speaks of one thing which is very observable: relating, that it is not far from a flaming or burning mountain, seated upon hot scalding Springs, conveyed by pipes of stone into the Monastery, and serving both as a stove to warm them, and for a fire to boyl their Vasaals. The walls of the Monastery built of Pumice stones cast out of that Mountain; which being tempered with the water of those burning Springs, doth make a glutinous substance, serving in stead of Lime, and as long durable. The Gardens of the Convent, in regard of this heat, flourish all the year with herbs, and sweet-smelling flowers, and the adjoining Sea for the same reason being never frozen, affords good plenty of fish and fowl, the whole year about; not only for the Monks, but the neighbouring Islanders. So far, and to this purpose he. The second Town of Note, is Iiva, not far from this Monastery: and 3 Manderpe on the South-East point. Others, as in a Country not well discovered, we have little notice of: though it be near 300 years since Nicolas Zeni, a Venetian, cast by tempest on the Coast of Freeze-land, and by the King thereof employed upon new discoveries, Anno 1380. first made it known to us of Europe; immediately on that discovery possessed by the NORWEGIANS, and made a Member of that Crown.

As for the NORWEGIANS themselves, now their fellow Subjects, they were first known in the time of Ptolomy, by the name of Chedini; possessing then the Western parts of Scandia. Uniting with their Neighbours, both Danes and Swethlanders, they became better known in the flourishing times of the French Empire, by the name of Normans; first called so by Eginhartus in his History of the life of Charles the Great, infesting then the Sea-coasts of France, and Belgium. Under this name they fell so heavily on the French, especially in the times of Charles the Simple, that they extorted from him that goodly Country, since of them called Normandy; conferred on Rollo, first Duke thereof, Anno 912. whose Successors much increased their glory by the Conquest of England; as some private adventurers of them did, by the Conquest of the Kingdoms of Naples, Sicily, and Antioch. Afterwards settling on their own bottom, every one of these Northern Nations acting by it self, they were called Norwegians: sometimes, as formerly, commanding over all three Kingdoms, subject successively to each; but most an end governed by their own Kings, till their final subjugation by the Danes. And as a Nation acting solely, and by it self, they subdued Ireland, under the conduct of Turgesius, who tyrannized there for a time; as also all the Orcades, and the Isle of Man, sold, or surrendered by them, upon good conditions, to the English and Scots, who by those Titles still possess them. The Catalogue of their Kings, leaving out all those of the darker times (parallel to our Brute, and the first Scottish Fergus) as merely fabulous; we will begin with King Suibadgerus, who was King of all the three Kingdoms, and at his death divided them again amongst his three sons; whose Successors Munster thus reckoneth.

THE KINGS OF NORWEGY.

- 1 Suibadgerus.
- 2 Haddingus.
- 3 Hetharius.
- 4 Callerus.
- 5 Frogerus.
- 6 Gobarus.

- 7 Rotherius.
- 8 Helga.
- 9 Hufmannus.
- 10 Reginaldus.
- 11 Gummarus.
- 12 Osmundus.
- 13 Olaus.
- 14 Osmundus II. not long after whose time, Anno scil. 800. the Normans began their irruptions.
- 15 Aquinus.
- 16 Haraldus.
- 17 Olaus.
- 18 Sueno, King of Denmark by Birth, and of Norway by Conquest.
- 19 Olaus III. son of Spain, or Sueno, succeeded in the Realms of Denmark and Norway, Cannus his younger brother being King of England. In this Kings time the Norwegians first received the Gospel.

young, without any issue; yet the Danes having once got footing in Norway, so assured themselves of it, that they have ever since possessed it as a subject Kingdom: keeping the Natives so poor and low, that they are not able to assert their former liberties; and not permitting them to use any shipping, so much as for transporting their own commodities, for fear they should grow wealthy and strong at Sea. Besides the strong Garrisons maintained in most parts of the Countrey, keep it in such an absolute awe, that they dare not stir against the Danes, if their stomachs served them. So that now Norway being made subject to the Crown of Denmark, or both made fellow subjects to the same King: We must next look upon these Kings, not as Kings of each, distinct and separate from the other, but as they are in fact and Title.

The KINGS of DENMARK and NORWAY.

- 1376 1 Haquin, or Aquinus, King of Denmark, and Norway; of this last by descent, of the other by marriage.
- 1380 2 Olaus, son of Aquinus and Margaret.
- 1383 3 Margaret, wife of Aquinus, mother of Olaus, and daughter of Waldemar the third, after the death of her son (in whose time she governed as his Guardian) took upon her the Kingdom in her own right; not only keeping Norway in the state she found it, but adding unto Denmark the Crown of Sweden, won by the vanquishment of Albert, Duke of Mecklenburg, then King thereof. A gallant and magnanimous Lady, the Semiramis of Germany.
- 1411 4 Ericus, Duke of Pomeran, and Knight of the Garter, son of the Lady Mary, Dutches of Pomeran, daughter of Ingelburgis, the sister of Margaret, by whom adopted for her Heir; succeeded after her decease in all the three Kingdoms: oured of all before his death, by a strong Faction made against him, and his estates conferred on
- 1439 5 Christopher, Count Palatine of the Rhene, and Duke of Bavaria (but in title only) the son of Margaret, sister of Ericus; chosen by the joynr consent of all the States of these Kingdoms. After whose death, (without issue) the Danes considering the great advantage they had gotten by the addition of Norway; pitched upon Adolphus, Duke of Sleswick, and Earl of Holst, for the next successor: that they might get in those estates to their Kingdom also. Who excusing himself by reason of his Age, and want of Children, commended to them Christiern, Earl of Oldenburg, his kinsman, and next heir, who was chosen accordingly.
- 1448 6 Christiern, Earl of Oldenburg, upon the commendation of his Uncle Adolphus, chosen King of Denmark and Norway; succeeded his said Uncle in the estates of Holst, and Sleswick, continuing since united unto that Crown: and added also thereunto by conquest the Kingdom of Sweden.
- 1482 7 John, son of Christiern, succeeded in all three Kingdoms; Knight of the Order of the Garter.
- 1514 8 Christiern II. son of John, King of Denmark, Norway, and Sweden, which last he held under with great cruelty: hated, by reason of his Tyranny towards all sorts of people, and ousted of his Kingdoms by his Uncle Frederick, Anno 1522, by whom at last taken, and kept in prison till he died, Anno 1559.

1523 9 Fre-

- 1523 9 Frederick, brother of John, and Uncle of Christiern the second, chosen King of Denmark, and Norway, on the abdication of his Nephew; reformed Religion in both Kingdoms, according to the Confession of Ausbourg.
- 1535 10 Christiern III. suppressed with great trouble, the party formed against him in behalf of Christiern the second; perfected the Reformation begun in the time of his Father, and was a great Benefactor to the University of Copenhagen.
- 1559 11 Frederick II. son of Christiern the third, subdued Ditmarsh, before unconquered by the Danes, or Earls of Holst, and added it unto that Dukedom: both being united to the Crown, though held of the Empire; Knight of the Garter.
- 1588 12 Christiern IV. son of Frederick the second, brother of Anne, Queen of Great Britain, and Knight of the Garter; engaging in a war against the Emperour Ferdinand the second for the liberty of Germany, was suddenly beat out of all the Cimbrick chersonese by the prevailing Imperialists, but compounded the bulinefs upon very good terms, and was restored to all his own.
- 1648 13 Frederick III. the youngest son of Christiern the fourth, his elder brethren being all dead without issue, succeeded in the Crowns of Denmark and Norway.

Having thus mustered up the Kings of these several Kingdoms, taken distinctly, and conjunct; we must next look upon the way of their coming to their Regal throne, their form of Government, together with the powerableness and revenues incident unto it. As for the manner of their coming to the Regal Throne, the Danes pretend the Kingdom to be Elective, and not Hereditary: yet so as they have always set the eldest son on the throne of his Father; unless some extraordinary occasion have disposed it otherwise. But they that look upon their Stories in the former times, can see no such matter: the Kingdom going generally in the way of Succession, unless by Faction or usurpation some popular and powerful Pretender hath interloped; as oftentimes hath hapned in such other Estates, as are hereditary merely, without claim or colour of Election. 'Tis true, that the male issue failing in Olaus, the son of Margaret; and the Princes which pretended by the Females after her decease, not being of sufficient power to assert their titles: the Kingdom was transferred to the house of Oldenburg, who held it on no other ground than by that of election. Which being an extraordinary case, is to make no Precedent; though seconded by the ouing of King Christiern the second, and the advancement of Frederick unto that Estate: being acts of violence and force, and justified only by the false Topic of success. But whosoever loit by the hand, the Danes got well by it; King Frederick taking up the Crown upon such conditions as have made him and his successors little more than Titular. For he was fain to swear at his Coronation, that he would put none of the Nobility to death, or banishment, but by the judgement of the Senate; that the great men should have power of Life and Death, over their Tenants or Vassals; that no Appeal should lie from them to the Kings Tribunal, nor the King be partaker of the Confiscations; nor finally, advance any to Commands and Honours, but by consent of his Great Council. Which Oath being also taken by his Successors, made Bodin say, Non tam re ipsa quam appellatione Reges esse; that they were only Kings in Title, but not Kings indeed. Yet in regard that the Nobility (so they call their Gentry) have but small Estates, none of them above the degree of Knights, (except only the Princes of the Blood) and that degree conferred by the King alone; it is not often found that they have dared to cross, or oppose their King, but when some of the Royal Family (out of private ends) have concurred with them in it: as in the case of Christiern the 2d. deposed by the people, but those people headed, and set on by his Uncle Frederick, who had an eye upon the Crown.

As for the Senate, or Great Council, spoken of before, it consists wholly of men chosen out of the Nobility, (who are to prove their Gentry by a long descent) seldom exceeding the number of 28. to each of which there is allowed a convenient Salary, with some fair Castle in the Countrey for his retirements, during his being of that body: his whole estate being freed also for that time, from all publick payments. Without their counsel and advice, the King is neither to determine of Peace or War, or to enter into any new Leagues, or Confederacies, nor impose any Tax upon the Subject; and unto them and the King jointly, is the last Appeal: such being the constitution of this Estate, that all Causes and Controversies are first decided in the Presbiter or Heret (184. in number) where they first arise; from whence it is lawful to appeal to the Judge of the Province, from him to the Chancery of the Kingdom, and finally to the King and Council. By the Laws of Waldemar the first, who first reduced the Laws into set form, and writing, the Bishops were to sit with this Council in all causes of moment: discharged from that employment by King Christiern the third, by whom it was also ordained, that the Clergy should not sell any of the Church-lands, without leave of the King.

The Forces which this King or Kingdom are able to raise, may best be seen by some of their particular undertakings: those specially of Christiern the second, who at the request of Henry the second of France, sent a Navy of an hundred sail into Scotland against the English, and therein no fewer than 10000 Souldiers; and of Frederick then Duke of Holst, who in his war against this Christiern, (whose removal from the Crown he had then projected) brought 80000 men into the field, to make good his quarrel. And questionless, considering the many Ports, and Islands, that this Crown is Master of, both within the Baltick, and without, it cannot be but he may suddenly raise a strong power at Sea: And then considering that each of the Nobility, which are here numerous enough, is bound to find a certain number of Horse upon all occasions; as are those also who hold lands of the Kings, which the Danes call Verlehnunge: it will accordingly be concluded, that they are able to make good Levies, for a sudden service: especially in defence of their own Dominions.

Danes

The Revenue of this King consisteth principally in the great impost laid upon all ships which pass through the Sound: the greatness whereof may easily be conjectured at by the multitude of ships, which of necessity must pass by it in the trade of the Baltick; though of late somewhat lessened of what it was, since the Engliff found out, and frequented the Northern passage into Muscovia. There are also some Crown-lands, and a great yearly Tell made of the Cattel, which pass it to Germany; as also of the fish transported into other Countries. And yet it is conceived, that the Treasures of this King are not very great: partly because there is no other important commodity, but fish, to draw Merchants thither; and partly that there is not any one Town of any great Traffick in all his Realms, for the entertaining of commerce.

The chief Order of Knighthood in it, is that of the Elephant, instituted by Frederick the second. Their badge; a Collar powdered with Elephants trowed, supporting the Kings Arms, and having at the end the picture of the Virgin Mary.

The Arms hereof are Quarterly; 1 Or, three Lions passant Vert, crowned of the first, for the Kingdom of Denmark; and secondly Gules, a Lion Rampant Or, Crowned and Armed of the first, in his paws a Danish hatchet Argent, for the Kingdom of Norway. What Arms belong to him as Duke of Holf, and Sleswick, I am yet to seek.

SWETHLAND.

SWETHLAND is bounded on the East, with Muscovie; on the West, with the Dofrine hills, which divide it from Norway; on the North, with the great Frozen Ocean, spoken of before; on the South, with Denmark, Liefeland, and the Baltick Sea. So called from the Succi, Suehans, or Suehidi, and the word Land added for a termination; of which more hereafter.

It is in length from Stockholm, unto the borders of Lapland, above a 1000 Italian miles; and in breadth from Stockholm, lying on the Bodner Sea, to the borders of Denmark, about twenty good dayes journey on horseback: inasmuch as they which have travelled the length and breadth of it, on this side of Lapland, and the Gulf, or Bay of Bodner, account it little less than all Italy and France together: but taking in Lapland, and the Provinces on the other side of the Gulf, bigger than both by the quantity of 900 miles.

The situation of it in regard of the heavenly bodies, is the same with Norway, under the same Parallels and Degrees; but of so different a temper, both for soil and air, as if disposed of under several and long distant Clims. For the Air here is very pure, but not so sharp and insupportable, as it is in Norway: though in some places, where the Moors and Waters settle, for want of care to open and cleanse the water-courses, they have great fogs and mists, which do somewhat putrify it. And for the soil, it is more fertile than any of the other Northern Provinces: so that besides those necessities which they keep for themselves, they usually transport into other Countreys store of Malt and Barley; together with great quantities of Brass, Lead, Steel, Copper, Iron, the hides of Goats, Bucks, Oxen, and costly Furs. They have also some Mines of Silver, not mixt with any other metal; plenty of fish, in their Lakes and Rivers; abundance of Pine-trees, Firre, Oaks, both for ships and houses; yielding yielding besides, among the woods, good store of Tarre, and Honey, and some other necessities. But hereof we shall speak more punctually in the several Provinces.

The principal Mountains of this Countrey are the Dofrine Hills, a vast and continual ridge of Mountains, which divide it from Norway. And though they want not Rivers fit for common uses, yet partly by reason of their great frosts and flakes of Ice, partly by reason of the falling of trees which lie cross their channels, they have not many Navigable, or of any great fame. The principal of such as be, are 1 Meler, at the mouth whereof stands the City of Stockholm, 2 Lusen, 3 Dalecarlie, giving name to the Province so called, or as denominated from it. And of the Lakes; whereof here are exceeding many, that of most note is the Lake of Weret, which receiving into it 24 Rivers, disburtheneth it self at one mouth, into the Baltick; with such noise and fury, that they call it commonly the Devils head.

The people are naturally strong and active, provident, patient, and industrious; hospitable towards strangers, whom they entertain with great humanity: so healthy, that if they do not shorten their dayes by excess and riot, they live commonly to 140 years of age; and so laborious, that a Beggar is not seen amongst them. Of no great note for Arts or Arms in the times foregoing, not much addicted to the one, and so kept under by the Danes, that they could not grow eminent in the other; but much improved in both respects in these later dayes: Ericus, the first King of the present race, who cleared his Countrey of the Danes, and Gustavus Adolphus the last King, who freed the Germans from the yoke of the house of Austria, not being easily to be matched in the Arts of Warre. And since they began to give themselves to the sweets of learning, this Countrey hath produced (amongst some other learned men) Olavus Magnus, Archbishop of Upsal, of great note for his History of the Goths and Vandals; the first fruits of this Nation in the liberal Sciences. And it is probable, by reason of their late commerce with the German Nations, they will give better testimony to the world hereafter of their proficiency in this kind, as being generally exceeding apt to learn the Arts Mechanical, every man in a manner being his own Artificer, without employing Smith, Mason, Carpenter, or any other manual trades: very valiant both on foot and horse-back, which their long wars against the Danes, and their late wars in Germany, have given good proof of. Their women are discreet and modest, free from that intemperance which these Northern parts are subject to. Both sexes use a corrupt Dutch, common to all three Northern Kingdoms: except in Finland, and the Provinces on the other side of the Bodner Sea, where they partake somewhat of the Muscovite, or Russian language.

The Christian Religion was first planted amongst them, by the care and diligence of Ausgarus Archbishop of Brems, the Apostle general of the North. Corrupt with Papish superstitions, it was reformed, according to the Augustane Confession, in the time of Gustavus Ericus, the first of the present Royal family; solicited thereunto by one Petre Nevicus, a Lutheran Divine, and Lawrence the Archdeacon of Strengnes; but chiefly moved (as others say) by a desire to appropriate to himself the goods of the Church. And this appears to have had some strong influence upon him in it, in that he presently seized upon what he pleased; and made a Law, that Bishops should enjoy no more than the King thought fit: yet having pretty well lessened their Revenues, he was content they should remain as formerly, both in power and number; reserving to himself and his successors the nomination of the persons; but so as the approbation of the Clergy, (in a kind of election) doth usually go along with the Kings appointment.

The Bishops are in number seven; that is to say, 1 of Lincopen, containing in his Diocese 226 Parishes; 2 of Vexime, under whom are 210. 3 of Scara, ruling over the same number of Churches; 4 of Strengnes, under whom are a hundred only; 5 of Abo, the greatest for extent of all, as comprehending under it 500 Parishes; 6 of Wilburg; and 4 of Halsay, whose Dioceses for the most part ly out of the bounds of Sweden, in Muscovie, Livonia, and some other of the out-parts of the Realm of Poland: all of them under the Archbishop of Upsal, as their Metropolitan, whose Diocese extending into Lapland, and Finnmark, containeth 171 Parish Churches. By which account there are in all the Kingdom of Swethland, but 1417 Parishes; but many of them of a thousand, or eight hundred families: the people being dispersed in Forests and other places, where they have store of timber to build them houses, and store of pasture for their Cattel; which is the reason why they have not so many great Towns, nor so well inhabited, as is usual in far lesser Countries. As for the Authority of these Bishops, they still retain their voice in Parliament, and with them so many of the inferior Clergy, as are from every Socken, (a certain number of Parishes like our Rural Deaneries) deputed to appear there in the name of the Church: the affairs whereof the Bishops do direct and order, as well in as out of public meetings, according to the Ecclesiastical Constitutions formerly established; and if any great occasion be, they may either advise with their Consistorials, or call a Diocesan Synod, (as they think most fit) and therein make such Laws and Canons, as they conceive to be most proper for their own edification.

The whole Kingdom is divided into two parts, the one lying on the East, the other on the West side of the Bay, or Gulph of Bodner, called Sinus Bodicus in Latin, being a large and spacious branch of the Baltick Sea, extending from the most southerly point of Gothland, as far as to Lapland on the North: According to which division, we have the Provinces of 1 Gothland, and 2 Sweden, lying on the West side of the Gulf; 3 Lapland, shutting it up upon the North; 4 Bodia, or Bodden, and 5 Finland, on the East side thereof; and 6 the Swedish Islands, where it minglth with theret of the Baltick.

I. GOTHLAND.

GOTHLAND, is bounded on the East, with the Bodner Sea; on the West, with the Mountains which divide it from Norway, and so much of Denmark as lies in the same continent with it; on the North, with Sweden; on the South, with the Sea Baltick. So called either from the Goths, whose original Country it is commonly affirmed to be; or quasi good land, from the goodness and fertility of the soil; Gootlandia, qua Germanice Terra bona sonat (as Maginnus out of Munster hath it) the soil being very fruitful for Corn and Cattel, affording plenty of Mines, with great store of Fish; and generally a better conditioned Country, than of the rest of these Northern Regions.

It is divided commonly into Ostrogoth, or East-Gothland; Westergoth, divided from the former by the great lake of Weret, spoken of before; and South Gothland, subdivided into Smalandia, Tuiscia, and Verendia. Chief Towns whereof in Ostrogoth, are 1 Lincopen, a Bishops See. 2 Loduse, adorned with a very fair Haven: in Westergoth, 3 Scara on the Lake Weret, a Bishops See also: 4 Elfsburg, on the Western Sea, betwixt Denmark and Norway; a place of consequence, and flanked with two very strong Castles in the parts adjoining, the one called Croneberg, and the other Goldberge. 5 Tragnalle, remarkable for iron works, occasioned by the mines adjoining. And finally in South Gothland, there is 6 Vexim, or Vexio, another of the Episcopal Sees. 7 Wallburg, a reasonable fair Town, with a strong Castle. 8 Elchilm in that part hereof which is called Verendia, near the confines of Denmark. 9 Colmar, a noted and well-traded Port on the Baltick Sea, beautified with a Castle, not inferior to that of Milain; and so well fortified throughout, that at the taking of it by Christiern the fourth of Denmark, Anno 1611. there were found mounted on the works 108 brass pieces of Ordnance, six men of war to guard the Haven, with all manner of Ammunition in proportion to them. 10 Gottenberg, (or Gothorum Burgum) the chief Town of the Goths or Gothland, as the name importeth, enjoying a commodious Haven on the Baltick also, and very much frequented for the trade of Germany, to which it serves exceeding fitly; the principal Town of all this Province, and for that cause the ordinary seat or residence of the Governour for the King of Sweden.

The first Inhabitants of these South parts of Scandia, are commonly affirmed to have been the GOTHs, whom Jornandes in his Book de Rebus Geticis, makes to have issued out of this Country, and to plant themselves on the North banks of the Ister, near the Euxine Sea, some time before the Trojan war: ascribing to them whatsoever is reported in old writers of the ancient Scythians, as their encounter with Vexoris or Sesostrius, the King of Egypt, the Aet and achievement of the Amazons: their congress with Alexander the Great, in his Persian war, and the like to these. In which Jornandes being himself a Goth, is no more to be credited than Geoffry of Monmouth, a Welshman, in the story of Brute, and his successors, to whom he doth ascribe the taking and sacking of Rome under the conduct of Brennus, whom he makes to be the brother of Belinus, a King of Britain. Most probable it is, that they were originally a Dutch, or German people, part of the great Nation of the Suevi, called by Tacitus the Gothones, inhabiting in his time (as it is conceived) in the land of Prussia. Who finding their own Country too narrow for them, might pass over the Baltick, into the next adjoining Regions; and not well liking that cold clime, might afterwards in some good numbers go to seek new dwellings, and at last seat themselves on the banks of the Ister, where Jornandes found them. That they were Dutch originally, besides the general name of the Gothones or Goths, and those of Ostrogothes, and Wisigothes, into which they were afterwards divided; the particular names of Alaric, Theodorick, Riccard, (the names of their Kings and Captains) seem to me to evidence. That they were once seated in this Country doth appear as plainly, 1 By the name of Gothland, here still remaining; 2 By the title of Rex Gothorum, which the Kings of Swethland keep in the Royal stile; 3 By some inscriptions in ancient unknown Characters, engraven on the rocks near Scara in the Continent, and in Wibby in the Isle of Gothland; supposed by learned men to be some monument of that people. And finally, that their first dwellings, when first known by this name amongst the Romans, was on the North side of the Ister; is evident by the testimony of all ancient Writers, from the time of Antoninus Caracalla, with whom they had some tumultuary skirmishes in his way towards Persia; till their violent irruption into Italy and the Western Provinces: most famous in this interval for a great fight, with Decius the Roman Emperour, whom they overcame and slew in a battle, Anno 253. In the time of Valens, and Valentinian, the Roman Emperours, a quarrel being grown amongst them, managed by Phritigernes, and Athalaricus, the leaders of the opposite factions; Phritigernes overthrown in fight, had recourse to Valens; from whom he received such succours, that giving his adversary another day for it, he obtained the victory. Whereupon Phritigernes and his party received the Gospel, but intermixt and corrupt with the leaven of Arianism by the practice of Valens, who sent them none but Arian teachers, to whom and their factions in the Church, he was wholly addicted. Afterwards the whole Nation being driven over the Ister, by the barbarous Huns, they obtained of Valens the out-parts of Thrace for an habitation; on condition they should serve under the pay of the Emperour, and become Christians: the cause that Arianism over-spread the whole Nation generally, which had before infected but one party only. Ulphilas a devout and learned man, was their first Bishop; who for their better edification in the way of godliness, invented a new Gothick Character, and translated the Scriptures into that language: in the study whereof they so well profited, that many of them in the time of their first conversion, suffered death for it, at the hands of Athalaricus, and were counted Martyrs. Burdened by Valens, and denied their accustomed pay, they haraſs and depopulate the rest of Thrace, marching towards Constantinople: encountered in the way by Valens, whom they overcame, and killed after all his favours. Vanquished by Theodosius the succeeding Emperour in many battels, they became good neighbours, enlarging their bounds with his leave and licence as far as Pannonia, and grown into such estimation with him, that Ricimer and Frantia, two of that Nation, did obtain the Consulship; not to say any thing of that exorbitant power and favour, which Gainas had attained unto in the Court itself. Made insolent by so great honours, and apt to pick quarrels with their Patrons, they invaded Italy in two great bodies, consisting of no fewer than 200000 fighting men: the first whereof under the conduct of Rhadagisus, was discomfited and cut in pieces, by Stilico Lieutenant to Honorius the Western Emperour, at Fesula in the straits of the Appennine. The other by his treachery permitted to pass, sacked Rome, and subdued the most part of Italy, under the leading of Alaricus. He dying immediately after this great victory, left the fruits of it to his son Athaulfus; who marrying with Galla Placidia, the Emperours sister, relinquished Italy, and had all Gaul Narbonoise, and a great part of Hispania Tarraconensis, assigned unto him; where he erected the Kingdom of the Wisigothes, or Western Goths, possessed of Spain and Tingitania, for the space of 300 years and upward, when they lost that Kingdom to the Moors, as hath there been said. In the mean time, the Goths, which were left in their own Countries, distinguished from these by the name of Ostro-Goths, by reason of their more Eastern situation, kept themselves in quiet: first subdued by the Huns, and when by Wilamir, freed from that subjection, not intermeddling or attempting any thing against the Empire, till called by Zeno Emperour of Constantinople into Italy against Odoacer, and the Hernuli, who had then subdued it. Which action they managed with so much prudence and good fortune, by their King Theodorick, that they vanquished Odoacer, possessed Italy, and held it above 60 years; when broken in many set battels by Belisarius and Narſes, Lieutenants for the Emperour Justinian; their Kingdom and name there came unto an end.

As for the Kings of the Goths, we have a succession of them in Jornandes, from Berig, who first conducted them out of Scandia towards the East; till the going of Theodorick into Italy; but made up with so little probability, that I dare give no more credit to it, than the stories of Brute, Dan, Fergus, or the Lady Scots, Pharaohs daughter. Such of whom there is any certain knowledge and succession, are these few that follow.

The KINGS of the GOTHs.

- 344 1 Athalaricus King of the Goths, in the time of Constantius, and Constant, the sons of Constantine the Great.
- 357 2 Alaricus, the first of that name, in the time of Constantius.
- 3 Phritigernes, King of the Goths in the time of Valens, the first Christian Prince among that People.
- 370 4 Athalaricus II. in the time of the Emperours Valens, Gratian, and Valentinian the second; under whom the Goths were first seated on this side of the Ister.
- 379 5 Rhadagisus, who in the time of Honorius, first led the Goths into Italy; slain at the battle of Fesula.
- 410 6 Alaricus II. who pursuing the war of Italy, sacked Rome, subdued Naples, and the most of Italy.
- 413 7 Athaulfus, the son of Alarick the second, who first erected the Kingdom of the Wisigothes in Gaul, and Spain, continuing there for the space of 300 years and upwards: the present Kings of Spain coming from this stock.
- 417 8 Athalaricus King of the Goths remaining in the East, at the departure of Rhadagisus and Alaricus, distinguished from their Plantations, by the name of Ostrogothes: vanquished by Attila, they became subjects to the Huns, in the time of Theodosius the second, and Valentinian the third, Emperours of the East, and West.
- 9 Wilamir, one of the blood Royal of the Goths, Vassal to Attila at the first, whom he assisted, or served rather, in the great battle near Tholouse against the Romans: but taking advantage of some quarrels amongst the sons of Attila, shook off that yoke, and recovered the Kingdom of the Goths, in the time of the Emperour Marcianus.
- 10 Theodomir, son of Winithar, and brother of Wilamir, in the time of Leo Emperour of Constantinople.
- 11 Theodorick, son of Theodomir, kept at Constantinople in his youth, as a Pledge or Hostage for his Father, where he was instructed in all the Greek and Roman learning, and made the adopted son (as is said by Scaliger) of the Emperour Zeno; by whom he was sent into Italy against Odoacer and the Hernuli, erecting there the Kingdom of the Ostrogothes; which continued till the reign of Justinian, when destroyed by Belisarius and Narſes, as before is said; the name of Goths in Italy being thus extinct, but their blood intermixt with the best Italian. The sum of their whole story, for varieties sake, take thus out of Du Bartas.

The warlike Goth, which whilom issued forth
From the cold frozen Islands of the North, Incamp'd by Visula; but the Air almost
Being there as cold as in the Baltick Coast,

He

Lapland.

He with victorious Arms Sclavonia gains,
The Transylvanian, and Valachian plains.
Then flies to Thracia, and then leaving Greece,
Greedy of spoil, four times he bravely seeks
To pluck from Rome, then Mars his Minion,
The Plumes which the from all the world had won :
Guided by Rhadaguis, and Alarick,
Bold Vindimarus, and Theodorick.
Thence flies to France; from whence expulst, his Legions Rest ever since upon the Spanish Regions.

The Arms of these Kings are said to have been Or, three Ravens with displayed wings Purple, membered Gules. And let this suffice for the original, successes, and final period of the Goths; reserved by me unto this place, because most commonly conceived to be their original Country; at least the place out of which they issued, when they first moved towards the East to seek new dwellings.

2. SWEDEN.

SWEDEN is bounded on the East, with the Bodner Sea; on the West, with the Dofrine hills, which part it from Norway; on the North, with Lapland; on the South, with Gothland. So called from the Swethans, or Swethidi, the old Inhabitants hereof, of whom more anon. A Country sufficiently fruitful, but for the goodness of the soil inferior to Gothland; and not so well planted or inhabited as that is, by reason of the vast Woods which they will not suffer to be destroyed, and the greatness of some marishes hitherto undrained: but might be made as rich and fertile, if the people would; as appeareth by that plenty of corn growing amongst the woods, though much hindered by their shade and thickness, both from Sun and Rain. But for the character of this Country we had it formerly, when we spake of Swethland in the general; relating specially to this, as the principal part.

And as the largest and principal part of this great body, it contains in it many Provinces, and subdivisions, as namely, 1 Upland, 2 Suderman, 3 Noricia, 4 Westman, 5 Dalecarle, 6 Wormland, 7 Coppardele, 8 Gestrucia, 9 Helsingen, 10 Middelphar, 11 Angerman, bordering on Lapland, the furthest of these Provinces towards the North. Many of which have no Towns or Cities of any greatness, or beauty, the people living thin, and scattered, where they have wood for building, pasturage for their Beasts, and elbow room enough for themselves and their Cartel. Of these the principal are, 1 Upsal, an Archbishop's See, and an University, situate not far from the Bay of Bodner: beautified with a large Cathedral, wherein many of the ancient Kings of Swethland are interred. From this City the Country hereabouts is styled Archiepiscopatus Upsalensis. 2 Holm, by the Inhabitants called Stockholm, by the Russians Stecolue: the Royal seat of the Kings, a noted and well-traded Port, and the chief of the Kingdom: exceeding strong both by Art and Nature, as being situate in the Marishes, like Venice, at the mouth of the Lake, or River of Meler, the passage to it out of the Bay, being very narrow, and by consequence easily defended; and yet so deep within, that the greatest Ships of burden may sail up to the City: the Port within the Strait being so safe and capacious, that it is able to receive at one time 300 sail, which usually ride there without any Anchor. The Castle of this City is conceived to be one of the strongest holds in the world; fortified for the more assurance of it with 400 brass peeces, many of which are double Canons. 3 Nicopen, a sea Town on the same Bay also. These three are in that part hereof which is called Upland. Then there is 4 Strengnes, an Episcopal See; and 5 Telge, on the Lake of Meler, in the Province of Suderman: the title and estate of Charls, Father of Gustavus Adolphus, late King of Sweden: before his getting of the Crown, called Duke of Suderman. Next, in the Province of Westman, there are 6 Arvogen, on the West side of the said Lake of Meler; and 7 Arofe, rich in silver mines; out of which are made the best Dollars of Sweden: the mines here being so rich and profitable, that out of every fifteen pound weight of silver, the workmen draw a pound weight of gold. 8 Helsingen, upon the Bay of Bodner, in the Province of Helsingen, taking name from hence. 9 Oxelbo, or Ourbou, a strong piece in Nerissa; and 10 Lefinger, on the Bay of Bodner, one of the furthest North of Sweden, distinctly and specially so called.

3. LAPLAND.

LAPLAND; the most Northern part of all Scandia, hath on the East, Russia; on the West, the Province or Prefecture of Wardhny, in the Kingdom of Norway; on the North, the main Frozen Ocean; and on the South, Bodia, or Bodden, on both sides of the Bay so called.

It is named thus originally from the Lappi or Lappones, the Inhabitants of it, as they are from their blockish behaviour; the word Lappus signifying the same with ineptus or insultus in Latine, for such they are: rude, barbarous, and without the knowledge of Arts or Letters, as also without corn and houses, or any certain habitations (except only in Finmarch) feeding for the most part on fish, and the flesh of wild beasts, with the skins whereof sowed together they hide their nakedness. Generally they are meer Idolaters, giving divine honour all the day following to that living creature whatsoever it be, which they see at their first setting out in the morning: great Sorcerers, and abhorring ring the sight of strangers, whom till of late they used to flee from, at their first approach; but within few years past beginning to be more sociable and familiar. In a word, they are the true descendants of the ancient Finni (possessed in old times of all that tract, which lyeth between the Bay of Finland, and the Frozen Ocean) whose natural rudeness and barbarity, unmixed with the conditions of more civil people, they do still retain.

It is divided into the Eastern and the Western Lapland. The former appertaining to the Knez or great Duke of Muscovie, by which people the Inhabitants are called Dikiloppi, or the wild Lappians; is subdivided into Biarmia and Corelia; of which, if there be any thing in them worth taking notice of, we shall there speak more. The latter doth belong to the Crown of Sweden, subdivided into two parts also, that is to say, 1 Finmarch, and 2 Scricfinnia.

1 FINMARCH, being that part hereof which lieth next unto Norway, is the more populous of the two; the people for the most part idolatrous, but by the neighbourhood of the Norwegians, and resort of strangers unto Wardhny, and the parts adjoining, somewhat civilized; and in the borders of both Kingdoms favouring of Religion; possessed of sheds or sorry houses, and those houses reduced to parishes under the jurisdiction of the Archbishop of Upsal; the chief of which, (if there be any chief amongst them) are named, 1 Samman, and 2 Hjelfo. Called Finmarch, as the ancient bounds and March of the Finni, (of whom more anon) and therefore erroneously by Maginus, made a part of the Kingdom of Norway.

2 SCRICFINNIA, lieth between Finmarch and Russia. The name derived from the Finni, a great people of Scandia, and Scrigen a Dutch word signifying leaping, sliding, or bounding, for such is their gate. An etymologie not much improbable, in that the wooden-soled shoes, with sharp bottoms, which they used for their more speedy sliding over the ice, of which this Country is full, are by the Germans (who also use them) called Scrikesboenen, or sliding-shoes. The ancient Writers call this people Scritto-fani.

These are indeed the natural and proper Laplanders; and unto these the former character doth of right belong. Of stature very low, little more than Pygmies, but strong and active; well skill'd in Archery, and patient of cold and labour. Much given to hunting of wild Beasts, whom they kill with their Bows, devour the flesh, and cloath themselves with their skins, and they tie at the top of their heads, and leave no place open but for the sight; giving thereby occasion unto some to write, that they are hairy all over, like kine or horses. Such Deer (whereof they have great plenty) as they take unkill'd, they make to draw in little carts, as they shift their Quarters. But having served them for a while, they are killed at last, though perhaps for nothing but their skins: a certain number of which they pay yearly to the King of Sweden in the way of tribute. Three Companies of these Laplanders, so clad and armed as aforesaid, came into Germany in the year 1630. to serve Gustavus in those Wars; looked on with admiration by all spectators.

Towns we must look for none here, where no houses be: and yet there are some sheds and cabbins, on the Sea-shore; which Mariners having made for their refreshment when they came on land, have bestowed some names on, and possibly in time may become good Towns, now not worth the naming.

BODIA, BODEN, or BODNER, is situate on the South of Scricfinnia, betwixt it and the Bay or Gulf hence named; extending Southwards on the West side of it, till it joyns to Sweden, and on the East side, till it meet with the Province of Finland. Hence the division of this Country, into the Eastern, Northern, and Western Bodden; with reference to the situation of it on the Bay aforesaid. The Country not very plentiful of grain or fruits, but full of great variety of wild Beasts, whose rich skins yield great profit unto the Inhabitants; and by reason of the commodious situation on all sides of the Bay, well stored with Fish. Anciently it was part of the possessions of the Finni, but how or whence it had the name of Bodia, or Bodden, or Bodner, I am yet to learn. But whence soever it had the name, certain I am, that from hence the Gulf adjoining is called Sinus Bodicus, Bodner Zee, by the Dutch or German.

Chief Towns herein are, 1 Barkara, in West Bodden, betwixt the Bay and a great navigable Lake; 2 Gernia, a well-traded Emporie at the very bottom of the Bay, in North Bodden. 3 Helsingelac, more North than that, towards the borders of Lapland, and 4 Kerldby in East Bodden, on the Bank of the Gulf, conveniently seated for a Town of Trade.

5 FINLAND.

FINLAND hath on the North, Bodia; on the South, the Baltick Sea; or Mare Suevicum; on the East, Sinus Finnicus; on the West, Sinus Bodicus. It is by Mansfer thought to be called Finland, quod fine land; quod pulchrior & amantior sit Suecia, because it is a more fine and pleasing Country than Sweden it self. But indeed it is so called from the Finni or Fenni; a potent Nation, who have here dwelt, whose Character is thus framed by Tacitus. Finnis mira feritas, fæda paupertas, non arma, non equi, non penates; vitæ herbe, vestitui peller, cubile humus, sola in sagittis spes. The Finnis, saith he, are wonderfully barbarous, miserably poor, without Arms, Horse, or Household Gods; Herbs their food, the ground their bed, and the skins of beasts their best apparel, armed only with their Arrows, and in them their hopes. A Character which agreeth every way with our present Finlanders, especially

- 1439 31 Christopher, Count Palatine, and Duke of Bavaria (in title only) son of the Lady Margaret, sister of Ericus, succeeded in all three Kingdoms. After whose death the Swethlanders, being weary of the Danish Government, broke the agreement made at Colmar, for the uniting of the three Kingdoms under one Prince; and chose one Carolus Caninus to be their King, Anno 1448.
- 1448 32 Carolus Caninus, one of the meanest of the Nobility, and not long pleasing to the great ones: whose displeasure when he had incurred, and feared the consequences thereof, he gathereth together all the treasure he could, fled unto Dantzick, and there ended his days.
- 1455 33 Christiern, King of Denmark and Norway, called in by a party of the Swedes, and crowned King of Swethland; but outed again under colour that he had not kept conditions with them: the Kingdom governed after that (for a time) by Marshals.
- 1458 34 John, King of Denmark and Norway, the son of Christiern, received King by the Swedes, then overpowered by the Muscovite: but their turn being served, they expelled him again; returning to their former Government under Marshals. Of which Marshals (descended from Steno Stur, the Uncle of Carolus Caninus by his Mothers side) there were three in number; viz. 1 Steno, 2 Snanto, and 3 Steno Stur, the second: of which the two first died natural deaths, and the last being by Christiern the second slain in barrel, this Kingdom was again possessed by the Danes.
- 1519 35 Christiern II. King of all three Kingdoms, used his victory so cruelly here, and his Subjects so insolently at home, that here he was outed by Gustavus Ericus, and driven out of Denmark by his Uncle Frederick.
- 1523 36 Gustavus Ericus, descended from the ancient race of the Kings of Sweden, having vanquished and expelled the Danes, was on the merit of that action chosen King of Swethland, which still continueth in his house.
- 1561 37 Ericus V. son to Gustavus 8.
- 1569 38 John II. brother of Ericus, married Catharine the sister of Sigismund the second, King of Poland.
- 1593 39 Sigismund, the son of John the second, in the life time of his Father chosen King of Poland, Anno 1586. but was dispossessed of the Crown of Sweden (after a long War) by his Uncle Charles.
- 1607 40 Charles II. Duke of Suderman, the youngest Son of Gustavus Ericus, and brother of John and Eric, the two former Kings: first governed here as Viceroy for his Nephew Sigismund. But having an aim upon the Crown (to which he found the Lutherans not very favourable) he raised up a Calvinian party within that Realm; according to whose principles he began first to withdraw his obedience from his natural Prince, and afterwards to assume the Government to himself: speeding so well in his design that after a long War, he forced his Nephew to desist from all further Enterprises, and made himself King, Anno 1607.
- 1611 41 Gustavus Adolphus, son of Charles, having settled his affairs in Sweden, and made peace with the King of Denmark, with whom his Father was in War at the time of his death; fell first upon his Cousin Sigismund, the King of Poland, from whom he took many places of importance in Prussia and Livonia; and in pursuance of that War was made Knight of the Garter. Afterwards, having settled a Truce with him, he passed into Germany, then in great danger of being absolutely intrahled to the house of Austria. In which he prospered to beyond all expectation, that in one year he passed over the Elbe, the Rhine, and the Danow (which no Conquerour ever did before:) and having twice vanquished the Imperialists led by Tilly, and restored many of the German Princes unto their estates; he was in the current of his victories, slain in the battle of Lutzen, Novem. 1632. his body royally conveyed to Swethland, and there interred.
- 1632 42 Christina, sole daughter of Gustavus, of the age of seven years, acknowledged Queen of Sweden; the Estate governed by the Councils of the Nobility. After a long War, with variable success, in Germany, they came at last to this Accord in the Treaty of Munster; That she and her Successors, Kings and Queens of Swethland, should peaceably enjoy all the Higher Pomerania, with the Isles of Rugia, Wollin, and the Town of Stetin, in Lower Pomerania; the Town and Port of Wismar, in the Dukedom of Mecklenburg; and the whole Bishoprick of Bremen, and Verden, and the Prefecture of the Town of Wilhelmshaven; with the title of Dukes of Bremen, Pomerania, and Verden, Princes of Rugia, and Lords of Wismar, and by those titles to have place, as Princes of the Empire, in all Diets and Assemblies which concern the publick. By which agreement (if it hold) the Swedes have not only got a good footing in Germany, a strong influence upon all the Councils of the Empire, a door open for more forces (if occasion be) and a free passage into the Western Ocean, which before they wanted: but may in time prove absolute Masters of the Baltic Sea; and make the Hamburgers, those of Lubeck, and possibly the Kings of Denmark and the Empire itself, be at their devotion.

But leaving these things to the doubtful issue of contingents, let us next look upon the Forest and Revenues of the Crown of Sweden, before the time of Gustavus Adolphus, or as he found it at his succession to that Crown. For though the Swedes pretend their Kingdom to be Eldstive, especially especially since the failing of the Royal Line in Magnus the fourth, and Albert of Mecklenburg: yet still the eldest son, or next heir, succeedeth; unless put by, by faction and strong hand, as in the case of Sigismund, and his Uncle Charles; Which Charles so ordered his affairs, that having engaged the Kingdom in a War against his Nephew, he was solicited at the last to accept of the Crown: to which he would by no means yield, till a Law was made for the entailing of the same for ever unto his posterity, whether male or female, as an Hereditary Crown. But whether Hereditary or Eldstive, the King once settled in the Throne, is an absolute Monarch: having not only a power to levie Taxes on his Subjects, as he seeth occasion, as five, six, seven, eight dollars, or more yearly upon every Householder, according to the proportion of his estate; but also to grant a certain number of Paissants unto such as he means to favour, to be as Subjects and Vassals to him, according to his well-deserving. And whereas in the constitution of this Government, every Parish hath a Landman or Consul to decide the controversies of the same; as every Territory hath its Vicount, and each Province his Lamen; there lyeth an Appeal from the Landman unto the Vicount, and from the Vicount to the Lamen: who if they be supposed not to judge uprightly, then the Appeal lies unto the Council, and from the Council of Estate to the King and Council, (in whom is fixed the Sovereignty, and DERNIER RESORT) and not unto the King and Council, as before in Denmark.

The Forces of this King are either by Sea or Land. By Sea he is Commander wholly of the Bay of Bodner, and hath a great power in all the rest of the Baltick: being able to set out 70 good Men of War, as John the second did in the year 1578. Seven of which were good Gallies, and all the rest did carry above 50 cast pieces of all sorts; besides many other good Vessels fit for service. And if a Navy of this size will not serve the turn, he is not only furnished with Timber, Cordage, and all other necessaries for the building of Ships, and with good store of Ordnance and Ammunition for present use; but is able to raise upon a sudden 6000 Mariners, and upon little warning as many more: all which he entertaineth at no other charges in a manner, than to find victuals, inasmuch as John the second, before mentioned, did use to say, that that which cost the King of Spain a million of Crowns, cost not him 100000 Dollars.

For his Land Forces, they may best be estimated by the Trained Bands (as we may call them) in every Province: there being in all 32 Veilles (or Ensigns) of Foot constantly trained and mustered in the several Provinces; each Veille comprehending 600 or 700 men, amounting in the total to 20000 Foot, all in a manner Musketiers, ready to march whenever the Kings occasion shall so require. And then for Horse, there are eleven Cornets in continual readines, for Sweden and Gothland, and two for Finland, maintained at the charges of those Countries: to which the King may add at his own charges as many more as he pleaseth. And for an instance of what this King is able to do, without putting his estates in hazard by draining them too dry of men to make good his Kingdom: we find that John the second in his Navy of 70 Ships (spoken of before, had above 18000 Land Souldiers, besides Mariners. And in the Army which Gustavus Adolphus, the late King, brought into Germany, there were mustered no fewer at one time, than 12000 Horse, and 34000 Foot, all Finnes and Swethlanders. For the accommodating of which Armies with Artillery, and the like Engines of War, it is thought that the Kings hereof are Masters of 8000 great pieces, for the most part brass, with Mortar-pieces and Granadoes in proportion to them.

But that which makes his Land Forces most considerable, is their hardnes in enduring the extremities of Wind and Weather; inasmuch that it is usual with them to stand Centinel a whole Winters night of 18 hours long, without being relieved: their exact Discipline, and obedience to their Commanders, and finally their indefatigable industry in making their own shoes, apparel, stocks for Muskets, and all other necessaries. Which doth not only make them fit to endure any labour which is put upon them in the Wars; but keeps them from idleness, and the pride of Mutinies; the ordinary effect, in great Armies, of sloth and ease. Nor do they want encouragement on the Kings part neither; who first gives to every Souldier victuals, which he accomps not in their pay, and that according to his obedience and desert: 2 If a Souldier be taken Prisoner, him the King doth usually redeem at his own charges; and 3 If a Souldiers horse be slain under him, the King supplieth him with another: which makes the Souldiers (very sensible of such obligations) exceedingly conformable unto his commands, how dangerous soever they seem to be.

Finally, as for his Revenues, they must needs be great, there being four wayes allowed him to amass his treasures. First, the Revenues of the Church, consisting before the Reformation of seven Bishopricks, and sixty Monasteries, which enjoyed very great possessions; all seized on by Gustavus Ericus, and by him incorporate to the Crown; excepting only what is given back to maintain the Bishops. Secondly, Mines which are here of all metals in very great plenty, except of Gold and Silver, which they have more sparingly; the tenth whereof in all places belongs to the King, and yields him such a fair Intrade, that in the year 1578. the Kings part out of two or three Mines of Copper only, amounted to 30000 Dollars. Thirdly, Tenth out of all encrease, as Rie, Wheat, Barley, Fish, Oxen, Skins, and the like commodities; the sum whereof, though not certainly known (because the increase is so uncertain) yet it was once computed, that the tenth of the Oxen only, came in one year to 18000 Dollars, besides provision for his household. Fourthly and lastly, Customs imposed on Merchandise, and paid in all his Haven Towns for all commodities imported, or exported, of what sort soever. Besides all which, he hath his Contributions in all times of War, power of imposing taxes (though moderately used) as his necessities require: and on the marriage of a Daughter, the Kingdom is to provide her portion, which of late times hath been fixed at the certain sum of 100000 Dollars, besides Plate and moveables. Out of which several Items to sum up the total: It was observed, that in the year 1578. King John the second (all charges, ordinary and extraordinary, being first deducted) did lay up in his Treasury no less than 700000 Dollars; which was a vast sum for those times, considering especially the great charge which the King had been at that year, in furnishing a Navy of 70 sail, and railing 18000 Land Souldiers, (besides Horse) for defence of his Realm against the Danes. And yet it is conceived by some knowing men, that his Revenues would be much greater than they are, if he did employ strangers to work the Mines, which the Natives do not husband to the best advantage; and yet are fearful to difcover them to other Nations, upon some jealousies, which they are naturally addicted to: or if he would turn Merchant, and in his own ships send out Corn and Cordage, with Matts and Timber fit for building; and in them bring back Salt and other necessaries, which his Kingdom wants, setting them at a far less price than now they go at, and yet gaining very greatly by it too.

The Arms of this Kingdom are Acure, three Crowns, Or.

There are in Swethland

And thus much for SWETHLAND.

OF RUSSIA.

RUSSIA, is bounded on the East, by Tartary; on the West, with Livonia, and Finland, from which divided by great mountains, and the River Polna; on the North, by the Frozen Ocean, and some part of Lapland; and on the South, by Lithuania, a Province of the Kingdom of Poland, and the Crim Tartars inhabiting on the banks of Palmu Maotis, and the Euxine Sea. It standeth partly in Europe, and partly in Asia, the River Tanais or Don running through it; the common boundary of those great and noted parts of the World.

It was thus called from the Rossi or Russi, a people of Mount Taurus, or Taurica, Chersonesus (if not both) who in the declining times of the Greek Empire, possessed themselves of some parts of it; and being the prevailing people, imposed their name on all the rest. Called also Russia Alba, to distinguish it from Russia Nigra, a Province of Poland, quod incolae omnium gentium ipsius imperio subiectarum (as it from Russia albis & Pileis plerumque utantur, because one observes discoursing of the affairs hereof) vestibus albis & Pileis plerumque utantur, because the Inhabitants use to wear white caps and vestments. And why not thus? since the people of Margiana and Sogdiana in Asia, have the name of Jesellasse, only because they wear green turbans, as the word importeth. Finally, it is called Moscovie, from Moscovie the chief Province of it; as that denominated from the Moschi, of whom more anon.

In reference to the heavenly bodies, it is said by some to be situate betwixt the 8th. and 20th. Climates; the longest day in the Southern parts, being but 16 hours and an half; and almost 22 hours and an half in the Northern parts. But this is to be understood only of the Province of Moscovie, properly and specially so called; and not of the whole Empire of the Moscovie, according to the bounds before laid down. For taking in the Northern Provinces belonging to it, as East Lapland, Comoranda, and Petzora, lying within the Arctic Circle, the longest day in Summer will be full 6 months (for so long do those Countries see no night at all) which is a mighty disproportion, from the length of the longest day in the most Southern parts, being but 16 hours and an half, as before is said. And by this rule we are to take the dimensions also. For though some make the length hereof from North to South, that is to say, from Cala in the North, to Astrachan near the Caspian Sea, to be no more than 2260

2260 Versts, or 3690 Italian miles; yet they confess, that reckoning forwards from Tromschu, the furthest point of Petzora, the full length thereof will be nigh so much more. And for the breadth, reckoning from Narve, on the Bay of Finland (now in possession of the Swedes) to the Province of Severia in the East, it amounteth to 4400 Versts, or 3300 Italian miles; each Verst being estimated at three quarters of an English mile. Which mighty Territory, if it were peopled answerable to some other parts of the World, would either make it too great for one Prince to hold; or make that Prince too great and puissant for all his neighbours.

The people, as is commonly reported of them, are very perfidious, crafty, and deceitful in all their bargains, false-dealers with all they have to do with, making no reckoning of their promises, and studying nothing more than ways to evade their Contracts. Vices so generally known, and noted in them, that when they are to deal with strangers, they dissemble their Country, and pretend to be of other Nations, for fear lest nobody should trust them. Destitute of humane affections, and so unnatural, that the Father insults on his Son, and he again over his Father and Mother: So malicious one towards another, that you shall have a man hide some of his own goods in the house of some man whom he hateth, and then accuse him for the stealth of them. They are exceedingly given to drink, inasmuch that all heady and intoxicating drinks are by Law prohibited, and two or three days only in a year allowed them to be drunk in. For the most part they are strong of body, swift of foot, of a square proportion, broad, short, and thick; grey-eyed, broad-bearded, and generally furnished with prominent paunches. The Commons live in miserable subjection to the Nobles, and they again in as great slavery to the Duke or Emperor; to whom no man of all the vulgar dares immediately exhibit a Petition, or make known his grievances: nay the mean Lords and Officers are squeamish in this kind, and but on great submission, will not commend unto the Duke a poor mans cause. They are altogether unlearned, even the Priests meanly indoctrinated; it being cautioned by the Great Duke, that there be no Schools, lest there should be any Scholars, but himself; so that the people use to work commonly on the Lords day, holding it fit to be kept by none but Gentlemen; and to say in a difficult question, God and our Great Duke know all this; and in other talk, All we enjoy, health and life, is all from our Great Duke; According to whose pleasure every man is prescribed what habit he shall wear, both for matter and fashion suitable unto their condition. In the time of my Author, their habit was a long garment without plaits, which hung down to their heels; commonly of white or blew, with very strait sleeves; on their legs wearing buskins up as high as the calf, for the most part red, high at the heels, and beset with nails of iron. The stuff, and trimming of the dress is the only difference betwixt the Noble and the Peasant.

The women are attired also much after this manner; but if great and noble, suffered to set forth themselves with store of pearls and precious stones, which hang so thick about their ears, that they do almost pull their ears from their heads. A second marriage is conceived no blemish in point of chastity, but the third condemns them of incontinence: naturally subject enough to the lusts of the flesh, but private, and fearful to offend; if once lascivious, then most intolerably wanton. It is the fashion of these Women to love that Husband best which beareth them most; and to think themselves neither loved nor regarded, unless they be two or three times a day well-favouredly swaddled. The Author of the Treasury of Times, telleth a story of a German Shoemaker, who travelling into this Country, and here marrying a Widow, used her with all kindness that a woman could (as he thought) desire; yet did not she seem contented. At last learning where the fault was, and that his not bearing her was the cause of her pensiveness, he took such a vein in cudgelling her sides, that in the end, the Hangman was fain to break his neck for his labour.

They use the Slavonian Language, but so corrupt and mixt with other Languages, that they and the Slavonians understand not one anothers meaning, but by circumstance only: yet in Jugaria (out of which the Hungarians are thought to have issued) they speak a corrupt Hungarian; and in Petzora and the Country of Czeremissians, they have a Language to themselves, distinct from others.

They first received the Christian Faith in the year 987; or as some say, Anno 942. by the preaching and ministry of the Greeks, sent hither by the Patriarch of Constantinople: of which Church they are constant followers, both for Rites and Doctrine; but not without some superstitious of their own superadded to them, viz. not coming near a Cross, Church, or Monastery, but they kneel down, and make the sign of the Cross, saying, Miloy Hspodi, i. e. Lord have mercy upon us; nor entering into any Church, until washed and bathed. They bear a deadly hatred to the Jews, whom they suffer not to live amongst them: and so great friendship unto a Calf, that they hold it a great offence to kill one, or to eat his flesh. Their Church is governed by 18 Bishops, and 2 Metropolitans; all of them subordinate to their Archbishop or Patriarch; as he, in former times, to the Constantinopolitan, by whom he used to be confirmed. But about an hundred years ago they withdrew themselves from that subjection; the Patriarch being nominated by the Great Duke, and consecrated by two or three of his own Suffragans. Without the counsel and advice of this Patriarch, the Emperor or Great Duke doth nothing of any moment. The Bishops are all chosen out of the Monastick or Regular Clergy; which makes the Monks (being all of the Order of S. Basil) to live very religiously; in hope to be advanced to the Episcopal dignity. And for the Secular Clergy, or Parochial Priests, there is not much required of them, but to say their Masses (which being in their own Language they may easily do) and to read now and then one of St. Chrysostoms Homilies, translated heretofore for the use of those Churches: after the death of their first wives not permitted to marry, in other things little differing from the rest of the people. Once in the year it is lawful and usual with them to hold a Synod, at which the Patriarch hath his Crozier or Pastoral staff carried before him, as the Popes Legate hath the Cross; where they make Constitutions

Muscovite. ies of State to hold discourse with the Ambassadors of neighbouring Princes, but only in the Emperor's hearing. By means whereof the Chronography of this vast Empire is come but lately to our hands; though the Power, Police, and Regencies of it, being points discernible by the Ministers of other Princes, and by the course and conduct of their affairs, are as well known as those of less distance. Which said, we will first begin with Muscovite, the prevailing Province, that which gives name to this whole Empire, with reference to which the situation and position of the rest of the Provinces, is set forth unto us in our Authors.

MUSCOVIE.

MUSCOVIE, (specially so called, is seated in the very center of this Estate, and is more fit to border the affairs thereof, the largest Province of the whole, extending from East to West 600 Dutch, or 2400 English miles; so populous withal, that besides 300000 Boulers, or Gentlemen, bound to serve on Horse-back at their own charges (like the Turks Timariots), the Great Duke is able to raise 70000 Foot (which is a great matter for a Country so little cultivated.) The soil hereof is stiff and clammy, but might be made more profitable than it is, were it well manured, or ploughed and ordered, as it is in all other Countries. For here, and in most parts else of this large Dominion, the people are accustomed to sow no more of their Land, than what they dig with the Spade, or can break up with a stick very sharply pointed; whereof they carry great numbers into the field, that when one breaks they may use another. Chief places in this Province are: 1. Mosco, the Imperial seat, and the See of the Patriarch, so called of the River Mosco upon which it is situate. Exceedingly improved both in state and beauty, since the time that Daniel the fourth Lord of Muscovite removed the seat Royal hither, from Kalagomire, where before it was: inasmuch that it was once grown to nine miles in compass, containing then 41500 Families, but being fired by the Tartars, Anno 1571. (at what time there were burnt 800000 persons) it is reduced to five miles only. The houses for the most part of Wood and Dirt, the streets very dirty; it is reduced to five miles only. In stead whereof there are without either Ditch, Wall, or Rampart, to defend it against an Enemy. In stead whereof there are two Castles in the outward parts of it, the one called Kiagorod, the other Balsigorod; environed with the River Mosco, and another Water called Neglinna, which here falls into it. It contains 16 Churches, the most of them of the same materials as the houses are: and the Palace of the great Duke situate in the midst thereof, (which for the greatness of it may be thought a little City) fortified with 17 Towers, 3 Bulwarks, and a continual Garrison (if the Great Duke be there) of 25000 men for the Guard of his person. 2. Stoboda, a Bishops See, North-east to Mosco, on the banks of one of the greatest Rivers which fall into the Volga. 3. Ruschova, the title of a Dukedom, fortified with a Castle of Wood of which there is the most of the Fortresses of this Country are made) situate 2 1/2 leagues from Mosco towards the West, on the banks of the Volga, which hath its fountain in the Territory and precincts hereof. 4. Jaroslava, on the banks of the Volga also, a Town and Castle distant about 46 Dutch miles from Mosco, formerly the Estate and patrimony of the second sons of the Great Duke, but united to the Royal Domain, by John Wasilwitsky, and by him added also to the title Imperial. It is also one of the Sees Episcopal. 5. Rustova, the See of one of the two Metropolitans, situate in a fruitful soil, well stored with fish, and yielding good plenty of Sale. One of the ancientest Principalities of all this Empire, and held accustomedly by the second sons of the Great Duke, as a State distinct: but conquered by John Wasilwitsky, Anno 1565. and added to the title and Patrimony of the Great Duke himself, the younger sons being from thenceforth put off with pensions. 6. Vologda, a Bishop See, situate in a Fenny and Woody Country; very strong by nature, and beautified with one of the strongest Castles of all this Estate, where the Great Duke doth sometime lay a part of his Treasure: that part especially which is raised of the English and Dutch Merchandise, which being landed at the Port of St. Nicolas, is first brought hither, where having paid a new Toll or Custom, it goeth on to Mosco. Betwixt this City and that of Jaroslava before mentioned, for the space of an hundred English miles, where stood in former times 50 goodly Villages, (some of them of a mile in length) the Country in a manner is left wholly desolate, and without Inhabitant; abandoned by the people, by reason of the insupportable pressures which were laid upon them.

2. SMOLENSCO. 3. MOSAISKI. 4. PLESCOW.

THE Dukedom of SMOLENSCO, is situate on the course of the River Nieper, or Borysthenes, full of many thick Forests, from whence they carry a great number of rich skins yearly. Places of most observation in it, are 1. Smolensko, situate on the Nieper, a Bishops See, about 80 Polish miles from Mosco; begirt on every side with Mountains, and spacious Woods. A large Town, and of great esteem in these parts of the Empire, and giving name unto this Province; which heretofore was governed in a free condition under the patronage and protection of the King of Poland, in the time of Alexander, a late King thereof, by Basilius the Great Duke conquered and added unto this Estate. Taken by the Polanders in the year 1610. after a long siege of two years, with the slaughter of 200000 Muscovites, and the loss of many of the besiegers; but retored again to Michael Fedorowitsch the Great Duke, on the making of the peace between them. 2. Biela, a principality of itself, having the honour of a Castle, and reckoned in the usual title of the Knez, or Emperor.

3. MOSAISKI hath in length 350 Italian miles, and as much in breadth; so called from Moskwa, the chief Town hereof, and a Bishops See; taken together with the Territory or Province appertaining to it, from Alexander King of Poland, by John the Great Duke, Father of Basilius, before mentioned.

4. PLES-

4. PLESCOW or PSKOW, contains in length 350 Italian miles, in breadth 230 or thereabouts; so called from Pleskow, or Pikow, the chief City of it, and a Bishops See: great, powerful, and well walled about, the only walled City of all this Empire. So large within the Walls, that when it was besieged by Stephen King of POLAND, there were in it for defence thereof 70000 Foot, and 7000 Horse, besides the Natural Inhabitants of it; which in all ordinary computation must be many more. It belonged formerly to the Poles, in the right of the Dukedom of Lithuania; taken from them by Basilius the Great Duke of Moscovite, Anno 1599. by whom and his successors used in the Royal title.

5. NOVOGORD.

NOVOGORD or NOVOGROD, is one of the largest Provinces or Dukedoms in all Russia; bordering on Livonia, towards Sinnu Finnicus, or the Gulf of Finland. A colder Country and less fruitful than that of Moscovite, because situate somewhat further North: the longest Summer day in Mosco not being above 18 hours, whereas in Novogrod the chief City hereof, it is very near 20. By consequence the Winter nights being of that length, must make the air exceeding cold, and the soil as comfortless. Here is in this Province the great Lake Ilmen, spoken of before, 80 Italian miles in compass; as also that called Ladoga, before also mentioned.

Towns of most estimation in it are 1. Novogrod it self, the wealthiest and goodliest City of all the North; affirmed to be in greatness not inferior to Rome; called therefore Novogrod the Great (to difference it from another of the same name near unto Valadomir;) an Archbishops See, and one of the four Mart Towns of the Hanse-Merchants, resorted to from all parts for the trade of Muscovite, brought thither by Land, and thence transported through the Baltick to most parts of Christendom. So confident in those times of their power and strength, that they used to say, that men could do nothing against God and them: but found the contrary when taken from the Crown of Poland, by the Great Duke of Moscovite. The trade hereof since much decayed, by the finding out of the North-east passage to the Port of St. Nicolas, where the English and Dutch Merchants barter with the Muscovite. Yet still it keeps the reputation of the principal City, situate on the River Naf, which the Dutch call Ny; the buildings for the most part of Wood and Clay: distant from Mosco 120 Dutch miles, and about 200 from the main body of the Baltick; betwixt which and this City lieth the whole Bay of Finland, the entrances whereof upon the Dwina, (which leads towards Novogrod) are fortified with the strong Towns and Garrisons of Narve, and Rivallia, both in the hands of the King of Sweden; which is another great hindrance to the trade of this Town. 2. Narve, on the North bank of Dwina, where it falls into the Bay of Finland, or Sinnu Finnicus, in the Province or Territory of Witchilaw: heretofore reckoned of as a part of Livonia, but being taken by Basilius the Great Duke, with the rest of this Country, and the Town of Novogrod it self, Anno 1477. it was impregnable fortified by the care of his son Vassilwitsch, who for a reward unto the Archibishop being a Polonian, put out both his eyes, to disable him from building the like again. But having left all the Natives in their own habitations, without abating either their strength or number, the Town and Castle not long after was betrayed to the King of Sweden, who still holds it. 3. Pozow or Pozowia, and 4. Polocow, two strong pieces, situate in the borders against the Polanders. 5. Volsko, besieged by Stephen King of Poland, with an Army of 100000 men; forced to retire without taking it, with the loss of many of his best Captains and Common Soldiers. It is distant from Novogrod 28 Dutch miles, the Country about it called Volsk: where they say for certain, that all Cattel which are brought thither, of what hair or colour soever they be, upon a little stay there become all white. The people of this tract have a Language (or some Dialect rather) peculiar only to themselves. 6. Juanogrod, a strong Castle not far from Volsko, 40 miles from Novogrod; a frontire Castle against the Swedes Garrisoned in Narve, to repulse whose inroads it was built.

In this Country, and not far from the Town of Novogrod, was fought that memorable battel betwixt the Sarmatians, and their Slaves. For when the Asiatick Scythians went to plant themselves in Media, and the parts adjoining; some of the Sarmatians, then Inhabitants of this Tract, went along for company. Their long stay, caused their wives, despairing of their return, to comfort themselves with their Slaves both at bed and board; to whom they brought a lusty increase of youths: who being well grown, and hearing that the Sarmatians were upon their coming back, joyed together against them; the Slaves to retain that wealth and freedom which they were possessed of; the women for fear of the displeasure of their Husbands; and the young men for defence of their Fathers and Mothers. With joint forces they go out to meet them, before their entrie into the Country; neither are the Masters slow in their advance, hoping to take them unprovided. At Novogrod they have the first fight of each other. The Masters scorning to defile their swords on so ignoble an Enemy, assault them with whips; and by the terror thereof got a signal victory. In memory of which battel, the people of that City have ever since stamped their money with the figure of an Horse-man shaking a whip in his hands: And it is the custom of all Muscovite, that the maids in the time of wooing, send such a whip, curiously wrought by her own hands, to that Sister, whom she resolves on for her husband, in token of her future subjection to him. But of this more hereafter in another place.

6. CORELIA. 7. BIARMIA.

Sixty Dutch miles from Novogrod, lieth the Province called Corelia, extending Northwards as far as to a branch of the Frozen Sea, where the longest day is 20 hours and a half: the nights proportionable

tionable in the Winter, make it cold and barren. It bordereth on the East of Finland, from which parted by a long and rough ridge of Mountains. By reason of which situation betwixt two great Princes the people are enforced to pay tribute to both, though properly the Subjects of the Great Duke of Moscow. Chief Towns whereof are Kexholm, or Hexholm, in the hands of the Swedes; and 2 Corlinburg, the Chief Towns of the Province, belonging with the rest of the Country unto the Moscovites. By some this Province is made a part of the Eastern Lapland; but, I think, erroneously: the people having some good Towns, and favouring of some humanity; neither of which are known or heard of amongst the Laplenders. 3 Nordenberg, on the mouth of a Lake, which by the River called Wargus, emptieth it self into the Bay of St. Nicolas. 4 Umea, of the Frozen Ocean, which bounds Corelia, is the

On the North side of that branch or arm of the Frozen Ocean, which bounds Carelia, lyeth the Western part of Lapland, which by a proper name is called BARMIA: the Country of the Dikloppi, or Wild Lappians, as the Moscovites call them, to whose Duke or Emperour they are subject. We had their character before, when we were in Swethland; nor shall we need to repeat it here: as barbarous and as rude as the worst sort of those mentioned in Scirifinnia, and as Idolaters as they; but more (if more may be) inclined to luftfulness than the others. In the Winter Solfstic, when the Sun entereth into Capricorn, they have night for three whole moneths together: during which time lurking in their Caves, they have leisure to consult with the Prince of Darkness; being very great Sorcerers, able (as some affirm) to raise Winds, Clouds, Tempests, and do many strange things. Towns here are none. Some Sheds and Cabbins on the Sea Coasts, patched up by the Sailers, for their reception and refreshment as they came on land, and named according to their fancies; but not here considerable.

11 JUGRIA.

Opposite to Blarmia, or East-Lapland, on the other side of the Bay leading towards the Port of St. Nicholas, lyeth a large Promontory or Headland stretching out far into the North, beyond the Artick; comprehending in it four Provinces of the Russian Empire: that is to say, Petzora, Condora, Oldora, and Jugria; belonging formerly to the Tartars, but won from them of late years by the Russian Emperours; extending by that means their Territories to the River Ob, but not a whit improving them in power or patrimony. Howsoever somewhat must be said of them, because parts of this great body which we are to disfect.

8 PETZORA, so called from a River of that name, is fenced on every side by Mountains and unpassable rocks; extending Northwards to the Sea, and crossed with a vast chain of hills, part of the Hyperborei, spoken of before: so high, that a certain man having travelled in the ascent of them 17 days together, is said to have returned back again, despairing to attain the top of them. Covered in the Winter time with perpetual snows, in the Summer with as scorching heats by the continual lying of the Sun on all parts thereof. The people are of a plain and simple nature, and received the Russian Faith and Empire at one time together, Anno 1518. The chief Town of it, 1 Petzora, or Pechora, at the fall of that River into the Sea; a small Town, but having three Churches in it: the people whereof, though otherwise sufficiently simple, as before is said, do in the Summer time catch Partrich, Ducks, Swans, Geese, and other fowl, which they sale and lay by till the Winter, and then live upon them. So good a Tutor is the Belly, that the Poet did not unfully give it the titles of Artis Magister, and Ingenii Lector: whereof this may serve for one example.

9 CONDORA lyeth on the North of Petxora, more near the Pole; by consequence a colder Country, and of worse condition; in one half of the Country being continual day, and the other half as long a night. The people universally Idolaters, worshipping some Images (or Idols) in the shape of a Man, others in that of Bears, Wolves, &c. which they adorn with the richest Furs they can get, and hide them in their Caves for fear of the Raffes: who if they chance to light upon them, as they hunt those parts for Sables, Foxes, and Bevers: take away their Furs, and bestow a greater heat upon them in fires. The chief Town hereof is Pusfozrea, over against Nova Zemla, on or near the great lake called Oxera, whence it hath the name; situate in the 68 degree of Northern Latitude, 50 minutes over.

10. OBODORA, so called from the River Ob, on both sides of whose banks it lyeth, is the most North-Eastern Province of all these Dominions: won to the obedience of the Russers, in the Reign of Theodore the son of Iohn, Great Duke of Muscovie. At what time the people had no Cities, lived in Hoods or Companies, eat the Beasts they took, knew no Corn nor Bread. They were then very good Archers, sharpening their Arrows with Fish-bones; with which bones and the sinews of the Beasts, they sewed Furs together for their Clothing; which they wear inward in the Winter, outward in the Summer, covering their Houses with Elk-skins. By this Theodore were some Castles built on the River side, to which he sent condemned persons, and brought it into the form of a petty Kingdom. But his Successor Boris built Tooms, the chief Town hereof, with divers other Towns on both sides of the Water, not worth naming here. But notwithstanding this subjection to the Muscovites, they continue still in their old Idolatry, worshipping an ancient Idol, in form of an old woman, holding in each Arm a Child, and a third at her feet, called by them Zlatu Babu, or the Golden old Wife; to which they offer precious Furs, sacrifice Harts, and therewith do consult touching things to come. But some accompt this for a Fable, or a meer mistake.

II FUGRIA, or JUHAR, lyeth also on the Northern Seas, but more South than either of the other; betwixt Petcore or Petchora, and the Province of Dwina: the longest day in Summer being not not above 21 hours, or not fully that. The people for the most part Idolaters, and worship the same Images as do those of Ordora; affirmed by some to be the Progenitors of the present Hungarians; who coming out of this Country over-ran all Pannonia, and there fixed their dwellings. For proof of which it is affirmed that they speak the old Hungarian language; not used but in this Country, and the North parts of Hungary, betwixt Danubius and Thyffens: Which more learned men affirm to be the Jacizian, the language of the Jaxages, who antiently possessed that Country in the times of the Romans. But leaving this dispute to another place, certain it is, that they are subject to the Moscovites, but so poor and miserable a people, that they have few Towns, and not many houses; and so bare of money, that in stead thereof they pay Furs for tribute to their Emperour.

12 SEVERIA. 13 PERMIA. 14 RHEZAN.

SEVERIA, or SIBIOR, as the Moscovites called it, lieth in a long tract on the banks of the River Ob, or Oby, fouth of Obdorsk, and the rest of the four last Provinces. The Countrey very fruitful, and abounding with all things necessary, notwithstanding that there be great Deferts, and some Forests also: but those Forests well stored with black Foxes, Ermines, Sables, and the like wild beasts; which yield more profit by their rieh Fur, than any more fertile Countrey doth by its Corn and fruits: Inomuch that in the year 1589. there were collected out of this Province only, in the way of tribute for the Emperour, 466 timber of Sables, (every Timber containing 40 skins) five Timber of Martrons, 180 Cases of Black Foxes, (every Case containing 40 skins) besides other commodities. The woods also do offer good plenty of Honey, and the plains of Herbage; well watered with the River Sema, which falleth into the Desna, and both together into that of the Nieper, or Boryssenes. There are in it many Towns and Castles, the principal whereof are 1 Silber, on the West side of the River Ob, which gives name to the Province; 2 Branki, not far from the great Forest from hence named. 3 Starodub, 4 Poturovo, and 5 Czezenigo.

The people hereof, by reason of their continual skirmishes with the neighbouring Tartars, are the most warlike Nation of all the Russes : heretofore governed by a Duke or Prince of their own, who at the first acknowledged no Superior ; but afterwards was severally and successively Tributary to the Lithuanians, the Polanders, and the Moscovite; and finally, the last Duke being fully accused of treason, was outed of his Estate by Basilus the Great Duke ; who added it to the rest of his Dominions, as it hath continued ever since.

13 PERMIA is situate on the South-west of Sibir, or Severtia, a large Province, distant 250 Dutch miles from Mosco: so called from Perm, or Permia, the chief Town hereof, situate on the River Vishore, or Vishorna. The second Town of note is called Sichiansky. The people (as also those of Sibir) are of the Moscovite Religion, and live most by hunting wild beasts, whose flesh they eat, and make good Merchandise of their skins, many of which they pay yearly to the Great Duke in way of tribute; who makes a good commodity of them, selling them to the Merchant at excessive rates. They have no corn of their own growth, nor will they buy any elsewhere; but in stead of bread, eat the flesh of Stags, dried and prepared in the Sun: Speaking a Language of their own, different from the rest of the Russies; and in stead of Horses and Oxen, make use of great dogs and stags, whom they train up to draw their sleds, from one place to another. There is good store of wood amongst them; but they want Cedars, and they have paid dearly for that want. For John Vasilivich meaning to pick a quarrel with them, sent to them for certain loads of Cedar wood, whereof he knew there grew none in their Country; and upon word returned that they had not such wood, he fined them at 12060 Rubles.

14 RHEZAN, a great and goodly Province, is situate betwixt the River Tannais, and that of Oke; the most fruitfull Countrey of all Russia, and (if report be true) of the whole world also: it being credibly affirmed that one grain of corn doth bring forth six ears; the stalks hereof growing so thick, that an horse can hardly pass through them, or a Quail flie out of them, but with very much difficulty. Here is also great plenty of fruits, better than are to be found elsewhere in Russia; together with good store of Honey, fish, towl, and other commodities; besides Ermians, Beyvers, and the like, common in these Countries. Chief Towns hereof are, 1 Tiella, famous for the fountain or spring head of the River Tannais, which ariseth near it. 2 Colluga, well garrisoned for fear of the Crim Tartars. 3 Corfira, a Bishops See; as is also 4 Rhezan, the principal of the Province, which it giveth name to, feared upon the Banks of the River Ocgue. A Countrey populous and well-planted, affording to the Great Duke 15000 Boiars, or Gentlemen which serve on horseback, and betwixt 30 and 40000 foot.

15 WIATHKA. 16 CASAN.
17 ASTRACHAN.

South-east of Rhezan, beyond the banks of the River Kamme, and about 150 Dutch miles from Moscow, lyeth the Province called W I A T H K A ; fenny and barren, but well stored with fish and honey, and wild beasts good plenty. Heretofore subject to the Tartars, and then the receptacle or retreat of all fugitive servants, here very gladly entertained : but the Tartarians being expelled, it was made subject by Basilins to the Dukes of Moscovie. I do not read of any Towns which should be here, which makes me think that they do still retain so much of the Tartar with them, as to live in Hordes, and Companies, without any fixt dwellings : or at the best, in scattered houses, not hitherto united into Towns ther forein Embassador to his head for his too much perverseness, he used our Sir Thomas Smith with all kindness imaginable. Another time, when the Jesuite Possesine began to perwade with him, to approve of the Religion of the Church of Rome; upon the information of the English Embassador, that the Pope was a proud Prelate, and would make Princes kiss his feet; he grew into such a rage, that the Jesuite was afraid he would have beat out his brains. But to return again to the Port of S. Nicolas, it is so called from an Abby there built unto that Saint, the tutelary Saint, and local Patron of the Nation. Which said, I will set sail from this Port to the Russian Islands, and see what may be said of them to our present purpose.

24 The RUSSIAN Islands.

THE RUSSIAN ISLANDS are but two; both of them in the northern or Frozen Ocean, on the Coasts of this Countrey; that is to say, 1 Sir Hugh Willoughbies Island, and NOVA Zemla; both subject (if to any) to the Knez or great Duke of Moscow. 1 WILLONGHBIES ISLAND, was so called from Sir Hugh Willoughby, because he first discovered it, Anno 1553, and was hereabouts found frozen to death, the next year following. For being employed by the Merchants of London in the time of King Edward the 6. to find out a new way being employed by the Merchants of London in the time of King Edward the 6. to find out a new way to Moscow, Cathala, and China, he proceeded so far as to this Island (situate almost opposite to the Bay of S. Nicolas) where the weather proved so extreme, and the Frosts so vehement, that his Ship was set fast in the ice, and all his people, with himself, frozen to death; in which condition they were found the next year after, with an exact description of their voyage, and fortunes. Notwithstanding which disastrous beginning, the enterprize was pursued by some noble Adventurers, as Jenkinson, Burroughs, Pet. Jackman, and others of the English Nation, who opened the way as far as to the River Ob, (the East bounder of Russia) but by reason of the length of the way, the vast floating Islands of Ice, and perpetual nights, for many months together in Winter, could advance no further.

2 NOVA ZEMLA, situate on the East of Willoughbies Island opposite to Pustozera in Condora before mentioned, was first discovered by such Adventurers, as followed Willoughbies design. Famous for nothing but a race of short-statured men, not above four foot high, a degree above the height of Pygmies: not yet so far discovered as to know any thing thereof, but by the relation of the Russes, who affirm the Inhabitants to have neither Religion, nor Civility, nor the precepts of any Law; but that they worshipped the Sun, Moon, and Northern Starr, to which they offer an yearly Sacrifice of their Deer; that the Island is woody, desert, and not easie for travel, having in it neither green bough nor Deer; yet harbouring great store of Bears, and such ravenous and dangerous beasts. Found experimentally true by William Barrenson, and his Associates, employed by the Hollanders for this discovery, Anno 1594. and 1596. in which last year, after many dreadfull combats with huge flakes of Ice, they were forced to winter in this Island, where they built an house, as well to preserve themselves from being buried in snow, as from being devoured by the Bears (some of them 13 foot in length) which with the loss of two of their company devoured by those savage creatures, they at last effected; some of them coming home in safety the October following. And though they seemed to give some hope, that a way might be found unto Cathala on the North of this Island (themselves having gone as far North as the 81 degree of Latitude, within 9 of the Pole) yet it is generally conceived that the undertaking is unprofitable, the success impossible.

And so I leave it to return to the story of Russia, called antiently by the name of Sarmatia Europea, but known no further Northwards than the head of Tanais. And for Sarmatia Europea, it was bounded in the time of Pytolomy, by the Baltick Sea, and some Terra Incognita, on the North; the Jaxgu (now Metanassa (now Transylvania, and the Upper Hungary) upon the South; the River Vistula, or Wexel, which divided it from Germany, upon the West; and the Tanais, upon the East. Beyond that all along the banks of the Euxine Sea, to the Mare Caspium, and as far North as any Conquerour had gone, it was called Sarmatia Asiatica: the Countries further Eastward being then called Scythia. By which account, as Russia containeth not all Sarmatia Europea, of which Prussia, and the rest of the incorporated Provinces of Poland, passeth for a part: so neither is it totally comprehended in it, extending beyond Tanais into Asiatica. The antient Inhabitants called by a general name Sarmata, by the Greeks Sarmatæ, were subdivided, for so much of this part of it as was then made known into the Agathyrsi, Rutheni, Pagiritæ, dwelling in the North; the Osyli, Alanni, Roxolani, &c. dwelling in the South. Amongst many other barbarous Nations, these were some of the principal. And from these Roxolani, as the principal of all the rest, Muthias à Michon, a learned Polander, doth derive the original of the Russes, (which we now call the Russians) seconded herein by the more learned Bochartus, who proveth out of antient Authors, that the Inhabitants of Taurica Cherfoneus (from which the passage into this Countrey is both short & easie) have been formerly called Rhos. Taurus tus Pæonibus, Taurus vocari gentes Rhos, as he saith from Tserces. Which Rhos or Rhofes, first mingling with the Alani, a Sarmatian people, might get the name of Roxolani: and afterwards possessing the more Northern Countries, or mingling with the Rossi of Mount Taurus (from whom those of Taurica descended) in their enterprizes on Constantinople and the parts adjoining, return to their old name of Rossi. The Rossi or Russians, were then the first Lords of this Countrey generally, the Moscovites possessors of a Province only; so called from the Moschi, spoken of by Lucan in his Pharsalia; and placed by Pliny near the head of the River Phasis, which rising from the Armenian Mountains, falls into the Euxine. Derived no doubt from Mesech (or Mosch, as the Antients called him) the son of Japhet, placed originally in the North and North-East of Syria, on the Confines of Chalcis and Armenia: where Pliny, as before is said, hath fixed the Moschi, and where there is a long chain of hills; which most of the old writers call Montes Moschici. But to return unto the Rossi, we hear not of them by this name, till the time of Michael the third, Emperour of Constantinople; in whose reign they infested the Euxine Sea, and had the boldness to attempt the Imperial City, Anno 864. said by Cedrenus, and some other of the Eastern Writers, to be a people of Mount Taurus (next neighbours to Mesech or the Moschi.) Failing in their attempt upon Constantinople, and not willing to go home again; they spread themselves, with their confederates and associates in this expedition, upon the North-west banks of the Euxine Seas; enlarging their bounds Northwards with less opposition than they were likely to have done on the Southern parts: Constantinople being once again in vain attempted, in the reigns of Constantine the 7th. and Henricus Aneps. Converted to the Christian Faith, or growing into better terms with the Eastern Emperours, Helena daughter of Nicephorus Phocas, is married to Valodimirus one of their Kings; from that time forwards turning their forces on the Polanders, and their weaker neighbours; save that, provoked by the death of one of their Countrey, slain accidentally at Constantinople in a private quarrel, they made another fruitless journey against that City, in the time of Michael Cataphagus. Enlarging their estate to the West and South, they became masters of a great part of Sarmatia Europea, Lithuania, Podolia, Nigra Russia, and other Provinces, now subject to the Crown of Poland; being then parts of their Estate. Anno 1240. the Tartars, under the conduct of Batba, or Batay, son of Ogatai Chan, broke in upon them, and subdued them: the Countrey before this entire, under one sole King, being broken afterwards into divers petit and inferior Governments, according to the will and pleasure of the inferior Vassals. The principal of these (descended from the former Kings) were Lords of Poland, Moscho, and some other Cities; held by them with no other title than that of Lords of Moscow, and for that Tributary to the Tartars, as were all the rest. their seat originally at Valodimir, till the time of John the son of Daniel, the fifth Lord of the Russes, descended of the old Regal line, taking a good liking of the River and Town of Mosco, repaired the Town, being before but mean and ordinary; and made it the chief seat of his Principality. From whence the residue of the Russes, united in succeeding times unto this Estate, by marriages, fraud and Conquest, had the name of Moscovites. But notwithstanding this increase of their Power and Empire, the Tartars held them for their Vassals, and tyrannized upon the Countrey with a barbarous insolency. Under which thralldom they long groaned, till the Tartars being divided amongst themselves, and grown less terrible to their neighbours, were outed of their power and command here, by the valour of John, son of Basilus the second, who thereupon changed the Title of Lord, into that of Duke, and after into that of Great Duke, as his fortunes revived. Yet not so great, but that he was contented to be an Homager of the Tartars: it being finally agreed on at the end of their wars, that the Tartars should relinquish all their Holds in the Countrey; and on the other side, that once every year, within the Castle of Mosco, the Great Duke standing on foot, should feed the Horse of the Crim Tartar with Oats, out of his own Cap. This Homage was by Basilus changed into a tribute of Furs; which being also denied by his successors (as they grew in power) occasioned the long wars betwixt the Nations: the Tartars alwayes pressing on them by sudden inroads, sometimes by Armies of no less than 200000 fighting men. But notwithstanding all their power, and the friendship of the Turk to boot; the Moscovite is not only able to assert his Sovereignty, but hath also wrested from them many goodly Provinces.

As for the Princes of this Countrey, I shall not trouble my self (as I see some do) in tracing a Succession of them, as far as from the times of Augustus Caesar: when neither the Rossi, nor the Moschi had here any footing. We will therefore go no higher than the time of George, whose daughter Anne I find to have been married to Henry the first of France. From whom in a direct line descended another George, with whom we do intend to begin our Catalogue, as being the last King of the Russes, before the coming of the Tartars. Who wisely yielding to the storm, waved the title of King, contented only with the title of Lord, as more safe for him, and less invidious to the Tartars: the fifth from whom called John (as before is said) having removed his seat to Mosco, took to himself the title of Lord of Mosco, the chief seat of that power and Sovereignty, which he transmitted afterwards to his posterity: affecting for that cause the title of Dukes of Moscow (though all the conquered Towns and Territories have their place also in his style) as much as that of Emperour of Russia; which some of them have assumed also, since the time of Basilus, who styled himself Basilus, by the Grace of God, Emperour and Lord of Russia, Great Duke of Volodimir, Moscovie, Novogrod the great, Plescow, Smolensko, Tver, Jugor, Wiatka, Bulgar, &c. Lord and Great Prince of the Lower Novogrod, Czernigov, Rhezan, Wologda, Rjow, Biele, Rostow, Tarofane, Poloskie, Bielloziere, Udore, Obdora, Condora, &c. King of Casan and Astrachan. But leaving them unto their swelling and voluminous Title (little inferior unto that of the Kings of Spain) let us next look on the succession from the time aforesaid, of

But the Russian Lords disdain- ing to have a Prince imposed on them from Poland, rose in Arms against him, and at last vanquished, and slew him in open field: his wife a noble Polonian Lady, sent poorly home; and the Polanders beaten out of the Country.

But the Russians loth to fall under the power of the Polander, and weary of their own confusions, made choice at last, of 1615. 10. Michael Fredrovitz, son of Theodore the Patriarch of Mosco, who at last settled this vast Empire, and managed it in a more constant way of peace with the Turks, Tartar, Polonian, and Sweth-lander, than any of his Predecessors had done before him.
1646. 11. Alexius Michailowitz (or the son of Michael) succeeded his Father in the Empire, troubled at first with some distempers in the State (as in all other Countries about that time) but now quietly settled, Anno 1648.

The Formalities with which these great Emperours are invested, or settled in the Throne, are not many nor stately; such as they be, I here afford you out of the history of the life of Johannes Basiliades, written in Latine by Paulus Oderbornius. On the 2. of June, Anno 1583. Theodorus Johannides went towards the Temple of S. Michael, being the principal Church in all Mosco: the streets all covered with flowers, the doors of the Citizens crowned with Garlands, the air echoing with the noise of Flutes and Trumpets, and the people so crowding to behold their Prince, that had not the Guard with naked swords forced a passage through them, it had been impossible for him to have gone on. Being now come to the Church door, the Lords of the Country (Czesars they there call them) went out to meet him: and the Archbishop of Mosco, clad in his pontificalibus, when he was come into the Church, embraced him. The pavement of the Church was hidden with Tapestry, and the stalls adorned with costly hangings. The Great Duke sat down in his Throne, being attired in a garment of silk, buttoned down with golden buttons: on his head he wore a purple cap, spangled with rich jewels, and on his fingers abundance of rings. Being thus seated, the Patriarch made a Prayer to God, to bless him, his people, and his government; which was seconded by the joyful shouts and acclamations of his Subjects: amongst whom no small store of silver money was flung by the Treasurer, and so they returned to the Palace.

The Government of this Country is meerly Tyrannical, the Emperour being absolute Lord of the lives, lands and goods of all his Subjects: all of them, the noble as well as the base, subscribing themselves in their Petitions to him, by the name of Keloptery, that is, Slaves. Whereupon Alibon a Turkish Bashaw was used to say, that his Master and the Muscovite were the two most absolute Princes in all the world. First for their goods, when any Ambassador returns home, the Great Duke takes from him all the presents which he hath received, giving him perhaps some small reward, perhaps none at all all: and as for lands, they pass not from father to son, but as he confirms it. But more particularly (besides the case of Permia spoken of before) John Wasiliwich sent a command to Mosco, to provide a Coal-pack of live Fleas for a medicine; and when the Citizens returned answer that it was impossible, he fined them at 700 Rubbles for their disobedience. Another time he laid a mulct of 300000 Rubbles upon his Nobility, because he had no good sport in his hunting; which they again extorted from the common people: and under colour of want, commanded from some Bishops, and Monasteries the sum of 100000 Rubbles, from some 50000, more or less from others; according unto their revenues. And it is usual with the best of them, to cause the Boiars (or Gentlemen which serve on horse-back) to pretend themselves robbed; that he may send unto the City to find out the Felon; and on a Non est inventus, fine them at discretion, sometimes 8000, sometimes 10000, and sometimes 20000 Rubbles. Then for their liver, there is a story, that Wasiliwich having found that one of his Secretaries had received a Goose, stuffed full of silver for a Bribe; caused him to be brought into the Market-place of Mosco: where, without any legal trial, he commanded the Executioner, first to cut off his legs about the shins, and then his arms about the elbows (still asking the miserable man how he liked Goose-flesh) and in the end, to cut off his head; in similitude of a Goose ready for the spit. And that they may the better preserve this power, the Great Dukes seldom shew themselves unto the people; but in apparel of inestimable value, joining the ornaments of a Bishop unto the Majesty of a King, by wearing a Mitre on their heads shining with Diamonds and rich stones: and when they wear it not on their heads, they place it before the chair of state (over which are the images of Christ and the blessed Virgin) holding in his hand a most rich Crosier Staff, and all their fingers full of rings. And upon solemn festivals and entertainments, the Great Chamber is beset with Cubboards of plate, of infinite value; and filled with men clothed with cloth of gold, to the very foot; all of them seeming to be men of the chief Nobility, but many times being no other then the gravest and portliest Citizens of Mosco, richly apparelled for the time out of the Emperours wardrobe; which to such as do not understand the fraud, look like so many Princes, and causeth no small wonder at his magnificence. So that the people seeing him in such royal state, and knowing no more than what they are taught at home; reverence him as slaves; not subjects, and look upon him rather as a God, than a King.

Having so absolute a command on their lives and goods, it will be easily supposed that he may raise what forces, and amass what treasures he hath a mind to. First, for his Forces, it is said that he is able to raise 300000 Horse, if occasion be: and that he may come near that number it is more than probable; in that John Wasiliwich in his war against those of Astrachan, had actually 120000 Horse; and that a great part of the Country is in the hands of the Boiars, bound by their Tenure to serve with horse whenever he pleareth. And that there are 110 men chosen by the Emperour, and by him enfeoffed with lands, (during pleasure only) who for these lands are to find 65000 Horse, with all things necessary for the wars; and those in a continual readiness, fit for present action. Then for such horse as he himself doth keep in continual pay, there is not fewer than 25000 which attend him as a Guard to his person; all of them well experienced men, and fit for service: which added to the 65000 spoken of before; makes up a standing body of 90000. Had he foot answerable unto this proportion of horse, there were no dealing with him; but therein his Militia is defective: Wasiliwich to his great Army of 120000 horse, having but 20000 foot; the foot-men which he hath in continual pay amounting to 12000 only, far short of such a standing body of horse, as before we spake of. And this defect hath been the reason why the Polanders, with far less Armies have prevailed against them: the Great Duke not being able with all his power, to hinder King Stephen of Poland from taking Villocolne, or besieging Pleskow; (though his Army was not above 60000 both in horse and foot) for want of standing bands of foot to make good his ground. Generally both horse and foot are very obedient to their Captains and superior Officers; patiently enduring all discommodities of cold, rain, and hunger; (in that regard fitter to keep a Fortress, than serve in field) and so regardless of their lives in the day of battel, that they will rather lose them, than either yield themselves Prisoners, or demand Quarter.

For his Revenues, they may be what he will himself, considering (besides his extraordinary power of oppressing his subjects before mentioned) the many ordinary ways he hath of amassing treasure: as viz. the forefelling of homebred commodities, and ingrossing the foreign; selling them at what price he list, and hindering all men else from trade, till his own be sold; provision of rent-corn, and victual, raised in some years to 200000 Rubbles, rent-wood, and Hay to 30000; poll-money to 400000, customs on Merchandise to 800000. By which and other means of collecting moneys, and the Domain of his Crown, though he raise vast sums; yet it is thought, that his household charges being deducted, there remaineth not towards all other expences, three millions of Rubbles, every Rubble being as much as an English Mark.

The Arms are Sable, a Portal open of two leaves, and as many Degrees, Or.

P O L A N D.

POLAND is bounded on the East, with Russia, and the Crim Tartar, from whom parted by the River Borysthenes; on the West, with Germany; on the North, with the Baltick Sea, and some part of Russia; on the South, with the Carpathian Mountains, which divide it from Hungary, Transylvania and Moldavia.

It is an Aggregate body, consisting of many distinct Provinces, united into one Estate, of which Poland being the predominant, hath given name to the rest, called all together the Realm of POLAND: and that so named from Pole, which in the Slavonian language (the common language of the Countrey) signifieth plain; because but little swelled with Hills. Of figure round, in compass 2600 miles; situate under the eighth and twelfth Climates: so that the longest day in the Southern parts is but 16 hours, and about 18 hours in the parts most North.

The Countrey plain, but full of woods, which serve to rectified the Air, being naturally so cold that they have neither Wine nor Grapes: in stead whereof they use that kind of drink called Ale; in former times the usual Beverage of England, and this Countrey only. Barley they have, and Pulse in such abundant measure, that no small quantities of each are transported yearly: nor yeeld they any thing at all to Denmark, or Hungary, for their plenty of Cattel. But of this more in our description of the several Provinces.

The people are very industrious, and studious of all Languages, especially of the Latine; to which they are so devoted, that there is scarce a mean man, who is not able in some measure, to express himself in it. According to their abilities, rather prodigal than truly liberal; and good Souldiers generally. The Peasants live in miserable servitude unto their Lords; the Lords in such equality of estate amongst themselves, that none of them (excepting the greater Princes) exceedeth 25000 Ducats of yearly rent. Proud in their garb, costly in their Apparel, impatient in their humours, and delicate in diet: these last conditions common to the women also, who are for the most part indifferently fair, and rather witty than well spoken. But this being the peculiar Character of the Polander properly so called, is not perhaps communicable to the people of the rest of the Provinces, whom we shall speak of severally in their proper places.

The Christian faith was first planted in this Kingdom at several times, and by several persons, according to the different parts of which it consisteth: in Poland specially so called, in the time of their Prince Miesclaus, son of Nemomilus, An. 963. in Livonia, by the Preaching of one Minardus, Anno 1200. or thereabouts; in Lithuania, not until the year 1386. at the admission of Jagello to the Crown of Poland, and then done (as some say) by Thomas of Walden, (or Waldensis) an English Friar. In Samogitia, and Polhinia, at the same time with Lithuania. In the rest at other times, and on other occasions: yet so that in many places of it, Idolatri was never totally rooted out, the seeds and practices whereof in many points still remain amongst them. Corrupted by the superstitions of the Church of Rome, a Reformation was endeavoured, at such time as John Hus flourished in Bohemia, the next neighbouring Kingdom: but by the rigour of Ladislaus the sixth, then King thereof, assisted by his Bishops and Noblemen, at that time hindered. Afterwards in the time of Luther, some who had studied at Lipsique, and Wittenberg, (Universities of Saxony) brought his opinions home with them into the Province of Poland; as some Dutch Merchants (with the rest of their Commodities) did into Dantzick, the chief Town of Pomerelle Anno 1525. from whence it spread it self over most part of that Countrey. According as it was favoured or disliked, by the Palatines, Chastellons, and other great men of the Realm; so was its entertainment either good or bad: the Grecians in the mean time taking opportunity, to win some parts of it to their side, and confirm others in it; who being originally members of the Church of Greece, because originally converted by the Bishops thereof, did still continue continue in conformity and obedience to it. In the end, by reason of the over-great liberty of the Nobility and people, and want of power in the King to controul their doings, every man took up what Religion he best liked; some following the Augustane Confession, others the Helvetic, others adhering as tenaciously to the Church of Rome: and some inclining to new Sects; or rather to old Heresies under new disguises, have brought in such a miscellany or Babel of Religions into this estate, (Jesuites, Lutherans, Calvinists, Socinians, Arians, Anabaptists and indeed what not, being here all tolerated) that at last it grew into a By-word, that if any man had lost his Religion, he might find it in Poland, or else believe it to be vanished. A By-word afterwards applied unto Amsterdam; communicable since unto other places: Libertas Prophetandi, or the Liberty of Prophecy being now as much allowed of in some parts of Christendome, as Libertas opinandi, was in Rome under Nervus Government; ubi & sentire quæ velis, & quæ sentias loqui liceat, when as a man might think as he listed of the publick, and speak what he thought. But whether this be such a Rara temporum felicitas, such a felicity of these our times, as Tacitus conceived the other to be of those, future times will shew.

But to return again to Poland, notwithstanding this mixture of Religions, yet that most publickly allowed and countenanced, is the Religion authorized by the Church of Rome; asserted here by the zeal of the Kings unto that cause, and the great power of the Bishops; who seeing how those of their Order have sped in Germany and other places, under colour of Reformation of some things amiss, have hitherto upheld the Ecclesiastical Estate, in the same form they found it. The Government of the Church as formerly, by 3 Archbishops, and 19 Bishops: who challenge a jurisdiction over all the Kingdom, but exercise it upon those only who submit unto them: those who embrace the Doctrines of Luther, or Calvin, following the forms of Government by them established; as others do some new ones of their own devising. And for those Provinces and people which lye towards Greece, or were parts heretofore of the Russian Empire, and still hold a Communion with those Churches; they have Archbishops and Bishops of their own Religion: that is to say, the Archbishops of Vilne, and Limburch, the Bishops of Polozko, Luzko, Pinsk, Volodimir, Presmil, and Kiov. Yet amongst all these different Churches and forms of Government, there is this conformity, that whensoever the Gospel is read openly in the Congregation, the Nobility and Gentry use to draw their swords (according to an ancient custom which they had amongst them) signifying their readiness to defend it against all opposers. Which reason doubtless gave beginning to the standing up at the Creed, and Gospel, in the primitive times, retained still in the Church of England: whereby we do declare, how prepared and resolute we are to defend the same: though some of late, holding it for a Relick of Popery, with greater nicety than wisdom, have refused to do it.

Principal Commanders of this Countrey in the Art of war, 1 Cassimir the third, the greatest establisher of this Kingdom after long dissensions. 2 Jagello, or Vladislaus the first, who first brought down the pride of the Dutch Knights in a famous victory. 3 Cassimir the 4th, the fortunate conqueror of the Knights of Prussia, brought by him under the command of the Kings of Poland. 4 Sigismund the first, by whose valour and good fortune the Dutch Knights were totally suppressed; and the greatest part of Prussia for ever added to that Crown. 5 Sigismund the second, surnamed Augustus, fortunate in his wars against most of them of Livonia, by him united to this Kingdom. Of most special note for learning, Hofius, a Divine of the Papal party, whose great abilities advanced him to the State of a Cardinal; 2 Crellius, and 3 Volchelins, of the contrary party in Religion, men of great parts, but Heterodox and unfound opinions; 4 Cromerus the Historian; 5 Barth. Keckerman the Professor at Dansk or Dantzwick, a man of universal studies, but of greater industry than exactness.

Chief Rivers of this Kingdom are 1 Vistula or Wixel, the ancient Boundary betwixt Germany; and Sarmatia Europæa, which rising in the Carpathian Mountains, passeth by Cracovia the chief City of Poland; and dividing Prussia from Pomerella, falleth into the Baltick Sea not far from Dantzick; and is navigable for the space of 400 miles; of old called Vandalis. 2 Warta, which runneth through the lesser Poland; 3 Dvina the left, watering Livonia; and 4 Borysthenes or Nieper passing through Podolia, both spoken of before when we were in Russia. 5 Niester, by Polomy called Tyras, which falleth into the Euxine Sea, having first parted Podolia from Moldavia. 6 Ingria, by some called the lesser Tanais, arising in Lithuania, and falling into the more noted Tanais, which is now called Don. Of less note there are, 1 Renben or Reubon, 2 Cronus now called Pregel, 3 Bogh, said by some to be the Hipani of the Antients. 4 Minnael, 5 Niems, the Meander of these Northern parts. 6 Winde, a Livonian River falling into the Baltick. Mountains of note here are not many, the Countries for the most part being plain and Champaigns: and those which be are rather boundaries betwixt this and some other Kingdom, than proper unto this alone. The chief of which are those called Sarmatich, dividing Germany from Sarmatia Europæa; by Solinus named Scvo, by Polomy the Carpathian Mountains; the Boundary at this time betwixt Poland and Hungary, of which more anon.

The common meets and Land-marks being thus laid down, we will next take a view of those several Provinces, of which this Kingdom doth consist; being eleven in number: that is to say, 1 Livonia, 2 Samogitia, 3 Lithuania, 4 Polhinia, 5 Podolia, 6 Russia nigra, 7 Massovia, 8 Podlaffia, 9 Prussia, 10 Pomerella, and 11 Poland, specially so called: all of them (except the proper Poland) within Sarmatia Europæa.

1 LIVONIA.

LIVONIA or LIEFLAND, is bounded on the East, with the Empire of Russia; on the West, with the Baltick Sea; on the North, with the Gulf or Bay of Finland; on the South, with Samogitia, and Lithuania. Extended in length along the shore of the Baltick for the space of 125 Dutch, or 500 Italian miles, &c unto their posterity; and to subject it to the election of the Polanders, in which it was possible the Princes of their family might be pretermitted: deferred the accomplishment hereof from one day to another, under colour that the Lituanians would revolt, if they went about it. But Sigismund Augustus, in whose person the male issue of Jagello failed, foreseeing what divisions might ensue after his decease, and fearing that the Moscovites would renew their old pretensions, united it unto the Crown: ordaining that the Bishops, Palatines, and a certain number of the Chastellans by him established, should have their place and suffrage in the Great Council of Poland, power in the chusing of the King, and all other privileges which the natural Polonians have. Since that, accounted a chief member of that Body Politick: subject to those corruptions, changes, and innovations in matters of Religion, which have been predominant in the other; excepting those parts only which relate to the Church of Greece, or Mosco, adhering pertinaciously to the Rites thereof.

VOLHINIA, by some accounted one of the Palatinates of Lithuania, (as once it was) but by others, a distinct Province of it self; is bounded on the North and East, with Lithuania; on the South, with Podolia; and on the West, with Russia Nigra, and Podlaffia. So called, as Maginus is of opinion, from the Volgari, who dwelling on the banks of the River Volga, came afterwards into this Countrey, calling it Volgaria; whence by degrees it came unto Volhonia, and at last unto Volhinia. But this conjecture is improbable, and of no good grounds.

The Countrey yields good plenty both of grain and fruits, Pools which abound with very good fish, Forests which do afford them store of game and Honey; and much good pasturage for their Cattel. The people of the same nature with the Lituanians, but more strong and warlike; and better weaned from their old superstitions and heathenish customs, than the others are. Of the same Language and Religion with those of Russia; to which, together with the rest of Lithuania, it did once belong: It is divided commonly into three parts or Provinces, all taking name from the three principal Cities of it; that is to say, 1 Luzke, in Latine called Luceozia, a Town of above 1000 families, whereof 127 only, in the time of my Author, were of the Romish Religion; the residue being Russians, Grecians, and some Armenians: the seat and residence of two Bishops, of which one being of the Communion of the Church of Rome, is of the Province of the Archbishop of Lemburg, in Russia Nigra; but they which are of the Communion of the Church of Greece, have also a Bishop of their own, who acknowledgeth the Patriarch of Mosco for his Metropolitan. 2 Volodomir, a Bishops See also, of the same condition. 3 Keremence, which (as the rest) hath under it many fair Towns and Castles, besides large Villages. The whole once part of Lithuania, as before was said; but of late dismembered from it, and united to the Crown of Poland, as a State distinct. But so, that the greatest part of it is immediately subject to the Duke of Osrygoe, who is said to have 4000 Fendataries in this Countrey; the greatest Prince of those who hold Communion with the Church of Greece in the whole Realm of Poland.

5 PODOLIA.

PODOLIA hath on the North, Volhinia, part of Lithuania, and the great Empire of Russia; on the South, Moldavia, from which parted by the River Tyras, now called Niester; on the West Russia Nigra; extending Eastward through vast uninhabited Countreys, as far as to the Euxine Sea. The reason of the name I find no where guessed at; the people for the most part of the same nature and original with the Russians, to whose Empire it formerly belonged also, till gained (if such a subjection as they give the King, may be called a gaining) to the Crown of Poland, at such times as the Russes were in thrall to the power of the Tartars.

The Countrey generally so fertile, that the Husbandman is accustomed to reap an hundred for one, in regard it bears at one ploughing for three years together: the Countreyman being put to no further trouble, than at the end of the first and second years, to shake the Corn a little, as he reaps or loads it; that which so falls, serving as seed for the next year following. The Meadow ground so strangely rich, and luxuriant, and the grass so high, that a man can hardly see the heads or horns of his Cattel: of so swift a growth, that in three dayes it will cover a rod which is thrown into it, and in few more so hide a plough, that it is not an easie work to find it. If these things seem beyond belief, let Maginus, who reporteth them, bear the blame thereof; though better take it on his word, than go so far to disprove him. And yet, which adds much unto the miracle, the ground in most places so hard and stony, that there need six yoke of Oxen to break it up: to the great toy! both of the Cattel and the men. It is also said, that in this Countrey there are great flocks of sheep, many herds of Oxen, abundance of wild beasts, and great store of Honey. And yet for all this plenty and abundance of all things necessary, the Countrey for the most part, especially towards the East, is but meanly inhabited; by reason of the frequent incursions of the Tartars bordering next unto it. Who have so wasted it in times past, and thereby so discouraged the people from building, planting, and all other works of peace and husbandry; that in so large and rich a Countrey, there is nothing to be seen but some scattered houses, few Villages, and not above five Towns of note, viz. 1 Oreazkow, at the influx of the Borsibenes or Niester into the Euxine Sea. 2 Vaszwon, at the fall of the River Bug into that of Niester. 3 Bracław, more high upon the Bog. 4 Camiencz, on the borders of Russia Nigra, built by some divine hand, as it were, amongst the precipices of high and inaccessible Rocks; and so well fortified withal, that it is impregnable: as is apparent by the many and great repulses, which the the Turks, Tartarians, and Valachians, have received before it, with much shame and loss. 5 Lemburg, Russia Nigra, remarkable for the fawces or salt-meats, which they send thence into other Countreys. The former gras, &c. fortunes of this Province, and how it was brought under the Crown of Poland (with which incorporated long since) we shall see anon.

6 RUSSIA NIGRA.

RUSSIA NIGRA hath on the East, Volhinia, Podlaffia, and Moldavia; on the West, Machovia, and Poland, specially so called; on the North, Lithuania, and Podlaffia; and on the South, the Sarmatian or Carpathian Mountains. It is called also Roxolania from the Roxolani, a chief people of Sarmatia Europea, and by some Ruthenia: but generally Russia, from the Rassi spoken of before, in the Empire of Russia, who spread themselves over all these parts. Some hold that it was first called Rassia, which signifieth in the Slavonian language, a Scattered Nation, or a Nation disseminated, and dispersed into many parts; and that this was the name generally of all that spake the Slavonian tongue, and followed the religion and the rites of the Church of Greece: extended from the frozen Sea to the Adriatique, and from the Euxine to the Baltick. This, and a greater tract of ground, I grant to have been heretofore possessed by divers Nations, under the name of Slavonians; a very considerable part of Germany and Poland being conquered by them. But for the name of Russia, given at first to all the Russian Empire, distinguished now into Russia Alba, and Russia Nigra, I adhere unto my former Vote; conceiving that it came from the Rossi, an Armenian people, inhabiting about Mount Taurus, who in the year 864. or thereabouts, attempted the taking of Constantinople, and after placed themselves on the Northern banks of the Euxine, getting ground of the Slavonians to the North and East, till they had made themselves Masters of all Russia Alba, Lithuania, Volhinia, Podlaffia, and this Russia Nigra. Distinguished from the former by the advent of Nigra, after the destruction of that great Empire, by the coming in of the Tartars; either from the colour of their garments, or their black and more Southernly complexion. In which regard called also Russia Meridionalis, or the Southern Russia.

The Countrey is generally fruitful, abounding in Horses, Oxen, Sheep, Sables, and Foxes: such store of Bees, that they breed not only in Hives and hollow Trees, but in Rocks and Caves. Well watered both with Pools and Rivers, affording them great plenty of fish; more naturally spawning here than in other places; inasmuch, that if a Pond be digged, and spring accordingly, the fish will breed therein of their own accord, without being brought from other waters. The greatest want hereof is Wine, either supplied with Mede, or from other places. And it is said, that in the Territory of Chelme, the branches of the Pine trees left upon the ground for three years together, will be converted into stone.

The people are generally valiant, and so strong of body, that they use Bows of 12 foot long. Being formerly governed by Dukes, they do but ill brook the name of King; which much induced the Kings of Poland to send Colonies of natural Polonians, into most parts of the Countrey: inasmuch as most of the Knights and Gentry of it are of that extraction, and follow the Religion of the Church of Rome; the Peasants and original Inhabitants of it, being more generally affected to the Rites and doctrines of the Church of Greece.

Places of most importance in it, are 1 Chelme, in the Territory whereof it is affirmed, that the branches of Pine trees left upon the ground for three years together, are converted to stone. 2 Premissen, 3 Halitz, 4 Belzo, 5 Grodock, and 6 Lecopolia, by the Natives called Lemburg, built by one Leo a Muscovite; a Town of great traffique, and an Archbishops See, who is of the Religion of the Church of Rome. But the Patriarch of Mosco hath here also an Archbishop of his own ordaining, there being Churches both in the City it self, and all Russia generally (as before was said) which are of the communion of the Church of Greece. There are also in this City some Armenian Merchants, who have a Church, a Bishop, and some Priests of their own Religion.

Of the affairs of of this Province, and how it was a part once of the Russian Empire, hath been said already. Dismembered from it by the Tartars, it had a while Dukes or Provincial Governours, subject and tributary unto those Barbarians: as had also Podolia, its next neighbour. Both conquered by the Polander, were for a time kept under by strong hand, and the power of Garrisons. But being upon all occasions apt to revolt, by reason of the hard hand which the Kings held over them, (by whom treated rather like Slaves than Subjects;) they were assured unto the State; by giving them the same liberties and immunities, both for the Nobility and the Commons, which the natural Polonians had; and by that means made fellow-members of that Common-wealth. The Act of Ladislav the 6th. the son of Jagello, imitating therein the ancient Romans; who much augmented their forces, and assured their Estates, by communicating the freedom of Rome, and the privileges of Latium to many of the conquered Provinces: and was herein imitated by Sigismund the first, Sigismund Augustus, and Stephen, his successors, in their incorporating of Prussia, Lithuania, and Livonia; to the Crown of Poland.

MASSOVIA is bounded on the East, with Lithuania; on the West, with Poland, specially so called; on the North, with Prussia, and Podlaffia; on the South, with Russia Nigra, or Meridionalis. So called from Masso, one of the Dukes hereof; who in the year 1045, being vanquished by Cassimir Duke of Poland, fled into Prussia, and there unfortunately dyed.

The Countrey large, and for the most part full of woods, where they find store of Bugles, and wild Buls. The people strong, valiant, and courageous in war; differing little from the Polonians in speech, manners, or apparel, save that they use a kind of whittling, which the others do not. The principal Towns of it, are 1 Narshow, the chief of the Province, and heretofore the residence of the Duke or Prince; remarkable for the best Mede, or Metheglin. 2 Egrad Czirko, 3 Polkowotkie, 4 Gadzick, 5 Lazara, 6 Droic, the seat of a Palatine, but not else observable.

This Province was once subject to Princes of its own, not subject or subordinate unto any Superior. Of which number that Maffo was one, from whom named Massovia. In the years 1246, and 1260, being strangely waited and distressed by Mindy Duke of Lithuania; they were fain to put themselves under the power of the Polander: by whom made the portion of the second son of that Kingdom. But John, and Stanislaus, the two last Dukes hereof, dying without issue, it returned unto the Kings of Poland; by whom incorporate to that Crown, and privileged in the election of the King, and all matters which concern the publick, as all others of the Polonians are, Anno 1526.

8. PODLASSIA.

PODLASSIA is bounded on the East, with Polhinia; on the West, with Prussia; on the North, with Lithuania; and on the South, with Massovia, and Russia Nigra. The reason of the name I know not. The Countrey not much differing from those before; the people a mixt generation of Russes, Moscovites, and Polonians, partake a little of the manners and garb of those several Nations, from which they lineally are descended.

Places of most importance in it, are 1 Bielske, 2 Branniko, 3 Suras, all of them having fair and ample Territories. 4 Tykiskin, strongly fortified and well garrisoned; as being the place where the Kings Treasures are kept. 5 Kayssin, beautified with a Royal Palace and a pleasant Park; wherein are store of wild beasts for hunting, and fish-ponds very well replenished. 6 Narow, 7 Wasskow, and 8 Angustow, a very very strong Town, built and well fortified by Sigismund Augustus, and by him thus named, Anno 1569, at what time he dismembred this Province from Lithuania, to which before it appertained; uniting it for ever to the Crown of Poland.

9. PRUSSIA.

PRUSSIA, is bounded on the East, with Lithuania, and Podlattia; on the West, with Pomerania; on the North, with the Baltick Sea; and on the South, with Poland, and Massovia. Called first Borussia from the Borussi, who subdued it (of whom more anon;) which by an easie alteration was changed into Prussia, by which name still called.

The Countrey is extended all along the Baltick Sea, from the City of Dantzick in the West, to Lithuan on the mouth of the Meilank, East; for the space of 50 Polish miles: and from Tornae bordering on Massovia, to Memel in the confines of Lithuania, 58 miles of the same measure. The air thereof very mild and temperate, the soil both profitable and pleasant; full of Lakes and Rivers stored with fish, plentiful of corn and other necessities, and well clad with Forests, which yield them game for hunting, rich skins for profit, and abundance of honey. Of which last they make Mede for their own use, (their ordinary drink where there is no Wine) and sell the rest unto the Merchant. But the commodity wherein they do excel their neighbours, is their plenty of Amber, which is the juyce of a stone which groweth like a Coral in a Mountain of these Baltick Seas, covered quite with water; and shunned by Mariners three leagues off, for fear of Shipwrack: the Mountain reasonable large, about 50 yards high of English measure. And when any tempest riseth in these Northern Seas, especially in September and December, the liquor by violence thereof is rent from the Rock, and cast into divers Havens, and on divers Coasts of this Countrey, and sometimes upon those of Sweden, and Pomerania: the people leaping into the Sea when it rageth most, whence they take up first some store of weeds, after that this Liquor; which being taken out of the water hardneth like to Coral. Besides the beauty hereof, and the quality it hath of attracting straws and iron, as the Adamant doth; burning like pitch, and others of this nature; it is excellent good for stopping blood; all kind of Agues, Falling-sickness, Dropsies, Stone, Collick, weakness of Stomach, Head-ach, and the Yellow Jaundice.

The people, especially the Gentry, descend from the Germans, and retain much of their nature: having more art and industry than the other Polonians, and being more tenacious of their ancient customs. Idolaters for long time together, converted first unto the Faith, in the time of the Emperor Frederick the 2^d. by whose setting on they were subdued by the order of the Dutch Knights, An. 1215, and either won or forced to the Christian Faith. As Christians, governed since the plantations of the Gospel, by the Bishops of Culme, Warne, Sambia, and Pomesan, suffragans to the Archbishop of Guesna: under whom those parts do still continue, which have not yet forsaken the Church of Rome: the Lutherans, Calvinians, and other separate Congregations distinct from them, having their own forms both of doctrine and discipline.

Few Provinces of the North are better watered, than this is, both for Lakes and Rivers: some of the Lakes 7 Dutch miles in compass, and well stored with fish. The Rivers 12, in number, that is to say, 1 The Vistula, 2 Chornus, 3 Nogat, 4 Elbing, 5 Vastra, 6 Passaria, 7 Alla, 8 Pregel, 9 Offa, 10 Drebnice, 11 Lica, and 12 Lavia, all plentifully stored with fish; besides a large Sea-coast both for trade and fishing, no small commodity to the Natives.

The Countrey formerly divided into twelve Dukedoms, (so they called the parts and fractions of it) it) was by the industry of the Dutch Knights to adorned and beautified (after they had once brought it under their obedience) that there were no fewer than 72 Castles, and 62 good Towns of their foundation. Which number being much increased in these later times, hath made the most flourishing part of the whole Kingdom of Poland. But the Order of these Knights being suppressed in this Countrey, by an agreement betwixt Sigismund the first King of Poland, and Albert of Brandenburg, the last great Master of the Order; both Town and Countrey are divided between the Successors of the said Albert, as Dukes of Prussia, and of the said Sigismund, as Kings of Pole: the Dukedoms or divisions of Hogeland, Warne, Galindia, Miclow, Calmeria, with the City of Marienberg, the Sovereignty of Dantzick, and Melvin, with the whole Countrey of Pomerella, lying on the Westside of the Vistula, being allotted to the King; the residue containing the divisions of Schalawonia, Sambia, Natania, Nadrawia, Bartania, Sudawia, and Pomesania (except the City and Territory of Marienberg) to the Dukes of Prussia.

Chief Towns belonging to the Duke, are 1 Memel, a well-frequented Port, the Mart Town for the commodities of Lithuania, which are brought hither, and here bought by the foreign Merchant: part of this Province interposing betwixt Lithuania and the Baltick. 2 Coningsberg, as the Dutch; Regimont, as the French; and Mons Regius, as the Latines call it; situate in the Province of Sambia, at the bottom of a Gulph or Bay, where the Pregel falleth into the Baltick Sea: built by the Dutch Knights in the year 1260. and made an University by Albert, the first Duke hereof, 1525. the seat and principal residence of his successors; as also of the Bishops of Sambia, in Latine called Sambiensis, by the name of the Province. 3 Mulneburg, founded by the Dutch Knights, Anno 1279. 4 Brandenburg, on the South side of that Bay, but more near the Sea; built, as I guess, by some of the great Masters of that family. 5 Ragnitz, the furthest Town of note towards Lithuania. 6 Angersburg, in Schalawonia; as was also Kegallit. 7 Nordenburg in Bartania. 8 Ottellurg in Galindia, of which little memorable. 9 Marienwerder, the furthest of the Dukes estate towards the Vistula, and the ordinary residence of the Bishop of Pomesan. Besides which, there are reckoned in this division, 80 good Towns more; and about 54 Castles; though not of much observation in the course of story.

Chief Towns pertaining to the King, are 1 Braunsburg, upon a Bay of the Baltick Sea, which they call Frisch Haffe; a Town of good trade by reason of the commodious Haven; and the ordinary residence of the Bishop of Warne. 2 Frauenburg, on the the same Bay, not far from Braunsburg. 3 Resel, the chief Town of the Dioceses and Dukedom of Warne. 4 Straisburg, in Micklow, confining on Poland, specially so called; at the liege whereof by Gustavus Adolphus King of Sweden, Anno 1628. Elias Tripe, one of the Engineers of that King, found out the use of Leather Ordnance, which afterwards did that King great service in the wars of Germany. 5 Culm, on the River Vistula, a Bishops See. 6 Marienburg, on the Nogat, built by the Dutch Knights, Anno 1302. and made the seat of the Great Masters of their Order, translated first from Ptolemais, or Acon in Syria, to the City of Venice, from thence to Mapurg; and at last to this place by Sifride the twelfth Great Master of it: whose constant residence in this Town, occasioned the Bishop of Culm to remove thither also. A very fair and well-built City, the chief of those which do belong to the King of Poland: by whom so well garrisoned, and furnished with such store of Victuals, Ammunition, and other necessities, that it was thought able to hold out for six years siege. But it proved otherwise when besieged by the King of Sweden, who took it in less space than so many months; on the settling of a peace betwixt the Crowns, rendered again unto the King of Poland. Beneath this Town, down towards the Baltick, is a pleasant Island, made by the Nogat and the Wixell; for the fertility of the soil, and the great number of houses, Villages, and people, not equalled (for the muchness of it) in all this Countrey.

To this part also belongeth the fair Port of Elberig (or Melwing, as Maginius calls it) situate on the Bay of the Baltick called Frisch Haffe, spoken of before not far from a Fishful Lake; well traded, rich, and full of very wealthy Merchants; of great resort from other Nations, and much frequented by the English Merchants, who have here their Staple for the Baltick. A small but neat and well-built City, and fortified with a very good wall, governed after the manner of a free Estate or Common-wealth, under the Patronage and Protection of the Kings of Poland, in like sort as Dantzick also is, of which more anon.

The ancient Inhabitants hereof were the Venedi, the most potent Nation of this tract, extended all along the coast of the Baltick; from them by Ptolomy called Sinus Venedicus: containing under them the Gythones, Phini, Salanes, Pharungidones, Avarini; and more within the Land, the Sudini and Galinde, whose name the Dukedom or Province of Galindia doth still retain. But great and potent though they were, they were subdued by the Borussi, inhabiting at the foot of the Riphean Mountains, who weary of their own cold and barren dwellings, removed into the Western parts; and vanquishing the Venedi, and those other Nations, possessed themselves of this Countrey, which they called Borussia, now by named Prussia. By Venedus one of their Princes, having 12 sons in all, it was divided into 12 Provinces or Dukedoms, one for every son: continuing by that means distracted into divers petty principalities, till the coming of the Marian or Dutch Knights, sent hither by Frederick the second, Anno 1215. by whom the Provinces or Dukedoms of Sudawia, Micklow, and the greatest part of Nadrawia, were laid waste and desolate; the rest submitted to their power, and received the Gospel. After this it continued subject to this order of Knights, till the year 1419. when weary of their extortion, and the continual change of Masters, they revolted to the King of Poland, to whom they offered their obedience: seconded by the yielding up of Marienberg, with many other Towns and Castles, sold to King Casimir by the Garrison Soldiers, Anno 1457. for 476000 Florents. But the Knights disdaining to be so dealt withal, and refusing to swear allegiance to the Kings of Poland, they brake out into open war; managed with variable success on both sides; Ludovicus the then Great Master, being so successful at the first, that he once beat the King out of the field, routed his whole Army, slew 30000 of his men upon the place, and took 136 of his chief Nobility: not vanquished at last, but by the treachery and rebellion of his own people. In the end wearied and worn out on both sides by continual wars, Albert of Brandenburg, then Great Master, having for 14 years together courageously maintained the honour of his Order; and for the four last years importuned in vain the assistance of the Emperor and Princes of Germany: began to think of some expedient to compound the business. Being inclined to Luther's Doctrines, and willing to advance himself unto this Estate; he secretly practised with Sigismund the first of Poland, to end the war to the advantage of both parties. By whom at last it was agreed, that Albert should relinquish his Order, and surrender all Prussia into the hands of the King; that the King possessing the Western parts with the Town of Marienberg, and the Sovereignty of Danik, and Melvin, should invest Albert with the Title of Duke of Prussia, settling on him and the heirs of his body, the whole Eastern Moiety, containing the Provinces or Dukedoms before specified; and finally, that Albert and his heirs should hold the said Estate, as Homagers to the Crown of Poland, taking place in all Assemblies at the Kings right hand. According to this agreement, Anno 1525. Albert, attired in the compleat Habit of Master of the Duch Order, presents himself humbly on his knees, before King Sigismund at Cracow, the King then sitting on his Throne. The King raising him from the ground, caused him to put off those robes, and attire himself in a Ducal Habit; which done, an instrument was read and published, whereby the King conferred upon him and the heirs of his body, the Dukedom of Prussia, to be held of him and his Successors Kings of Poland. An act at which the whole Order were extremely incensed; but they could not help it; and thereupon retired into Germany, where there were some good lands left, to maintain (such of them as had no mind to quit that military honour: leaving their old Estates in Prussia to the King, and the Duke; whose successors have hitherto enjoyed their part of it, with the Title of

DUKES OF PRUSSIA.

- 1525 1 Albert of Brandenburg, son of Frederick Marquess of Onalsbach; or Ausbach, created Master of the Order by the Emperor Maximilian, Anno 1511. and the first Duke of Prussia, by Sigismund, the first of Poland, Anno 1525. founded the University of Coningsberg, Anno 1544.
- 1568 2 Albert Frederick son of Albert the first Duke, married Mary Eleanor, daughter of William Duke of Cleve, Gulick, Berg, &c.
- 3 Anne, eldest daughter of Duke Albert Frederick, Dutchess of Prussia, brought the Estate in marriage to
- 4 John Sigismund, Marquess and Elector of Brandenburg, confirmed therein by Sigismund the 3d. of Poland, pretending an Escheat thereof for want of heirs males of the body of Albert the first Duke.
- 5 George William Marquess and Elector of Brandenburg, in right of his Father; Duke of Prussia, in right of the Lady Anne his Mother; and of Cleve, Gulick, Berg, &c. by descent from Mary Eleanor his Grandmother.
- 6 Frederick William, son of George William, Marquess and Elector of Brandenburg, Duke of Prussia, Cleve, Gulick and Berg; of whose investiture in the Dukedom of Pomerania, and other large and goodly Signeuries, we have spoke elsewhere.

As for the Government of this Province, standing thus divided, that of the Duke is more Monarchical than that of the King; the one being absolute and uncontrollable in his Estates, the other subject to the great Council of Poland. If any difference grow between them, Delegates appointed by the King, but taking a new Oath to do equal justice, either at Marienberg or Elbing, do compound the business: who together with some other of the Dukes nomination, receive all Appeals, in which the Duke is interested as one of the parties.

The Revenues of this Dukedom are thought to be 120000 Ducats yearly.

The Arms thereof are Argent, an Eagle Vert, Membred and Crowned Or, langued Gules.

10. POMERELLA.

POMERELLA is bounded on the East, with the River Vistula by which parted from Prussia; on the South, with Poland specially so called; on the North, with the Baltick Sea; and on the West, with the Dukedom of Pomerania, of which it was antiently a part, till separated from it and united to the Crown of Poland under this new name.

The Territory small, and consequently not capable of many Towns and Cities of consideration. Those of most note, 1 Nemburg on the banks of the Vistula or Wesel. 2 Dirschaw, or Darsaw, (in Latine Darsavia) a well fortified Town, and of great importance, at the feige whereof, Anno 1627. Gustavus Adolphus King of Sweden, received the Order of the Garter. 3 Dantzick in Latine called Dantiscum, and sometimes Gedanum, situate at the mouth of the same River also, a fair and well-built City, the houses for the most part of Brick, and the rest of stone raised with great beauty and magnificence six or seven Roores high: beautified with a fair Council-house for affairs of State, and many publick Gardens for disport and exercise. It consisteth of three Cities, governed by as many Senates; the one called Trinitate, the fore-City; the second Alstat, or the old City; and the third Reichstat, or the Emperours City; but all encompassed with one wall, and governed by one chief Senate or Common-Council chosen out of all three. A Bishops See, and the second in esteem and rank, of all the Hanse-towns; of so great Trade, such a noted granary of all sorts of Corn issued from hence to supply the wants of other Countries, that 1000 measures of Wheat (besides other commodities in proportion) are here daily sold. Heretofore it was reckoned as Imperial, but now reckoned a Free-Estate, acknowledging the Kings of Poland for their Protectors, to whom they allow many Customs upon their Merchandise, and permit their Officers to remain there for receiving them. The first Town in the Kingdom of Poland, which gave entrance to the doctrines of Luther, Anno 1525. but in so tumultuous a manner, that they that favoured his Opinions, deposed the old Common-Council-Men, and created new ones of their own; prophaned the Churches, robbed them of their ornaments, and shamefully abused the Priests and religious persons, abolished the Mass, and altered all things at their pleasure. But by the coming of the King they grew somewhat quieter; leaving one Convent of Black-Friers, and two of Mints, who still enjoy the exercise of their Religion.

This Countrey once a part of the Dukedom of Pomerania was given by Smuntibore once Duke thereof, Anno 1107. to Bugislaus his second son: whose posterity enjoyed it till the year 1295. when Messtwin 24. dying without issue male, gave it to Primislaus Duke of the Polonians, whose successors have ever since enjoyed it by that Donation: called Pomerella for distinctions sake, from the first separating of it from the Dukedom of Pomerania.

11. POLAND.

POLAND, properly and specially so called, is bounded on the East, with Masovia, and Podlasia; on the West, with Silesia, and the Marquisate of Brandenburg; on the North, with Prussia and Pomerella; and on the South, with the Sarmatian or Carpathian Mountains, which divide it from Hungary. It is in length 480 Italian miles, 300 of the same miles in breadth; and took this name (as afore is said) from the word Pole, signifying as much as plain; the Countrey being plain and level, little swelled with hills.

The Air hereof is pure and healthy, but sharp and cold; the Countrey plain, shaded with thick dark woods, parts of the Hercynian, full of wild beasts for hunting, and of Bees for honey, which they have here in great abundance: together with such plenty of grain, but of Rie especially, by reason of the continual breaking up of new grounds gained out of the Forests, that it may be called the Granary or Store-house of the Western parts of Europe; sent down the Wixel unto Dantzick, and thence transported by the Merchant into other Countries, according their several wants.

The Character of the people we have had before; adding now only, that in matters of war they are stout and resolute: so forwards in giving the charge and pursuit of the enemy, that John Vasilvich the Great Duke of Moscovie, comparing them with the Souldiers of his own Dominions, was wont to say, that the Moscovites wanted a spur to drive them forwards; and the Polander had need of a bridle to hold them back. Their Language is the Slavonian tongue; most generally spoken also in the rest of the Provinces; but with some difference in the dialect or pronunciation.

It is divided commonly into two parts, the Greater and the Lesser Poland. The Greater lying wholly on the Western side of the Wixel, and so accounted antiently as a part of Germany, contains 9 divisions, under the jurisdiction of the 9 Palatines of 1 Posna, 2 Kalisch, 3 Siradia, 4 Lancitia, 5 Uladislaw, 6 Breslaw, 7 Rawa, 8 Plockzko, and 9 Dobrzin: each of them so called from some Town of note. The chief whereof, and of the rest contained in them, are 1 Posna, a Bishops See, and the principal of the Greater Poland, seated amongst the hills on the River Warta; built of free-stone, with very large Suburbs beyond the River; but much subject unto inundations, which add much strength unto the place: of great resort by reason of the Marts or Fairs holden twice a year. 2 Koscien, situate amongst Marijshers, and fortified with a double wall. 3 Ostresow, bordering on Silesia, begirt with woods. 4 Gnesna, the antientest Town of Poland, founded by Lechus their first Prince, the seat of him and his successors; till removed to Cracow situate in Kalisch, and by old prescription, the first place for inauguration of the Kings of Pole; in regard that here Prince Bolaislaus the first King of this Countrey received the Regal Diadem at the hands of Otho the third. The Town well walled, and the See of the Archbishop; who is the Primate of the Kingdom, by antient privilege the Popes Legat for all Sarmatia Europaea, and in the absence of the King or interregnum, the Vicar General of the Kingdom, having power to summon the Diets, to conclude and publish their Decrees. 5 Petrocov, a walled Town, in the Palatinate or division of Siradia, situate on a moorish soil; the place in former times of the General Diets; since removed to Warsaw. 6 Uladislaw on the Wixel or Vistula, a Bishops See. 7 Bedgost, a walled Town on the Bard, a navigable River, conveying the Merchandise of these parts into the Vistula. 8 Krusznick, in Bresky; built of wood, standing on a great Lake named Gopla, in the Castle whereof Popielis the second Duke of Poland, was after a strange manner devoured with Rats, swarming out of the Lake. 9 Plockzko upon the Vistula, a walled Town, and a Bishops See, with a Castle to it. 10 Warsaw, upon the banks of the same River: of no great note in former times, but of late grown the best frequented and most traded Town in all the Province: honoured for the most part with the Court of the King, the holding of all publique Diets (removed from Petrocov to this place) and the Transaction of all businesses both of peace and war; which must needs draw to it great resort of all sorts of people; the fruitfulness of the soil, and commodiousness of the situation rendring it very capable of those publique meetings. 11 Mladet, bordering on the Dukedom of Prussia.

The

hereof were absolute Princes, and ruled after a Despotic manner: having power not only of the estates of their subjects, but of life and death, without formalities of Law: yet when they once became elective, they lost much of that power; which decayed so by little and little, that at the last the King is counted little better than a Royal shadow: Stat magni nominis umbra, in the Poets language. A diminution which began first in the times of Lewis of Hungary, and Jagello of Lithuania: who to gain the succession to the Kingdom contrary to Law, the one for his daughter, the other for his son, departed with many of their Royalties and Prerogatives, to buy the voices of the Nobility. Since which time, the Nobility in all their elections have so limited and restrained the Kings authority, and enlarged their own, that without their consent in Council, he may neither make warre, nor treat of peace, nor impose taxes, nor alienate any of his Demesns: nor do any thing of importance which concerns the Publick: in so much as Botermus a great Statesman doth expressly say; That the Government of Poland doth rather resemble an Aristocracy than a Monarchy, a Common-wealth rather than a Kingdom. Besides, the King not only takes a solemn Oath at his Coronation, to confirm all the Rights and Privileges, which have been granted to the Subject by his Predecessors: but adds this clause, Quod si Seramentum minus dilectis, incolis, Reginis nullum nobis obedientiam prestare conebimur, that if he violate this Oath, his Subjects shall not be obliged to yield him any obedience. Which as Bodin well observeth, doth rather shew the condition of a Prince of the Senate, than of the Majesty of a King; respected accordingly by the great ones, who look not on him as their King, but their elder Brother, (or perhaps not that) and reckon his Decrees but of three days lasting. Which notwithstanding, the King once chosen and introned, hath sole power in many things, without consulting with the Senate; as viz. in assembling Dietts, choosing the secular Counsellors, disposing absolutely of his Vassals, and the Revenues of the Crown to what use he pleaseth; being sole Judge of the Nobility in Criminal causes, which is a strong bridle to reign them in with. By which, and either uniting himself unto the Clergy, or the well-forming of his party amongst the Nobility, he may do many things not allowable in strictness of Law: the power and influence which he hath in the publick Government, being proportionable to the strength of his Wit and Brain.

And here it is to be observed, that none but the Clergy, and Nobility, have any suffrage in the election of the King: that is to say, the 26 Palatines, and 60 Chastellans, with the four Marshals, and some others of the principal Officers of State, in behalf of the Nobility; and the Archbishops and Bishops, in the name of the Clergy; but of the Commons none at all. Which is the reason, why there is so much care taken to preserve the privileges of the two first Orders; without obtaining any Immunities for relief of the third: most miserably oppressed on all sides, rather as Boadmen than Tenants in respect of their Lords, and not so much subjects, as plain Slaves in regard of the King; whereof somewhat hath before been noted. Nor are the Commons excluded only out of these elections, but have no place nor vote in the Council of State, or in any of the General Dietts: the first consisting only of the Prelates, Palatines, Chastellans, and principal Officers, spoken of before, the nominating of which pertained to the King alone; the other aggregated of all persons of those several Orders, and the Delegates of each Province and principal City, sent thither for the rest of the Nobility, whom they represent. Yet notwithstanding this exclusion of the Commons from this Common-Council, they there conclude of all matters of publique interests, not properly determinable by the great Council or Council of State: in which perhaps (especially in the case of taxes) the Commons may be more concerned than any other.

The Forces of this Kingdom or Common-wealth relate unto Land-service only. For though they have a large Sea-coast upon the Baltic; yet the Danes, Swedes, and Hanse-towns, having got the start of them, keep them from doing much at Sea. And for Land-forces, they consist of Horse especially, whereof they are able to raise eightscore thousand, (that is to say, 16000 out of Poland, and 60 or 70000 out of Lithuania, and the Eastern Provinces) of which one-half at least are thought to be for action. And this seems probable enough, in regard of those great bodies of Horse, which Stephen and Sigismund the third, had against the Muscovite; whereof the one had 40000. and the other 30000. (besides draught Horses,) very well appointed. But for their Foot, they are not at so good a pass, their Infantry being for the most part Germans, or Hungarians, whom they hire for money; of which two Nations King Stephen, in his enterprise upon Livonia, had no less than 16000, to convey his Ordinance. Upon confidence of this great number of Horse, and their readines to serve upon all occasions, the Poles bear themselves so high, that they neither fear the power of a foreign Enemy, nor regard the fortifying of their Towns, or the building of Fortresses on their Frontiers: boasting that they are able to defend their Countrey, without such helps, against any Nation whatsoever; and trusting more to a Castle of bones, (as was courageously said by Savage an English Gentleman) than to a Castle of stones. And for the raising of these Horse, the Gentlemen of the Countrey are bound by their tenure, (like the Turk Timariots) not only to serve in person for defence of the Realm, but to maintain a certain number of Horse in continual readines: especially in those parts which lie next the Tartar, where their numbers are exceeding great; and with whom many times they joyn to afflict and harrafs their own Countrey, though in pay against them. Of these, some serve in the manner of our men of Arms, some like unto our Light-horse, others like the Tartars. And these they call commonly by the name of Cosacks (or Adventurers): a race of men trained up to steal, waste and depopulate, wheresoever they come, having little but their swords to live by; a murderous and wicked people, chiefly in their drunkenness, and that not only towards strangers, but their natural Countrymen. The cause of that sedition, which for some years past, hath more depopulated and distracted that flourishing Kingdom, than all the Armies of the Turks.

As for the Revenues of this King, they are computed at 600000 Crowns per annum, drawn chiefly out of Salt, and some Mines of Silver: the profits arising from the Demesns of the Crown, being for the most part, given away in pensions and gratuities to the Palatines, Chastellans, and other great men of the Realm, to make them the more pliant to his desires. Most of which sum is put up yearly in his Coffers, or expended in the purchase of estates for his younger sons; his daughters being married at the publick charge, and the expences of his household defrayed by the Lithuanians, and most part of Poland, for the time that he remains amongst them. Nor do the wars at any time exhaust his Treasure, in which case by decree of the Dietts, he is enabled to lay impositions and taxes upon the people, levied in the way of Exchequer, or upon their lands: which do amount to such a sum, that by means hereof, King Stephen maintained war three years against the Muscovite, without expending any thing of his own Revenue.

Chief Orders of Knighthood in this Kingdom are,

1 The Marian or Dutch Knights, instituted under the walls of Acon, or Ptolemais, in the Holy-land; in a Church whereof dedicated to the blessed Virgin, their Order was first allowed; from thence called Equites Mariani. The institution was in the year 1190. The first great Master, Henry Walpot. The Christians being beaten out of Syria, they first removed to Venice, and from thence to Adampurg in Hassia; where, and in some other parts of Germany, they were endowed with fair Revenues, from which named Equites Teutonici, or the Dutch Knights; sent into Prussia by the Emperor Frederick the second, Anno 1239. or called in, as some say, by the Muscovite against the Prussians; they fixed their seat at Marienberg, under Sigisfride, the second Great Master, Anno 1340. or thereabouts. In the time of Ludovicus the 18th Great Master, they were forced to submit to Casimir the fourth of Poland, Anno 1450. the occasion of the long war betwixt them and the Poles, continuing till the time of Albert of Brandenbourg, the 24. and last Great Master in this Countrey; who surrendered his order (as before is said) to Sigismund the first, by whom he was created the first Duke of Prussia. Such of the Knights as disrelucted this action, retired into Germany, where they chose one Walter Croneberg Master of the Order: the title afterwards conferred upon Maximilian, one of the younger sons of Maximilian the second; but the Order sensibly decaying, and at this time of little estimation in the world.

2 Of the Port-glaive, or Sword-bearers (Ensseri in Latine) confirmed by Pope Innocent the third; by whom sent into Livonia to defend the Preachers of the Gospel against the Infidels, at the first conversion of that Countrey. Being too weak to effect that business, they united themselves with the Dutch Knights by the Popes authority, and in stead of Knights of the Sword, were called Knights of the Cross. Separated from it in the time of Univus their Great Master, Anno 1541. the Dutch Knights being then dissolved of Prussia, and these inclining wholly to the opinions of Luther, they a while subsisted of themselves: what became of them afterwards, and how the Order was extinguished, hath been shewn already in Livonia.

The Arms of this Kingdom are quarterly, 1 Gules, an Eagle Argent, Crowned and Armed Or, for the Realm of Poland; and 2 Gules, a Chevalier armed Cap-a-pen, advancing his Sword Argent, mounted on a barbed Courser of the second, for the Dukedom of Lithuania.

There are in the whole Realm of Poland,

Of the Romish Church, Archbishops 3.	B'shops 19.
Of the Greek Church, Archbishops 2.	Bishops 6.

Universities 4.

And so much for POLAND.

THE Carpathian Mountains.

Our way from Poland unto Hungary (whether now we go) we must of necessity pass over the CARPATHIAN MOUNTAINS, the ancient boundary of Sarmatia Europæa, from the rest of Europe. A long and craggy ledge of hills, which beginning near the City of Presburg, and the borders of Austria, pass on in a continual course till they come to the very Emaxine Sea: and by that means not only divide Hungary from Poland, specially so called; but parting Transylvania and Moldavia, two Dacian Regions, from Russia Nigra and Podolia, Provinces of the Polonian Kingdom. By Ptolemy in his second Book, they are called Montes Sarmatici, (Sarmatice Ruper, by Solinus) because determining the Sarmatian Nation, (who possessed the most part of it) from Germany, and the more Southern parts of Europe: and in his third Book by one name Carpathes, or Mons Carpathus, so called (as some think) from the Greek word καρπός, signifying Fruit; from the fruitfulness of it, compared with the other Mountains in those Northern Countries. At the present known by divers names, according to the Provinces and people which it passeth by. By the Dutch generally called Wurtzgarten, (or a Garden of Herbs) which alludeth to the name of Carpathus: by the Hungars, Tarchzal. Betwixt Moravia and Hungaria, where it is at the highest, it is called in the Slavonian tongue, by the name of Tatris; in the German, Schneberg: where it parteth Transylvania from Russia Nigra, the Rosses call it Bieseld; and the Dutch men, Crapack. A chain of Hills, of more length than fame: not much observable in story, but for the shutting up the Hungary, Slaves, and others of those Northern Nations, which afterward invaded the Roman Provinces: nor of much notice at the present, but for giving an Original to many of the principal Rivers, which water the Countries lying on both sides of it. And therefore having nothing more to detain us here, we will pass them over, and descend unto the Plains of Hungary; where we shall meet again with the Roman Empire, the Territories and Affairs whereof we shall take along without interruption until we come unto the banks of the great River Tygris, and the Caspian Sea. And so far also from this place, we shall survey the fortunes and Estates of the Turkish Empire, of which the Realm of Hungary is the most Western part or Province; not meeting either of them again till we come to Egypt.

OF HUNGARIE.

HUNGARIE is bounded on the East, with Transylvania, and Walachia; on the West, with Stiria, Austria, and Moravia; on the North, with the Carpathian Mountains, which divide it from Poland; and on the South, with Slavonia, and some part of Dacia. Extended in length from Presburg along the Danow to the borders of Transylvania, for the space of 300 English miles; and 190 of the same miles in breadth. The reason of the name we shall have anon.

It lyeth in the Northern temperate Zone, betwixt the middle Parallels of the 7th and 9th Climaxes, so that the longest Summers day in the Southern parts, is but 15 hours and a half, and not above 18 hours in the parts most North: taking up all that tract of ground on the North side of Danubius, possessed by the Jazyges Metanastæ, a Sarmatian people; and part also of Pannonia Superior, and Pannonia Inferior, both on the South of that River.

But being it passeth generally under the name of Pannonia, we are to know, that the Romans having made themselves Masters of all Pannonia, divided it into four Provinces, part of the Diocese of Illyricum Occidentale: that is to say, Pannonia Superior, bordering on Noricum, and containing part of the Higher Austria, and the most Western parts of the present Hungary, on the South side of the Danow; 2 Pannonia Inferior, containing the Eastern parts of Hungary, on the same side of the River. 3 Valeria, anciently part of Pannonia Superior, comprehending Stiria or Stiermark, in the Archdukedom of Austria. And 4 Savia, so called of the River Savus, anciently part of Pannonia Inferior, now called Windestland, one of the Provinces or Subdivisions of Slavonia. But the name of Pannonia falling with the Roman Empire, and this Country being fallen into the hands of other Masters; it took a new name from the Nations who possessed themselves of it; and was called Hungaria, quasi Hunni-Avaria, by a mixt name made of the Hunni and Avars, two Scythian Nations, who either successively or conjunctly were possessed thereof: or from the Hungari, another race of Scythians, mentioned by Jornandus in his Book De Rebus Geticis, drawn into this Country by the Emperour Arnulph to aid him in his war against Suabivogus, King of the Moravians. This last I look on as most probable; the first as more probable than that of Aventine and others of our later Writers: who finding a poor Province in the most North-east point of the Russian Empire called Jugra, (and by them Jugaria;) would have the name of Hungary to be thence derived.

The people are strong of body, and rude of behaviour, respecting neither the liberal Arts, nor mechanic Trades. The greatest aspersion is the name of a Coward, which cannot be wiped off without the killing of a Turk: after which they are privileged to wear a feather, and by the number of their feathers to shew how many Turks they have slain in battel. They desire wars, and like no trade better, being naturally slothfull (like the Irish) and therefore best approve of that course of life, whereby they may rather live upon other mens labour, than take pains for their living. Extremely covetous; yet having rather desire than art to enrich themselves, permitting the Dutch to ingross all their trading, and manage such Commodities as the Country yieldeth: which is the cause (seconded by the oppressions of the Turk and the Austrian Princes under whom they are) that none of them rise to any considerable wealth. And for such as have Estates in Land, they grow every day more poor than others. For though the Females be excluded from inheriting their Fathers possessions (to whom they give no portion, but new Cloaths on the Wedding day;) yet being the Sons do equally inherit the Estate (as such who hold in Gavelkind do here in England) it must needs be that by so many divisions and subdivisions, the greatest Patrimony that is, will be brought to nothing. Both Sexes in the way of their education are inured to hardihood, not suffered to lie in beds till the night of their marriage.

The Christian Faith was first planted here in the time of Stephen, surnamed the Saint, the first King of

of this Countrey; invited thereunto by the special means and procurement of the Emperour Henry the second, giving him upon that condition his Sister Gisela in marriage: and through the preaching and industry of Albert Archbishop of Prague, Anno 1016. or thereabouts. Since which time Christianity hath continued here without interruption, (defended gallantly and courageously against the Turks) but broken into factions and subdivisions among themselves: some pertinaciously adhering to the Church of Rome, some following the doctrine of Luther, others that of Calvin; and some, new fancies and opinions disavowed by all the rest: free exercise of Religion first granted by Maximilian the 24, and re-obtained in the time of Rodolphus his Son and Successor, by the Pacification at Vienna, procured by the power of Boscai Prince of Transylvania, Anno 1606. The violating of which Pacification by Ferdinand the II. in the beginning of his reign, occasioned great wars and troubles betwixt him and this people, not quieted in a long time after: yet all these different parties do agree in this, to punish adultery and fornication with no less a punishment than death: the father forcing his daughter, the husband his wife, and the brother his sisters, to the place of their Execution.

The language generally here spoken, is a kind of Slavonian, differing in dialect from the Poles: but in the parts adjoining to Germany, the Dutch is spoken; as the old Jazygian is betwixt Danubius and Tibiscus, the ancient seat of the Jazyges Metanastæ.

The Soil is wonderfull fruitful, yielding Corn and Fruits in great abundance; the grasse in some places (as in the Isle of Comara) if it be suffered to grow to its full length before the cutting of it down, being said to exceed the height of a man: which doth breed such a number of Cattel, that this Countrey alone, is thought to be able to feed all Europe with flesh. They yearly send into Germany and Slavonia, 80000 Oxen: they have Deer, Partridge, Pheasants, in such superfluity, that any man that will may kill them; which in other places is utterly prohibited, these creatures being reserved as game for Gentlemen. For at that great insurrection of the Boors in Germany (before the end of which, 50000 of them were slain in fight) their chief demands were, 1. That they might choose their own Ministers; 2^{ly}. That they might pay no tithes but of Corn; 3^{ly}. That they might be free from the power of Magistrates; 4^{ly}. That Wood, Timber, and Fewel might be common; 5. And especially, That they might hunt and hawk in all times and places. The other commodities of the Countrey are Gold and Silver, whereof they have some very rich veins; as also of Tin, Lead, Iron; good store of Fish, Copper, Wine; this last as good as that of Candy.

The worthiest Scholar that ever this Kingdom produced, was S. Hierom, a worthy Father of the Latine Church, born in Siridon. The most worthy of all their Souldiers, were Johannes Huniades, who so valiantly resisted the incursions of the Turks, and slew of them 50000 at the battel at Maron. And 2^{ly}. Matthias Corvinus, his Son, afterward King of Hungary; of whom thus Adrian our of a Poet:

Patria decus, unica stirpis
Gloria, Pannonicæ cadis fortissimus altor.

His Countries pride, the glory of his race,
Revenger of th' Hungarians late disgrace.

The principal Rivers are, 1 Danubius, spoken of before, when we were in Germany. 2 Sava, which rising in Carniola; 3 Dravus, which rising in Carinthia; and 4 Tibiscus, which rising in the Carpathian Mountains, pay their tribute to Danubius: of which Tibiscus the Hungarians use to say, that two parts are water, and the third fish. Besides which, and some others of inferior note, there is the famous Lake called Balaton (by the Dutch Platse) 40 Italian miles in length, but of breadth unequal: in some places being ten miles broad, and in some but three. There be also many medicinal waters, and more hot Baths than any one Countrey hath in Europe: some waters also of a strange Nature; whereof some falling on the ground is turned to stone; others (about the Town of Smalnice) which falling into Ditches make a kind of mud, out of which tried and melted they make very good Copper; and some again which flow in Winter, and freeze in Summer; and near unto Bisrice or Mosol, a Spring or Fountain, out of which cometh a green water, whereof they make Solder for their Gold.

Principal Mountains of this Countrey are 1 Carpatus, the Sarmatian or Carpathian Mountains spoken of before. 2 Mutcan, near the City of Agria, covered with rich Vines. 3 Erdol, omnium amplissimus, the largest of the three, saith the Atlas minor. Which words if true, must needs be understood of the height of this Mountain, but neither of the length or breadth; in both which without question it comes short of Carpatus.

The Countrey is commonly divided into the Upper Hungary, and the Lower: the Upper lying on the North of the River Danow, out of the bounds and territories of the Roman Empire; the Lower lying on the South of that River, and comprehending all Pannonia Inferior, and part of Superior, two Roman Provinces. The Upper again subdivided (before the coming in of the Turks) into 32 Counties or Juridical Resorts, that is to say, 24 on the West side of Tibiscus (or the Tisse) and 8 on the East side of it: the Lower (at the same time) into 16 only; Of which ten were betwixt the Danow and the River Dravus, and the other six betwixt the Dravus and the Sava. But this Division and the Subdivisions depending on it, being since the coming in of the Turks almost out of use, we will now look upon it as it stands divided at the present, betwixt the Emperour as King of Hungary, by a mixt title of descent and election; and the Great Turk, as Lord of the most part of it, by Arms and Conquest, two parts of three at least being forced into his possession. But here we are to understand, that by by reason of the great jealousies and distrusts betwixt these great Princes, every ordinary Town is fortified and garrisoned like a Town of war, and so are almost all the houses of the Nobility and Gentry throughout this Countrey: so that it were an infinite labour to specify in this place all those Towns and Fortresses, which do occur in reading the Hungarian Histories of these later times. Some of the principal for strength, antiquity, or other mark of estimation which is set upon them, we shall here subjoin.

And first in the Emperours part of the Lower Hungary, we have 1 Rab, on the meeting of the Danow with the River Kab, coming out of the Lower Hungary, whence the modern Dutch name; by Antonine called Araban, by the French Javarine, by our present Latinists, Javorinum. Memorable heretofore for being the boundary of the two Pannonias, Inferior and Superior, hereabouts divided: of late most principally for a strong Fortress against the Turks, by whom once taken, Anno 1594. but within four years after again recovered by the industry of Monsieur de Vandre Court, a French Gentleman, as the Frenchmen say; but as the Germans write, of the Earl of Swartzenbourg, a French Gentleman, as the Frenchmen say; but as the Germans write, of the Earl of Swartzenbourg, at that time Governor of Komura. 2 Altembourg, in the road leading towards Austria, a strong Town, and the belt Out-work of Vienna, for which cause much aimed at by the Turks, but without success. 3 Castell-Neus, a new-erected Fortress, as the name importeth, but of special strength, erected purposely in the time of the Emperour Rodolph, to confront the Turks. 4 Sabaria, anciently the Metropolis of Pannonia Superior; the birth-place of St. Martin Bishop of Tours; now of less account; by the Hungarians called Kimarorubash. Others conceive it to be that which the Dutch call Leibnitz. 5 Siridon, the Sidon of Ptolemy, in the Confines of Hungary and Dalmatia, by the common people called Strigman. A Town of good repute, till destroyed by the Goths; but after made of more esteem by the birth of St. Hierom, one of the four chief Fathers of the Latine Church; and for all parts of humane Learning; nothing inferior to the best of the Grecian Sages. 6 Sopron, (Sopronium in Latine) on the borders of Austria. 7 Komura, a strong piece in an Island of the same name, made by the Circling of the Danow; oft-times attempted by the Turks, but in vain at all times. Then in the Upper Hungary, we have 8 Preiburg, on the edge of Austria also, but on the North side of the River, the Carnuntum of Antoninus; but by the modern Latines called Posonium: seated in a pleasant healthfull Countrey on the River Lyca, whose waters the Danow there receiveth; in the suburbs whereof, on the top of an high Mountain, standeth a goodly Castle, the ordinary residence of the Emperours, as Kings of Hungary. For though it be a little City, and not very beautifull; yet being safe by the neighbourhood of Austria, it hath been made the Metropolis of this Kingdom, since the loss of Buda. Before the walls hereof dyed Count Dampierre one of the chief Commanders of Ferdinand the second, in the wars of Hungary and Bohemia. 9 Filleck, a place of great strength and consequence, taken by Solyman the Magnificent in his first attempts upon this Kingdom, and lost by Amurath the 34, the Turks in vain attempting the recovery of it. 10 Niri, a Bishops See on the River Bech. 11 Paccia, a Bishops See also on the River Danubius, once in possession of the Turks, but restored again unto the Christians at the making of the peace between the Emperour Rodolphus, and Sult. in Achmet. 12 Cassovia, a strong piece towards Transylvania. 13 Lippe, in the Borders of that Countrey also, commanding the entrances thereof, and therefore much affected by the Princes or Vainods of that Province; possessed by whom in the later times of the Emperour Rodolph, it was by them incorporated into Transylvania; but how long it continued so, I am not able to say. 14 Tokai, a place of great strength, and as great fidelity, the people and Garrison hereof holding out for the Emperour Rodolphus, Anno 1605, against some of his rebellious Subjects, in the time of so extreme a Famine, that the Souldiers did not only eat two boyes, but many times cast livers who should eat one another. 15 Eperia, a place of no less consequence, and exemplary loyalty. 16 Neusoll, or Nebenzell, a strong Town, and as strongly fortified, not far from the Spring-head of the River Gran, which in the year 1621. proved fatal to that great Commander the Count of Bucquoy; who at the siege hereof (the Town being then in rebellion against Ferdinand the second, Emperour and King of Hungary) lost his life. For going privately to view some places of advantage for a general assault, he fell into an Ambush of Hungarians, who suddenly set upon him, discomfited his small party, killed first his horse under him, and at last himself, having in that skirmish received 16 wounds. Slain with him at the same time also, Torquato an Italian Prince, Count Verdugo, a Spanish Earl, and one of the Gonzagues of the house of Medina.

Places of most importance in the Turks possession, are, 1 Buda, by the Dutch called Hoffen, supposed by some to be the Cirta of Ptolemy; by others, the Arincum of Antoninus; and to have took the name of Buda, either from Buda the Brother of Attila, said to be the re-founder of it: or from the Budini, a Scythian people, mentioned in Herodotus. Unevenly seated amongst hills, on the Southern shore of the Danow, but in the most fruitfull part of all the Countrey; exceedingly well fortified, especially by a strong Castle, thought to be impregnable, and therefore very carefully guarded by the jealous Turks; adorned with many buildings both private and publick: and furnished with some medicinal Baths, which owe much of their pomp and sumptuousness to their new Masters the Turks, who took it from the Christians, August 20. 1591. Solyman the Magnificent then present at the taking of it. Before that time the Seat Royal of the Kings of Hungary, and the chief City of the Kingdom; as now the seat of the chief Basha, or Lord Lieutenant for the Grand Signeur. 2 Alba Regalis, by the Dutch called Sint-Weissenburg, betwixt the Danow and the Dravus; strongly, but unwholly feared, in the midst of an inaccessible marsh: joynt to the firm Land by three broad Causeys, blocked up at the ends with three great Bulwarks; but for all the strong situation of it, taken by the Turks, Anno 1543. before that time the usual place both for the Coronation and interment of the Kings of Hungary, recovered from the Turks, Anno 1601. and lost again unto them in the next year after. 3 Walpo, or Pal- po, on the River Dravus, taken by Solyman marching towards Alba Regalis, to leave no enemies behind him at the siege of that City. 4 Gran, in Latine called Strigonium, seated upon the Danow, but opposite to the mouth of Gran, which arising in the Upper Hungary doth there end its course, whence the name of Gran; honoured of a long time with the See of an Archbishop, who is the Primate of the Kingdom, and of great power in all business which concerns the State, took by the Turks, Anno 1534. Solyman the Magnificent being in person at the siege, and lost An. 1595. at what time Sir Tho. Arundel of Wardour Castle in Wiltshire, carried himself so gallantly, that forcing the Water-Tower, and taking thence with his own hands the Turkish Banner, the Emperour Rodolphus created him a Count of the Empire; and King James afterwards made him Lord Arundel of Wardour; but the Christians were not suffered to keep it long; for being many times after besieged by the Turks, who were resolved not to end the war without it, it was finally recovered by them, Anno 1605. 5 Fiske-kirken, in Latine called Quinque Ecclesie, from 5 Churches in it, a Bishops See, conceived to be the Tentiburgium of Antoninus; took by the Turks, Anno 1566. and giving them a great command on the River Dravus, upon which it is seated. 6 Sirmisch, betwixt the Danow and the Saw, or Savus, now noted for a vein of the best Wines, but otherwise of no estimation at the present, though heretofore of most account in all this Province; the Metropolis (as I conceive) of Pannonia inferior; the seat of the Prefectus Pratoris Illyrie, before the division of the Empire, honoured with the personal residence of many of the Emperours, and made in those respects, the Stage of many great and memorable actions. For here Vetricano, or Bretanio as others call him, took on himself the Purple Robe, and was declared Emperour, by the Illyrian Souldiers, lying here in Garrison: here being deserted by his own Souldiers, he submitted himself unto Constantinus, the Son of Constantine the Great; here Gratian the Emperour, Son of Valentinian the first, was born. And finally here was held a Council against Photinus, Bishop of this City, who held, that CHRIST had no existence of God the Father, till he was conceived and born of the Virgin, which Tenent being contrary as well to that of the Arian, as the Orthodox Prelates, was here condemned by both parties in the time of the said Constantinus (who was then in person) Anno 356. 7 Zigath, a strong Town situate in a marshy ground, on the North side of the Dra, taken by Solyman the Magnificent, Anno 1566. who there ended his dayes. 8 Murs, upon the confluence of the Dra, and the Danow, once a Roman Colony, and as remarkable in the stories of elder times; as 9 Belgrade, on the confluence of the Saw and the Danow, hath been in the later. This last Town of divers names, first called Taurunum, or Taurinum; after, Alba Græca; by the Dutch accordingly Greiche Wessenburg; by the French and modern Latinists, Belgrade, and Belgradum, from the beautiful situation of it, hemmed in upon the North, with the Danow, on the East, with the Saw; on the other sides defended with strong walls, deep ditches, and impregnable Ramparts. Belonging anciently to the Despots of Serbia, by whom consigned over to Sigismund, King of Hungary, as best able to keep it; the Despots being satisfied with lands and territories of a better value. The Bulgars heretofore of Christendoms against the Turks, who received before it many great and notable repulses; (of which the most memorable were those of Amurath the second, and Mahomet firnamed the Great;) taken at last to the great loss and shame of the Christian world, not succouring the defendants in convenient time, by Solyman the Magnificent, Anno 1520. Then on the North side of the River, in the Upper Hungary, there is 10 Pesth, over against Buda, on the River Danow. 11 Colocza, an Archbishops See, on the same River also. 12 Zegedin, on the West side of the River Tibiscu. 13 Agria, an old Bishops See, and strongly fortified, having a great command over all those parts of the Countrey; in vain besieged by Haly the Bassa of Buda, with an Army of 36000 Turks in the time of Solyman the Magnificent, Anno 1552. But taken by Mahomet the 3d, himself lying at the siege in person, Anno 1578. not far from which, immediately after the taking of Agria, Mahomet gave the Christians so great an overthrow, that if he had pursued his Victory, it is thought that he had finished the conquest of Hungary; as on the other side the Turks were so worsted, and disordered (Mahomet himself, and most of his Commanders flying out of the field) that had the Christians followed the chase, and not betook themselves to the spoil of the Camp, they had in probability for ever freed the Kingdom from the Turkish Tyranny. This battel, from a Village near unto which it was fought, called the battel of Keresztur, a battel of so strange a fortune, that the Conquerors were driven out of the field, and the vanquished Army ran away with the victory. 14 Hatroan, a very strong Town, and as strongly garrisoned, recovered by the Christians after two long sieges, and many sharp assaults, Anno 1558. and presently again abandoned, upon the noise of *Mahomet*s coming into Hungary with a dreadful Army. 15 Temeswar, on the East of that River towards Transylvania; the ordinary residence of a Turkish Bassa. 16 Gyula, a strong Town on the borders of Transylvania, betrayed by Nicholas Kereken Governour hereof, in the last year of Solyman, on a promise of some great reward. But Selimus the Son of Solyman caused him to be put into a barrel stuck full of nails, with the points turned inwards, and so to be tumbled up and down, till he (most miserably) died: there being on the Barrel this Inscription written; viz. Here receive the reward of thy Avarice and Treason; Gyula thou soldst for gold; if thou be not faithfull to Maximilian thy natural Lord, neither wilt thou be true to me. 17 Singidon, on the South of Gyula, betwixt which and Belgrade are the fields of Maron, memorable for the slaughter of 50000 Turks, slain here in battel, under the fortunate conduct of John Hunlades.

The first Inhabitants of this Countrey on the North side of the Danow, and the West of the Tisse, or Tibiscus, wherethe Iazyges, Metanasse; and on the East side of the Tisse, the Daci; known, but not conquered by the Romans: on the South of the Danow the Pannonies (by some called the Panes) subdivided into the Azull, Latovici, Werciani, Tassil, Oferiatis, and some others inhabiting the West

parts thereof, or Pannonia Superior, and the Ercuneeles, Brouci Arvufci, and Scordisci, dwelling in the Eastern parts, or Pannonia Inferior. First conquered by the Romans, Anno U. C. 719 L. Cornificius, and Sextus Pompeius, being Consuls; but many times rebelling, and not fully subdued till 40 years after the insurrection of Bato, being then crushed by Augustus Caesar, and thereby the whole Province seised in obedience. Divided first into two parts or Provinces, Superior and Inferior; out of which Scavia and Valeria were after taken, as before is noted. Under the Romans it continued, till subdued by the Huns, a people not heard of in the time of the Roman greatness, unless we take them, as some do, for the Chuni of Ptolomy. But being those Chuni are placed by him betwixt the Bessarna, and the Roxolani, on the South-west of Borysthenes, I see not how to fit that dwelling unto the Huns, who were shut up within the Pennis of Palas Meotis; and by all the Writers of those times accounted for a Nation not so much as heard of, when they first set footing into Europe. Letting that therefore pass as an improbable and ill-grounded conjecture, certain it is, that from the Fenn-Countries of Asia, on the other side of the Tanais, they came first into Europe: living in their own Countrey a poor and miserable life, till God thought fit to make use of them as a scourge, to chastise the Christians of the West, then grown luxurious, and almost incorrigible by too much felicity; and to that end miraculously opened them a passage, never found before. For having neither mind nor meaning to invade the Roman Empire, which possibly they had not heard of; nor knowing how to clear themselves of that uncomfortable Countrey in which they dwelt; it pleased the great disposer of all things, by following an Hart or Stag which they had in chase, to shew them a safe passage into Europe, through the Fenns of Meotis; which before they thought to be unpassable. The report made by those Hunters at their coming back, of the rich and pleasant Land which they had so fortunately discovered; invited the chief heads of their Clans, with all the several Rascallies depending on them, to flock into Europe: into which they fell so suddenly and unexpectedly, that they forced the Goths, then dwelling on the North side of the Ister, to fly over that River, and supplicate to the Emperour Valens for new habitations. This hapned in the year 373. Athanaricus the second, or Ermanaricus (as Jornandes calls him) being then King of the Goths, and Balamir, Captain of the Huns. Fleshed with this victory, Balamir or Balhemler, (as Siebert calls him) takes the name of King, Anno 386. or thereabout; and following the course of the Ister towards this Pannonia, which he had an aim at; found a great Army raised on the other side of the River, of purpose to encounter with him: commanded by Detricus General for the Roman Army, and Macrinus (or Matrinus) Commander in chief of the Pannonians. Both Generals presuming too much on the depth and wideness of the River, and knowing well that the Huns had neither Boat nor Ship to pass them over; betook themselves unto their rest, with too much security. But the Huns, to the number of 100000, having crossed the River upon bladders, fell on the quarters of the Romans, whom they slew like sheep. Macrinus after this fought two battels with them, in the first whereof he was victorious, there being lost on both sides about 30000 men: but in the second being slain, and his Army routed, the Huns possessed themselves of both Pannonias; buying this Victory with the loss of 40000 men, in the year 401. Balamir being dead, Bleda and Attila his Sons succeeded, Anno 436. and Bleda dying also in the year 450. left Attila sole King of the Huns, that great scourge of the Christian world; who having first waited Illyricum and Thrace, compelled the Emperour Theodosius the second, to buy his peace of him at the price of 6000 pound weight of Gold, and an yearly Tribute. Invited afterwards by Geisfricus King of the Vandals in Africk, to war upon the Goths of Spain, (out of which Countrey they had driven him) he forced his way, through all the Nations betwixt him and Gaul; and beating down all the Towns and Fortresses on the River Rhene, on that side of the Roman Empire, entered that Province in the reign of the 3d Valentinian: divided at that time betwixt the Romans, French, Burgundians, and the Goths of Spain. Discomfited by Attilus, and the Kings of those Nations then in league against him, in that famous battel near Tholouse spoken of before, (with the loss of 180000 of his men,) he went back by the way of Italy, where he lacked Aquileia, Millain, Vincenia, Pavie; and not without much difficulty was diverted from the spoil of Rome, by the intercession of Pope Leo: committing in all places such unspeakable cruelties, that he was always after called (as he styled himself) Malleus or'is, and Flagellum Dei. Returning home he picked a quarrel with Marciannus the Eastern Emperour, as if the tribute promised him by Theodosius, had not been well paid. But being pacified for the present, and mindfull of his former project upon the Goths; he resolved once again to try his fortune with that people; and was again defeated by them under the conduct of Thorismund, the third King of the Visigoths, or Goths of Spain, and so returned ingloriously to his Countrey. Cloaked after with his own blood, violently breaking out at his nostrils, on his wedding night; he left Pannonia to his Sons named Hernac, Aladurins, and Chaba: who disagreeing amongst themselves about the Kingdom, gave an advantage to the Goths, then possessed of Dacia, to make themselves masters of this also; scarce thorough warm in their new Estates, when sent by Zeno the Emperour into Italy against Odoacer, where they finally seised. After this time we hear no more of the Goths in Pannonia, or any where of the Huns at all; unless acting under the Avars, or joyning with them in the name of Hun-Avaria, as some think they did.

The Countrey being thus left to the next Invader, was presently possessed by the Longobards, said to be originally of Scandia, and there called Winnili, (and of the Winniloth in Scandia, Jornandes speaketh) afterwards ob longas barbas Longobardi. But concerning this last name, take along with you this old Witte tale, recited but not approved of by Paulus Diaconus. The Vandals warring upon the Winnili, went unto Godidan (he should rather have said Woden) to sue for the victory: which the Winnili hearing, wrought by countermine, and sent Gambata the mother of their King Ajon, on the like business to Frea

- 1191 17 Emaricus, Son of Bela the 3d.
 1201 18 Ladislaus II. Son of Emaricus, reigned but 6 months, being slain by treason, very young, and without issue.
 1201 19 Andrew II. Son of Bela the 3d, and brother of Emaricus.
 1236 20 Bela IV. Son of Andrew the 2d.
 1271 21 Stephen IV. Son of Bela the 4th.
 1273 22 Ladislaus III. Son of Stephen the 4th.
 1290 23 Andrew III. nephew to Bela the 4th, by his Brother Stephen.
 1302 24 Charles, surnamed Martel, Son of Charles King of Naples, by Mary, daughter to Stephen the 4th, against whom was chosen Wenceslaus, King of Bohemia, Son of Wenceslaus the second, and of Anne his wife, daughter of Bela the fourth, and after three years Otho of Bavaria, descended from Elizabeth, another of the daughters of Bela the fourth, chosen also by a faction against Wenceslaus. But Wenceslaus surrendering his claim to Otho, and Otho not long after forced to renounce his title; Charles Martel remained King of the whole.
 1343 25 Ludovicus, Nephew to Charles Martel by his Son Carlbert, succeeded King of Poland also, in right of Elizabeth his Mother, Sister of Casimir the 2d.
 1383 26 Charles II. King of Naples, descended from Charles of Naples, and Mary, daughter of Stephen the 4th, before mentioned, by their Son John of Durazzo, one of the younger brothers of Charles Martel; poisoned after a short reign by the widow of the former King, to make a way for her daughter to the Crown.
 1387 27 Sigismund, Emperour, King of Bohemia, and Duke of Luxembourg, succeeded in right of Mary his wife, eldest daughter of Lewis or Lodovicus; her younger sister Edwige being Queen of Poland.
 1438 28 Albert of Austria, Emperour and King of Hungary, and Bohemia, in right of Elizabeth his wife, the daughter of Sigismund.
 1440 29 Ladislaus, or Uladislaus, Son of Jagello King of Poland, in the minority of Ladislaus the Son of Albert, chosen King of Hungary; unfortunately slain at the battle of Varna, with 30000 of his people: and perhaps his perjury might deserve it. For having made and sworn a Truce with the Turk; the Pope's Legate upon a seeming advantage, absolved him of his Oath, and drew him into the field. At the beginning the Christians had the better; but at the last, Amurath the 2d, against whom they fought, lifting up his eyes to heaven, and desiring Christ to look upon the perfidious dealing wherewith his followers had dishonored him; re-encouraged his men, and to got the victory.
 1444 30 Ladislaus V. King of Bohemia, the Son of Albert, by Elizabeth, daughter of Sigismund, and Mary.
 1458 31 Matthias Corvinus, Son of the famous Hunniades, after the death of Ladislaus the 5th, King of Hungary.
 1491 32 Uladislaus II, or Ladislaus VI. Son of Casimir the 4th of Poland, and of Elizabeth the daughter of Albert, succeeded in the Kingdoms of Hungary, and Bohemia; his three younger brothers successively in that of Poland.
 1517 33 Ludovicus II. King of Hungary, and Bohemia, both born and dead before the ordinary course of nature: in the 21 year of his age, and the 12th of his Reign, unfortunately drawn into the field, to encounter Solyman the Magnificent, one of the hardiest Captains in his time. The battle was fought at a Village called Mogachz, or Mugace, just betwixt Belgrade and Buda; in which 19000 of the Hungarians were slain, and the young King drowned in the flight. A most lamentable discomfiture. Lewis thus reared, John Sepusio, Vayvod, or Governour of Transylvania, was by the States chosen King of Hungary. But Ferdinand, Archduke of Austria, and brother unto Charles the 5th, challenged the Kingdom in right of Anne his wife, daughter to Uladislaus, and sister to Lewis, King of Hungary and Bohemia. On this pretence he invaded the Kingdom, and drove out John his Competitor, who to recover his right, called Solyman the Magnificent into the Countrey, who took so fast footing in it, that his Successors could never since be removed.
 1527 34 John Sepusio, Vayvod of Transylvania, chosen King upon the death of Ludovicus the 2d, oured by Ferdinand of Austria, restored by Solyman the great Turk, died An. 1540. after whose death the Hungarians caused his Son Stephen an Infant, to be Crowned King in his Cradle, of which immediately deprived by Solyman his pretended Patron, who under colour of preserving that Kingdom for him, seized Buda, and other the chief Towns thereof, which he after kept unto himself.
 1540 35 Ferdinand of Austria, elected King of Bohemia, in respect to the Lady Anne his wife, sister of Ludovicus the 2d, Anno 1527. did in the same right lay claim to the Crown of Hungary, chosen to which by a party prepared for him; he was always in contention with John de Sepusio; each of them acknowledged King by their several factions; but by both sides received on the death of John.
 1562 36 Maximilian, Emperour, King of Hungary and Bohemia, Archduke of Austria, Son of Ferdinand.
 1572 37 Rodolphus, Emperour, &c. Son of Maximilian.
 1608 38 Matthias, Brother of Rodolphus, afterwards Emperour.

1618 39 Fer-

- 1618 39 Ferdinand II. of Gratz, next heir unto Matthias of the house of Austria, afterwards Emperour, &c. against whom a party of Hungarians called in Bethlen Gabor, Prince of Transylvania, whom they elected for their King, intending (as they said) to crown him also. But the affairs of Bohemia going on the Emperours side, Gabor relinquished his pretensions, and hearkened to a peace betwixt them.
 1625 40 Ferdinand III. Son of Ferdinand the 2d, chosen and crowned King in the life of his Father, and in the year 1627. King of Bohemia also, succeeding after him in the Empire, and now living Anno 1648.

This Kingdom doth pretend it self to be Elective, and to have special Privileges indulged them by their former Princes; and anciently indeed it was so in both respects, the last especially: King Andrew giving authority to his Prelates, Peers, and other people, ut sine nota alicujus infidelitatis, &c. that without any imputation of disloyalty, they might contradict, oppose, and resist their King, if he did any thing in violation of their Laws and Sanctions. But both their liberty of Elections, and pretence of Privileges, had been so shaken and restrained by their Kings of the house of Austria, that the Electors are become a matter of formality only, their Privileges depending wholly on their Princes pleasure: now grown too potent for them to contend withall, unless they should betray their Countrey into the hands of the Turk. To which some of them have expressed some strong inclinations; the oppressions laid upon them by the Austrian Family being deemed unsufferable.

The Forces of this Kingdom when it was entire, may best be seen by those great Armies which they have brought into the field against the Turk. By whom two parts of three being since subdued, that which remains must not be thought able to answer the proportion of former times; though they have done more than could be reasonably expected from it. For at the battle of Keresztur, Anno 1596. there were 6000 Hungarian horse, and 10000 Foot of this Nation only; besides those of Germany and Transylvania: and the next year, notwithstanding the discomfiture of that Army, they raised no less than 20000 horse and foot, on the noise of some preparations among the Turks. 'Tis true, their foot are commonly but meanly armed; the defect wherein is rather to be imputed to the Prince, than unto the people: who can but bring their bodies (which is all they have) for defence of their Countrey. And for their Horse (whom they call Heiducks) maintained in continual readiness, at the charge of the Nobility and principal Gentry, they are next Cousins to the Cosacques, almost as mischievous as they, and hold as strict intelligence with the Turks, as those do with the Tartars.

The chief Revenues of this Kingdom come from the Silver Mines, out of which is yearly raised about a million and a half of Guldens. Maximilian the 2d made it up two millions, by seizing on the lands of Cathedral and Collegiate Churches; and assigning annual Penions to the Bishops, Canons, and other Religious persons. Most of which sum comes clearly to the Emperours Coffers, the Presidary Souldiers being paid with Contribution Money, raised upon the Countrey; and the Lieutenant General, whose entertainment comes to 30000 Dollars yearly, defrayed upon their purses also.

The chief Order of Knighthood in this Kingdom, was that of the Dragon, instituted by Sigismund Emperour and King hereof; at such time as by the Council of Constance, against John Hus, and Hierom of Prague, and by the sharpness of his Sword proved upon their followers, he had cast down (as he conceived) the Dragon of Herese and Schism. But the device proved of no long continuance, expiring almost with the Author.

The Arms of Attila the Hun, once the King of this Countrey by the name of Pannonia, are said to have been Gules, a Falcon displayed Or, membered and crowned Argent. But the Arms of the Kingdom at this time, are Barre-wife of 8 pieces, Gules and Argent.

OF SCLAVONIA.

SCLAVONIA is bounded on the East, with Servia, Macedonia, and Epirus; from which parted by the River Drinus, and a line drawn from thence unto the Adriatick; on the West, with Carniola in Germany, and Histria in the Signeury of Venice; from which last divided by the River Arfia; on the North, with Hungary; on the South, with the Adriatick Sea. So called from the Slaves or Slavi a Sarmatian people, of whom more anon.

It contains in length from Arfia to the River Drinus, according to Plinius computation, 800 Italian miles; the greatest breadth being 325 of the same miles. But others reckon the length of it at no more than 480 miles; who may be reconciled with Pliny, by supposing this, that these last measure in a strait and direct line from River to River; and that Pliny coasted by the Creeks and Reaches of the Adriatick. Situate in the Northern temperate Zone, betwixt the middle Parallels of the sixth and seventh Climates; so that the longest day in Summer is about 15 hours and an half.

The Country is generally fruitfull of all these Commodities, which are found in Italy, to which little inferior: yielding not only Wine, and Oyl, in very good plenty, but good store of Cattel, and of wilde Beasts of pleasure no want at all; some rich veins also of Gold and Silver. The Northern parts are mountainous, cold, for the most part lying under Snows, not capable of Wine, or any the like productions which require much heat. But even these mountainous parts afford very good Pasturage, and breed a wealthy race of Sheep, which bring forth young twice a year, and are shorn four times. Nor doth the Sea Coasts come behind in advancing the profit of the people, not only yielding store of Fish, but the benefit of many excellent and convenient Havens.

The people are courageous, proud, stubborn and untractable, of strong bodies, and able constitutions, fit for works of drudgery; and so employed by the Venetians, when first brought under their command: who using them in all servile offices both at home and abroad, occasioned the neighbouring Nations to call their Villains or Bond-servants, as they of Venice did, by the name of Slaves; that being originally as to this people, the name, not of their condition, but of their Ancestors and Country.

The Christian Faith was first here planted, I mean in reference to this people, who do now inhabit it about the time of Charls the Bald, Emperour of the West, Anno 877. Sacropolis being the first of their Kings, who embraced the Gospel. But lying in the mid-way of Greece and Italy, the Religion of the Church of Rome, and that of the Greek Church, are both allowed of: that of the Greeks being as prevalent in the East parts hereof, as that of Rome is in the Western. But here it is to be observed, that though this people, according to their division into East and West, follow the Rites and Ceremonies of those several Churches; yet on both sides, it is indulged them to celebrate Divine Offices in their natural Language, contrary to the usage of the Church of Rome in all places else. And yet the People are not all of the Christian Faith, the Turkish and Mahometan prevailing in those Towns, and Territories, under their obedience.

But though they be not of one Religion, they are all of one Language; which is the old Sarmatian (or Slavonian) Tongue, generally spoken in the Empire of Russia, Livonia, Poland, Silesia, Bohemia, Moravia, some part of Hungary, Histria, Slavonia, where we now are, Dacia, Epirus, Georgia, Mengrelia, (both in Asia) and by all the Captains, Officers, and other Souldiers of the Turkish Empire: the Language generally spreading over all those Countreys, which either were Sarmatian in their first original, or made theirs by conquest under the united name of Slaves; or otherwise intermixt with them by the necessity of commerce and trade, or dispatch of their common businesses. Inasmuch as taking in the subdivisions of the Princes and Countries before specified, it is affirmed by G. J. J. J. a right learned man, that there there are no fewer than 60 Nations, which have the Slavonian Tongue for their Vulgar Language. Windischland.

Chief Mountains in this Countrey are those called Scardonici (from Scardona, one of the best Towns of Illyria) dividing Dalmatia in the midst, and extending along the Coasts thereof; by Polomy called Arduum. Of Rivers those of special note amongst the Ancients, were 1 Titius, now Variecha, separating Illyria from Dalmatia. 2 Arfia, now Arfa, the utmost bound upon the West; as 3 Drinus is upon the East: of which the first falleth into the Bay of the Adriatick, which is called Golfo di Quervo, (Sinnus Flanaticus by the Ancients;) the other into the Sav or Savus, somewhat west of Belgrade. 4 Narfe, now Narento, running not far from Epidaurus.

The Boundaries and Landmarks being thus set out, I should proceed to the division of the Countrey as now it standeth. But I must first look on it as it stood in the time of the Romans: in whose time that part of the whole Province which lay from the River Arfia to the Titius, was named Lilarnia, and Illyria; that from the Titius to the Drinus, was called Dalmatia. But the Illyrians being the stoutest and more warlike people, and such as created greatest troubles to the Romans, it pleased the Conquerours when they had fully subdued both Nations, to call the whole Countrey by the name of Illyricum: and not so only, but to extend this name over all their Provinces (the Diocese of Thrace excepted) which lay between the Alps and the Euxine Sea, the Adriatick and the Danow: for so far the Jurisdiction of the Præfatus Prætoris of Illyricum, did at first extend. Enic Præfatus (saith Zosimus) Constantinus ejus institutor, Macedones attribuit, Thessalos, Cretenses, Graciam, & circumjacentes insulas, Epirum miramque, Illyricos, Dracos, Triballos, & Pannonios, Valerianusque & Myssiam superiorem. And that all these did then pass by the name of Illyricum, appeareth as well by that of Pollio in the life of Claudius the second, expressly saying, Illyricum, Thraciam, Myssos, Dacos, Dalmatias & Pannonias continet; as by that of Socrates the Historian, who lib. 32. cap. 10. calleth Sirmium, the chief Town of Pannonia Inferior, & lib. 5. cap. 6. Thessalonica, the chief City of Macedon, Urbes Illyricas, or Illyrian Cities. By which account Illyricum in the largest extent of that name, contained no less than 18 Provinces of the Roman Empire; that is to say, 1 Noricum Mediterraneum, 2 Noricum Ripense, 3 Pannonia Superior, 4 Pannonia Inferior, 5 Valeria, 6 Savia, 7 Dalmatia, 8 Myssia superior, 9 Dardania, 10 Dacia Mediterranea, 11 Dacia Ripensis, 12 Macedonia, 13 Thessaly, 14 Achaia, 15 Crete, 16 Epirus vetus, 17 Epirus Nova, and 18 Prevalitana. These 18 Provinces being cast or made up into three Dioceses, viz. the Diocese of Illyricum, specially so called, containing the seven first; 2ly, the Diocese of Macedon, containing the seven last; and 3ly, the Diocese of Dacia, comprehending the other four: were governed by the Præfatus Prætoris for Illyricum, who had first his chief seat and residence at Sirmium before mentioned. But in the division of the Empire betwixt the Sons of Theodosius the Great, into the Eastern and Western: the Diocese of Illyricum specially so called (after that named Illyricum Occidentale) was laid unto the Western Empire, under the Governance of the Præfatus Prætoris of Italy; and thereupon the seat or residence of the Prætoris Præfatus for Illyricum, removed from Sirmium unto Thessalonica. So that we are now to look upon Illyricum in a stricter notion, as a Diocese of the Western Empire, containing the seven Provinces before specified, whereof both Noricum, both Pannonias, and Valeria (if at least Stermach be that Valeria, as some say it is) have been described already in their proper places. There now remain only Savia and Dalmatia to be spoken of: the first containing all those parts of this Countrey lying on both sides of the Savus (whence it had the name); the last, those parts hereof which lye towards the Sea, known by the ancient name of Dalmatia, the Region of Illyria properly so called, being added to it. But as new Lords give new Laws, so they give new Names. The Countrey being divided by the Slavi in two Kingdoms, viz. of Croatia, and Dalmatia; of which the first contained the Province of Savia, the last took up the whole Province of Dalmatia, bounded as before, but keeping the name of Slavonia to it self alone; being indeed the only Province in which the name and memory of the Slavi, is retained amongst us. Afterwards as it came to be divided (as at last it was) betwixt the Kings of Hungary and the State of Venice, we find it subdivided into these six parts; that is to say, 1 Windischland, 2 Croatia, 3 Bosnia, 4 Dalmatia, 5 Lilarnia, or Contado di Zara, and 6 the Slavonian Islands.

1. WINDISCHLAND.

WINDISCHLAND is bounded on the East, with part of the Lower Hungary, from which on a little River which falls into the Savus; on the West, with Carniola, or Krain, a Province of the Archdukedom of Austria; on the North, with the River Dravus; on the South, with Croatia. It is thus called by the Dutch as the Land or Countrey of the Wintshi, or Vendi, the greatest Nation of the Slaves, whom generally they call by the name of Windisch: and anciently for so much of it as lieth on the North of the Savus, accounted part of Pannonia inferior, as afterwards of the Province of Savia; till conquered by the Slaves, and laid unto their possessions; from whom named Windischland, as before. Places of most importance in it are 1 Windisch-greits, seated on the Dravus, the Pinnadria and Vindomana of the Ancients. 2 Saguna, near unto the Savus. 3 Gradiska, on the South, and 4 Zigabris, on the North of the same River: from which last a great part of this Countrey is called Comitatibus Zagabrisiis. 5 Novigrad, on the Savus also, but more near to Germany. 6 Petrova, situate at the foot of the Mountains, which are between the Savus and the Dravus, and dwelt Hungary from Slavonia. 7 Sisse, or Sissakben, (the Sissa of Pliny and Antoninus) situate on the Sam, over against Zigabris, where it receiveth the River Zulp; famous for the notable resistance which the Turks there found, Anno 1593. Who hoping by the conquest of this Province, to open a free passage into Germany, entered it Croatia, &c. it with a puissant Army, (having in their way taken the Castle of Ostrowitz,) and the strong Town of Wibits in Croatia) and late down very strongly intrenched before this Town. But the Town held it out most gallantly against all their batteries and assaults, till relieved by a power of Germans who came to succour them: by whom 8000 of the Turks were slain in the place, and most of the rest drowned in the River Savus, as they fled hastily, and (through that great haste) blindly, from the Sword of the Conquerour.

This Province, for the most part, is under the Princes of the house of Austria, as Kings of Hungary, to which Crown it formerly belonged: those parts of it which lye next to Hungary, on the North and East, groaning under the tyranny and bondage of the Turkish Garrisons.

2. CROATIA.

CROATIA is bounded on the North, with Windischland, from which parted by the River Una, or Wana; on the East, with Bosnia; on the South, with Liburnia, or Contado di Zara; on the West, with Carniola. The reason of the name I find not among my Authors; but only it was imposed by the Slaves at their first coming hither: who comprehended under this name all the Inland parts of Slavonia, from the Mountain Arduum to Pannonia; including Bosnia and Windischland, though distinguished afterwards.

The Country for the most part cold, mountainous and hilly, overspread by the branches of the Mountains Babii, spoken of by Plutomy; yet reasonably fruitful, stored with all necessary provisions for the life of man: and would yield more increase and profit both to Lord and Tenant, were it not for the ill neighbourhood of the Turks; to whose tyranny and oppressions it hath been, and is still exposed. The people for the general are held to be good Souldiers, mentioned in our modern stories by the name of Crabats.

Chief Towns in it are, 1 Masch or Musht, bordering upon Germany, the Aleta of the Ancients. 2 Ostrowitz, a strong Fort of the same Frontire. 3 Wibits, by the Dutch called Bibigen, by the Ancients Ennium, the Metropolis or chief place of the Country, encompassed like an Island by the River Una, and fortified with strong works by the help of Art: but taken by the Turk, Anno 1592. and all the Souldiers in it cruelly murdered, contrary to the Articles agreed on at the surrendry. 4 Zeng, 5 Warkat, 6 Tarnan, 7 Modrisch, of which little memorable.

This Country, with the rest included anciently under this name, was one of the two Kingdoms of Slavonia; the Princes whereof were usually entituled Kings of Croatia, and Dalmatia. In the year 1007. the Venetians having before possessed themselves of some Towns on the Sea-side, first set footing there. How the whole Country of Slavonia came to the Crown of Hungary, shall be shewn anon. Held, part of it in the right thereof, by the house of Austria; part of it by the Turks in the way of conquest: the Venetians having now no share in it, for ought I can find.

3. BOSNIA.

BOSNIA is bounded on the East, with Servia, a Province of Dacia; on the West, with Croatia; on the North, with the River Savus, and the East parts of the Lower Hungary; on the South, with Dalmatia. So called, as some think, from the River Bosna, which runneth through it; as others, from the Bessi a people of Dacia, driven out of their Country by the Bulgari, and removing hither; by the change of a Vowel called Bessi, whence the Country Bosnia.

Places of most importance in it are 1 Jatza, by the Latines called Jazyga, situate on the top of an high Hill, at the bottom whereof almost encompassed with two Rivers, which there uniting pass from thence unto the Savus. The Town, by reason of the rocky præcipes of the Hill, the unfordableness of the River, and an inaccessible Castle, held to be impregnable: the Metropolis in former times of this petit Kingdom, and the ordinary sepulture for the Kings thereof. 2 Warbosoni, at this time the chief Town of the Country, but not walled about. 3 Cazach, the usual residence or retiring place of the Bosnian Kings. 4 Schwanica, not much observable. 5 Dorobiza, the first Town taken by Mahomet the Great in his conquest of this Kingdom; as 6 Clyssa was the last; the unfortunate King Stephen being taken in it.

This Country, anciently accounted of as a part of Croatia, together with it was united to the Crown of Hungary; under the Patronage and Homage whereof it was erected into a Kingdom: but the precise time when, I find not. Some say, about the year 1420. If so, a Kingdom of late date, and short continuance. For in the year 1464. Mahomet the Great, first Emperor of the Turks, having taken Constantinople, and almost all the rest of Greece, cast his eye upon it, suddenly surprised it: and having taken Stephen the last King hereof, most barbarously commanded him to be dead alive. After whose death this Kingdom was converted to a Province of the Turkish Empire, and governed by one of the Bassa's of it; as it still continueth.

4. DALMATIA.

DALMATIA is bounded on the East, with Albania, from which parted by the River Drino; on the West, with the Titius (now Varitcha) which divides it from Liburnia; on the North, with Bosnia; on the South, with the Adriatick Sea. This only of all the Provinces of Slavonia, retaineth its ancient name and bounds. So called from Dalminium the chief Town hereof in the time of the Romans, from from which the people were called Dalmatae, and the Countrey Dalmatia.

The Country in the time of the Romans was full of woods, and those woods of Robbers, who from thence issued out to make spoil and booty. Dalmata sub sylvis agunt, inde ad latrocinia promptissimi, saith the Historian. And by the advantage of these woods, they intercepted and discomfited Gabinus, one of Caesar's Captains, marching through their Country with 1000 horse, and 15 Companies of foot towards Macedonia, to the aid of his General against Pompey. But their woods being destroyed, they became more peaceable; and in stead of Robberies by Land, began to exercise themselves at Sea in the way of Merchandizing, to which their large Sea-coasts and commodious Havens served exceedingly fitly.

Places of most consideration in it, 1 Sebenic, on the Sea-side, not far from the influx of Titius or Varitcha: by Plutomy called Sicum, in whose time a Colony of Roman Souldiers was sent hither by the Emperor Claudius. 2 Salona, a Roman Colony also, one of the Juridical Resorts for these parts of the Province, and the ordinary Arsenal for their Natives. Renowned in ancient stories for the retreat of Diocletian, a Native of this Country: who having governed the Roman Empire 20 years with much felicity, but a great deal of cruelty, deposed himself, and retired to this City; where he followed the trade of a Gardener, working with his own hands, and observing with great content the productions of nature. Inasmuch that when Maximianus Hercules his associate (who at his persuasion had done the like) invited him to resume the Empire, he returned this answer; Utinam possit visere olera nostris manibus plantata, &c. that if he would come unto Salona, and see how well the Wort which he had planted with his own hands, did thrive and prosper, he would never trouble his head with Crowns, nor his hands with Scepters: a rare expression of a settled and contented mind. The name, and some of the ruins do still remain, to preserve the memory of so remarkable a place. 3 Spalato, East of Sebenic, a Sea Town, and an Archbishops See, who writes himself Primate of Dalmatia; as anciently and of right he was, till the Bishop of Venice being made a Patriarch by Pope Eugenius the 4th, Anno 1450. assumed that title to himself, together with a superintendency over all the Churches of this Country, as subordinate to him. Of note for many learned Prelates, but for none more than for Marcus Antonius de Dominis, who seeming to loath the Romish superstition, came for refuge into England, Anno 1616. and having here both by preaching and writing laboured to overthrow the Church of Rome, upon I know not what projects, he declared himself to be of another mind, Anno 1622. and returned again to Rome, where he writ as reproachfully of the Church of England. So that we may say of him, as Socrates in his Ecclesiastical History saith of Ecebolius, who under Constantinus, was a Christian; under Julian, a Pagan; and a Caritian again under Julianus; τὸ αὐτὸ πρῶτον κτῆσθαι ἡννοῦντες, ὡς ἐπὶ τῷ ἑστέῳ. So wavering and unconstant a turn-coat was Ecebolius from his beginning to his end. But Ecebolius sped better than Antonius did, he being received into the Church upon his repentance: but this insatiate man imprisoned in the Castle of Angelo, and his dead body burnt to ashes. A just reward for so great levity, and so gross Apostacy, as he had shewed unto the world in his going hence. 4 Almissa, the Piguritium of Plutomy, mounted on a high rock, and defended with an impregnable Castle. 5 Stagno, upon the point of a long and spacious Chersonese, not far from which the River Naron, (or Narenta) falls into the Adriatick. 6 Castle Novo, a strong Fortress within the Gulf of Catharo, now in possession of the Turks. 7 Antibari, on the further or Eastern side of the Bay, an Archbishops See; but that and the Sees of his Subfragan Bishops, being seven in number, now in possession of the Turks. 8 Catharo, on the same side of the Bay, by Plutomy called Ascrvium, inhabited in his time by Roman Citizens; now a strong hold for the Venetians against the Turks, and giving name unto the Gulf: which, formerly called Sinus Rhizoniscus, from Rhizonia (now Rhizini) situate at the bottom of it, is at this time called from this Town, Golfo de Catharo. 9 Ducigno, by Plutomy called Ulcinium, originally founded by the Colchians; And therefore called Colchinum by some ancient writers. 10 Scutari, more within the land, (the Scodra of Plutomy and Antoninus) strongly seated on a steep Rock, memorable for the stout resistance which it made for a whole year, against the whole puissance of Mahomet the 2d. battered for the most part of that time, with 70 pieces of Ordnance of wondrous bigness, especially that called the Princes piece, which carried a stone or bullet of 1200l. weight; but taken at the last, An. 1578. Not far from this Town, is the great Lake, called by Strabo, Labeates, now the Lake of Scutari, 130 miles in compass, and environed on all sides with Mountains, except towards the North: out of which issue the Drinus, now called Drino, which parting Slavonia from Macedon and Servia, passeth into the Savus. 11 Aleso, the Lissus of Plutomy, the furthest Town of all Dalmatia, towards Greece; 3. memorable for the Grave of Scanderberg, who was buried here; whereof more hereafter. 12 Medon, raised out of the ruins of Diocletian, an ancient and famous City, the birth-place of the great Emperor Diocletian, spoken of before. 13 Dalminium, once the Metropolis of this Province, situate on the River Drinus; first sacked by Marcus Fulvius, a Roman Consul, An. C. 689. and after, on a new revolt by one Nasica, spoken of by Strabo: not able after two such ruins to revive again; nothing being now left of it, but the name and memory.

Between the Chersonese of Stagno, and the Gulf of Catharo, stands the town and territory of RAGHUSI; not subject, as all the rest are, either to the Turk, or to the Venetians, but governing themselves by their own Lawes and Magistrates, as a Free Common-wealth: paying only to the Turk 14000 Zechins yearly in a way of tribute, and as much in Presents; discharged in that regard of Customs and Impositions, in all his Dominions. It was anciently called Epidaurus, (of which name there were two other Cities in Peloponnesus.) But that Town being razed by the Goths, the Inhabitants (after their departure) not knowing where to retire themselves, built this in the place of it, at the foot of a steep Mountain; enjoying a pleasant situation near the Sea, with a little, but commodious Port; forced Liburnia. out of the water, by the art and industry of workmen. The town well built, fortified with walls, and a well-furnished Castle; now an Archbishops See, and a noted Empory; rich, and strong in shipping, commanding over a small and barren territory within the land, and some pleasant Islands in the Sea. So that the riches of it proceed not from their Rents and Revenues rising out of the Earth, but by the benefit of their traffick upon the Waters: secured therein by the protection of the Turk, without which they had fallen before this time into the hands of the Venetians; as on the other side preserved by the State of Venice from being a prey to their Protektors. Of more wealth heretofore, than they are at the present. At what time they traded to most parts of this Western world, in those great Vessels which from hence were called Raguses, but corruptly Argosies; the last of which (their number lessening with their trade) they lent unto the King of Spain for the war of England, An. 1588. in which action it was lost and wracked on the Coast of Ireland.

5 CONTADO DI ZARA.

CONTADO DI ZARA, or the Countrey of Zara, called antiently Liburnia, and Illyris specially so named, is bounded on the East, with Dalmatia; on the West, with Histria; on the North, with Croatia; and on the South, with the Adriatick Sea, or Gulph of Venice.

It took this latter name (the former being long discontinued) from Zara, the chief Town thereof, the Jadra of Ptolemy and the antients; a Roman Colony at that time, now an Archbishops see; enjoying a safe and large Port, and situate on a low Chersonese thrusting out like a Promontory into the Adriatick; belonging to the State of Venice, by whom well fenced and fortified against foreign invasions. For the possession and command of this Town, there have been great wars betwixt the Hungarians, and the Venetians: to whom it seemeth to be of such importance, that being once taken by the Hungarians, it was redeemed for 100000 Crowns, of Ladislaus King of Neples, pretending against Sigismund of Luxembourg to the Crown of Hungary. In this Town is the Church of S. John de Malvatin, which was built by a company of Sailors; who being in a tempest, made a vow, that if they escaped, they would consecrate a Temple to S. John de Malvatin, whose mortar should be tempered with Malmsey; and accordingly they paid their vows. Far less did another Master of a ship intend to perform his promise, though he spoke bigger; who in a like extremity of danger, promised our Lady to offer at her Altar a Candle as great as the main mast of his ship. For when one of his mates jogging him, told him he had promised an impossibility: Tush fool (replied the Master) we must speak her fair in time of need; but if ever I come a shore, I will make her be content with a Candle of eight to the pound. And in a like fit of devotion was he, who on the same occasion plainly told God, That he was no common beggar, he never troubled him with prayers before; and if he would hear him that time, he would never trouble him again.

Other Towns herein considerable, are 1 Albona, retaining still the old name (the Alvona of Ptolemy) situate near the River Arfis, the divider of this Province from Histria. 2 Flavona, or Flanona, situate against the Gulph of Quernero, of old called Sinus Flanaticus, as before was noted: of ill report amongst Sailors for frequent tempests raised on every wind. 3 Zegna, by Ptolemy and Pliny called Senia, situate on a flat or level. 4 Nona, of old called Senona, compassed with the Sea. 5 Serifia, now a poor Village, in the place where stood the Argyratum of Pliny. 6 Scardona, now a mean Village also, heretofore of great note, and the Juridical Resort for the whole Province; from whence the neighbouring mountains had the name of Scardonici; the bounds of this Countrey and Croatia.

The antient name of this Countrey was Liburnia, as before is said, but extending more Northwards beyond the Mountains of Ardium, or Scardonici; this and Dalmatia being then the Membra dividenda of the whole Illyricum. The people hereof called by one general name Liburni, were much given to Piracies; and for their better speed therein, the Authors and Inventors of those swift vessels which were called Liburnica, and Liburne. Of which thus Horace,

Amice propugnacula.*

That is to say:

In a Liburnian shalt thou be Amongst the stoutest ships at Sea.

In imitation of which Vessels being swift and light, the Romans in the time of their wealth and pride, invented a kind of Chair or Litter, (such as those we call Sedans) wherein they were carried on mens shoulders with such ease and pleasure, that they could not only sleep or read, but write in them also: the Porters or Bearers of them of this Nation commonly; from whence, or from the fashion of the Vessel which they did resemble, they were called Liburni. Of these thus Juvenal in his third Satyre:

*Si vocat officium, turba cedente vehetur
Dives, & ingenti curret super ora Liburno.
Atque obiter leget, aut scribet, vel dormiet intus,
Namque facit somnum clausa leistica fenestra.*

Thus

Thus Englished by my honoured friend Sir Robert Stapleton, in his excellent translation of that harsh Satyrist.

When business calls, a crowd the rich man fluns,
And o'r mens heads in's huge Sedan he runs,
Reads, writes, and sleeps within it as he goes,
For sleep will come if he the curtains close.

Besides which office of Chair-carriers or Sedan-men, as we call them now; this people being, when once conquered, a servile Nation, furnished the Romans with those Beadles, whom they employed in calling the Citizens from the fields to their publick businesses; to which the same Poet alludeth, in the next Satyre, saying, Clamante Liburno, Currite jam sedis, &c. But to proceed, the nearness of this Countrey to the Adriatick, occasioned the Bay of Quernero, or Cornaro as some call it, commonly called Sinus Flanaticus, to be sometimes named Sinus Liburnicus; the parts of Italy on the other side of it, to be called Regna Liburnorum in the Poet Virgil; and gave the name of Liburnades to a shoale of Islands lying on the coast hereof, 60 at least in number, as is said by Strabo. To which and other Islands of the Adriatick, we are now to hasten, leaving the story of Illyricum to the close of all.

6 The SCLAVONIAN ISLANDS.

ALong the Coasts of Sclavonia, lie a cluster of ISLANDS, to the number of a thousand, as is said by Pliny, most of which (if indeed so many) are but rocks, not Islands, or not inhabited at all, or of any note. The principal whereof, and such as deserve place here, are 1 the Liburnades before mentioned. 2 The Abstrides. 3 The Isles of Ragusi. 4 Arbe. 5 Curzola. 6 Zara. 7 Lissa, and Braccia; the rest not worth the looking after, as to our design: the whole number of the Inhabitants reckoned in the total to no more than 40000 persons.

1 The LIBURNADES said by Strabo to be 60 in number, lie all along the Coast of Liburnia, or Contado di Zara. The chief whereof are 1 ISSA, now called Paga, containing 100 miles in compass, having a town of the same name; but in all that tract of ground not above 1500 Inhabitants, in the time of my Author, by reason of the sharp air, and great want of fuel. The Salt-pits here yield great commodity, not only to the people themselves, but also to the State of Venice, Supreme Lord hereof. 2 Tragurium, now Trau and Trabu, so called from the chief town hereof, built by those of Issa: so near the Continent, that it seems to be a part thereof. By Mela it is named Tagurium, with some little difference. 3 Pharus, so called from the Pharii, or Parii, of whom once a Colony, long since come to ruin. It is now called Lexina, the greatest of all the Adriatick, as being 150 miles in compass, and very fruitful for the biggles. It hath a town of the same name, which enjoys a safe and spacious Harbour; unwall'd, and of no great beauty, but fortified with a strong Castle, which commandeth both the Harbour and the shipping in it. The birth-place of Demetrius Pharius, so often mentioned in the stories of Greece, and Rome.

2 The ABSTRIDES are in number many, so called from the River Abstrus, which thereabout falls into the Adriatick; according unto that of Lucan.

Et cadit Adriacas spumans Abstrus in undas.

Abstrus foaming with his haste,
Into the Adria falls at last.

But whether that River were so called by the Colchians at their landing there, in memory of Abstrus the son of Aetas King of Colchis, whom they went to seek; or for some other reason, I determine not. Certain I am, it could not be so named from the scattering of his limbs hereabouts by Medea his unnatural sister, as is said by Pliny: that cruel fact being done on the shores of the Enxins; the place called Tomos afterwards upon that occasion. But for these Islands, being in number many, as before was said, two only are of special note, that is to say, 1 Vegia, or Vegio, not far from Zegna on the firm land, containing in compass betwixt 80. and 100 miles, and about 10000 Inhabitants; the most populous of all these Seas. It hath a town of the same name, with a very fair harbour: the Inland, by Pliny, called Curieta, the chief Towns of it in his time being Psulfinium, and Curicum. 2 Alorus as Ptolemy, Abstrus as Pliny calls it; in whose time it was one Island only, but now divided into two, by the Venetians, letting in the Sea betwixt them: the one of them is called Cherso, the other Ostiro: Both joynd together by a Bridge made by the Venetians, and both together making up 140 miles in compass; each of them having one town only, and that of the same name with the Island; the Inhabitants in both not exceeding 5000 persons. Stored with sufficiency of corn, plenty of wine, and abundance of wood, great quantities whereof are sent yearly to Venice. They have also goodly herds of Cattel, and great flocks of sheep, affording by their flesh, wool, cheese, and butter, a good increase of profit to the owners of them.

Illyricum.

3 The Islands of Ragus, (for so I call them which belong to that Common-wealth) are but three in number. 1 Gravosa, a very pleasant place, full of Gardens of Oranges, Lemmons, and Pomegranates. 2 Languste, environed about with very high Mountains, in which are the Ragusians Farms, made rich by the great charge and industry of the several Occupants, so as to yield them wine, oil, and most excellent fruits: which they receive more plentifully from a goodly plain, situate in the midst hereof, and naturally more fruitful than the other parts. Near to this last Island is good fishing for Sprats: and in both an Art of making their trees to bring forth Oysters, by bending down their boughs, and staying them under the water with stones; so as in two years there are so many Oysters fattened unto them, as is strange to see, and in the third year they are very good meat. 3 Melida, lying betwixt Ragus and the Isle of Curzola, by Pliny called Melita, and on that ground supposed by some to be that Island on which S. Paul did suffer shipwrack, Acts 26. But the name of Barbarous, which the Text joyns to the Inhabitants of it, not proper to an Island betwixt Greece and Italy, in the times of S. Paul; and his landing when he parted thence into Syracusa, an Haven of Sicily, so far from this, so near unto the other Melita, which is now called Malta, sufficiently refell this fancy, though otherwise not improbably grounded.

4 Of those which are known only by one single name, the chief are ARBE, so called in the time of Pliny, from the best Town of it; but by Plutomy it is named Scardona. A pleasant Island, in compass about 30 miles, and containing some 3000 Inhabitants, the only Haven-less Isle of all the Adriatick; but that defect abundantly recompensed by the natural sweetness of the place. Which to enticed certain dissolute Rovers of Austria, that they seized upon it, Anno 1618. and had like to have occasioned an heavy war betwixt Ferdinand, Archduke, of the House of Gratz (not long after chosen King of the Romans) and the State of Venice; if Philip the 3d. of Spain had not made up the breach.

5 CURZOLA, by Plutomy and Strabo called Corcyra, or Melana, more rightly Corcyra Melana, or Corcyra Nigra, to difference it from Corcyra, now Corfu, in the Sea Ionian: the chief Town of it being of the same name, with the Island, was founded by the Gnidians of the Isle of Crete. Sufficiently fruitful, but of wine especially; 40 miles long, in compass 90. and very populous, for the biglyness; notwithstanding that the people being Sea-faring men, do much use the Seas, and build many ships. In the year 1571. a little after the taking of Cyprus, and before the battle of Lepanto, it was invaded by Uluç Ali, General of the Turkish Fleet, with a Navy of 60 Gallies: for fear of whom Contarenius the Venetian Governour, together with the Townsmen and Garrison Souldiers, abandoned Curzola, the chief Town hereof. The lilly women thus forsaken, and preferring death before dishonour, defended the walls; and with fire, stones, and such other weapons as they had, they beat off the enemy: till at the last a violent tempest forced the Turkish General to remove his Gallies further off, to a place of safety.

6 ZARA, LISSA, BRAZZIA, three small Isles, not other wise memorable, but for their misfortunes; spoiled by the Turks at their departure from Curzola, who carryed thence 1600 Christians into cruel bondage. The rest I purposely omit, rather Rocks than Islands; barren and stony for the most part, and not much inhabited.

The antient Inhabitants of Illyricum, in the full extent of it, comprehending Liburnia, and Dalmatia, were the Japodes bordering on Italy; the Scirtones, or Scirtary confining upon Macedon; the Ma-zai, in the midst about Salona; the Peirussa, lying towards Pannonia; the Dorrii, Ceraunii, Daurii, Vardi, Siculota, Sardiotae, and others of inferior note: all making up the great and potent Nations of the Liburnians and the Dalmatians; and comprehended generally in the name of Ilyrians. Of these the Liburnian Ilyrians, (Ilyrici seu Liburni, as they are indifferently called by Florus) were the first who felt the Forces of Rome: which growing State they had provoked by their frequent Piracies; but more by murdering the Ambassadors which were sent unto them to require satisfaction; Tenta their Queen, a proud and Imperious Dame, commanding execution to be done upon them. Warr'd upon by the Romans for so many injuries, under the conduct of Centimulus, one of their Consuls, they were overthrown (as having more of the Pirate than the Souldier in them) some of their chief Nobility executed, in revenge of the wrong done to the Ambassadors; an yearly tribute imposed on them, and the Queen deprived of the greatest part of her Kingdom, conferred by the Romans on Demetrius Phariis, one of their Confederates. But he proving unfaithfull to them in their war with Hannibal and Gentius, their last King, who commanded over Illyricum, siding against them with Perseus, King of Macedonia; Anticus the Prator is sent with a sufficient Army, to make an end of that work who: used such diligence therein, that Scodra the chief Town of the Kingdom, was taken; and the King himself, together with his wife and children made prisoners: by consequence the whole war ended, antequam geri Romæ nunciaretur, before they knew at Rome that it was begun. The Liburnians after that became quiet subjects, the whole Country, on the taking of Gentius, being made a Province of the Romans, Anno V. C. 586. employed at Rome in many servile offices, as before was said; and then the Dalmatians began to cast off the yoke. But Dalminium their chief City being first sacked by Martius Figulus, and after by Nasica before mentioned; they continued quiet and obedient till the time of Augustus Caesar, when they again rebelled at the instigation of one Batto, a man very potent with the people, who

Illyricum.

Who having ten years together maintained the liberty of his Country, at last broken and wearied by the forces of Germanicus, and Tiberius, he submitted himself unto the two Generals: who asking the reason of his revolt, were answered, because the Romans sent not Shepherds to keep, but wolves to devour their flocks. Thus finally conquered, it continued a Roman Province till the coming of Odoacer into Italy, who brought it under his command; as the Goths also did having vanquished him, and thereby made themselves Masters of Italy, and the rest of his purchases. But the Kingdom of the Goths being brought to an end, by the good fortune of Justinian, and the valour of Belisarius and Narsis, two of his Commanders (but very ill requir'd by him) Illyricum became a part of the Eastern Empire: continuing under the power of the Grecian Emperours, till the time of Phocas that bloody Tyrant; when made a prey to the Slaves.

Of these though we have spoken before in several places, as their fortunes and affairs have led us; yet being this is the only country which preserves their name, we will here speak more exactly of them, than we have done hitherto; especially as to their manners, name, and first Original; and finally of their successes in this Country. And first for their Original, I take it for a thing past question that they were no other than natural Sarmatians, inhabiting on the North of the River Ister; uniting themselves under this name, in their undertakings and attempts on the Eastern Empire: as the many Nations of Germany took the name of Frank, and Aman, in their actions and achievements against the Western. But why they took this name rather than another, is not yet agreed on. Some fetch the original of it from Slavo, which in the Slavonian tongue signifieth a Speech or word, because they were all of one common language: others from Slava, signifying in that language Fame or Glory, in regard of that great fame and honour which they had achieved, by their successes on the Empire. But when I find a potent Nation of the Winithi, Winuli, or Vendi, a Sarmatian people, called Slavini by Jornander, possessed in his time of the further shores of the River Ister, opposite to Illyricum and Thrace; and by that name waiting and foraging these Provinces, and other parts of that Empire in the time of Justinian, as we read in Procopius that they did; I see no reason why we should look further for the name of Slaves, than from these Slavini. For having in the time of Phocas subdued this Country, and called it Slavania, or Slavonia, after their own name: by that and other fortunate successes on the Eastern Empire, and the honour they had thereby gotten, they might very well induce the rest of the scattered tribes of the Sarmatians to unite together with them both in name and action; and try their fortunes in the conquest of the West of Europe, as these had done already on the East parts of it. In which design they sped so well, that they became Masters of almost all those Countreys, which lie betwixt the River Vistula, and the Euxine Sea, the Adriatick, and the Baltick; communicating their language unto all the Provinces, and Nations, conquered by them; and to most, their manners, rites, and customs. Their Government at first by Kings, but so that the succession seldom held in a Race or Family; and those that had the Throne did not long enjoy it. For having a Law amongst themselves, that he who killed a Tyrant should succeed in his place: they had few Kings whom some other would not vote to be a Tyrant, and then dispatch him out of the way; that a greater Tyrant than himself (as it commonly happeneth in such cases) might possess the Power. Inasmuch that they had a new King almost every year, none of them for the space of an hundred years dying natural death; and all that while the People (as it needs must be) most miserably torn in pieces by intestine wars. Not cured of this distemper, till the several Tribes and Nations of them, (as Poles, Moravians, Bohemians, these here, and those of other Countries) had their several Princes, succeeding one another in a Regular way. Their Religion Gentilism at the first. For being originally Heathens, they worshipped such Gods as others of the Gentiles did; Jessan for Jupiter, Ladon for Pluto, Murzim for Mars, Zievane for Venus, and Nian for Diana. They had also a Goddess called Eugode, to whom they prayed for fair weather, and a temperate Air. To their children they used to give no name, till they began to grow great, and then conducted them to the Temple of their Gods; where they cut off their first hair, and offered it as a pledge of their future service: at which solemnity they called together their friends and kinsfolk to make merry, with bankets, dancing, singing, and all kind of sports; offering in sacrifice an Hog, and wine mixed with honey, somewhat like Meibeglin.

The Gospel was first generally received amongst them by the preaching of Cyril and Methodius, two right godly men, who had before converted the Georgians and Circassians, two great Asian Nations, employed therein by the Patriarch of Constantinople: With good success as to the work, and with no small honour and advantage to those Patriarchs also: the Eastern Slaves inhabiting those parts of this Country which lie next to Greece, and all the Dacian Provinces, except Transylvania, being of the Communion of the Church of Greece, but privileged to officiate all Divine Services in their natural Language. The rest, as more obnoxious to the power of the Kings of Hungary, and the German Emperours, submitted by degrees to the Popes of Rome, who by this means did reap where they never sowed.

But to return unto the story, the Slaves thus settled in this Country (since called Slavonia) continued absolute Masters of it, under the Title of Kings of Croatia and Dalmatia, till the year 970. when growing unsufferable by their frequent Piracies, and having ravished or surprized a company of Venetian Ladies, they forced that State (as the Liburnians did the Romans) to make war upon them: which ended in the loss of Lezina and Curzola, two of their best Islands, and almost all the Sea-towns on the Coast of the Adriatick, possessed for the most part, since that time, by the State of Venice: a tribute also of 100 barrels of Wine, and a present to the Duke of 3000 Coney-skins, being laid upon them; Pietro Urscol being then Duke of Venice, and Marcomir, King of the Slavonians.

ans. Afterwards Zelamirus the last King, dying without issue, bequeathing the Kingdom, to his wife, and she as freely to her brother Ladislaus, King of Hungary, named the Saint: the right hereof accruing by this means to the Kings of Hungary; but the possession of a great part of it remaining to the State of Venice; the cause of much war and bloodshed betwixt those Princes, till the Turk came to part the fray, and got the greatest part for himself, by their disagreements. Betwixt these three, Sclavonia at this time doth stand thus divided: the Venetians possessing the greatest part of the Islands, and all the Sea-Coasts from the River Asis, to the Bay of Catbare, (the City and Common-wealth of Ragusa, excepted only) the house of Austria, in right of the Crown of Hungary, the Inland parts of Windischland, and Croatia; and the Turks (who first set footing here in the reign of Mahomet the second) the whole Kingdom of Bosnia, the Patronage of Ragusa, some Towns in Windischland and Croatia, and all the residue of Dalmatia, from the Bay of Catbaro to Albania.

The Arms of Sclavonia were: Argent, a Cardinals Hat, the strings pendant, and platted in a true Love knot, meeting in the Base, Gules.

The are in Sclavonia

And thus much for SCLAVONIA.

D A C I A.

D A C I A is bounded on the East, with the Euxine Sea, and some part of Thrace; on the West, with Hungary, and Sclavonia; on the North, with Podolia, and some other Members of the Realm of Poland; on the South, with the rest of Thrace, and Macedonia. So called from the Daci, who here first inhabited: in Strabo better known by the name of Davi, who proving, when first known to the Romans, an officious people, willingly putting themselves to service in hope or gain; occasioned the Romans in their Comedies, and common Speech, to call a Sycophant or Servant, by the name of Davus.

It lyeth on both sides of the Danubius, fronting all along the Upper and the Lower Hungary, and some part of Sclavonia: extended from the 7. Climate to the 10th. so that the longest Summers day, in the most Northern parts thereof, is near 17 hours; and in the most Southern, 15 hours 3 quarters.

By this account with reference to the other limits before laid down, it differeth much in situation and dimensions, from the ancient Dacia, described by Ptolomy: that lying wholly on the North side of the Danubius, but taking in so much of the Upper Hungary, as lyeth on the East side of Tibiscus: this comprehending all the rest of the ancient Dacia, with both the Myssus and Dardania, and in a word, the whole Dacian Diocese in the largest extent thereof, the Province of Prævalitana excepted only; which though a Member of this Diocese, was no part of Dacia, but rather of Macedon or Albania. For the clearer understanding whereof we may please to know, that Dacia properly so called, was situate on the North side of Danubius, as before was said; extending as far Westward as the River Tisus, where it fronted on the Jaxges Metanasta: inhabited by a military and valiant people, who many times, especially when the frost did favour them, passed over the River, and infected the Roman Provinces. And though repressed and made tributary by Julius Cæsar, yet they brake out again in the time of Augustus; who sending Lentulus against them with a puissant Army, compelled them to retire on the other side of the River, planting the Southern banks thereof with strong Towns and Garrisons to restrain them from the like incursions for the time to come. By means whereof, Si Dacia tunc univisa, summos atque dilata est, saith the Historian; though Dacia was not overcome, yet it was removed ved somewhat further off, and the Provinces thereby secured from the attempts of that people. After this, from the time of Cotiso, with whom Augustus had to deal, we find little of them till the reign of Decabalus their last King, a man both ready in advice, and quick in execution. Against him, Dominian made war by Julianus his Lieutenant; who gave Decabalus a great overthrow, and had then utterly vanquished him, if his wit had not better befriended him than his sword. For, fearing that the Romans making use of their victory, would enter and take possession of his Countrey; he pitched in the way a great number of stakes in battel array, putting on them the old Coats of his Souldiers, which looking like so many men of Arms, frightened the enemy from approaching the Countrey. Trajan was the next that made war against him, and brought him to that exigent, that having with much loss endured some few skirmishes, he yielded himself, and is acknowledged a friend to the Senate and people of Rome. But being one of a high spirit, and born in a free air, he once again fell off from the Romans; but to his own destruction: for seeing by the valour of Trajan, his Kingdom conquered, and his Palace taken and destroyed, he fell upon his own sword, and Dacia was made a Province of the Roman Empire. Lost in the time of Galerius, it was again recovered by Aurelianus: Who finding how difficult and chargeable the keeping of it was like to be, transplanted the Roman Colonies, and the more civil sort of the Native, on the other side of the River; placing them betwixt the two Myssus, (in some part of each) and calling the Countrey given to them by the name of Dacia, or New Dacia: leaving the Old unto the Goths, and others of the barbarous Nations, whose thorow fare it was in all their enterprises and designs of the Roman Empire. Divided by Aurelianus into the two Provinces of Dacia Mediterranea, and Dacia Ripensis; this lying on the banks of the Danubius, the other more within the land: which with the Provinces of Mæssa Superior, Dardania, Prævalitana, and part of Macedonia Sultaria, made up the whole Diocese of Dacia in the times succeeding. Subject with that of Macedon to the Præfatus Prætorio for Illyricum, and consequently appertaining (after the division) to the Eastern Empire. And it continued in this state till the time of Justinian, who being a Native of this Countrey, subducted it from the command of that Præfect, and instituted both a Præfatus Prætorio for this Diocese only in civil matters, and a Primate for the affairs of the Church; both seated in the City of Justinian, of his own foundation: enlarging the jurisdiction of the first by the addition of some part of Macedonia Secunda, and Pannonia Secunda, and giving to the other all those preheminencies, which had been antiently enjoyed by the greater Patriarchs. But this new Institution was of no continuance. For first the Slaves, and afterwards the Russians, Hungars, and Bulgarians, breaking over the Danubius dismembered it piece-meal from the Empire, and divided it under new names amongst themselves. Of which, together with the nature of the soil and people, I shall speak anon, having first took a view of the Rivers, Hills, and other Land-marks, which are to be my chief guides in the Chorography or description of them.

The Rivers then of most note are, 1 The Danubius, which here, at Axiom, or Axiopolis, a Town of Bulgaria, takes the name of Ister, continuing it from thence to its Æstuarium, where it falleth into the Euxine Sea, with 7 mouths or channels: that is to say, 1 Pence, 2 Narcissus, 3 Calistoma, 4 Plendistoma, 5 Spiroestoma, 6 Boreostoma; the name of the last I find not amongst my Authors, quia languidissimum nec perpetuum, as it is in Ptolomy. 2 Marelius, now called Mariſch, 3 Termes, 4 Alania, keeping its old name, 5 Hierafus, all of old Dacia, and all falling into the Danubius or Ister: As do also Cidrus, now Ibar, a River of Servia; and 6 Suconia of Bulgaria, or the Lower Myssus. Chief Mountains of it are 1 the Carpathian, 2 Scardus, 3 Ozbelus; whereof the first parteth it from Sarmatia Europæa, the second from Dalmatia, and the third from Macedon.

This said, we will proceed to the description of the several Provinces, which we have comprehended under this name of Dacia; that is to say, 1 Transylvania, 2 Moldavia, 3 Wallachia, 4 Rascia, 5 Servia, 6 Bulgaria: the first four in Old Dacia, on the North side of the Danubius; the two last in New Dacia, on the South thereof.

1 TRANSYLVANIA.

TRANSYLVANIA, is bounded on the East, with Moldavia; on the West, with the Upper Hungary; on the North, with Russia Nigra, a Province of the Realm of Poland, from which parted by the Carpathian Mountains; on the South, with Rascia, and Wallachia.

It took this name from the great Woods lying betwixt it and Hungary, the name in Latine signifying the Countrey beyond the woods. By the Dutch it is called Seben Burgen, from seven Castles or strong holds antiently built in it, to defend the frontiers: Septemcastrensis, in some Latine Authors, upon that occasion. But by the more elegant Latinists, it hath been named Pannodacia, as that part of Dacia, which either was inhabited by the Pannonians, or made subject to them.

The soil doth naturally abound with wine, corn and fruit, of which was so plentiful in the time of the Romans, that the Emperor Trajan caused a piece of money to be coined, having the figure of Ceres, holding in the one hand a Cornucopia, and in the other a plain Tablet with this inscription, Abundantia Dacia. Particularly besides great plenty of wheat, and most excellent wines, it yieldeth great store of Cherries, Damaſcens, Malacotoons, Musk-melons, not inferior to those of Italy; and also Century good store, and many other Medicinal plants; some mines of gold and silver, many of Iron, Brass, Copper; and not a few veins of Salt and Sulphur. Of cattel such abundance, that many times large Oxen are sold for a Florin, or halfe a Crown a piece; and a most notable breed of Horses: not to say any thing of that variety of wild beasts, which they have in their Woods and Forests, and of all sorts of Fowl both for food and pleasure. So populous withall for the

the most fruitful Countries are commonly populous also) that Castaldo Governour hereof in the minority of Stephen, the 4th. son of John de Sepusio, Anno 1551. advanced an Army of 70000 able men, consisting of the Natives of this Countrey only, for the liege of Lippe, a strong Town of Hungary, but on the borders of this Countrey.

The people are much of the same nature with the Hungarians, to whom they have been a long time subject; but somewhat more stubborn and untractable; speak the same language that they do, with some difference in the Dialect only: converted at the same time to the Christian Faith, and under the same forms of Ecclesiastical government. In former times they used to read, as the Jews do, from the right hand to the left; but of late herein conform to the Western Nations, from whom they are generally descended.

For that the people of this Countrey are the progeny of the Saxons, is evident by the Saxon Language yet in part retained. 2ly. We find that Charles the Great, like a Politique Conquerour, placed many of that Nation here, weakening so their strength at home, and fortifying the bounds of his Empire. And 3ly. by a story recited by Vorsteگان, which we touched in our description of Brunswick; the whole narration is this. Hallerstade was beyond credit troubled with Rats, which a Musician whom they called the Pied-piper, undertaking for a great mass of money to destroy, they agree: hereupon he tuned his pipes, and all the Rats in the Town dancing after him, are drowned in the next River. This done, he asketh his pay, but is denied; whereupon he striketh up a new fit of mirth: all the children male and female of the Town follow him into the hill Hamelen which presently closed again. The Parents miss their Children, and could never hear news of them; now of late some have found them in this Countrey, where I also leave them: only telling you this, that this marvellous accident is said to happen the 22 of July 1376. Since which time it is said that the people of Hallerstade permit not any Drum, Pipe, or other instrument to be founded in that street: and established a Decree, that in all writings of Contract or Bargain, after the date of our Saviours Nativity, the date also of this their childrens transmigration should be added in rei memoriam. But though the Dutch or Saxons make up the main body of them, yet being conquered by the Hungars, they received many of their Colonies; and in the Northern parts there remain still some of the old Scythians, planted there by Attila. One of those Members is the body of this State composed: so strong and populous that it is conceived to be able to raise an Army of 90000 men; and actually did arm 6000 horse and 12000 foot for the battle of Keresztur Anno 1596. being more by 2000 than the whole Realm of Hungary sent unto that service.

Chief Towns herein of the foundation of the Dutch or Saxons, are 1 Hermansted, in Latine Hermanopolis, (of old called Cibinium, from the River Cibin, on which it was situate) so named of one Herman the Founder of it; little inferior to Vienna for strength or greatness, well fortified both by Art and Nature. 2 Cronstadt, in Latine called Corona, by some Brassovia, by others Stephanopolis, this last name given it by Stephen, King of Hungary, who repaired and beautified it. Situate on the borders of Wallachia, amongst fruitful Mountains, remarkable for a fair Library, a kind of Academy, and the most noted Empory or Mart-Town of all this Countrey: of great resort, especially in the time of their public Fairs, by Turks, Arabians, Greeks, Armenians, Poles, Polanders, Wallachians, and other Nations. 3 Bistricium (by the Dutch called Noren) so called from the River Bistrica, which runneth through it: so pleasant and so sweet a Town, that there is no dirt or mire to be seen at any time; or if there be, the people presently swell up the River, and so cleanse the streets. 4 Mediesus, (by the Dutch, Medisch, so called quasimedius Confessus, because situate in the midst of the Countrey; a Town almost as near as Bistrica. 5 Segoswaria, or Schesburg, on the declivity of an hill. 6 Zabesius or Laiz, once the chief Towns of the Saxons, but now much decayed; situate in a very deep Vally, well fenced with waters, and those waters well stored with fish. 7 Clausenbourg, the Zemga of Ptolomy in Latine called Claudiopolis, from Claudius the second, Emperour, by whom re-edified: at first a Colony of the Saxons or Dutch only, but of late times the Hungarians coming in as strangers, were at last privileged as Citizens, and inhabited it together with them. The Town well-seated in the middle of a pleasant Plain, encompassed with an handsome wall, and beautified with elegant buildings. 8 Alba Julia, now Weisenberg, the Apulum of Ptolomy, situate on a small brook then called Apnus, (but now Oratus) whence it had the name. Built on the side of an hill near the River Marnuch, (or Marnus) over-looking a large and fruitful Plain: heretofore a Bishops See, and the ordinary residence of the Prince or Vaivod of Transylvania; but now a garrison of Hungarian Souldiers, holding it for the Emperour, as King of Hungary.

Chief Towns belonging to the Hungarians, and by them inhabited, are 1 Varadin, much mentioned in the stories of these later times, since the invasions of the Turks; situate on the borders of Hungary. 2 Thorda, built in or near the place where stood the Salina of Ptolomy, so called from the abundance of Salt-pits which were then about it. 3 Enguodine, by the Romans called Animum, from a Causy leading to it, raised by one Annius, and from him so named; some fragments whereof are still remaining. 4 Devu, remarkable for a vein of the best Wines. 5 Fenuschium, affording very pleasant Wines also, not inferior to those of Venusium in Italy. 6 Zilachi. 7 Gela, of which little memorable. 8 Miltenbach, not far from which, betwixt it and the Town of Bros, is a very strong fortress, commanding a strait and narrow passage leading into this Countrey out of Hungary.

In the North part hereof lyeth the Province called ZACULEIA, inhabited by the Scythians, or old brood of Scythians; brought hither by Attila, on his first conquest of this Countrey; and here still continuing. A people which have much in them of the antient Huns, and had heretofore a peculiar liar language to themselves, but now they speak the Hungarian generally; differing in the Dialect only. But though, by the necessity of commerce and co-habitation, they are brought into the same language; they still retain their ancient customs, governed by their own Laws, and living after the same manner as the Switzers do: each of their Cantons (seven in number) being absolute in and of itself, but all united with the Transylvanians, and with one another, for defence of the whole Countrey, against the several pretensions of the German and Turkish Emperours. And though they do acknowledge some subjection to the Emperour, as King of Hungary; yet it is but what they list themselves: being antiently privileged from all taxes, more than the paying of a Bull for every household, in the way of an Herritor, at the Coronation of the new King, when and how oft soever it may change to happen. Their Cantons (Seds they call them,) are 1 Septi, 2 Orbay, 3 Kisfy, 4 Czyk, 5 Gyrgio, 6 Uduarbeli, 6 Marovs Zeck, and 7 Aranyes Zeck; so called from the chief town in each division. In former times no Nobleman, nor any one of better means and greater eminence than other, was known amongst them: but now of late, that parity (or confusion rather) is grown out of credit, and some begin to over-top the rest both in power and title, as in other places.

The first Inhabitants of the old Dacia, whereof this Province was a part, where the Anatii, Taurisci, Rhatacensi, Cancoensi, the Burgedensi, and Biephii, &c. first conquered by Lyfismachus, the great and mighty King of Thrace, one of the renowned Captains of Alexander the Great; in token whereof, innumerable medals, in the age of our Grandfathers, were found in this Countrey, having his Image on the one side, and this word Victoria on the other. How they were afterwards subdued by the Emperour Trajan, and quitted by Arrelianus, hath been shewn already. Being forsaken by the Romani, it was won by the Goths; their constant dwelling, till forced over the Danow by the Huns, the next possessors of this Countrey; the road or thorow-fare from that time of those barbarous Nations, which out of Asia made their inroads on the Europeans. Having been successively subdued by the Scythians and Rosses, this part hereof was conquered by Stephen the first King of Hungary, surnamed the Saint; by whose perswasion and inducements, they received the Gospel. Governed after this time, as a member of that Kingdom, by a Deputy whom they called the Vaivod of Transylvania, (the word Vaivod signifying as much as Præfatus Militie, or a Lord Lieutenant;) a man by reason of the greatness of his place and power, of most authority in that Kingdom. The names and succession of these Vaivods, till the time of John Huniades, comes imperfectly to us; but after that, more clear and constant in this order following.

THE VAIVODS AND PRINCES OF TRANSYLVANIA.

- 1 John, surnamed Huniades, made Vaivod hereof by Bladislaus the 4th. A man of great valour and renown, the great Defender of his Countrey against the Turks; whom he overthrew in many battels, especially in that of Maron, where he slew 50000 of them. He died about the year 1458.
- 2 Stephen, of the noble family of Cattory, Vaivod in the time of Matthias King of Hungary the son of Huniades.
- 3 Stephen II. surnamed de Sepusio, from the place of his Honour or Estate, not so much memorable for any thing; as for being Father of Barbara, the wife of Sigismund King of Poland, and of
- 4 John II. called also de Sepusio, after the death of Lewis the 2d. chosen King of Hungary, of whom before, amongst the Kings of that Realm.
- 1526 5 Americus, Bishop of Veridium, made Vaivod by John de Sepusio, on his taking of the Crown of Hungary; treacherously murdered for not complying with the Turks, Anno 1534.
- 1540 6 Stephen, III. surnamed Maylat, a noble Hungarian, but extremely ambitious; having not long after the death of Americus usurped the Vaivodship; was in the year 1540. confirmed in that dignity.
- 1541 7 Stephen IV. son of John de Sepusio the late King of Hungary, by Solyman the Magnificent made Vaivod of Transylvania, being then an Infant; (by whom he had been deprived of his Kingdom of Hungary not long before) inroached upon not long after by the said Solyman; this Countrey was put into the hands of Ferdinand King of Hungary, other lands being given to the young Prince in exchange hereof.
- 1551 8 Stephen V. surnamed Dobus, for his valour shewed against the Turks in defending Agria, made Vaivod of this Countrey by the said King Ferdinand. But Solyman not liking that this Countrey should be at the Devotion of the Kings of Hungary, conferred the same (under the Vassallage of his Empire) upon one
- 9 John, III. whose Family and surname I have nowhere found; a professed Champion of the Turks, and as professed an Enemy to Ferdinand and his successors in the Kingdom of Hungary.
- 10 Stephen VI. surnamed Battory, (of which house he was) made Vaivod by the Turks; and afterwards on the commendation of Amurath the 3d. chosen King of Poland.
- 1575 11 Christopher Battory, brother of Stephen, on whose election unto Poland he succeeded here; and was the first who leaving the title of Vaivod, took that of Prince of Transylvania.

12 Sigismund

Moldavia.

- 12 Sigismund, son of Christopher, shook off the Turkish bondage, defeated many of their Armies, and slew some of their Bassas (the Scanderbeg of the times he lived in.) But not being able to hold out against so potent an adversary, he resigned his estate to Rodolphus the Emperour; having for it in exchange the Dukedoms of Oppelen and Ratibor in Silesia, and an annual pension of 50000 Joachimus. But finding his pension ill paid, he made a new resignation of it to
- 1599 13 Andreas Battery, cousin of Sigismund, slain within the year by the Vaivod of Valachia. After whose death
- 1601 14 Rodolphus Emperour, and King of Hungary, is admitted Prince of Transylvania, on the second resignation of Sigismund. But his Souldiers behaving themselves with too great insolence, Sigismund was called back again, but never well settled: so that at last he was fain to leave the Country in the power of the Emperour, and retire to Prague, where in the year 1613, he died unlamented. In the mean time
- 1604 15 Justine, or Istvan, surnamed Botsay, a Nobleman of this Country, made Prince hereof by the Great Turk, and supported by him, cleared the Province of the Germans, and being followed by great Companies of those of the Reformed Religion, he not only obtained of the Emperour Rodolphus a confirmation of this estate unto himself, but liberty of Conscience, and the free exercise of Religion for both the Nations, presently after which he died, Decem. 30. 1606.
- 1607 16 Sigismund, II. of the noble family of Ragotzy, elected in the February following by the Transylvanians; but finding himself not able to make his election good again the Emperour, and being unwilling to subject himself unto the Turks, after the end of one year he relinquished the Government, and betook himself again to a private life.
- 1608 17 Gabriel Battery, of the family of the former Princes, succeeded by the favour of Achmet the Great Turk: after whose death so welcom unto his Neighbours and subjects.
- 1613 18 Bethlem Gabour, by the same Achmet was made Prince of Transylvania; a professed Enemy of the house of Austria; but one that with a great deal of noise did them little hurt.
- 1630 19 Stephen VII. surnamed Ragotzy, on the death of Bethlem Gabour, succeeded Prince by the power and favour of the Turks; under whose Clientele and protection he doth still enjoy it, (as his predecessors did before him) against all pretensions of the Empire and Realm of Hungary; as on the other side, defended by the Emperour, and Crown of Poland, from being made thrall unto the Turks.

2 M O L D A V I A.

M O L D A V I A is bounded on the East, with the Euxine Sea; on the West, with Transylvania; on the North, with the River Niefter, the Tyras of Ptolemy and the Antients, by which parted from Podolia a Province of POLAND; and on the South, with Valachia.

It is so called, as some say, quasi Motavia, from its nearness to the fens of Motis; or rather from the Hunnes and other people of those fens, who possessed the same. Others conceive that it was first called Maurdavia, i. e. nigrorum Davorum, Regio, the Country of the black Davi, (for by the name of Davy were the Dacians called, as we find in Strabo and some others;) so named from their complexion, or the colour of their Caps and other garments; as Nigra Russia, a near neighbouring Province of the Realm of Poland, on the like occasion. But the more probable opinion (as I take it) is, that it took this name from the River Moldava, which runneth throw it; as the Moravians had that name from the River Morava. The nature and Religion of the People we shall find in Valachia, whereof antiently reckoned for a part.

The Country is very fruitful in corn, wine, grafs and wood; but more used for pasturage than tillage, by reason of the great want of people to manure the land: by means whereof it affordeth great plenty of Beef and Mutton, whereby they supply some parts of Poland, and the populous City of Constantinople. And these they issue out in so great a number, that the tenth penny exacted by the Prince or Vaivod, in the way of Custom, amounteth to 150000 Crowns per annum: and yet the Clergy and the Gentry are discharged of this impost. But the main trade of this Country is not driven by the Natives: the Port-towns being full of Armenians, Jews, Hungarians, and Raguzian Merchants, who foreitall the Markets, and barter all their corn and wine into Russia and Poland; their skins, wax, honey, powdered beef, Pulse, and butter, into Constantinople: it being credibly reported, that from the Ports of this Country no fewer than 500 ships laden with corn, victuals, and other provisions necessary to the life of man, are yearly sent unto that City.

The Country is in a manner round, the Diameter each way being near upon 300 English miles: but so ill-inhabited by reason of the neighbourhood of the Turks, Tartars, and Polonian Cossacks, that certain English Gentlemen having in the year 1609, travelled at least 240 miles in the country, could meet in all the way but nine Towns and Villages; and for an hundred miles together, the grafs so high that it rotted on the ground for want of Cattel to eat it, and of men to order it. So that we are not to expect in it many eminent Cities, or towns of note: though it afford two Archbishops, and two Bishops Sees; followers (as all the rest of the people are) of the traditions and Doctrines of the Church of Greece.

Valachia.

The principal of those which be, are, 1 Occazonia, or Zucconia, the Vaivods seat. 2 Euccania, 3 Fazeling, of which little memorable. 4 Kotjim, a place of great strength, on the borders of Poland; by some called Cochina; the ordinary mogazen of the Country. 5 Jassy, commonly called Tas, the chief Town for wealth and trade in all this Province. 6 Bender, a strong Town on the Euxine Sea. 7 Poladi near the Danow. 8 Bialograd, or Bologrove, situate on or near the River Tyras, now called Niefter; a strong Town against the Tartars, and Polonians. 9 Kele, antiently called Achilleia, situate on the shores of the Euxine Sea, for the most part compassed round with the waters of it; and therefore said by Ptolemy to be an Island. 10 Ac-Germen, of old called Asprocaron, and Moncastrum, a very strong Town in the same Coast also: both taken by Bajazet, the second Emperour of the Turks, Anno 1485. But these three Towns are not so properly in Moldavia, at least not in Moldavia properly so called, as in a little Province called Bessarabia, lying on the Euxine: formerly counted part thereof, till conquered by the Turks in the year aforesaid, it became a member of that Empire. A tract inhabited by the Bessi, in the times of Ptolemy, who being driven out of their Country by the Bulgarians, settled themselves (as some say) in that part of Sclavonia, which is now called Bosnia.

The whole Country following the fortune of Transylvania, and the rest of Dacia, till the coming of the Sclaves and Rosses, was for a while accompted part of the Russian Empire: till the dismembring of that Empire by the Tartars. After which it was sometime Honger to the Polanders, sometimes to the Hungarians, according as the Vaivods or Princes of it could find best conditions. By Mahomet the Great it was made tributary to the Turks; but the tribute at the first very light and easie, not above 2000 Crowns per annum: that mighty Emperour, who aimed at more profitable conquests, being loth to spend his Forces on so poor a purchase, as the addition of this Province would have been unto him. But Bajazet his son, finding how fit it lay for the more absolute command of the Euxine Sea, took in that part hereof which is called Bessarabia, reducing it into the form of a Turkish Province, Anno 1485. as before was said; imposing on the rest, an increase of the former tribute, and so left it unto the disposal of its natural Princes. After which time the Vaivods fearing to be made Vassals to the Turks, did many times rise in Arms against them; aided therein sometimes by the Hungarians, and sometimes by the Polander; which last pretended to the Sovereignty and chieftie of it. Bogdanus Vaivod hereof in the time of Selimus the second, uniting himself more closely with the Polonians; became thereby suspected by the Turkish Tyrant, who with a great power chased him out of his Country, and gave the same unto one John a Moldavian born, but bred up for the most part in the Turkish Court (where he renounced his faith, and was circumcised) under the yearly tribute of 60000 Crowns. But John the new made Vaivod, was no sooner settled but he returned again to his first Religion, and for that cause grew less affected by the Turks. Which being observed by the then Vaivod of Valachia, he practised to obtain that dignity for his brother Peter; offering to double the said tribute, and to assist in subjugation of the Country. The Turk accepting of these offers, compounds an Army of 70000 Valachians, 30000 Turks, and 3000 Hungarians, with which they fall into Moldavia: and were so gallantly received by the noble Vaivod, that few of them escaped the slaughter. But being afterwards betrayed by his old friend Czarnieviehe; and against faith given, barbarously murdered by the Turkish Bassa; Moldavia fell into the hands of the Turks, and was united to that Empire, An. 1574. the Vaivods from that time forwards, being nominated by the Turkish Emperours, and governing as substitutes and Lieutenants for and under them. And though Arcon, one of the succeeding Vaivods, did shake off this yoke, and confederated himself with Sigismund Pr. of Transylvania, and Michael Vaivod of Valachia, for defence of themselves and their Estates, against that enemy: yet being afterwards supplanted by Rosivan, one of his own ambitious subjects, and that confederacy disjoyned, it became subject first unto the Polonians, by the power and practice of Zamoyskie, Chancellor of Poland; and then unto Rodolphus, Emperour of Germany; and finally unto the Turks, as before it was. And though the Polanders have since made use of some opportunities, in imposing Vaivods on this Country, in despite of the Turks; yet was it commonly to their own loss, little or no benefit to the Moldavians, and in the end drew the whole power of the Turks upon themselves in the reign of Osman, never since intermeddled in the affairs of this Province, but leaving them entirely to the Turks disposing; who receive hence some yearly tribute, but have not hitherto obtained the entire possession of it, so long since aimed at by those Tyrants.

3 V A L A C H I A.

V A L A C H I A is bounded on the East, with Moldavia, and a branch of the Ister, or Danubius, bending towards the North; on the West, with Rascia; on the North, with Transylvania, and some part of Moldavia; and on the South, with the Danubius wholly, by which parted from Servia and Bulgaria. First called Flaccia, from one Flaccus, a Noble Roman, who on the conquest hereof in the time of Trajan, brought thither an Italian Colony; afterwards by corruption Ulachia, and at last Valachia.

But the name of Flaccia or Ulachia, was at first of more large extent, than it is at present; comprehending all Moldavia also: divided in those times by a ridge of Mountains, into Cisalpinia, and Transalpinia; the name of Moldavia being afterwards appropriated to the one, and that of Valachia (properly and specially so called) unto the other. The people of both, in token of their first extraction, speak a corrupt Latine or Italian language; but in matters of Religion follow the dictates of the Greek Church, and obey the Patriarch of Constantinople; under whom all Ecclesiastical affairs are governed by one Archbishop, and two Bishops. In other things they partake generally of the rudeness death of George, soon possessed himself of it. For Lazarus the youngest of Georges sons, having deprived Stephen and George his elder Brethren (whose eyes Amurath had before put out, to make them incapable of the Government) of the Principality, compelled them to seek to Mahomet for aid. But dying whilst these matters were in agitation, his widow put her self and her three sons, Peters, John, and Martin, under the protection of the Hungarians; and by that means, but with much trouble and many difficulties (the blind Brethren still soliciting the Turks against her) held the State a while: till the people finding no assurance in that kind of government, and weary of the daily harms they received from the Turks, yielded themselves absolutely to the power of Mahomet, about the Year 1460. continuing ever since a Province of the Turkish Empire.

6. BULGARIA.

BULGARIA is bounded on the East, with the Euxine Sea; on the West, with Servia; on the North, with the River Danow, which is here called Ister; on the South, with Thrace. Called formerly by the name of Myfia inferior, as lying lower than the other on the course of that River; as Servia, lying up the water, was called Myfia superior. Afterwards it was reckoned of as a part of Dacia, and in that notion was the Birth-place of Galerius, one of the Cæsars in the Empire of Diocletian; born in this country near the borders of Thrace, not far from the City of Sardica: who therefore in the Martyrologies of the middle times, was called by the name of Dacianus. Finally, it took this name from the Bulgars, a Scythian people, who in the Year 566. possessed themselves of it.

The Country for the most part full of sharp and rugged hills, branches of the great Mountain Hamus, which divide it from Thrace; and spread themselves over all this Province, inasmuch that even the midlands of it are rough and stony: and though the lower parts have some plains and val-lies, yet are they generally full of Woods and Deserts; the most unpleasant, and least peopled part of both the Dacias. The Inhabitants hereof in some conformity to the country, are patient of all toil and labour, and not easily tired; but nothing is more troublesome than their conversation: more full of courage, than of valour, their courage nor proceeding by the rules of reason, but issuing only out of brutishness, or a natural fierceness.

They first received the Christian Faith towards the latter end of Justinian the 2d. who died in the year 713. Tyrellius being then their Prince; afterwards by the persuasion of Leo the 4th. surnamed Porphyrogenitus, about the year 789. But those Conversions being but partial, and for private ends, they relapsed shortly after to their former Gentilism: not totally gained unto the Gospel, till the Empire of Michael and Theodora, in the year of Grace, 860. Subject since that unto the Jurisdiction of the Patriarch of Constantinople: but not without great opposition of the Popes of Rome, who laid claim unto them.

Places of most note in it, are 1. Axiom, or Axiopolis, on the banks of Danubius, which from this town begins to take the name of Ister. It is now called Colonomich, of no great fame otherwise. 2. Di-nogeriak, by Antonine called Dinagutia, now Drimago, situate also on the Ister, opposite to the influx of Hierafius, and the town of Galatz. 3. Mesimbria, situate on the Euxine, and still retaining the old name; in Sirabo, by some error of the Transcribers, called Mentbria. 4. Marcianopolis, on the Ister, not Danubius also, built by Trajan in honour of Marcia his sister, whence it had the name: in vain besieged by the Goths, at their first irruptions on this country; and afterwards much mentioned in the stories of that warlike people; for many bickerings, and some great battles they had near it with the Emperor Claudius; in one of which overthrown by him with a mighty slaughter. 5. Nicopolis, (by the Turks called Nigebol) built by the same Trajan on the Danow, at the fall of the River Jatre, at his return from the conquest of Dacia, whence the occasion of the name; the word Nicopolis signifying the City of Victory: sufficiently memorable for the founder of it, more for the many great battles fought near unto it; whereof two the principal. The first, that of Sigismund the Emperor and King of Hungary, besieging it with an Army of 130000 Christians, in the time of Bajazet the first (whose father Amurath had taken it from the King of Bulgaria) the issue of which siege was this, that Bajazet coming to raise the siege obtained the victory with the loss of 60000 Turks; the army of the Christians being wholly routed; 20000 slain, all the rest almost taken prisoners; and the young Emp. forc'd to flee by Sea to Thrace, thence into Constantinople; afterwards to Rhodes; and at last, after 18 months absence, to his Realm of Hungary. The other (as it was in revenge of this) was fought betwixt Michael Voivod of Valachia, and the forces of Mahomet the third, over whom the Voivod got a remarkable victory; and as the fruits thereof, sacked the City itself, carrying thence great spoil and booty, & infinite multitudes of people; with some whereof he made up his Army, sending the rest to inhabit and manure the void and desert places of his own Dominions. 6. Sophia, called Tibiscum in the time of Ptolemy, repaired by the Emperor Justinian, who gave it this name, from a famous and magnificent Temple, founded and dedicated by him unto St. Sophia. The ordinary Residence for these late times of a Turkish Beglerbeg, who hath the chief command of Europe under the grand Signieur: once taken by Huniades, and by him at the command of Uladislaus King of Hungary, burnt unto the ground; but afterwards repaired, and more strongly fortified, than it had been formerly. 7. Varna, antiently called Dierysopolis, situate on the Euxine Sea; near the borders of Thrace: remarkable for the great defeat there given the Christians, the first flight of Huniades from the face of the Turks, and the death of Uladislaus King

Bulgaria.

King of Hungary, spoken of before. 8. Sumium, 9. Pezechium, 10. Calacrium, 11. Galata, and 12
Macropolis; all taken by the Hungarians in their way to Varna, and lost again upon the issue of that battle. 13. Silistria; at this time the chief City hereof, and the ordinary abode of a Turkish Bassa: delivered to Amurath the first, by Saimes, Prince or King of Bulgaria, out of a vain hope to save thereby the rest of his Country. 14. Parastaba, or Perstaba, the antient seat of the Kings of Bulgaria; till the taking of it by John Zimisces Emperor of Constantinople, by whom caused to be called Johanopolis; but it soon lost that new name, and is now an ordinary Village called Peristaw. 15. Ter-nova, the usual seat or residence of the later Princes of this Country, at the conquest of it by the Turks. 16. Budina, once of great importance, and the chief of this Country; but being taken by Huniades in the course of his victories, it was by him burnt down to the ground, as having been the cause of much war to the Christians there: supposed to be built in or near the place, where once stood the old City of Oescus, the principal Town of the Triballi, called therefore Oescus Tri-bollarum; though some will have that City to be now called Blida. 17. Vennuzina, a Town of great strength, and one of the first peaces taken by the Turks. 18. Cosova, fatal to the Christians, who in the plains hereof had two main defeats. The first by Amurath the first, who here discomfited Lazarus the Despot of Servia, and the greatest Army that the Christians ever raised against the Turks: Lazarus himself being slain in the fight, and Amurath himself shortly after the battle stabbed in the belly by one Miles Cobiliz, a wounded and half dead souldier, as he was taking a view of the dead bodies which lay there in heaps. The last by Amurath the second to the famous Huniades, whom he here discomfited after a cruel fight continuing three days together: in which were slain 17000 Christians, and amongst them the greatest part of the Hungarian Nobility; Huniades put again to flight, and forced to some extremities to preserve his life: the Turks buying this great victory with the loss of 40000 men, as themselves confessed. The place in which these fights were fought, called the Fields of Cosova, extendeth 20 miles in length, and 5 miles in breadth, encompassed round with pleasant Mountains, in the form of an Amphi-Theater; as if it were designed by Nature for a stage of action. 19. Dorostorum, by some of the Antients called Rhodopolis, the seat in Ptolemy's time of the first Legion called Italica; afterwards one of the chief Towns which the Rosses and Russians had in this Country from whom taken by John Zimisces the Eastern Emperor, decaying after that time by little and little, and now wholly ruinous. 20. Achrida, the birth-place of Justinian, by whom beautified and enlarged, and called Justiniana Prima: who raising the Diocese of Dacia into a Præfecture, placed here a Primare for the affairs of the Church, (which honour it doth still retain, the Bishop hereof being the Primate of all Dacia) and a Præfectus Prætorio for affairs of State. But he being dead, the Town returned to its old name, now called L'Ochrida, contracted by William of Tyre to Acra; by the Turks called Ginsandit, a distinct Principate of it self in the time of Amurath the first, and by him made tributary at his first war with this Country.

(And here it is to be observed; that those parts of this Country which lie next to the Euxine Sea, had antiently the name of Pontus, as had some parts of Asia Minor, which bordered on the same Sea also: and that the City of Tome, as Ptolemy, or Tomos, as Pliny calls it, to which Ovid was banished by Augustus Cæsar, was a City of this European Pontus, and not of the Asian, as hath been commonly conceived. For Tomis is by Ptolemy placed amongst the Cities of Mæsia inferior; and by Ovid on the West or left side of the Euxine; and not upon the South thereof, as appeareth by these lines of his;

Cum maris Euxini positos ad læva Tomitas Quærens me læsi Principis ira jubet.

That is to say,

*My wronged Prince's wrath commands me bid
At Tomos on the Euxines Western side.*

The place at this day called Tomiswar, according to Cælius Calpurnius; but others would have it to be the same which is now named Kiovia, in the same tract also; not far from which is said to be a Lake called to this day Ovidow Pezecoor, the Lake of Ovid. For what cause hither banished is not yet agreed on. Some say it was for the unlawfull pleasures which he enjoyed with Julia the Emperor's daughter, whom he celebrates in his Amorum under the borrowed name of Corinna.
Others imagine that he had seen Augustus himself unnaturally using the company of the same Julia, his daughter; for which the offended Prince exiled him: and that he alludeth hereunto in his book de Tristibus, saying, Cur aliquid vidi? cur noxia lumina feci? &c. A Crime, of which I dare not think that public Emperor to be any way guilty. But certain it is, that whatsoever was the true reason of it, that which was openly pretended was the writing of those lascivious and inflammatory Books de Arte & Amoris, tending to the debauchment of youth and corruption of manners, which he in divers places of his works acknowledged for the cause thereof.

But to return unto the business of this Country, the antient Inhabitants hereof were towards the East the Trogodite dwelling near the mouth or fall of the River Pence into the Euxine or Black Sea; the Pæoni inhabiting on the very mouth of it, and in a little Island opposite thereto called also Pence, now Pizina, the Cribizi, Piarenzi, and Dimenzi; the Western parts being wholly taken up by the Triballi,

Bulgaria.

balli, the most potent Nation of them all: who only had the happiness to vanquish Philip King of the Macedonians. For Philip having, or pretending a quarrel against Mateus a King of the Sarmatians, entered his Country, overthrew him in a fight, carried with him great booties, and among other things, 20000 Mares for breed, which he took in the battle: it being the custom of the Scythians and Sarmatians, to use Mares only in their wars; because their not stopping in the midst of a race to piss, could be no impediment to them in their flight. In his return homeward, these Triballi deny him passage through their Country, unless they might partake of their spoils. This being denied, they fall from words to blows, and next to a pitched field. If which fight Philip was wounded with an Arrow, which passing thorow his thigh, nailed him to his saddle: his horse being galled with the wound, falling down to the ground. Which the frighted Macedonians seeing, and supposing him dead, fled out of the field, leaving all their spoils to the Triballi, as if they had been sent out only to be their Receivers. So true an observation is it, that the very life-blood of an Army runs chiefly in the veins of the General, or supreme Commander. Overtopped after this by the Massi, or mingled with them, they were first broken by the Romans under the conduct of C. Curius Scribonius, spoken of before, the absolute conquest of them and the rest of the Massians being reserved for the times of Augustus Caesar. By him or his successors, the whole Country of the Massians being cast into two Provinces, this part of it had the name of Massia inferior; that lying Westward up the Water being called Massia superior, for distinction sake. By the Emperor Amulianus, the Dacians being forced from the other side of the Danube, by the barbarous Nations, or by him prudently removed to avoid their fury, were planted here betwixt both the Massians divided afterwards into two Provinces, taken out of the other, Mediterranea, and Ripensis: which with the help of the higher Myisia, Dardania, Prevalitana, and part of Macedonia Salutaris, made up the whole Diocese of Dacia, as before was said. The residue hereof now passing under the name of Bulgaria, was afterwards divided into two Provinces also: another Province being taken out of the East parts of the Lower Massia, lying betwixt the River Rhanissus, and the most northern branch of the Ister, which they called Scythia, because the Aroteres a Scythian people did once possess it; the Romans ambitiously affecting to be thought the Conquerors of that unconquerable Nation. Successively by the Goths and Huns was this Country taken from the Romans: recovered again in or before the time of Justinian, who had here his Officers; subordinate to the Vicar or Lieutenant of Thrace, to which Diocese they properly belonged.

But long they held not in that State; The Slavonians first, and after the Bulgarians, being masters of them. Of the first of these enough hath been said elsewhere. These later being a Scythian people inhabiting on the banks of the River Volga, were at first called Vulgari, afterwards Bulgari: though some conceive they had the name of Bulgarians from Bulgar, the chief Town of their Nation; but both uncertain. In the time of the Emperor Anastasius, they made their first sally into the Provinces of the Empire, foraging Illyricum and Thrace: afterward, in the reign of Heraclius hired by Cosroes the Persian (with many other barbarous Nations) to besiege Constantinople. In the reign of Constantine, surnamed Pogonatus, conquering or calling out the Slaves, they planted themselves in these Countries; compelling the Emperor to compound with them for a sum of money, from making any further inroad into his Dominions. From this time forwards, we find their Princes called by the name of Kings of the Bulgarians; the first of which after their settling in these parts, was Tribellius, or Trebellius, as some call him, the first Christian Prince of the Bulgarians, by whom Justinian the second was first restored unto the Empire, of which he had been ousted by Abismarius; and afterwards well beaten by them, and forced to flee unto Constantinople on some breach between them. Growing into good terms with the Eastern Emperours, they aided them against the Saracens then besieging the Imperial City; of whom they slew 22000 as they were foraging the Country: and in the time of Leo the fourth, called Porphirogenitus, they became Homagers to the Empire, by whose persuasion Telricus King of the Bulgarians received the Sacrament of Baptism; and thereupon was honoured by him with a wife of the Imperial family, and the honourable title of a Patrician. After this time the Kings hereof had many privileges indulged them by the Constantinopolitans, not usually communicated unto other Princes, viz. their Crown of gold, their tiar or cap of silk, and their red shoes for their Regal; which were also the Imperial ornaments. To these Kings also, and to these only, did the Greek Emperours allow the title of Basileus, as being merely Imperial. Other Kings they called Prin from the Latine word Reges. Inasmuch that when Basilius Macedo had received letters from Pope Adrian the second, wherein Lewis the second the Western Emperour was called Basileus; he razed out that Imperial attribute, and dispatched an Embassy to Lewis, wherein he challenged it as his own peculiar Epishite. Some quarrels after falling out, Crunus the Bulgarian King, in the time of Nicophorus successor to the Emperess Irene, invadeth Thrace, taketh the City of Sardica, killeth that Emperour in his tent, and worsteth Michael (who succeeded) in the open field; Mesembria, a principal City of this Country being taken and ransacked by him. But Bogor, of another temper, not only did receive the Sacrament of Baptism, which many of his Predecessors had intermitted; but brought his subjects (who rebelled on the change of Religion, and thereupon were fought with, and vanquished by him) to the same faith also: gratified for that cause by Theodora the Emperess, with some large accession unto his estate. After long wars betwixt the Bulgarians and the following Emperours, the fortune of the Constantinopolitan did at last prevail: Samuel King of the Bulgarians being overthrown, 1000 of his souldiers taken and deprived of sight; and the Country conquered by Basilius the second, surnamed Porphirogenitus, Anno 1015. from that time tributary to the Empire: to which they did good service in the time of Constantine Ducas, using their help against the Uzi, a new swarm of Scythians.

Bulgaria.

chians, passing over the Ister with an Army of 60000 fighting men, and wasting Macedon and Greece. The like did John another of the Kings thereof, aiding the Greeks against the Latines, whom they overthrew with a great slaughter, Baldwin the Emperour of the Latines in Constantinople being taken prisoner, sent in bonds to Ternova, and there cruelly murdered, Anno 1206. Nor were they wanting to assist them against the Turks, when they grew dangerous to that Empire, by the taking of Adrianople: for the recovery whereof, they raised a great and puissant Army, unfortunately discombed by the Forces of Amurath the first, Anno 1369. Provoked with which invasion, Amurath having settled his affairs in Asia, with an Army of 30000 falleth into Bulgaria; takes divers places of importance, and prevailed so far, that Sasimenes the last Prince hereof, wrapping his winding sheet about him, to shew that he had deserved death, prostrates himself most abjectly at the Tyrants feet, offering to put Silistria (his strongest City) into his possession. For not performance of which offer, his Country is again invaded, most part of it taken from him; permitted to enjoy the rest upon hard conditions, as vassal and tributary to the Turk. But Bajazet, Amuraths successor, not content herewith picked a quarrel with him, and made an absolute conquest of Bulgaria, converting it into a Province of the Turkish Empire, Anno 1396. In which State it hath ever since continued, governed by three Turkish Sanjacks under the Beglerbeg of Greece: the Sanjacks residing at Nichopolis, Silistria, and Sophia, in which last the Beglerbeg himself doth sometimes reside.

Before we enter into Greece, we must crosse MOUNT HÆMUS, a ridge of hills, extending from the Euxine Sea to the Adriatick; and thereby separating Greece both from Dacia and Sclavonia. So high and subject to the weather, that Stratonicus an old Grecian did use to say, that eight months of the year it was alwayes cold; for the other four, winter. It was affirmed by some of the Ancient writers, that from one of the highest heads hereof, as well the Adriatick as the Euxine might have been discerned: the truth of which report, upon very good reason, hath been called in question. But out of doubt, from some one top or Summit of it, there is so full a prospect into Thrace and Macedon, that from hence Perseus taking a survey of the fire of these Countries, positis per abruptis Castris, &c. as the Storie hath it, was able to make choice of the fittest places for Forts and Castles, whereby to lock up all the passages against his enemies the Romans. In the parts bordering upon Thrace so rough and craggy, that it is not to be passed but as two places only. Whereof one was made by the Emperour Trajan, where is yet to be seen a mighty strong gate built of great square stone: by which the passage that way was either opened or shut, at the pleasure of them who had the keeping of the same; with a small force exceeding easily defended against puissant Armies. The other being situate near a little River: by the Bulgarians called Saliza, not altogether so strait and narrow as the other, but rising high, and full of broken Rocks and dangerous precipices, is alike impassable; defensible at ease, and without any great danger: as was experimentally found by the famous Hunius, when he attempted (but in vain) to have led his forces this way, for the siege of Adrianople. Those parts hereof which border upon Macedonia, though somewhat openers, are not much easier of ascent; the passages through the broken rocks and precipices, being very difficult, and not easily mastered: inasmuch, that when Perseus the last King of Macedon had fortified the streights hereof against the Romans; non reliquisse aditum nisi à cœlo venientibus vidbatur, it was conceived (saith Florus) that there was no passage left for any forces, unless they fell immediately from the heaven: themselves.

This great and rockie chain of hills, as they were vehemently exposed to wind and weather, so were they destitute of those commodities, which were either comfortable or indeed meely necessarie to the life of man: which made the passage over them in a manner impossible unto any Armies, but what were very patient both of cold and hunger. Yet were they not left desolate and void of people, especially in these sides hereof which lay next to Greece; but most especially in those parts which bordered or confined on Thrace: where the spurs and branches of the hills spreading farre and wide, and taking up a great part of the Country; occasioned the Romans in the division of the Diocese of Thrace into severall Provinces, to call that part or Province of it which lay next to Mæsia, by the name of Hæmimontum, or Hæmimontana. The principal Towns whereof were Adrianople, Uscudoma, and Anchiala; the principal Governour hereof a Roman President. Where, by the way, we may take notice of an Errour in the common impressions of the Code, Lib. VII. Tit. 62. Leg. 23. where we find Hæmi montem, for Hæmimontum: the first being the name only of the mountain; and the latter (which is there meant) of the Roman Province.

But

But to return unto the Mountain, there is another of this name in Thessalie, mentioned (or mistook for this) by Servius in his notes on the first book of the Georgicks; in the top whereof was said to be the habitation of Mars, on the bottom, the most pleasant valley of Tempe: so called from Hæmus, the son of Boreas and Orithya amongst the Poets. And possibly to distinguish this from that of Thessalie, Prohomy, and others call it Hæmus; without the Aspirat: though it may well be, that there are others of this name; as that this is called in divers places, or in divers Authors, by other names: one part hereof being called Scombrus by Aristotle, another Scombrus by Thucydides, and by Laonicus the whole called Trafobus. The like may be observed at the present also, Pinesus calling is by the name of Cutena; Mundis, a great part whereof it links together: Cuspinianus, Castegnazzo, Lacini, Kri- stian; the Italians, Mont Argentario, the Frenab, Monte de Castegno; the Sclavonians, Cumanica; and the Turks, Balkan. Which I have therefore here observed for the Readers sake, that meeting any of these names in the Stories either of to the ancient or modern times, he may know what hills or mountains are intended by them. Which said, I now pass on to Greece, the way being thus prepared and laid open to me.

As for the Fathers of this Church, anciently and at this present held in most esteem, they were no other than such as had been Bishops of the greater Sees; that is to say, 1 S. Chrysostome, first a Reader of Antioch, afterwards patriarch of Constantinople: 2 Basil, and the two Gregories; 3 Nylsen, and Nazianzen, all in Asia Minor; this last of Constantinople also: 5, 6. The two Cyrils, the one Patriarch of Alexandria; the other, of Hierusalem: 7 Epiphanius, Bishop of Salamis in the Isle of Cyprus; 8 Theodoret, Bishop of Cyprus, &c. men of renown and precious memorie amongst them, to this very day. From whose writings, if they deviate in any material point of doctrine, it is in that of the 'Procession' of the Holy Ghost, which they grant to be per Filium, but not a Filio. And though Chelchibevvus, Lombard, and other moderate men of the Church of Rome, do grant the difference to be rather, in modo explicando, quam in ipsa re; and that the Clause a Filioque, was added by the Romanists to the ancient Creeds, the Grecians not being privie nor consenting to it: yet so uncharitable is that Church towards these poor men, languishing under the tyrannie of Turkish thraldom, as to persecute them with reproach and scorn, brand them for Schismatics and Apostates, and solemnly to anathematize them, in Bulls Censuræ, every Maunday Thursday. And it is a very hard measure to add and anathematize too, as is right well observed by the late Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, in his notable Discourse against the Jesuits. Other particular Tenets in which the Greek Church differeth from the Romish and Reformed (as in some points it doth from both) have been already specified in our Description of Russia: the Churches of the Greeks, and Moscovites, differing in no material points, but 1. the manner of distributing the Sacrament; 2ly, the exacting of marriage by the Moscovites, in the party admitted unto Orders; 3ly, the frequent admitting of divorces upon light occasions; and 4ly, finally in being less strict in observing the Lent before Easter than in any of the other three. For whereas the Grecians account it a damnable sin to eat flesh or fish which hath blood in it, in any of their other Lents or times of abstinence, (they have in both Churches four in all:) in that before Easter, which of all reason ought to be kept most punctually, the Laity eat all sorts of fish without any exception; the blood of some of which, as the Cusle by name, is held to be a delicate food, and in great request.

The Language they spake was of their own, of which there were four Dialects viz. 1 the Attick, 2 the Dorick, 3 the Eolick, 4 the Ionick: besides the common phrase of speech most in use among them. A language of great fame for the liberal Arts, but more for so great a part of the holy Scripture, first delivered in it: and for the lofty sound, significant expressions, genuine suavity, and happy composition of words, so excelling all others, that even in the flourishing of the Roman Empire, it so much overtopped the Latine, that the Histories of Rome it self (as of Polybius, Appian, Dion Cassius) were written in it. It was once also the general language of Anatolia, some parts of Itallie, Provence in France, and almost all the Islands of the Mediterranean. But now partly by the mutilation of some words, and contraction of others; partly by confusion of the true sound of Vowels, Diphthongs, and Consonants, and the translating of the Accents; and finally, by the admixture of foreign Nations, it is not only fallen from its natural elegancy, but from its largeness of extent. For it is now shut up within the limits of Greece, and the Sea-coast of the lesser Asia, opposite unto it; and there not only much corrupted, but almost quite devoured by the Turkish and Slavonian tongues; but specially by that which they call Franco, a Mungrel language, composed of Italian, French, and some Spanish words; used as the ordinary speech for commerce and intercourse betwixt Christians, Jews, Turks, and the Greeks themselves, who do not understand, and much less speak the true genuine Greek. So that although they still retain for ordinary dayes, S. Chrysostoms Liturgie; and that of S. Basil for the Festivals: yet being both written in the ancient and learned Greek, they are no more understood by the Vulgar Grecian, than the Latine Service by the common and illiterate Papist.

The soil questionless is very fruitfull, and would yeeld great profit to the husbandman, if they would take pains in the tilling: but they, knowing nothing certainly to be their own, but all things subject to the Grand Seigneur and his souldiers; neglect the tillage of their lands, on the same grounds with those who said in the Poets Eclogues:

*Impiū hęc tam culta novalia miles habebit?
Barbarus hęc segetes? en quęsī conjecimus arva!*

Shall misbelieving Turkey these acres spoil,
Which I manur'd with so much coit and toil?
Shall they enjoy my care? See neighbours see,
For whom these goodly corn-fields tilled be!

The more natural and certain commodities which they transport into other parts, are Wines, which in memory of the water which our Saviour turned into wine, and on the six day of January being that day whereon this miracle was wrought, they use to baptize: for which cause the Jews will drink none of them. They send also into other parts of the world, Oil, Copper, Vitriol, some Gold and Silver, Velvet, Damasks, Turke-Grograms, &c.

This Country hath formerly been famous for the brave Commanders, Miltiades, Aristides, and Themistocles of Athens; Lysander, and Agésilas, of Sparta; Pelopidas, and Epaminondas, of Thebes; Aratus, and Philopamen of Achæia; Pyrrhus of Epirus; Philip of Macedon, the subverter of the Grecian liberty, and Alexander his son (to omit infinite others) the subverter of the Persian Monarchy. For the divine Philoophers, Plato, Socrates, Aristotles, and Theophrastus; for the most eminent Lawgivers, givers, Solon and Lycurgus; for the most exquisite Poets, Hesiodus, Homer, Sophocles, and Aristophanes; for the famous Historiographers, Xenophon the condisciple of Plato, Thucydides, Plutarch, and Herodotus; the eloquent Orators, Aeschines, Demosthenes, and Isocrates; and lastly, for the Authors and Establishers of all humane learning whatsoever, only the Mathematicians excepted.

The chief Rivers, are 1 Cephisus, which arising in the Frontiers of Epirus, disburtheneth it self into the Aegean Sea. 2 Erigon, and 3 Alaicmon, which beginning their course in the more Northern parts of Macedon, end it in Thirmiacus Sinus. 4 Strymon in Mygdonia. 5 Albicun and Nisus in Thracæ. 6 Symphalius, where Hercules killed the Symphalian birds; And 7 Ladon, in Arcadia. 8 Inachus, whose daughter Io turned into a Heifer, was worshipped by the Egyptians under the name of Isis. 9 Achelous in Epirus, much celebrated by the ancient Poets, especially by Ovid in his Metamorphosis. As is also the chief River of Thessaly, and there arising from Mount Pindus, and increased with the waters of many Rivers. Daphne the Nymph, whom Apollo is fabled to have loved, and turned into a Bay tree, lived near or on the banks of this River Peneus; and is therefore said to be his daughter: as is also above-mentioned was the daughter of Inachus. Of less note,

Populifer 11 Sperchius, & irrequietus 12 Enipeus,
13 Apidannusque senex, lenisque 14 Amphyrys, & 15 Aëa.

That is to say:

Cool Sperchie, Enipeus that troubled ran;
Smooth Amphyrys, Aëa, and old Apidan.

The rest of less note, and the most eminent Mountains in each part hereof, shall be remembred in their places, as we see occasion.

Thus much of the whole Country in gross. And as for the division of it with reference to the State of the Roman Empire, it contained in a manner two whole Dioceses, viz. Thracæ and Macedon: the first under the Præfectus Prætorio Orientis, the latter (together with that of Dacia) under the Præfectus Prætorio for Illyricum. Of these the Diocese of Macedon lying wholly within the bounds of the Modern Greece, contained the Provinces of Macedonia prima. 2 Macedonia Secunda, or Salmariis (now, as in former times, called Albania.) 3 Epirus Nova, taking up the Countries of Phocis, Locris, and so much of the Old Epirus as was on that side of the River Achelous. 4 Old Epirus, comprehending all the rest of that Country. 5 Thessalie. 6 Achæia, containing all Achæia and Peloponnesus, the Countries of Laconia and Phocis excepted only. And 7 Crete or Candie, with the Islands adjoining. And for the Diocese of Thracæ, it was divided into the Provinces of 1 Thracæ, specially so called. 2 Europa, 3 Rhodope, 4 Hæmi-montum, 5 Mæsia Inferior, and 6 Scythia: of which the four first make up the body of Thracæ, and shall there be spoken of; the two last being comprehended in the Modern Dacia; have been described already in their proper places. But not to bind my self precisely unto this division; (though I shall look on this as occasion serveth) I shall consider Greece in the several Provinces of 1 Peloponnesus, 2 Achæia, 3 Epirus, 4 Albania, 5 Macedon, 6 Thracæ, 7 The Islands of the Propontick, 8 Aegean, and 9 the Ionian Seas, and 10 finally the Isle of Crete.

1 PELOPONNESUS.

PELOPONNESUS is bounded on the East, with the Cretan; on the West, with the Adriatic or Ionian Seas, on the North-east, with Sinus Saronicus, now Golfo di Engia; on the North-west, with Sinus Corinthiacus, now Golfo di Patràs, or Lepanto; and on the South, with the Mediterranean. So that it is almost an Island, properly called a Peninsula, rounded with the Sea, except where it is tied to the main Land of Greece, by an Isthmus six miles in breadth: which the Grecians and Venetians; fortified with a great Wall and five Castles. This was called anciently Hexamilium; and was overthrown by Amurath the second, who harassed and spoiled all the Country. It was afterwards in the year 1453, upon the rumour of a War, built up again by the Venetians (who then had the greatest part of this Country) in 15 dayes; there being for that time 30000 men employed in the work. This wall extended from one Sea unto the other, which had it been as gallantly guarded as it was hastily made up; or as it was well fortified, had it been as well manned; might easily have resisted the Turks, until more means had been thought on to defend it. Nor less observable, but more fruitless was the design of some in the elder times, to cut thorow this Isthmus, and make a perfect Island of it. Attempted by Demetrius King of Macedon, Julius Caesar, and Caius Caligula; by none more eagerly pursued; than by the Emperour Nero: who to hearten on his Souldiers, loth to attempt so fruitless an enterprise, took a Spade in hand, and busily began the work. Yet at last the Souldiers, being frightened with the blood which abundantly broke forth with the groans and roarings, which they continually heard; and with the Hagoblines and Furies, which were alway in their sight; perswaded the Emperour; now half out of the humour, to leave this, and enjoy them some more profitable service: given over by the former Princes on the like discouragements. But of this Isthmus we shall add no more; than these words of Ovid, and so pass forwards to the description of the Country: That is to say, Messenia.

That is to say :

Some in Olympick dust take pride
 Their Chariots and themselves to hide;
 Whom the shunn'd mark, and Palms to priz'd,
 Like to the Gods hath eterniz'd.
 Such as like heavenly wights do come
 With an Elean Garland home.

But to proceed, after the death of Hercules these games were discontinued for 430 years: at which time one Iphitus, warned so to do by the Oracle of Apollo, renewed them; causing them to be solemnly exercised every fourth year: from which custom Olympias is sometimes taken for the space of 4 years; as quinque annorum Olympiades, for 20 years. Varro reckoneth the times before the flood to be obscure; those before the Olympiads, and after the flood, to be fabulous; but those that followed these Olympiads, to be Historical. These Olympiads were of long time, even from the restauration of them by Iphidra, until the reign of the Emperour Theodosius, the Grecian Epoebe, by which they reckoned their actus, the first of them being placed in the year of the World, 3174. before the building of Rome, 40 compt: the first of them being placed in the year of the World, 3174. before the building of Rome, 40 compt: the last in the 440 year after Christs nativity. According to which reckoning this accompt continued for the space of 1214 years: the memory of which remains, though the name of Olympiade not found in Peloponnesus: the Town at this day called by the name of Sconri. 3 Pisa, whose people followed Nestor to the Wars of Troy; and in their return were by tempest driven to the coasts of Italy, where they built the City Pisa in Tuscany. 4 Turnese, a new Town, or the new name of some ancient City; from whence the adjoining Promontory, of old called Chilonites, is now called Cabo di Turnese.

3 MESSENA hath on the East, Arcadia; on the North, Elis; on the South, and West, the Sea. It takes its name from the Metropolis Messene, situate on Sinus Messeniacus, now called Golfo di Corone. 2 Pylos, where Nestor was King, now called Novarino; a desolate and poor Village not worth noting. Of which thus Ovid speaking in the name of Penelope;

Nos Pylon; antiqui Neleia Nestoris arva,
 Misimus; incerta est reddita fama Pylo.

To Pylon, aged Nestors seat, we sent;
 But could not hear from thence how matters went.

3 Modon, or Metihone, seated in the most Southern part of this Peninsula, from whence unto the Isthmus, which joineeth it to the rest of Greece, are reckoned 175 Italian miles; the Town commodiously situate in a Demie Island, washed on the one side with the Sea, and so well fortified toward the Land, that seated in the opinion of most men it is thought impregnable; adorned on the South side with a large and capacious Bay, about 3 miles wide, secure from all winds except the North, and shut up with a little Island called anciently Odnuse, but now Sapientia, which makes it one of the safest harbours in all these Seas: possessed once by the State of Venice, but conquered by the Turks, after many sharp and fierce assaults, Anno 1500. both Pylos and Corone yielding on the noise thereof; The best retreat since that time of the Turkish Navies, and the ordinary residence of the Turkish Zanzack, who hath the government of this whole Province of Morea, under the Beglerbeg of Greece. 4 Corone, or Ceron, the chief Town on the Bay of Messene, called from hence Golfo di Corone, and the last which held out against the Turks for the State of Venice, once Lords of all the Sea-coast of Peloponnesus. 5 Cyparissi, now called Arcadia, from whence the Bay adjoining hath the name of Golfo di Arcadia. Here is also the Promontory called of old Coryphusum, now Cabo Zanchio.

The people of this small Province had once a great sway in the whole Peninsula. At first confederate with the Spartans in so strict a league; that they mutually sent young Virgins to one another, for their publick sacrifices: but afterwards Corrivals with them for the Supreme power. The Spartans at the last getting the upper hand of them, oppressed them with a miserable servitude. The occasion this: In the confines of this Country stood a Temple of Diana, common alike to the Messenians, Spartans, and Dores. It happened that some Spartan Virgins were by the Messenians here ravished: which abuse the Spartans pretended to be the ground of their War; the true reason indeed being their covetousness of the sole Empire. This War broke out three several times. The first continued 20 years, in which space, the Lacedaemonians fearing their absence would hinder the supply of children in the City, sent a company of their ablest young men home to accompany their wives. Their Offspring were called Parthenii, who coming to full growth, abandoned Sparta, sailed into Italy, and there built were called Tarentum. The second being of 23 years continuance, was raised and maintained by Aristomenes, one of the chief men of the Messenians; in which they prospered till Aristocrates, King of Arcadia, one of their confederates, revolted to side with Lacedaemon. Then began they to decline, and Aristomenes was thrice thrice taken prisoner, still miraculously escaping. His last imprisonment was in a Dungeon, where by chance espying a Fox devouring a dead body, he caught hold of her tail: The Fox running away, guided Aristomenes after; till the straitness of the hole by which he went out, made him leave his hold, and fall to scraping with his nails: which exercise he never left till he had made the hole passable, and so escaped; and having a while upheld his falling Country, died in Rhoder. The third War was like drops after a tempest. In which the Messenians being finally subdued, were forced to abandon their Country, or become Slaves unto the Spartans who put them to all drudgeries and servile works, as they did the Helots, whom they counted as their bondmen: and to this life some of them did apply themselves with so much obsequiousness, that at last it grew into a Proverb, Messenii servilior, that such a one was more servile, or more slavishly used, than these poor Messenians. But the greatest part of them not brooking that heavy yoke, passed into Sicily, and there built the City of Messana. Others were planted in Naupactus, by the State of Athens; the rest dispersed up and down in all parts of Greece: few of them left in their own Country, till Epaminondas having vanquished the Lacedaemonians at the battle of Leutres, restored them to their ancient possessions.

4 ARCADIA hath on the East, Laconia; on the West, Elis and Messene; on the North, Achaia Propria; and on the South the Sea. This Country took its name from Arcus, the son of Jupiter and Calisto; but was formerly called Pelagasia: the people whereof thought themselves more ancient than the Moon.

Orta prius Luna, de se si creditur ipsi,
 A magno tellus Arcade nomen habet.

The land which of great Arcus took its name,
 Was e're the Moon, if we will credit Fame.

The chief Cities are 1 Mantineia, nigh unto which the Theban Army, consisting of 30000 Foot, and 3000 Horse; routed the Army of the Spartans and Athenians, consisting of 25000 Foot, and 2000 Horse. In this battle Epaminondas that famous Leader, received his death wound, and not long after died. At his last gasp one of his friends bemoaning his untimely death; Alas, said he, thou diest Epaminondas, and leavest behind thee no children: Nay, replied he, two daughters will I leave behind me, the victory of Leutres, and this other at Mantineia. It was afterwards called Antigonia, in honour of Antigonus, Tutor or Protector of Philip the Father of Perseus, King of Macedon; but by command of the Emperour Adrian, restored to its old name again; and is now called Mantegna. 2 Megalopolis, the birth-place of Polybius that excellent Historian. The one half of it had sometimes the name of Orestis, from the lodging of Orestes in it; the whole now called Leontari, on what cause I know not. 3 Phialia, towards the Sea. 4 Trophis, so called from Trophis, one of the sons of Lycan, once King of this Country, slain by Jupiter. 5 Stymphalius, situate near a Lake and River of the same name, where Hercules slew the Stymphalian birds; so great in number and in body, that they darkened the Sun-beams, and terribly infested this little Province; till driven thence by Hercules. Here was also in this Town a Temple dedicated to Minerva, from hence called Stymphalida. 6 Tegea, famous for the Temple of Pan, here worshipped, and from hence called Tegeus; more for the War made upon the Tegeates, or people hereof, by the Lacedaemonians: who thinking themselves assured of Victory, brought with them store of chains and fetters, wherewith to lead captive their conquered Enemies; but being overcome in battle, were themselves bound with them, and forced as slaves, to till the grounds of these Tegeates. Here is also in this Country the River Styx, whose water for the poysonous taste was called the water of Hell: by which Poets feign, that the Gods use to swear, as may be every where observed; and that what God soever swore by Styx falsely, he was banished from Heaven; and prohibited Nestor for 100 years.

This Country for the fitness of it for pasturage and grazing, hath made it the subject of many witty and witty discourses, especially that of Sir Philip Sidney, of whom I cannot but make honourable mention: a Book, which besides its excellent language, rare contrivances, and delectable stories, hath in it all the strains of Poesse, comprehendeth the universal art of speaking; and to them which can discern and will observe, affordeth notable rules for demeanour, both private and publick. Which noble Gentleman, as he may worthily be called the English Heliodore, so the ingenious Author of the History of Melinus and Ariana, may deservedly be called the French Sidney.

5 LACONIA is bounded on the West, with Arcadia; on the East, and South, with the Sea; on the North with Argolis. Called first Lelegia, from the Leleges, by Strabo, said to be the first Inhabitants of it, afterwards Oebalia from Oebalus a King of Lacedaemon; and finally, Laconia, of the Lacones, who succeeded the Leleges in the possession hereof, on their removal, into the Islands of the lesser Asia. It is by some Writers also called Heecatompolis, from the number of an hundred Cities which it once had in it.

The soil hereof exceeding rich, and the fields very spacious, yet for the most part not well tilled, in regard of the many Hill and Mountains which overthwart it. Well watered with the River Ennaeus, and memorable for many fair Bays and Promontories: of which the principal are the Promontories of Malea and Tanaria, now called Cabo Malio, and Cabo Matapan: and of the Bays, that called Golfo di Colobina, the Sinus Laconicus of the ancients; into which the River Ennaeus, (now better known by the name of Vasilo Potamo, or the Kingly River) pours his gentle streams. The nature of the people we shall find in Sparta.

Places of the most observation in it, 1 Leuistres situate on the Sea side, near the Bay of Messeni; of which name were two others in Greece; the one in Arcadia, the other in Achaia, but this last most memorable. 2 Amicyla, so called from Amicyla the third King of Sparta, by whom first founded: renowned afterwards for the birth of Castor and Pollux, the sons of Tyndarus; and of good note for being the Foundress of the City of Amicyla in Calabria Superior, at first a Colonie of this, distant from Lacedaemon about 20 Furlongs. 3 Thulana, nigh to which is the Lake of Lerna, where Hercules slew the Monster Hydra: and not far off Mount Tanarus near the Promontorie Tanaria, in which the Natives shew a Cave, (believed in former times to be the descent into Hell) out of which the Poets feign that Cerberus was dragged by Hercules. 4 Salassia, where Antigonos vanquished Cleomenes, the last King of Sparta. 5 Epidaurus, (seated on the Bay, named Golpo di Napoli) now called Malvasia; a Town well built, and very well peopled; remarkable for the sweet Wines called Malvesey, or Malmsey, sent from hence into all other parts in great abundance. 6 Sparta, so called from Sparta the son or brother of Phonoreus, the second King of Argos, the Founder of it: but afterwards beautified and enlarged by Lacedaemon, the second King of this Country, it took that name also; promiscuously known by both in the best Authors. One of the Eyes of Greece, and a famous Commonwealth; but at first governed by the best Kings, as most of the Greek Cities in ancient times. Tyndarus the Father of Castor and Pollux, was once King hereof. After whose death, and the death of the said famous brethren; Menelaus was admitted King of Sparta or Lacedaemon, in right of Helena his wife, their sister. And though Nicostratus, and Magapenthes, sons of Menelaus by another venter, succeeded after his decease; yet the Spartans soon rejected them, and received Orestes the son of Agamemnon to be their King; marrying him to Hermione the daughter of Menelaus and Helena, and consequently the Niece of Tyndarus. Tisamenus, the son of Orestes and Hermione, succeeded next; in whose time the Heracidae or posterity of Hercules returned into Greece, under the conduct of Temennus, Ctesiphon, and Aristodemus, sons of Aristomachus: whereof the first possessed himself by force of Arms, of the City of Argos; the second, of Messeni; and the third conquered the City and State of Sparta: which dying very shortly after, he left unto his two sons Eurythmus and Procles, the roots of the two Royal Families, which jointly and in common governed the affairs of Sparta: first absolutely as Sovereign Princes, without any controul; afterwards at the direction of the Senate, and finally under the command and check of those popular Officers whom they called the Ephori. But because these Spartan Kings in each several period, were for the most part men of action, and often mentioned in the Histories of the elder time: I will first make a Catalogue of them, and then subjoin such observations and remembrances, as I think most pertinent.

The KINGS of SPARTA

Of the first Family.

A.M.

- 1 Eurotas, the first King of Sparta, who gave name to the River Eurotas.
- 2 Lacedaemon, brother of Eurotas, from whom the City of Sparta was called Lacedaemon.
- 3 Amicyla, son of Lacedaemon, the Founder of Amicyla, a Laconian City.
- 4 Argalus, son of Amicyla.
- 5 Cynorta, son of Argalus.
- 6 Oebalus, son of Cynorta, from whom a part of this Country had the name of Oebalia.
- 7 Hippocoon, son of Oebalus.
- 2700 8 Tyndarus brother of Hippocoon, in whose life he was King of Oebalia only.
- 9 Castor and Pollux, sons of Tyndarus, famous among the Argonauts.
- 2740 10 Menelaus, son of Atreus, and brother of Agamemnon, Kings of Mycene, together with Helena his wife, the daughter of Tyndarus, whose Rape occasioned the destruction of Troy.
- 2770 11 Nicostratus, and Magapenthes, sons of Menelaus by a former wife.
- 12 Orestes, son of Agamemnon, and Hermione his wife, daughter of Helena, and Menelaus.
- 13 Tisamenus, son of Orestes and Hermione, who being outed of Sparta by the Heracidae, reigned in Achaia; and left his Kingdom there, unto his posterity.

who having slain Eurydamidas the son of Agis the third, substituted his brother Epicles in his place. But being himself shortly after vanquished by Antigonos of Macedonia, and forced to fly his Country with his wife and children; the Government of the Heracidae ended, after it had continued here for the space of 900 years, or thereabouts.

Under these Kings the Government at first was αγαν μοναρχικον, as Plutarch termeth it, sufficiently Monarchical, if it were not more. Under Ennomus, the fourth King of the second house, the people finding the reins of Government let loose, began to mutiny and grow too headstrong. To bridle whom, and to restrain the Kings withal, (should they prove exorbitant) Lycurgus the Protector of Charilaus, the sixth King of that house, did ordain the Senate; committing to them the supreme power in matters civil, and leaving to the Kings the ordering all military and sacred business. To curb the infolencies of this Senate, who quickly found their own strength, Theopompus the eighth King of that house with the consent of Polydorus the tenth King of the other; instituted a new Magistracie chosen out of the Common People, whom they called the Ephori, which grew in fine to such an height of pride and tyranny; as not only to controul the Senators, but to censure, fine, imprison, depose, and mutually to kill their Kings, as the spirit of sedition moved them. So that the State of Lacedaemon, was at first a Monarchie under Kings, then an Aristocracie under the command of the Senate; next a Democracie under the Ephori; and finally by those popular Officers made to plain a Tyranny, that Aristotle and Plato, two great Common-wealths men, who died before they had embred their hands in the blood of their Kings, call it in plain terms τυραννικη & ολιγαρχικη, a most absolute tyranny. What think you would these men have called it, had they lived to see Leonidas the third deposed; and Agis the third of that name also, most barbarously murdered by these popular Villains?

But being the foundation of this Common-wealth was first laid, and the good Laws and Politique Constitutions by which it did so long subsist in great power and splendour, established by the Wit and power of Lycurgus, as before was said: we are to know concerning him, that he was the son of Ennomus, the fourth King of the second house, slain in a popular tumult by the Common People. Who finding by this Essay, that the people were become too head-strong for the Kings to govern, unless reduced to extreme bondage by their Kings, which he wished not neither; took the advantage of the minority of Charilaus to new mould the Government: and what he could not do by fair means, to effect by arms; forcing this Charilans, though his Nephew, when he came to age, to flee for sanctuary to the Temple of Juno. Having ordained what Laws he pleased, and settled such a form of Government as himself well fancied, the better to decline the envy of so great a change, he got leave to travel, binding the people by an oath to observe all his laws until his return: and being gone, commanded at his death, that his ashes should be cast into the Sea, lest being carried back to Sparta the people might conceive themselves released from their oath. By means whereof his laws continued in force near 700 years, during which time that Common-wealth did flourish in all prosperity: the particulars of which institutions he that lists to see, may find them specified at large, by Plutarch in the life of Lycorgus. Suffice it that the Discipline was so sharp and strict, that many went into the wars for no other reason, than on a hope to rid themselves from so hard a life: and that Diogenes returning hence to the City of Athens, gave out that he returned from men to women, in his Ἀνδρῶν ὅς τις τὸν ἄνθρωπον. And being asked in what part of Greece he had met with the completest men; made answer, that he could no where meet with men, but that he had found some boyes amongst the Spartans. A Cynical and rugged answer, but such as carried a great deal of judgment in it; the Spartans being more stout and resolute in all their actions, and less effeminate in their lives, than the rest of the Grecians. But besides the strictness of the discipline under which they lived, there was another thing which made them with for Wars abroad: namely the little or no power which either the Senate, and the power of the civil matters, or affairs of State; entirely left to the disposing of the Kings or People had in Ephori. So that the Kings having by the Laws the command of their armies, were willing to engage in War upon all occasion; and the common people as desirous to attend them in such employments, as the Kings could wish. Upon these grounds the War is made a Trade amongst them; beginning with the Helots, a neighbouring people; then with the rest of the Lacônians; afterwards quarrelling the Messeniensians, their old Confederates: all which they severally subdued and made subject to them. In the War which Xerxes made against the City of Athens, their King Leonidas the first, of the elder house, went forth to aid them; slain at the Straights of Thermopylae, courageously fighting for the liberty of Greece: and when it was thought fit, to set upon the Persian Fleet, Eurybiades the Spartan Admiral did command in chief. In pursuit of this War against the Persians, Pausanias and Agessilaus were of most renown; the first in helping the Athenians to drive them out of Greece; the other in making War upon them in their own Dominions. Freed from the Persians, they grow jealous of the State of Athens, whom they looked on as their Rivals in point of Sovereignty and glory. Hence the long War betwixt these Cities, called Bellum Peloponnesiacum, managed for the most part in Peloponessus, from thence transferred into Sicily, and at last ended in the taking of Athens: the Government whereof they changed into an Ariflocracy under 30 Magistrates of their own appointment, commonly called the thirty tyrants. Proud of this fortunate success, their next quarrel was with the Boeotians, the conquerors of Athens covertly, and the Persians openly allying the enemy. Here their prosperity began to leave them. For besides many small defeats, Epaminondas the Theban so discomfited them, at the overthrow of Leutres and Manina, that Sparta it self was in danger of utter ruine. Not long after happened the Holy War, chiefly undertaken against the Phocians, wherein also they made a party: but this War being ended by King Philip, they scarce breathed more freedom than he gave air to. But when Alexanders Captains fought for the Empire of their Master, all these flourishing Republicks were either totally swallowed into, or much defaced by the Kingdom of Macedon. The Lacedæmonians held the chief strength of a Town to consist in the valour of the people; and therefore would never suffer Sparta to be walled, till the times immediately following the death of Alexander the Great: yet could not those fortifications then defend them from Antigonus Dofon, King of Macedon; who having vanquished Cleomenes King of Sparta, entered the Town and was the first man that ever was received into it as Conqueror. So much different were the present Spartans from the valour and courage of their ancestors. Cleomenes being forced to forsake his Country, and the race of the Heraclide failing in him, they became a prey to Machanides and Nabis, two wicked Tyrants; from whom they were no sooner freed, but they were made subject (in a manner) to the power of Rome: and in the end the Town so weak and inconsiderable, that it was not able to resist the poorest enemy; now a small Burrough called Misistra. And so I leave them to the thoughts of their former glories, having now nothing else to boast of, but the fame and memory of their actions in former times.

ARGOLIS, so called from the chief City Argos, is bounded on the South, with Laconia: on the West, with Corinthia, and Achaia Propria; on the East and North, with the Sea. A Territory remarkable for a most excellent breed of Horses, and from thence called Hippium.

Places of most importance in it, 1. Argos, founded by Argus the fourth King of this Country, and the chief of this Kingdom. Memorable as for other things, so 1. for the death of Pyrrhus King of Epirus; who having forced his entry into it, was here ignobly slain, after all his victories, by the hands of an old woman, throwing a tile at him from the top of an house. 2. For the long race of the Kings hereof, from Inachus the contemporary of our Father Abraham, An. 2003. unto Acisius their last King. Whose daughter Danae being shut up in a Tower of Brass, was deflowered by Jupiter; to whom the bare the renowned Perseus, so memorized in ancient Poets. But Perseus having by misfortune slain his Grandfather, the old King Acisius, quitted the City of Argos as unlucky to him, and transferred the Kingdom to Mycene, a City of his own foundation, and so better fancied, by means hereof, the second City of esteem in this little Province. Growing in small time unto so great riches, that it got the name of dites Mycena; as appeareth by Horace; in whom the Horses of Argos, and the wealth of Mycene are placed in one verse together;

Aptum

Aptum dicis equis Argos, dicesque Mycenae.

For horses Argos is of fame,
For wealth Mycene hath the name.

Trazen, situate on the Sinus Argolicus, now called Golfo di Engia, the Royal seat of Pytheus, the Father of Thesus, who was born herein: from whence the Town in Ovid hath sometime the name of Pythia Trazen, and Thesus many times is called Trazenius Heros, as Hercules had the name of Tyrinthius Heros, from 4 Tyrinthia, another City of this Province, in which he was nursed. 5 Nemea, where Hiracles slew the dreadful Leon which annoyed this Country. In honour of which noble Act, were instituted in time following the Nemean Games, which continued of great fame in Greece for many Ages. The Exercises were, running with swift horses, whorl-bats, running on foot, quoiting, wrestling, darting, shooting. Some have referred the original of these Games to one Opheltus a Lacedæmonian; and in whose honour they conceive them instituted: and others fetch it higher from the war of Ithebes. But this I take to be the more allowable opinion. 6 Epidaurum, on the Sea side, famous for the Temple of Æsculapius, and the cure of all sorts of diseases there; so called from Epidaurum, the son of Argus, the Founder of it. Of the same name, but of a different situation from that before mentioned in Laconia; that being seated on the Bay called Golfo di Napoli, this on that of Engia. Once called Melissa, and Emera, at that time an Island, but by an Earthquake laid unto the continent: now called Pigadia. 7 Nauplia, so called of Nauplius King of Eubœa, and father of Palamedes, to whom it is anciently belonged. A station then, as now, for shipping; in that regard called Nauplia Navale, now Napoli, or Neapolis, the richest and best traded in all this tract; giving name unto a large and capacious Bay, now called Golfo di Napoli, of old Sinus Argolicus; into which the famous River Inachus having passed through the City of Argos, doth disgorge it self; so called from Inachus the Father of Io and the Original and Progenitor of

THE KINGS of ARGOS and MYCENÆ.

- A.M.*
- 2693 1 Inachus, the supposed Father of Io, from whom the Grecians are sometimes called by the name of Inachii.
 - 2143 2 Phoroneus, the son of Inachus and Melissa, from whom the said Io hath the name of Phoronis in the Poet.
 - 2223 3 Apis, the son of Jupiter, and Niobe the daughter of Phoroneus, who leaving Greece, went into Egypt, where he taught the people tillage, and was there worshipped afterwards in the form of an Ox.
 - 2228 4 Argus, the son of Apis, and the Founder of Argos, in whose time Agriculture was taken up amongst the Grecians; from him called Argivi.
 - 2308 5 Crius, by some Peirasus, the son of Argus.
 - 2363 6 Phorbas, the son of Crius; in whose time Atlas and Promethus are said to flourish.
 - 2397 7 Triopas, the son of Phorbas, and the brother of another Phorbas, who planted himself in the Isle of Rhodes.
 - 2442 8 Crotopus.
 - 2464 9 Sthenelus, ousted of the Kingdom by
 - 2475 10 Danaus, the brother of Egyptus; by whom driven out of Egypt, he was made King of Argos, by consent of the people: the Father of those many daughters got with child by Hercules. From him the Grecians are called often by the name of Danai.
 - 2525 11 Lyncæus, son of Egyptus, the brother of Danaus.
 - 2556 12 Abas, the son of Lyncæus, and Hypermetra the daughter of Danaus.
 - 2566 13 Pretus, the son of Abas.
 - 2606 14 Acisius, the brother of Pretus, and the father of Danae, foretold by the Oracle that he should be slain by a son of that daughter, shut her up in a brazen Tower. But Jupiter, having corrupted the Guards with Gold, got the Ladies consent, by whom he had Perseus, so renowned amongst the Poets and Historians of those elder times.
 - 2637 15 Perseus, the son of Jupiter and Danae, exposed by his Grandfather to the Seas. Miraculously preserved, and grown into great fame by his brave exploits; he restored Acisius to his throne, from which he had been deposed by his brother Pretus. But after having ignorantly and unfortunately slain the said Acisius, he removed his seat unto Mycene; where he reigned together with his son Sthenelus.
 - 2645 16 Eurystheus, the son of Sthenelus, much spoken of for the difficult tasks, which, at the instigation of Juno, he imposed on Hercules his foster-child, and the supposed son of Amphitryon his Cousin German.
 - 2688 17 Atræus and Thyestes, sons of Pelops, on the failing of the line of Perseus, succeeded in Argos and Mycene; infamous for their murders and adultery: Thyestes abusing the bed of Atræus, and Atræus feasting him with the body of his own son, whence Trisitia Dana in the Proverb.
 - 2753 18 Agamemnon, the son of Atræus, Commander of the Greeks at the War of Troy, in which

- action there engaged 69 Kings of the Greecians, wafted over with a Navy of 1224 ships, killed at his coming home by Egiffhus, his Cousin German.
- 2768 19 Egiffhus, the son of Thyestes, having defiled Clitemnestra the wife of Agamemnon in the time of his absence; by her procurement murdered him at his coming home, and usurped the Kingdom.
- 2775 20 Orestes, son of Agamemnon, revenged his fathers death on Egiffhus, and Clitemnestra his own Mother. After which falling mad, and restored again unto his wits, he married Hermione, daughter of Menelaus and Helena, by whom he had the Kingdom of Spithallo.
- 2803 21 Penthius, the son of Orestes, and the last King of this line; oured of his estate by the Doris and Heraclida; who made themselves Masters of all Peloponnesus, which they possessed until the conquest of it by the Macedonians.

7 CORINTHIA is a little Region, lying towards the Isthmus or neck of land, which joyneth Peloponnesus to the rest of Greece, betwixt Argolis and Achaia Propria. It containeth only the territory of the City of Corinth, not large, nor very fruitful of those commodities which the rest of this Peninsula doth abound withal: as being mountainous and hilly, and by reason of the nearness of the Sea, full of craggy Rocks. The chief, and indeed the only Cities of note in it, 1. Cenchreae, the naval Road or station of ships for Corinth, mentioned Alt. 19. 18. and Rom. 16. 1. in both Texts reckoned a distinct Town from Corinth, as indeed it was; situate on that Bay which openeth into the Cretan Sea, called anciently Sinus Saronicus, now Golpodi Engia; and consequently opposite to 2. Lechaum, the other naval Road for Corinth, situate on the Western Bay, called of old Sinus Corinthiacus, now the Gulf of Lepanto. 3. Corinth it self, commodiously situate for the command of all Greece (had not the Inhabitants been more given to Merchandise than unto the Wars) as being seated on the bottom of the neck or Isthmus; the Ionian Sea upon the West, and the Aegean on the East, washing the walls thereof, and giving it once a side a capacious Haven, in which regard called by Horace, bimaris Corinthus. In compass about eleven miles, for strength impregnable, for command as powerful; mastering both Seas on which it stood, and cutting off all passage from one half of Greece to the other: to which last end the Castle called Acrocorinthus, looking into both Seas, served exceedingly fit; and was therefore called one of the Fortes of Greece. The City rich, very well traded, and neatly built, most houses beautified with handsome pillars, from thence called Corinthian: more memorable for the wealth of the people, and the convenience of the situation, than for any notable exploits performed by them, or any great influence which they had on the States of Greece. But in regard of the wealth, greatness, and situation, accounted by the Romans one of the three Cities which they held capable of the Empire; Carthage and Capua, being the other two. In this City lived the famous or infamous whore, Thais, who exacted 10000 Drachma's for a single nights lodging: which made Demosthenes cry out, Non emam tanti panitere, and occasioned the old By-word, Non cuivis homini contingit adire Corinthum.

'Tis not for every mans avail,
Unto Corinth for to sail.

Near hereunto stood the Acrocorinthian mountains, at the foot whereof the City, and on the top whereof the Castle called hence Acrocorinthus, were seated: out of which flowed the famous Fountain named Pyrene, of old consecrated to the Muses; by Persius called Fons Caballinus, because feigned by the ancient Poets to have been made by the Horse Pegasus, dashing his foot against the rock. And on the other side hereof in the Isthmus, were celebrated yearly the Isthmian Games, ordained by Theseus in the honour of Neptune; in imitation of the Olympick devised by Hercules in honour of Jupiter. The exercises much the same, and the reward no other than a Garland of Oaken boughs; yet drawing yearly a great resort of people to them: partly to exercise themselves, and behold the sports, and partly to sacrifice to Neptune, who had hard by, a famous Temple.

As for the Fortunes of this City, it was at first called Ephyra, at that time a small and obscure place; but beautified and repaired by Corinthus the son of Pelops, took the name of Corinth; Governed by him and his posterity, till the coming of the Heraclida into Peloponnesus: at what time one Aletes of the race of Hercules, possessed himself hereof, with the name of King, A. M. 2849. Twelve Princes of his line enjoyed it for the space of 220 years and upwards: when the house, failing in the person of Autonomen, they were governed by temporary officers, like the Archontes of Athens. Continuing under this government 124 years, the City was seized on by one Cypselus, A. M. 3294. who left it to his son Periander, one of the seven wise men of Greece; counted a Tyrant in those times, for no other reason, than that he had suppressed the popular Government: after whose death, An. 3364. the City did recover its former liberty. In the bustle betwixt Athens and Lacedaemon, and other the Estates of Greece, for the superiority, it did little meddle; the aim of this people being wealth, not honour: not interested in any action of renown in all those times; but in the sending of Timoleon to the aid of the Syracusans, against the Tyrant Dionysius, who did lord it over them. Subdued together with the rest, by the Kings of Macedon; and with the rest restored to liberty by the power of Rome; under whom growing still more rich, and withal more insolent, they abused certain Roman Ambassadors. But irasci populo Romano nemo sapienter potest, as is said in Livie, which the Corinthians found too true: the City being besieged, sacked, and burnt unto the ground by Lucius Mum-

Achaia.

Mummianus a Roman Consul, An. V. C. 607. In the burning whereof there were consumed so many goodly Statues of Gold, Silver, Brass, and other metals; that being melted into a lump, they made up by that fatal chance, the so much estimated metal, called Æs Corinthium, more highly prized in Rome than Gold, or Silver. Repaired again, it was of great esteem in the time of the Emperours, converted by S. Paul to the Christian Faith; and having flourished a long time in pride and pleasures, decayed by little, till it came to nothing, and is now a small Barrough called Crato.

Having thus spoken of the several Estates of Peloponnesus, it reiteth that we speak somewhat of the State of the whole; varied according to the fortunes of those particulars, which had most influence on the same. The affairs hereof a long while swayed by the Kings of Sicyon, whence it had the name of Sicyonia, restrained afterwards to the Territories of that City only. But when the Kings of Argos came in place and power, it depended much upon their pleasures; from Apis the third King whereof (if not rather from Apis, the fourth King of Sicyon) in the opinion of some Writers, it was named Apis. But Pelops, the son of Tantalus King of Phrygia coming into Greece, and marrying Hippodamia, daughter of Oenomaus King of Elis, became the most powerful Prince of all this Peninsula, taking from him the name of Peloponnesus. The Kingdom of Mycenæ growing into power and credit, had the next turn in swaying the affairs hereof for a certain season; as after that the Doris and the Heraclida, possessed at once of Argos, Sparta, Corinth, and Messene. The Spartans getting the preeminence over all the rest, were the next who governed the affairs of it, and they held it long; having first conquered Laconia, and subverted the Estates of Messene; by means whereof and by their fortunate success against the Persians, they became almost absolute in their commands, without any Competitor. But their power being broken by Pelopidas and Epaminondas, in the Theban War, the petit States hereof began to rake heart again, and stand upon their own legs, as they did a while, till the Kings of Macedon succeeding Alexander the Great, brought them once more under, and made them fellow-servants with their Spartan Masters. In the confusions which ensued in Macedon, amongst the Competitors for that Kingdom, Antas and Dime, two Cities of Achaia Propria, first united them in a strong league of amity, at such time as Pyrrhus first went into Italy: into which confederacie the Cities of Tricæ and Pheræ shortly after came; and not long after that Ægira, and the rest of Achaia Propria: their affairs first governed by two Prætors, with advice of the Senate, as afterwards by one alone with the like advice; of which Melorus Carinensis was the first, and Aratus of Sicyonia the second. The ground thus laid, and the reputation of this new Commonwealth increasing by the virtue of Aratus, the Epidaurians, Træzenians, Argives, and Megarians became members of it: maintaining gallantly the liberties of Peloponnesus, till finally mastered by the Romans. In the division of whole Empire it fell, with all the rest of Greece, to the Constantinopolitans: and in the declining of their fortunes, when the Lutines got possession of the Imperial City, most of the Sea-coasts of it were allotted to the State of Venice: the inland parts formerly parcelled out amongst many Princes, whom they called Despots, continuing as before they were. By Isabel, a Daughter of one of these Despots (and as it seems true chief amongst them) married to Ferdinand, Son of James the first, and Father of James the second, King of Majorca, the title of Prince of Majorca came into that house; used by them and the rest of these petit Princes, till all together made a prey to the Turkish Tyrants, Mehomet the Great, and Bajazet the second, by whom wholly conquered. For howsoever Thomas and Demetrius, brethren of that unfortunate Prince Constantinus Palæologus, had fled hither at the taking of Constantinople; and were received and obeyed by those petit Princes; yet being unable to hold out against the conquerour, they became his Tributaries. But falling out amongst themselves, and neglecting then to send in the tribute agreed upon, gave Mehomet the Great occasion to invade the Country; and under colour of aiding one brother against the other, to destroy them both, as he did accordingly: Demetrius being carried Prisoner to Constantinople, and Thomas forced to abandon Peloponnesus, and fly to Italy, Anno 1457. Such Towns hereof as belonged to the State of Venice, followed the same fortune also in the time of Bajazet; by whom all taken at the last, and the whole Country brought under his obedience, Anno 1500. or thereabouts. Governed ever since that time by a Turkish Zanziaek, under the Beglerbeg of Greece, who hath his residence at Modon, a Regiment of 1000 Horse to secure the Country, and 700000 Aspers, (that is to say, 140000 Crowns) a year, for his entertainment.

2 ACHAI A.

A CHAI A is bounded on the East, with the Aegean Sea; on the West, with Epirus; on the North, with Thessalia; and on the South with Peloponnesus, and the Seas thereof. Called anciently Hellas, from Hellas the son of Dendalion; but whence it had the name of Achaia is not yet agreed on; though sure I am, that from hence the Inhabitants of it were called Achiui, (a name communicated afterwards to all the Grecians) to difference them from the Achai of Achaia Propria.

The Country famous in the Authors of elder times, more for the gallantry of the men, than any great goodness of the soil and place: yet that sufficiently memorable for the hill Hymettus, swarming with Bees, plentiful of the sweetest honey, and rich in Mines of excellent Marble; as also for the River Cephissus, which runneth almost through the whole length hereof: divided into two main streams, of which the one is called Asopus, the other retaineth its first name. Upon the banks hereof stood the Temple of Themis, to which Dendalion did repair to be directed in the restauration of mankind, as the Poets Fable.

Achaia.

It was divided anciently into these seven parts, viz. 1 Attica, 2 Megaris, 3 Boeotia, 4 Phocia, 5 Locris, 6 Doria, and 7 Ætolia. A division now as much diffused as the name of Achaia, changed by the Turks into that of Lebania, of which more anon.

1 ATTICA hath on the West, Megaris, and some part of Boeotia; on all other parts compassed with the Sea; So called from Athens the chief City. The soil for the most part very barren, and craggy, yet by the arms and industry of the people made both rich, and famous: inasmuch as the yearly Revenues of the State of Athens were 1200 Talents. The money current in this Country was commonly stamped with an Oxe, whence came the By-word Bos in lingua, applied to such Lawyers as were bribed to say nothing in their Clients cause. Not much unlike to which was the Proverb rising from the coin of Ægina (an Isle adjoining) stamped with the figure of a Snail, viz. Virtutem & sapientiam vincunt Testudines.

Places of most observation in it, 1 Phila, a strong Fortrefs on the borders of Boeotia, surprized by Thraſſibulus, and others of the banished Athenians, during the government of the 30 Tyrants; the taking whereof was the first step towards their own and their Countries liberty; which soon after followed. 2 Eleusis, on the borders of Megaris, almost impregnable fortified by the 30 Tyrants when they had the command of Athens; by whom designed for their retreat in all times of danger. But having withdrawn hither on the taking of Phila, and Piræus, by the Thraſſibulians, they found strong walls a weak defence for so much wickedness; being trained out as to a parly, and so deprived of the place and their power together. It was first built by one Eleusius, who entertained Ceres, as she was in quest of her daughter Proserpine; who to reward him, taught him the use of Agriculture; and he in honour of her built here a Temple. Hence Ceres in the Poets is called Eleusina, and her sacrifices sacra Eleusinia; and sometimes the City also, Cerealis Eleusis, so called by Ovid in the 7 Book of the Metamorphosis. 3 Rhamus, upon the River Asopus, famous for the Temple of Amphiaranus, and the Statue of the Goddess Nemesis, hence called Rhamnusia in the Poets: this Nemesis or Rhamnusia, being the Goddess of Indignation, punishing those who made themselves unworthy of their present fortunes. 4 Trichorium, of more antiquity than fame. 5 Marathon, on the South side of the present fortunes. 6 Themistocles, of great note for the discomfiture given by Miltades the Athenian to the numerous Army of Darius, consisting of 200000 Foot, and 10000 Horse; the Emulation of which noble victory startled such brave resolves in the breast of Themistocles. As memorable in the Poets of those elder times for the Marathonian Bull there slain by Theseus. 6 Mosopia, the ordinary dwelling place of Theseus, before he fixed his seat at Athens, it being at this Town that he restored Helena, (whom he had before stolen from her own Country) to her two Brethren Castor and Pollux; of which both Rape and Restitution we find mention in Ovid, the one in the Epistle of Oenone to Paris, the other in that of Hermione to Orestes; in which last it is said expressly, Reddita Mosopia Tyndaris urbe soror. That is to say, that she was delivered to her two Brethren, (who had took much pains in seeking for her) in the Town of Mosopia. 7 Pyraus, the Port Town to Athens, and the ordinary station for their Shipping, the Haven hereof being capable of 400 sail; distant from the City about two miles, but joynted unto it by two long walls reaching from the one to the other, for securing the conveyance of their Merchandise to and from the Sea. The Port it self impregnable fortified by the advice of Themistocles. But as these long walls were broken down by the command of the Spartans, when the City of Athens was taken by them; so were the fortifications of Pyraus it self demolished by the command of Sylla, in his war against Mithridates King of Pontus, the better to keep under the Athenians. 8 Panormus, a Sea-Town also, and of very good trade, but not of such importance as the other was. 9 Athens, one of the eyes of Greece, and the chief of Attica, situate from the Sea two miles, as before was said: the Haven of Pyraus serving it with all commodities which came from other parts by shipping. First built by Cecrops the first King of it, by whom called Cecropia, A.M. 2409. repaired afterwards by Theseus, and furnished with good Laws by Solon; and finally thus named from Minerva, (whom the Greeks called Athene) to whom they dedicated, and in whose honour there were yearly kept some solemn Games, called Panathenaia. A City heretofore adorned with all those excellencies of strength and beauty, which art or cost could add unto it. Renowned, as for many things, so for three especially: 1 For the inviolable Faith of the Citizens in all their leagues, and most firm affection to their friends: so that Fides Attica grew in the end unto an Adage. 2 For the famous Scholars which here taught and flourished: this being so happy a Nursery of the choicest Wits, and so fitly feared for the Muses, that the very Natives being in other Countries, could sensibly perceive some want of that natural vigour, which at home was reliant in their spirits. Ita ut corpora istius gentis separata sint in alias Regiones, ingenia vero solis Atheniensium muris clausa esse existimes, as Velleius hath it. Yea and to say the truth, it was a most famous University, from whose great Cistern, the Conduit Pipes of Learning were dispersed over all the World. Yet did not learning so effeminate or soften the hearts of the people, but that 3 This one City yielded more famous Captains than any in the World besides, not excepting Rome; Miltades, Aristides, Themistocles, Cimon, Pericles, Alcibiades, Phocion, and divers others of great name. Who though they were the men that both defended and enlarged this Commonwealth, yet were the people so ungrateful to them, or they so unfortunate in the end, that they either died abroad in banishment, or by some violent death at home. Themistocles the Champion of Greece, died in exile in Persia; Phocion was slain by the people; Demosthenes made himself away by poison; Pericles many times endangered; Theseus their Founder first deposed, and then despitefully imprisoned; Aristides, Alcibiades, Nicias, &c. banished for 10 years by the Ostracism: A form of punishment so called, because the name of the party banished was writ on an Oyster-shell; and only used toward such, who either began to grow too popular, or potent among the men of service. Which device, allowable in a Democratic, where the overmuch powerableness of one might hazard the liberty of all, was exercised in spite oftner, than desert. A Country fellow meeting by chance with Aristides, desired him to write Aristides in his shell: and being asked whether the man whose banishment he desired, had ever wronged him, replied, No, he was only sorry to hear folk call him a good man. We find the like unfortunate end to most of the Romans, so redoubled in war. Coriolanus was exiled, Camillus confined to Ardea, Scipio murdered, with divers others: only because their virtue had lifted them above the pitch of ordinary men. Ventidius was disgraced by Antony; Agricola poisoned, with the privy of Domitian; Corbulo murdered by the command of Nero: all able men, yet living in an age wherein it to be valiant. In later times it so hapned to Gonsalvo the Great Captain, who having conquered the Kingdom of Naples, driven the French beyond the Mountains, and brought all the Italian Potentates to stand at the Spaniards devotion; was by his Master recalled home, where he lived obscurely, though honoured after his decease with a solemn Funeral. Worse fared the Guisse, and Biron in France; worse Essex, and Dudley of Northumberland with us in England. Neither will I omit William Duke of Suffolk, who having served 34 years in our wars with France, and for 17 years together never coming home, at his return was quarrelled and basely murdered. It were almost impie to be silent of Joab, the bravest souldier, and most fortunate Leader that ever fought the Lords battels, and yet was killed at the horns of the Altar. Whether it be that such men be born under an unhappy Planet; or that Courtiers, and such as have best opportunity to indeer men of warre unto their Sovereigns, know not the way of commending their great deserts; or that Envy the common Foe to Vertue, be an hinderance to it, I am not able to determine. And yet it may be that Princes naturally are distrustful of men of Ability; and are not willing to make them greater, whose name is great enough already. And it may be the fault is in the souldiers themselves, by an unseasonable over-valuing of their own performances, as if the Prince or State were not able to reward or prize them: which was the cause of the death of Silius, in the time of Tiberius. Concerning which Tacitus giveth us this good note, that over-merrit in great Subjects is exceeding dangerous, and begets hate in stead of favours. Beneficia eo signa sunt dum videntur excolui posse; illi malum anteverterunt, pro gratia odium reddidit, faith the wise Historian.

But to look back again on Athens, it was first built by Cecrops, the first King thereof; governed by him and his posterity with no lower title, for 400 years, as is apparent by this following Catalogue of

The KINGS of ATHENS.

A.M.

2394. 1 Cecrops, who first made Jupiter a God, and ordained Sacrifices to be offered to him, as Pausanias writeth.
2444. 2 Cranæus, ousted of his Kingdom by 2458. 3 Amphictyon, the son of Dædalion, and Uncle to that Amphictyon, who first instituted the supreme Court of the Amphictyones, or Common-Council of all Greece.
2498. 4 Erichthonius, the son of Vulcan.
2513. 5 Pandion, the Father of Progne and Philomela, so famous in the old Poets, of whom more hereafter.
2593. 6 Erichtheus, whose daughter Orithya was ravished by Boreas King of Thrace.
2603. 7 Cecrops II. brother of Erichtheus.
2643. 8 Pandion II. son of Erichtheus.
2668. 9 Ægeus, son of Pandion the second, of whom the Ægean Sea took name.
2706. 10 Theseus, the son of Ægeus, and Companion of Hercules, vanquished the Minotaur in Crete, collected the people of Attica into a body, and incorporated them into the City of Athens, which he had beautified and enlarged.
2746. 11 Mnestheus, the son of Peteus, Grandchild of Erichtheus, served with the other Greek Princes at the war of Troy.
2769. 12 Demophoon, the son of Theseus, restored unto his Fathers throne on the death of Mnestheus.
2802. 13 Oxyntes, son or brother of Demophoon.
2814. 14 Aphydas, son of Oxyntes, slain by his brother.
2815. 15 Thymades, the last of the line of Erichtheus.
2823. 16 Melanthius of Massene, driven out of his own Kingdom by the Heraclids, obtained that of Athens.
2860. 17 Codrus, the son of Melanthius, the last King of Athens; who in the wars against the Peloponnesians, having Intelligence by an Oracle, that his Enemies should have the victory, if they did not kill the Athenian King, attired himself like a common Begger, entered the Peloponnesian Camp, and there played such pranks, that at the last they were fain to kill him. Which when the Enemy understood, they thought themselves by this means deprived of all hopes of success, and so broke up their Army, and departed homewards. For this the people of Athens did so honour his memory, that they thought no man worthy to succeed, as King; and therefore committed the managing of the Estate to Governours for term of life, whom they called Archontes: the first Archon being Me-

2938	3	Archippus, the son of Acastus.	3106	9	Ariston, the son of Phereclus.
2957	4	Thersippus, the son of Archippus.	3126	10	Thestius, in whose time began the Kingdom of Macedonia.
2998	5	Phorbas, the son of Thersippus.	3153	11	Agamestor.
3029	6	Megacles, the son of Phorbas.	3173	12	Æschylus, the son of Agamestor. After whose death, Anno mdc. 3195, the Athenians weary of these Governours for term of life, as being less obnoxious to the check and censure of the people, chose themselves Officers or Archontes for ten years only: at the end of which time they were to yield up their places, and make room for others. But being a people greedy of Novelties, and desirous of change, they had only seven of those Decennial Archontes: their Officers from that time forwards being chosen annually: which Officers being nine in number, we may call most properly the Provosts, the Chief Bishop, the Marshals, and the six Chief Justices, all chosen out of the Nobility. And so it held for the space of 170 years, till the time of Solon, who was the first which put the Supreme authority into the hands of the People; and gave the first hint unto that Democracie, which afterwards prevailed in Athens, by the help of Pericles. Who being one of the great Council of the Areopagites, took from them a great part of their power in deciding Controversies and sutes in Law, putting them over to the judgement of the common People. A Government so dearly loved by the Athenians, that in all the Cities which they conquered or restored to liberty, or won to their party from the Spartans, they caused it to be admitted: as on the other side the Spartans introduced and confirmed the Aristocracie (their own loved Government) in all the places where they prospered. As for the Court of the Areopagites of much fame in Athens, it consisted from the first beginning in Æschylus, of such as had born some of the nine chief Officers; who being once admitted, held for term of life. First instituted in the time of Demophoon, the son of Thestius, and called by the name of Areopagites, either for that they held their Court in the street of Mars, in Agora, mentioned Æt. 17. 22. or because Mars being accused for a Murder, did first plead before them. A Court which held in estimation under all these changes, and so continued till the time of the Roman Empire.

But to return again to the story of Athens; in or about the later end of the life of Solon, Pisistratus altered the Free State, and made himself the absolute Master of the City: but he once dead, the People regained their liberty, driving thence Hippias the son of Pisistratus; who hereupon fled for succour to Darius the Persian Monarch, occasioning by that means the first coming of the Persians into Greece. What success the Persians had in Greece, the Histories of those times abundantly inform us: Darius being vanquished by Miltiades, at Marathon; and Xerxes by Themistocles, at Salamis. Yet did not Athens scape so clear, but that it was taken by Xerxes, though indeed first abandoned, and voluntarily dismantled by the Athenians. When the Persians were retired homewards, the people of Athens re-edified their Town, and strongly fortified it with high and defensible walls: which done, they put their Fleet to Sea, and spoiled the coasts of Persia in all quarters; enriching their City with the spoils, and enlarging their power and Dominion by the addition of many Islands and Sea-Towns. Hereby they grew unto that wealth and potency, that they were suspected by their weaker neighbours, and envied by their stronger, the Lacedemonians especially: who fearing to lose their ancient priority over Greece, but pretending the surprisal of Patideia a City of Thrace, from the Corinthians, and some hard measure, by them shewed upon the Megarenses; made warre upon them. In the beginning of this warre, the Athenians not only resisted the whole power of all Greece; confederate against them; but so exceedingly prospered, that the Spartans sued for peace, and could not get it. But the scales of fortune turned. For after they had held out 28 years, they were compelled to pluck down the Walls of their City, and submit themselves to the will and pleasure of the Spartans, now by the puissance and good fortune of Lysander, become their Masters: by whom the Government was changed, and an Aristocracie, (or rather Oligarchie) established under 30 Magistrates; known commonly by the name of the 30 Tyrants; expelled not long after by the valour of Thrasybulus, and his associates, as hath been touched upon before. Not long after the end of this warre, which the Historians call Bellum Peloponnesiacum, the Persians seeing how the Spartans, not having now the State of Athens to oppose them, began to work upon their Empire: furnished Conon a Noble Athenian Gentleman with a Navy so well provided, that they overcame the Lacedemonians in a fight at Sez; and thereby put his Countrymen into so good heart, that they made a party in the warre called Bellum Sacrum: composed at the last by Philip of Macedon: who brought not only the Thebans whom he came to aid, but the Athenians, Spartans, and the rest of the adverse party, under his command. A servitude from which they were never freed, till as well Macedon, as the rest became fellow-servants unto Rome. But though this brave City had then lost her power in point of Arms, yet she still kept her credit as an University in point of Arts; Origen, Chrysostom, Basil, and Gregory Nyssen, men of renown and eminence in the Primitive times, are said to have studied at Athens: the like affirmed of Pope

Pope Joane, if the Tale be true, for the middle ages. And so it held, as I conjecture, though not so eminently as before, till the year 1440. when taken by Mahomet the Great, who wondred much (as my Author telleth) at the extreme beauty of the Castle, and the strength of the walls, not having lost in so long time, their former excellencies. Since that it is sensibly decayed, and is now an ordinary Burrough (by the Turks called Sellin) but still preserved the Reputation of an Episcopal See, the Bishop of it holding up the title of Atheniensis.

2. MEGARIS is bounded on the East, with Attica; on the West, with the Bay of Corinth; on the North, with Boeotia; and on the South, with the Isthmus, and the Gulf di Engia; So called from Megaris, the chief City.

This the least Province of all Greece, and nor very fruitful; the Countrey for the most part being hard and rocky. Not beautified with many Cities; the principal of those which were 1 Pege, or Pægi, situate on the Bay of Corinth, and spoken of both by Pliny and Ptolomy; but not otherwise memorable. 2 Megaris, (now Megara) first built by Megareus, the son of Apollo; and from him thus named. Remarkable in former times for a Sect of Philosophers, called from hence Secta Megarica, founded by one Euclide a Disciple of Socrates; of whom see Laertius. More memorable in the Poets for Nisus, once the King of this little Territory: on whose head there is said to have grown a Purple Hair, on which the preservation of his life and Kingdom did depend. Which Jewel his daughter Scylla is said to have delivered unto King Minos her Fathers Enemy; on whom then besieging this City, upon the sight of him from an high Turret, she became enamoured. But he rejecting her, and her Present both, after the taking of the City returned into Crete: which the unhappy woman seeing, threw her self after him into the Sea, and was turned into the Bird called Ciris. I leave the moralizing of the Fable unto the Mythologists: observing only by the way, the antiquity of that politick practice, to love the Treason and hate the Traitor. But the glorie of this City did not end with Nisus. For shaking off the Cretan yoke, it became sui juris once again: and being conveniently seated on the very Isthmus, amounted to that height of prosperity, that they contended with the Athenians for the Island of Salamis. And in this war they so crushed the power and spirit of Athens by one fatal overthrow, that the Athenians to prevent all the like disasters, did ordain by Law, that whosoever mentioned the recovery of Salamis, was to lose his life: so that Solon was compelled to feign himself frantick, the better to propound the enterprise. In which, although the State of Athens got the Isle of Salamis: yet did the Megarenses continue a Free-people, till brought under (with the rest) by the Macedonians, and with them made subject unto Rome.

3. BOEOTIA is bounded on the South, with Megaris, and the Bay of Corinth; on the North, with the River Cephissus; on the East, with Attica, and a branch of the Ægean Sea; and on the West, with Phocis. Thus named from Bœ, which in Greek signifieth an Oxe: because when Cadmus weary of seeking his sister Europa (whom Jupiter had stolen out of Phœnicia) came to the Oracle at Delphos; he was commanded to follow the first Oxe he saw, and where the Oxe did rest it self, there to build a City.

In the Countrey nothing singular, but an antient custom of burning before the door of an house in which a new married wife was designed to dwell, the Axle-tree of the Coach which brought her thither: giving her by that Ceremony to understand (as Plutarch telleth us in his Morals) that she must frame her self to live and abide with him, without hope of departure. In this Countrey also are the Sights of the Mountain Oeta, from the neighbouring Baths called Thermopylae, not above 2½ foot in breadth: which in the war that Xerxes made against the Greeks, were valiantly defended by Leonidas King of Sparta, with no more than 300 of his men, who having valiantly resisted that Army which in its passage out of Persia had drank Rivers dry, and slain at least 30000 of them; dyed every man upon the place. To hide the greatness of which loss, lest it should terrifie the rest of his Army which were coming on, Xerxes commanded all the slain men to be buried in several pits, except a thousand; as if no more than they had been lost in that passage.

Places of most observation in it: 1 Thespiæ, on a River of the same name, at the fall whereof into the Bay it is pleasantly seated: shadowed on the North with a branch on the Mountain Helicon; and consecrated as that was, unto the Muses, hence called Thespiades in the Poets. 2 Plateæ, nigh to which, Mardonius General to the Persians, was overcome by the Greeks; with the loss of Mardonius himself and 16000 men on the Persian side; and on the other no more than 31 Spartans, 16 Aradians, 32 Athenians, and about 600 of the Megarenses. In memory of which brave exploit, and to preserve the names and honour of those Worthies, who there laid down their lives for the liberty of Greece, there was a festival kept annually by the Plateans in the month of September; with solemn Sacrifices, and a kind of divine acknowledgment unto the deceased; continued from the time of Aristides the Athenian who first ordained them, to the dayes of Plutarch, who records it; but how long after I am not able to say. In this great fight the Commander in chief was a noble Spartan called Paminius, who afterwards having a design to make himself Sovereign of all Greece, and being discovered in the practice, fled for sanctuary to the Temple of Pallas. From whence because it was counted sacrilege to constrain him by violence, it was unanimously resolved to wall up the entrances; his own Mother laying the first stone. It is recorded, that before the fighting of this battle, the Athenians had been told by the Oracle that they should be Conquerours if they fought upon their own ground: whereupon the Plateans within whose Territories the Persians had prepared to fight, bestowed that field on the State of Athens. In requital of which noble act, Alexander the Great re-edified and enlarged their City; having been first burnt, and sacked, by the Persians; and after levelled with the ground by the Lacedaemonians, because confederate with Athens in the war against them. 3 Leuctra, remarkable for the great overthrow, which the Thebans, under the conduct of Epaminondas, gave unto the Spartans, and their King Cleombrotus there slain: by which victory they did not only preserve their own liberty, but brought their enemies to that fall of courage and reputation, that they could never rise again: the divine vengeance overtaking them in that very place, where some of their Nation had deflowered the daughters of Schedaeus, who had given them courteous entertainment. For which, when no reparation could be had from the State of Sparta, the unfortunate Damocles slew themselves, to avoid the infamy of consenting to their own dishonour, and were buried in those very fields where this battle was fought. 4 Ascræa, the birth-place of Hesiod, a man (according to Paterculus) elegantia ingenii, & carminum dulcedine memorabilis: though it hath pleased that proud Critick Julius Scaliger, intending to deifie Virgil, to prefer the worst verse in the Georgicks of the one, before the whole works of the other. 5 Lebadia, near the Cephissus, the River Inhabitants whereof were counted the most superstitious of all the Grecians: memorable for the Den or Cave of Trophonia, and the Oracle there given by Jupiter, hence called Trophonius: Into which Cavern none were permitted to enter and receive the Oracle, but after many ointings, washings, and the like superstitious preparations, too long and many to be specified in this place and time. A Town which still preserves so much of its ancient estimation, that from hence (as I conjecture) the whole Countrey of Achaia hath the name of Lebadia; by which the Turks call it at this present. 6 Cberona, or Ceronea, the birth-place of Plutarch. Near unto which was fought that memorable battle, betwixt L. Sylla and the Romans, against Archelaus, one of the Lieutenants of Mithridates King of Pontus, leading an Army of 120000 souldiers; of which 10000 only escaped with life, the Romans losing but 14. 7 Orchomenon, no less memorable for another victory, obtained by the same L. Sylla, against Dorilaus another of that Kings Commanders, having an Army of 80000 men, of which 20000 lost their lives that day. After which victories, when Sylla might easily have destroyed that King, he suddenly patched a peace up with him, that he might hasten unto Rome, where Marius and Cinna had trodden his faction under foot; preferring by that act the pursuit of his own private quarrels, before that of his Countrey; endangered more by Mithridates after his return, than it had been formerly. 8 Anolis, a Port-Town on the shores of the Aegean Sea, where the Grecians took shipping when they went to the war of Troy; here making Oath never to give over the enterprize, until they had destroyed that City. Concerning which, thus the in Virgil:

Non ego cum Danais Trojanam excindere Gentem
Anolis juravi.

That is to say:

I took no Oath at Anolis to destroy,
As did the Greeks, the Town and State of Troy.

But the chief City of this Countrey, and such as had a special influence over all the rest, was the City of Thebes, situate on the banks of the River Cephissus, where built by Cadmus the Phoenician after all his wanderings. Famous in old times for the wars between Eteocles and Polynices, the sons of the unfortunate Prince Oedipus, and of his Mother and Wife Jocasta. The history of which war is the most ancient piece of story, that we find of all Greece; the former times and writings containing nothing but fables, little favouring of humanity, and less of truth; as of men changed into Monsters, the adulteries of the Gods, and the like. In this town lived Pelopidas and Epaminondas, who so crushed the Lacedaemonians at the battle of Leuctra and Mantinea, that they could never after re-obtain their former puissance. This Common-wealth long flourished, and at last being over-burdened in the Phocian war, was glad to submit itself to the protection of the Macedonians, under the leading of King Philip: who by this means first got footing into Greece, into which afterwards he thrust his whole body. Upon the death of Philip, Thebes revolted from the Macedons; but Alexander his successor quickly recovered it: and to dishearten the Greeks in the like attempts, he razed the City, selling all the inhabitants of age and strength; only Pindarus house he commanded to be left standing, in honour of that learned Poet. At this sack of the Town, one of the Macedon souldiers entered the house of a principal woman, named Timoclea, ravished her, and rifled her coffers; but still demanding more treasure, she shewed him a deep Well, saying, that there all her money was hidden. The credulous villain stooping down to behold his prey, she tumbled him into the Well, and overwhelmed him with stones; for which noble act, the generous Prince not only dismissed her unhurt, but most highly commended her. It was after re-edified by Cassander, and followed for the most part, as the rest of the Boeotians did, the fortunes of Macedon. Reduced at this time to the State of an ordinary Burrough, and called Scibes by the Turks.

4. PHOCIA is bounded on the East, with Boeotia; on the West, with Doris, and Locria; on the North, with the River Cephissus; and on the South, with the Bay of Corinth. A Countrey somewhat swelled with Mountains, but those of eminent note in the elder times. The chief whereof 1 Hellon, 2 Citheron; both consecrated to the Muses, and both contending with Parnassus for height and bigness. 3 Parnassus, of so great an height, that in that great deluge, in which most of these parts of Greece were over-overwhelmed with the waters, Dencalion and Pyrrha saved themselves, and many others, on the top Pentia and hereof: for which and for its two summits reaching to the clouds; of great renown amongst the Poets; Phocis as in Ovid thus:

Mons ibi verticibus petit ardua astra duobus,
Nominis Parnassus; superatque cacumine nubes.

Parnassus there with his two tops extends
To the toucht stars, and all the clouds transcends.

Places of most observation in it, are 1 Anticyra, situate near the Sea, and famous for the Helleborum there growing, an herb very medicinal for the Phrenzie; whence the Proverb, Naviget Anticyras, applied to mad men. 2 Pytho, or Pythia, said to be seated not only in the middle of Greece, but of all the world: Strabo relating how Jupiter desirous to know the exact middle of the earth, let loose two Eagles, one from the East, and the other from the West, which flying with an equal wing (so we must conceive) and meeting at this very place, shewed it apparently to be the Navel of the World. By reason of which convenient situation in the heart of Greece, it was made a Sessions-Town for all the Grecians, and honoured with the Court and general Assembly of the Amphictyons; men chosen out of the prime Cities of Greece who had power to decide all Controversies, and to make Laws for the common good. A Court first instituted by Acrisius, as Strabo telleth us; or as Halicarnassens more probably, by Amphictyon the son of Helles, from whom they seem to have their name. The Commissioners from the several Cities, with reference to the places for which they served, had the name of Pylogae; when assembled, they were called the Amphictyons: their meetings at the beginning of the Spring, and Autumn. Some instances concerning their authority will not be amiss. In the time of Cimon, the Cyrrhenians having by Piracy wronged the Thessalians, were fined by this Council. And after that the Lacedaemonians for surprizing Cadmea; and the Phocians for ploughing up the Land of Cyrrha, which belonged to the Temple of Delphos, were by them amerced: and because they continued obstinate, and paid not their ameracements, their Dominions were adjudged to be confiscate unto that Temple. But they disobeying this Decree also, spoiled the Temple itself: for which, war being proclaimed against them by the rest of the Grecians, who by the assistance of Philip King of Macedon, brought them to obedience, the Council was again assembled. In which it was decreed that the Phocians should raze the walls of their Cities; that they should pay the yearly tribute of 60 Talents, that they should no more keep Horse and Arms, till they had satisfied the Treasury of the Temple; nor any longer have a voice in those Conventions. It was also then enacted, that the lost suffrages of the Phocians, should be vested in King Philip, and his successors, Kings of Macedon; on whom they also did confer the perpetual Preldentship, and made them Princes of that Senate. A Court to which the Sanhedrin of the 70 Elders, among the Jews; and in our times, the Dices of the Empire, and the Assemblies of the Switzers, carry most resemblance. 3 Cyrrha, on the Sea-side, the Port town to Delphos. 4 Crisse, so called from Crisseus the son of Phocus, and grandchild of Aeneas, situate on the edge of the Bay of Corinth; called sometimes from hence Crisseus Sinus. 5 Scorpius, memorable for the defeat of Critolams Captain of the Achaean Army, by Metellus one of the Roman Praetors: the loss of which battle drew after it the destruction of Corinth. It was observed in the success of this great fight, that a band of Arcadians escaping out of the battle came unto 6 Elatea, another City of this Province, and were there kindly entertained, on memory of some former alliances, till news came of the overthrow of Critolams: when ordered by the State of Phocis to relinquish the Town, (for adversity seldom meeteth with returns of friendship) they were set upon, and all slain by the Romans, in the self-same place, in which their Ancestors had unworthily forsaken the rest of the Grecians in their warre against Philip King of Macedon, for the publick Liberty. 7 Daulis, a City appertaining to Terens King of Thrace, who having married Progne the daughter of Pandion King of Athens, ravished her sister Philemela, and cut out her tongue, the better to keep his villany undiscovered. But Progne being made acquainted with the double injury, first made him ignorantly eat his own son Itys, whom she had baked in a Pye; and after killed him, with the help of her ravished sister. 8 Delphos, renowned in old times for the famous Temple of Apollo, in which with that of Jupiter Haemon in Marmarica, (now reckoned as a part of Egypt) were the most famous Oracles of the ancient Gentiles: dark Riddles of the Devil, couched and contrived with so much cunning, that the meaning of them was most hidden, when it was thought most easie to be discerned. Instance of which that given to Craesus in the war by him projected against the Persians, which was thus delivered;

Craesus Halyn penetrans magnam subvertet opum vim.

When Craesus over Halys goes,
A mighty Nation he o'rethrows.

Which he interpreting according to his own hopes, crossed the River; was vanquished by Cyrus King of Persia, and his Kingdom conquered. The like we find of Pyrrhus King of Epirus, who before he made war against the Romans, consulted with the Oracle, and received this answer;

Aio te Eacida Romanos vincere posse.

Locris.

Which doubtful prediction he thus contrived; Te posse vincere Romanos, that he should overcome the Romans; but found it unto his cost that the meaning was, Romanos posse vincere te, that the Romans should overcome him; as indeed it happened. By another kinde of the same fallacy which the Logicians call Amphibolia, did this great enemy of mankind overthrow another: who demanding of the Oracle what success he should have in an expedition which he was in hand with, received his answer in these words:

Ibis redibis nunquam per bella peribis.

Which he thus pointing, Ibis, redibis, nunquam per, &c. engaged himself in the war, and was therein slain. Whereupon his followers canvassing the Oracle, found the meaning of it to be this, Ibis, redibis nunquam, per &c. The like juggling he also used in those supernatural Dreams, which Philosophers call Suipnomancy. For Cæsar dreaming that he carnally knew his own mother, the night before he passed over the Rubicon, became Lord of Rome, the common mother of the Romans: and Hippias the son of Pisistratus the Tyrant of Athens, having upon the same projects the same dream, was killed and buried in the bowels of his mother the earth: so that had Cæsar miscarried in his action, and Hippias thrived; yet still had the Devil been reputed his crafts-master, and the father of truths. But as the Ecclesiastical History telleth us, that Julian the Apostata consulting with the Devil, was told that he could receive no answer, because that the body of Babylas the Martyr was entombed nigh his Altar: so neither could the Devils deceive the world as formerly they had done, after Christ the Truth it self was manifested in the flesh, and tormented these unclean spirits, though as they alleged, before their time. Augustus, as Suidas telleth us, in whose time our Saviour was born, consulting with the Oracle about his successor, received this not satisfying answer:

Πᾶς ἑβραῖς κἀλαῖς καὶ θεοῖς μακάρεσσιν ἀνέσταιν
Τὸν δὲ θεῶν ἀνδραγαθὸν καὶ ἀνδρῶν ἀνδρῶν ἰσχυρῶν.
Αἰσίων ἀμὲν οὐρανὸν καὶ βασιλὴν ἡμῶν.

An Hebrew child, whom the blest Gods adore,
Hath bid me leave these shrines and pack to hell,
So that of Oracles I can no more:
In silence leave our Altar, and farewell.

Whereupon Augustus coming home, in the Capitol erected an Altar, and thereupon in Capital Letters caused this inscription to be engraven, HÆC EST ARA PRIMOGENITI DEI. Now as the Devils had by Christs birth lost much of their wonted vertue, so after his passion they lost it almost altogether. Concerning which Plutarch in a tract of his Morals, called Πᾶς ἑβραῖς ἀνδραγαθὸν καὶ ἀνδρῶν ἀνδρῶν ἰσχυρῶν, why Oracles cease to give answers, telleth us a notable story, which was this. Some company going out of Greece into Italy, were about the Echinades becalmed; when on a sudden there was heard a voice, loudly calling on one Thamus an Egyptian then in the ship. At the two first calls he made no answer, but to the third he replied, saying, Here I am: and the voice again spake unto him, bidding him when he came to the Palodes, to make it known that the great God Pan was dead. When they came unto the Palodes, which are certain shelves and rocks in the Ionian Sea, Thamus standing on the poop of the ship, did as the voice directed him: whereupon was heard a mighty noise of many together, who all seemed to groan and lament with terrible and hideous shriekings. News hereof coming to Tiberius, he caused the learned men in his Empire, to enquire out of their Books who that Pan should be; by whom it was answered, that he was the son of Mercury and Penelope, with ignorance enough, and little satisfaction to the business propounded to them. Such therefore as more narrowly observed the circumstances of this accident, found it to happen at the time when our Saviour suffered on the Cross; who was indeed the true God, Pan, the chief Shepherd and Bishop of our souls, as the Scripture calleth him: and that upon this divulging of his death and passion, the Devils who used to speak in Oracles, did with great grief and lamentation forsake that Office, which had been so gainful to them in seducing mankind. That all Oracles at that instant ceased, I dare not say; though it be certain that about that time they began to fail: it being said by Juvenal, who lived in the reign of Domitian, Delphis Oracula cessant, that the Oracle of Delphos was then silent; the rest decaying sensibly in a short time after.

But to proceed, the Temple of Apollo being spoiled by the Phocians, as before was noted, caused the war betwixt them and the Thebans, called the Holy War: in which the Thebans being likely to have the worst, sent for Philip of Macedon, who made an end of the quarrel by subduing both. The treasure which the Phocians found in the Temple, was reckoned at 60 talents of Gold; but it proved Aurum Tolosanum, and brought a sudden ruine on their State and Nation: Sacrilege being so unpardonable a crime, even amongst the Heathen, that the fault of some few, countenanced by the rest of a people, hath brought destruction on them all. It was afterwards with the like ill fortune ransacked by Brennus and his Gauls, in the wain of the Macedonian Empire; all of them miserably perishing who had any hand in it.

5 LOCRI is bounded on the East, with Phocis, and a branch of the Ægean Sea; on the West, with Ætolia; on the North, with a long ridge of hills which part it from Thessaly; and on the South, with with parts of Achaia, Bæotia, Phocis, the Bay of Corinth, the Straits of Antirrhium, and a part of the Ionian Sea. So that for largeness of extent, and the commodiousness of the Seas, it yeeldeth to no Province in Achaia, though not so fruitful as some others. Divided into the three Nations of the Locri; Ozole, lying towards the South, on both sides of the Straits; so called from some ill smells of the Country; or people; 2ly the Epimenidii, inhabiting the middle parts, so named from Mount Cnemis, not far from Parnassus; and 3ly the Opuntii, so called from Opus their chief City; lying on the North side of the River Cephus, on the Coasts of the Ægean, or Enlæan Seas.

Chief Cities of the whole, 1 Opus, the head City of the Opuntians, situate on the River Asopus, being one of the main branches of Cephus. 2 Cynus, the Port Town to Opus. 3 Thronium, the prime town of the Epimenidii, mentioned by Polybius, Livie, Plutomy. 4 Cnemides, at the foot of Mount Cnemis, whence they had their name. 5 Amphissa, the chief City of the Ozole, situate in the inland parts of it: the people whereof refusing to yield to the sentence of the Amphyctiones, against their confederates the Phocians, were the cause that Philip of Macedon returned into Greece. Against whom grievously insulting the Bæotians, and manifestly aspiring to the command of Greece, the Athenians desperately opposed; not so much with possibility of prevailing, as by the sharp and biting Orations of Demosthenes, made against his proceedings: which being by him called Philippicks, occasioned Tully to call his bitter invectives against M. Antonius, by the same name also. But the success hereof was such; as commonly attendeth a broken fortune: The Athenians being vanquished at Charonea, and Philip declared Captain of Greece against the Persians, obtaining under that title the command he sought. 6 Evantia, as Plutomy; Oeantia, as Pliny and Pansanias call it; opposite to Ægina in Achaia propria. 7 Molythia, by Plutomy placed here; and by others reckoned in Ætolia; not far from whence is the Promontory of Antirrhium, so called because just opposite to that of Rhism in Achaia propria; between which runneth a narrow streight (not so wide as the Hellepont) which openeth into the Bay of Corinth; each Promontory for that cause fortified by Bajazet the 2d. with a very strong Castle, that on this side being gallantly defended by the Turks, when besieged by Doria, Anno 1532. For being forced with great slaughter into a strong Tower, which commanded the Castle, they rather chose to blow it up, together with the ammunition, victuals, and themselves to boot, than that the Fort should come intire into the hands of the Enemy. Some place this Promontory in Ætolia also; but following the authority of Plutomy, I have placed it here. 8 Naupactus, so called from the building of ships there by the Heracleids; situate on the Corinthian Bay near the mouth thereof. Given by the Citizens of Athens to the poor Messenians, when after the end of the third war, the Lacedæmonians, unwilling to have them troublesome neighbours (and they scorning to be quiet slaves) compelled them to seek new habitations. It hath of late been called Lepanto, giving the name of the Gulfe of Lepanto to the Bay of Corinth; by that name subject for a while to the Venetians, and from them taken by the Turks, Anno 1499. Of these Lacians, those of Italy were a branch or Colony, whose Law-giver was Zaleucus, spoken of elsewhere.

6 DORIS is bounded on the East with Phocis; on the West, with Ætolia; on the North, with the hill Oeta, and other Mountains which divide it from Thessaly; and on the South with Ætolia, and part of Locris. The air hereof is very healthy, and the soil sufficiently fruitful if well manured, but now the greatest part lyeth waste for want of tillage. First peopled by the Dores or Dorians, descended from Dorus, the son of Hellen, and grandchild of Democleon; by whom placed in Thessaly; afterwards spreading into this Country, which they left their name to, as their proper dwelling; though many of them following the Heracleids into Peloponnesus, possessed themselves of the greatest part of Laconia also: imprinting on the same their Dialect or form of speech, from them called the Doric.

Chief Cities hereof are 1 Doris, so called in memory of Dorus, the first Progenitor of this people. 2 Erineus, seated at the foot of Parnassus, mentioned by Thucydides, Strabo, Mela, Plutomy, and the rest of the Antients. 3 Bium, as Plutomy; or Boion, as Strabo and Pliny call it. 4 Cytinum, near Parnassus also, in the common impressions of Diodorus Siculus the Historian, falsely called Cynthium: 5 Lilæa, situate not far from the Spring or Fountain of the River Cephus; which rising hereabouts passeth thorow the whole length of Achaia, and falls into the Ægean or Enlæan Sea.

7 ÆTOLIA hath on the East, Locris; on the West, Epirus; on the North, Doris; on the South, the Ionian Sea. Said to be so called from Ætolus, the son of Mars, who being by Salomonus cast out of Elis, fixed himself in this Country.

Here is the Forrest of Calydon, where Meleager and the flower of the Greek Nobility, slew the wild Bore. Here is the River Evenus, over which the Centaure Nessus having carried Dejanira wife of Hercules, and intending to have ravished her, was slain by an Arrow which Hercules on the other side of the River shot at him. Here also is the River of Achelous, of whom the Poets fable many things, as that being rival with Hercules in the love of Dejanira, he encountered him in the shape of a Bull; and that when Hercules had pluck'd off one of his horns, the Nymphs made of it their so much celebrated cornucopia.

The people of this Country were the most turbulent, and unruly people of all Greece, never at peace with their neighbours, and seldom with themselves. The Macedonians could never tame them, by reason of the cragginess of the Country: yet they brought them to such terms, that they were compelled to let the Romans into Greece, who quickly made an end of all.

Principal Towns hereof were 1 Chalcis, situate near the spring-head of Achelous before mentioned.

Achaia.

ned. 2 Arachthus, near the River so called; which arising hereabouts passeth into Epirus, and falleth into the Bay of Ambracia, not far from Nicopolis. 3 Olenus, not far from the Forest of Calydon. 4 Pleurona, giving name to the adjoining Countrey, called hence Pleuronia, the people whereof had the name of Curetes, and in nuda, from their shaving; it being their custom to shave the fore-parts of their heads, and let the hair grow on the hinder parts only; ne hostes eos casuie apprehenderent, because their enemies should not lay hold on them by the fore-tops, and so pull them down. 5 Thyrmus, the Parliament City, or place of general Assembly, for all the States of Ætolia, which meeting was called Panetolinum; chosen for those meetings, in regard of the situation and strength thereof; as situate well-near in the midst of the Countrey, environed with rocky Mountains, of steep and difficult ascent. For that cause made also the receptacle of their wealth, and treasure, in all times of danger; but taken by the last Philip of Macedon, with all the spoil in it, in his war against them. 6 Calydon, near the Forest so called, giving name unto it: the royal seat of Oeneus, father of Meleager; divided into two parts by the River Evenus, which runneth through it, according unto that of Ovid,

*Et Meleagream maculatus sanguine Nessi

That is to say,

*Calydon, Meleagers Town, the flood
Even divides, defil'd with Nessus blood.*

Adjoining hereunto were the Athamanes, whom Pliny makes a people of it, who gave name unto a little Province called Athamania; but such (as little as it was) as gave it the title of a Kingdom to Animander: a Prince whom the Ætolians made special use of in their wars against Philip King of Macedon, the father of Persens, suggesting to him and his children, that they were descended of the house of Alexander the great, and so engaging them in a hope of that Kingdom, to hazard the quiet of their own. The places of most note are, 1 Dium, 2 Athanasium, both took by Philip in that war.

These, as they were the last Actors on the stage of Achaia, so had they the most desperate part in all the tragedy of that Countrey. The affairs whereof, governed successively by that State which was most powerful, were for a long time managed by the Athenians: whose Counsels and conclusions went for law amongst them. But that Estate being broken, if not subverted by the power of Sparta, the Thebans and Bœotians, who came next in play, had the chief command; uniting almost all the rest in delign with them against the Spartans, who now grew terrible to all: Becoming insolent by the course of too much prosperity, and the many great victories which they had against the Spartans; and thereupon quarrelling with the Phocians, they were the cause of Philips coming into Greece; who as he had learned amongst them the use of arms, so made he use thereof at last, and of their dissensions, to unite all the States of Greece under his command: Thebes it self being took and sacked by Alexander, the son of Philip, as before is said. The Macedonians thus prevailing, partly by force, but specially by art and practice, there was no people in Achaia that durst oppose them; till these Ætolians, a restless, and impatient people took the cause in hand. Who thrived so well under Antigonus, and Philip, two of the last Kings of Macedon, that they took from them many Towns, invaded Thessaly, attempted Macedon it self: and when they could not otherwise obtain their purpose, in the destruction of that Kingdom, opened a passage for the Romans to effect it for them. But finding no such favour at the Romans hands as they did expect, they began to murmur, and afterwards to excite Antiochus and the Greeks against them, drawing thereby those forces against themselves, which they had invited into Greece: and were the first people of all the Grecians that were conquered by them; though by the mediation of the Rhodians and some other friends, their Countrey was restored unto them, with the loss only of Cephalenia, Zant, and some other Islands, which the Romans were resolved to keep as the fruits of the war. This was about the 564 year of the building of Rome, Fulvius Nobilior being then Consul, and chief Commander in this war. After which time the several Estates hereof enjoyed so much liberty, as the Romans their new Masters thought fit to give them: till finally made absolutely subject in the time of Vespasian, by whom Achaia was reduced into the form of a Province, Peloponnesus being reckoned as a part thereof. In the division of the Empire by Constantine the Great, the West parts hereof being divided from the rest, was called New Epirus; but both of them made Provinces of the Dioecse of Macedon, under the Præfettus Prætorio for Illyricum; The principal Officer of this part being called the Pro-consul of Achaia: continuing under him and his successors, Emperors of Constantinople, till the destruction of that Empire by the power of the Turks. But so that it remained not always under the command of one sole Officer, the politie of that State being altered, and this Countrey parcelled out into many Governments: especially after the taking of Constantinople by the Latines, or Western Christians. At what time Theodorus Angelus, a noble Grecian, and one of the (then) imperial family, seized on Ætolia, and Epirus, part of which last, and all the first he left to Michael his son: who held them, though with some dispute betwix him and Michael Paleologus, the first Emperour of Constantinople, after the expulsion of the Latines. Charles the last Prince of that family dying without issue, about the year 1430. bequeathed Ætolia to another Charles, the son of his brother; and Acarnania (being that part of Epirus, which the Princes of Ætolia held) to his late sons, Memnon, Tarnus, and Hercules. But many quarrels happening upon this division Amurath, the 2d. having then newly conquered Thessalonica, composed the differences, by taking all unto himself, Anno 1432. There were at that time other Princes of like authority, as of Achens, Phocis, and Bœotia, but the first the chiefest: as honoured not only with title of Dukes of Achens, but the Princes of Achaia also; such being the fortune of that City, as to have the first and last great sway in the affairs of Achaia. For at the translation of the Empire upon the Latines, Godfrey of Troyes, a Frenchman, was made Duke of Achens, and Prince of Achaia, of whom Pandus Emilius speaketh, Anno 1220. which honour afterwards was conferred on Walter di Brenne, a kinsman of John di Brenne, the last King of Jerusalem, Protector of Baldwin the 2d. the last Emperour of the Latines, mentioned by the said Emilius, Anno 1288. And though on the defeat and death of this Walter by the Catalonians then ransacking those parts of Greece, the Title of Duke of Achens was assumed by Frederick Alphonso, the son of Frederick King of Sicily, and by other Princes of that house: yet upon better ground by the heir general of this Walter it was conveyed in marriage to Izauus di Accio, a Noble-man of the Realm of Naples; whose son Walter (commonly called the Duke of Achens) for a time obtained the sovereignty of the State of Florence, Anno 1342. but lost it suddenly again by his too much cruelty. Francis de Acciavol, the last Prince of this house, having been brought up in the Court of Mahomet the Great, as one of his Favourites, surrendered his estate herein, at the perswasion of that Tyrant; in change for the Countrey of Bœotia, and the Dukedom of Thebes: which he so sooner had received, but he was sent by Mahomet to Zogannus his Lieutenant in Morca, by whom at first courteously received, at last cruelly murdered. And so the whole Countrey of Achaia fell into the hands of the Turks Anno 1454. or thereabouts.

3. EPIRUS.

EPIRUS is bounded on the East, with Ætolia, on the West, with the Adriatick; on the North, with Thessaly, Macedon, and some part of Albania; and on the South, with the Ionian Seas. So called from the solidity and firmness of it; the word Epeiros in the Greek tongue, signifying as much as terra firma, or the firm land. But by the Turks at this day it is called Albania, which name they give to all the Lands and Countreys in their possession, lying upon the Adriatick and Ionian Seas.

In this Countrey was born Olympias, Mother of Alexander the Great; and Pyrrhus, who conquered the Realm of Macedon, and was the first foreiner, who made tryal (though to his own loss) of the power and puissance of Rome; accounted by Hannibal, next to Alexander, the second great souldier of the world. Here is also Mount Pindus, sacred to Apollo and the Muses, dividing this Countrey from Thessaly, and therefore common unto both: as also the Acroceraunian hills, so called, because they are so much subject unto Thunder and Lightning; eminent for their height, and much feared by Mariners: who when they see a little cloud rising on the top hereof, are sure of a tempest. Finally here are the famous Rivers Acheron, and Cocytus, which for their black waters, and unfavourable taste, are said to be the Rivers of Hell: from which last the Sacrifices and Solemnities made in honour of Proserpine, whom Pluto ravished and brought hither, had the name of Cocytia. Whence by a Metonymie, these Rivers are taken sometimes for hell it self, as in that of the Poet, Eccetera si nequeo superos, Acheronta movebo.

Since those in Heaven I cannot move,
The powers of Hell I mean to prove.

The soil hereof is very barren, and in many places full of Forests, and thin of people; but towards the Sea reasonably fruitful: plentiful of Oxen, Dogs, and Sheep, of more than ordinary bigness, and yielding the best breed of Horses. The people use a distinct language from the Grecians, though of the Greek tongue not utterly ignorant: and by reason of the barrenness of their own Countrey, become great wanderers, especially in Summer time, when they travel into Thrace, Macedon, and Asia Minor, hiring themselves to work in harvest under the Turks, as also to thresh, winnow and make clean their Corn; and in the Winter time return to their Wives and Children. Able of body, swift of foot, apt to undergo any toyl and labour; having withal good courages, and high projections: which makes such of them as delight not in works of drudgery, to look for action in the wars; and otherwise to rob and spoil the neighbouring Mountains of Albania. Till their subjection to the Turks, much used both by the Kings of Hungary, and the State of Venice, in their several wars; serving on Horse, or Foot; as occasion was: as Mercenary as the Switzers in the Western parts, but not so faithless to the party, by whom entertained.

Antiently it was divided into Chaonia (which was the proper Epirus) lying on the West; and Acarnania, bordering on Ætolia, from which parted by the River Achelous; the middle parts hereof being Amphilochia, Thesprotia, and Aimene: all very populous in times, and so continued till Pandus Emilius, on the conquest of Macedon, overthrew 70 of their Cities. Few of which being since re-edified, and the Countrey for a long time languishing under the Turks, here are not any fair Towns, or well-peopled Cities, at the present to be spoken of, and therefore we must look on such as flourished in the times fore-going. The principal whereof, 1 Dodona, one of the Cities of Chaonia, memorable for the Temple and Oracle of Jupiter, hence called Dodonæis; situate in a fair Grove, the Trees whereof are said to be Vulgar, and to give the Oracle; though others say, it was de-delivered first by a pair of Pigeons; whereof the one afterwards fled to Delphos, the other to the Temple of Jupiter Hammon in Egypt. It was the antientest Oracle of all Greece; and so perhaps was the Town also. Said to be first built by Dodone, the son of Jupiter and Europa: more probably so called from Dodonim, the son of Javan, and Grandchild of Japhet, who first inhabited this Region; the whole Country (Greece I mean) being called Javan from the Father (by which name commonly it occurh in the Hebrew Text,) this Town Dodona from the Son. 2 Cassiope, a Port-Town, with a fair Promontory of the same name adjoining to it. 3 Onchesimus, by Strabo called Orchimus, and by Pliny Echimus, a Port-Town also, now called Santi Quaranta. 4 Panormos or the Sea-side also, retaining still the old name, and but little else. 5 Antigonis, more within the land, founded or repaired by Antigonus a King of Macedon, now called Argiro Castro, as Niger thinketh. 6 Phaniace, once the chief Town hereof; which being sacked by the Illyrians under Tenta their Queen, gave the Romans an occasion of quarrel with them, upon complaint made to them by the Epirots. 7 Pelodes, a Port-Town, the principal in that part which was called Thesprotia; as 8 Taronia, on the River Thyamis, and 9 Sybora, an antient Haven Town (now called Syoita) was in that part hereof which was called Almene. 10 Argos, the chief City of the Amphilochians. This part hereof was first named Molossia, from Molossus, the son of Pyrrhus and Andromache, remarkable for the best breed of Matives, hence called Molossi: and afterward Chaonia, by Helenus the son of Priamus, whom Pyrrhus the son of Achilles, settled in this Country; who having unfortunately slain his brother Chaon, caused it in memory of him to be called Chaonia; Chaoniamus, om-nim Trojano a Chaone dixit, as it is in Virgil. Of these Molossians, Pluto the third son of Saturn was sometimes King, called from the flat and hollow situation of this Country, consisting much of deep valleys, the King of Hell.

Towns of especial note in Acarnania, 1 Anactorium, on the Bay of Ambracia, now called Vanziza. 2 Ambracia, the Regal Seat or Court of Pyrrhus, giving name unto a fair and capacious Bay, now called Golfo di Larta, from Larta an adjoining Town, situate in or near the place where Ambracia stood. Once subject unto Periander, King or Tyrant of Corinth, who being slain by a woman named Lionna, whom he kept as his Concubine, occasioned the Inhabitants from that time forwards, in memory of their deliverance, to worship a Lion. Afterwards being taken from the children of Pyrrhus by the Macedonians, and from them won by the Etolians in the time of their greatness, it was besieged by Fulvius, a Roman Consul, spoken of before. Who seeing that he could not force it, was willing, at the mediation of the Athenians, Rhodians, and other friends of both parties, to conclude a peace; but so that he despoiled this City at his going hence, of much excellent Imagery; carrying away with him unto Rome, the Pictures of the nine Muses, most admirably well done by the hand of Zemus, the rarest Painter of his times. 3 Enthorium, a Roman Colony, by Pliny called Colonia simply; now a small Village called Sutrino. 4 Lencas, situate on the point of a Promontory of the same name also, antiently memorable for the Temple of Apollo: from the top of which Promontory, by leaping into the Sea, such as unfortunately loved were cured of that malady; the first trial of that kind being made by Sappho that famous Poetesse. At that time joyned unto the Land, but since by the violence of the Sea, or the hand of man, made into an Island; according unto that of Ovid,

Leucada continuam veteres habuere Coloni,
Nunc Fræta circumvenit;

That is to say,

Lencas in former times joyn'd to the land,
Environ'd round with waters now doth stand.

It was called Lencas, from the whiteness of the Rock or Promontory, having before the separation or disjunction of it been called Neritos; the chief Town of it varying with the name of the Isle and Promontory: both Town and Island at this time called S. Maure, taken by Bajazet the second, from the State of Venice, and by him given unto the Jews, (who do still inhabit it) at their expulsion out of Spain. 5 Nicopolis, a Colony of the Romans, of great both wealth and beauty in the time of S. Paul, who from hence dated his Epistle to Titus: called in that Postscript, Nicopolis of Macedonia, because Epirus at that time was part of the Province of Macedon; though afterwards a distinct Province of it self. It was first built by Augustus Caesar, on a Promontory opposite unto Actium, on the other side of the Bay: that being the place where his Land-souldiers were incamped before the Naval battle betwixt him and Mark Anthony; and was thus called, either in memory of his victory; or from a poor man and his As, whom he met there the day before. For asking the mans name, he told him that his name was Eutyches, i. e. Fortunate; and that the name of his As was Nicon, i. e. Conquerour; which happy Omen made his souldiers courageous, and hopeful of victory: and he in memory thereof erected here two brazen Images, the one of the As, the other of his Master. It is now a small Village called Prevesa.

6. Actium, on the Sea-shore, nigh unto which Augustus and Antony fought for the Empire of the world. The Navy of the latter consisted of 500 Gallies; the former had 250 only, but those crowned with victory: Antonius shamefully deserting his souldiers to follow after Cleopatra, who on the very first charge fled away for Egypt. The Town now ruined, the Promontory upon which it stood, called Cabo di Figlia.

The

Albania.

The Country was first peopled by Dodonim the son of Javan, or at least by some of his posterity, coming hither from the Isle of Rhodes, whose memory was preserved a long time in the Town of Dodona, by him, or from him so denominated. Afterwards being parted into several Nations; and those Nations united in the common name of Epirots; it became a great and powerful Kingdom: governed by a race of Kings descending from Pyrrhus the son of Achilles, and continuing till the time of Pyrrhus the son of Acæides. A man of such courage and magnanimity, that he did not only recover his own Kingdom, of which Cassander had deprived his Father; but got the Kingdom of Macedon from Cassanders Children: outed of which, he tried his fortunes with the Romans, Anno Mundi 3683. 4.C.471. After his death this Kingdom was shrewdly shaken by the Macedonians, and shortly after subdued by Paulus Emilius, who as we now said, destroyed 70 Cities hereof in one day. For, desirous to satisfie his souldiers after his victory in Macedon, he sent unto the Epirots for ten of the principal men of every City. These he commanded to deliver up all the gold and silver which they had; and to that end, as he gave out, he sent certain companies of souldiers along with them; unto whom he gave secret instructions, that on a day by him appointed, they should fall to sack every one the Town, whereunto they were sent. A barbarous and bloody decree, 70 Cities confederate with the Romans ruined in one day, and no fewer than 150000 Epirots made and sold for slaves. But the chief motive which induced him to fo great a cruelty, was by dispeopling this Country, lying with a long and fair Sea-coast over against Italy, to give the Romans opportunity to land their Armies without any resistance, for the further progress of their Forces into Macedon, Thrace, Mæsia, or where else they pleased. Which ungodly policy was afterwards imitated by William the Conqueror, who laid waste all that part of Hampshire, since called New Forest, and therein 36 Parish Churches, that he might have a safe landing place for his Norman Forces, if the English should at any time endeavour to make head against him. Being made subject to the Romans, it was a while part of the Province of Macedonia; but afterwards when Macedonia was made a Diocese, it became a distinct Province of it self, called by the name of Old Epirus, to difference it from the Province of New Epirus, which lay Eastward of it. At the division of the Empire it belonged to the Constantinopolitans; and so continued, till the taking of Constantinople by the Western Christians: at what time Theodorus Angelus, a Prince of the Imperial family, seised on Etolia and Epirus, as before is said; and sped so well in his designs that he took the strong City of Durazzo from the State of Venice (to whom it fell in the division of that spoil) and cunningly (if not treacherously) intercepted Peter the third Emperor of the Latins, whom, as some say, he caused to be murdered at a banquet. After his death, his whole Estate being divided into two parts, Etolia, with that part hereof which is called Charnia, continued in his house till the time of Charles Prince of Etolia and Epirus spoken of before, after whose death it was subdued by Amurath the second, as before was said. The residue hereof, together with that part of Macedon which is called Albania, fell to the family of the Castriots: the last of which named John (the Father of Scanderbeg) seeing himself unable to resist that Tyrant, who had already swallowed up all his neighbours Princes; submitted his estate unto him, and gave unto him all his sons for hostages. No sooner was the old Prince dead, but Amurath seised on his Estate, murdered his three eldest sons; and caused George the youngest, to be train'd up in the Law of Mahomet: who afterwards escaping out of his power, and recovering all his Fathers countries, assumed also the style or title of Prince of Epirus. After whose death his children not being able to make good their game, lost it to Mahomet the Great; as shall be shewn more fully in the story and description of Albania, which is next to follow.

4 ALBANIA.

ALBANIA is bounded on the East, with Macedonia; on the West, with the Adriatick; on the North, with Sclavonia; on the South, with Epirus. The Country mountainous and barren; watered with few Rivers, and those of no great note amongst the Antients, as 1 Lasis, 2 Apfius, 3 Paniasus, 4 Celidamus; all of them falling into the Adriatick.

It took this name from the Albani, once the Inhabitants of this tract; from whom the chief City hereof was called Albanopolis. Other Towns of most consideration, are 1 Sfeigrade, or Vëstigard (called by some the Holy City) situate in the borders of Epirus, on the top of an hill, where it is fenced about like an Eagles nest: one of the last Towns in all this Country which was taken by Scanderbeg, at his recovery of his birthright and estate herein; but being once taken by him, held good courageously against the Turk, the souldiers neither fainting in their oppositions, nor corrupted by money, till at the last subdued by a superstitition. There was in the Town one only Well, into which a treacherous Christian cast a dead Dog; at the sight of which, being the next day drawn up; the souldiers gave up the Town: being so unreasonably superstitious, that no persuasion, nor the example of the Captain, or the Burgo-masters, could make them drink those (as they thought) defiled waters. 3 Durazzo, a Town of great strength, first called Epidamnus, and afterwards Dyrrhachium. Under the walls of which Town, was the first bickering between the souldiers of Caesar and Pompey, not only to the present loss, but also the utter discomfiture of Caesar, as he himself confessed; if the enemies Captain had known how to have overcome. I must not omit the valour of Scava at this siege, who alone so long resisted Pompeys Army, that he had 220 darts sticking in his shield, and lost one of his eyes; and yet gave not over till Caesar came to his rescue.

Part.

Albania.

*Parq, novum fortuna videt concurrere, bellum
Atque virum—densamq, ferens in pectore sylvam.*

Fortune beholds an unaccustom'd fight,
An Army and a man together fight,
Whose breast a wood of Arrows covered quite.

In the division of the Eastern Empire amongst the Latins, it fell into the power of Venice; taken at last after a long and tedious siege, by Amurath the second, An. 1474. 4. Dibra, in the Hill-Countries, near Epirus: the first Town which submitted to the valiant Scanderbeg, at his revolting from the Turks; supposed to be the Deborus of Ptolemy. 5. Croia, conceived to be the Epicaria of Ptolemy, the chief Town of all this Country, seated amongst inaccessible Mountains, and made impregnable by Art: not got by Scanderbeg, but by wile: who having got into his power the Secretary of the principal Bassa, forced him to write Letters in his Masters name unto the Governour hereof to deliver it unto him; which was done accordingly. Afterwards in vain besieged by Amurath the second, who under the walls hereof gave up his wretched soul to the Devil; and thrice belied by Mahomet his son and successor, before he could again possess it: but taken at the last after Scanderbegs death, as if the Genius or tutelary Deity of the place had departed with him. 6. Petrella, a Town of great strength, seated on the top of an hill (as almost all the Towns of Albania are) about 25 miles from Croia; delivered unto Scanderbeg at his first sitting down before it: as also was 7. Petra Alba, three miles from Petrella, near the borders of Macedon, and situate like the other on the top of a Mountain; the River Emathius running under the bottom of it. 8. Stellusa, fifty miles from Croia, built on the top of an high Hill in the middle of a pleasant and fruitful Valley, with great and spacious plains about it. 9. Dagna or Dayna, a place of great importance in the Hill-Country towards Selavonia; for the possession whereof arose a war betwixt Scanderbeg, and the State of Venice: but the Venetians being worsted at the battle of Drino, relinquished their pretensions to it. 10. Aulon, a Port-town now called Vallona, situate over against Hydruntum, or Otranto in Italy, from which distant about 60 miles. The Town unwall'd, but fortified with a very strong Castle. A Town unfortunately fit for the invasion of Italy, and was accordingly made use of, by Achmetes the chief Bassa under Mahomet the Great, who from hence, passed his Army over into Apulia, took the Town of Otranto, and had not the death of Mahomet, and the combustions thereon following amongst the Turks, altered the design, might have opened them a very fair way for the adding of Rome unto Constantinople. 11. Apollonia, a Town of great note in the time of the Romans. A Sea-Town furnished with a commodious Haven, which they held as their entrance into Greece; to that purpose serving them as commodiously, as Calice did the English in their wars with France.

This Country antiently was a part of Macedon, inhabited by the Talantii, Astrai, and Albani, from which last (but not till these latter times) it had the name of Albania: but whether these Albani, were a Colony of the Albanians of Asia, (though it be very probable) I determine not. When made a Province of the Empire, it contained all Prevalitana, and some part of Macedonia Salutaris; under the Docese of Dacia, in the time of Justinian, but at first of Macedon. Dismembred from the main body of it, when the Latines had subdued Constantinople, it fell unto the Noble family of the Castriots: who though they took unto themselves the title of Kings or Princes of Epirus, (most of which they held) as the Country of more note and eminence; yet was Albania the greatest strength, and Croia the chief City thereof, the seat of their residence: called in that respect by some writers, the Kings of Albania. John Castriot, the Father of Scanderbeg, seeing himself unable to resist the Turks, became their Homager, and delivered four sons for Hosages; whom Amurath the second, in their Fathers life-time, caused to be circumcised, and turn Mahometans: and after his decease murdered the three eldest, and seized upon Croia the chief City, with the rest of the Country. But George, the youngest of those sons, being reserved for better fortunes, was carefully brought up by Amurath, (who somewhat passionately loved him) in the arts of war, was carefully brought up by Amurath, then told him, that he nourished a Serpent in his bosom, which would one day sting him. Amurath, to make trial of his disposition, offered him one time the Crown of Albania: to which he prudently replied, that he preferred the honour of his service before all the Kingdoms of the World; and that he held his hand fitter for a Sword, than his head for a Crown. Satisfied with which answer, the Tyrant preferred him to the place of a Sanjak or Provincial Governor, and gave him some Office of Command in all those Armies, which he set out against the Christians. Escaping out of the battell, wherein Caramben the great Bassa was overthrowen and taken Prisoner by Hunianes; he got the Town of Croia by a piece of wit, as before was said: and in a very short time after, made himself Master of Petrella, Petra Alba, Stellusa, and all the rest of the Country, by the reputation and terror of his first success. Having recovered his inheritance out of the hands of the Turks, he reconciled himself to the Church of Christ: styling himself the Soldier of CHRIST JESUS, from that time forwards. Invaded by a vast Army of Turks, he overcometh Alis Bassa, and kills 20000 of his men. With no more than 20 Horse and 50 foot, he assaulteth Alis Bassa in his Camp; in which 5000 Turks were slain, and 300 taken: with whom encountering not long after in the open field, he slew 10000 of his men, took many prisoners, and Musapha himself for one, whom he ransomed for 25000 Ducats. Falling upon the Host of Amurath, then besieging Croia, he killed Ferisses Bassa, hand to hand in a single combat: and in the time of Mahomet who succeeded Amurath, vanquished Isnac the great Bassa, routed his whole Army, had the the spoil of his Camp, took 20 of his fairest Ensigns, and slew 30000 of his Souldiers. Not to instance in the rest of his noble Actions, it is reported, that in the course of his war against the Turks, he killed no fewer than 3000 of them with his own hands: using a Turkish Scymitar in all his fights, of great weight and bigness. Which when Mahomet on a peace between them had desired to see, and afterwards returned again with this censure of it, that he saw nothing in it more than ordinary: the gallant Prince sent back this answer, that the virtue of the weapon depended on the strength of his Arm, which he could not send him, for that he did reserve it for the death of his Enemies. Finally, having held his Cards against Amurath and Mahomet, two most fortunate Gamesters, for the space of 24 years; he set up his rest at last a winner; dying in peace at Lyssa, then belonging to the State of Venice, Jan. 17. An. 1466, and was there honourably interred. At the taking of which Town by the Turks about nine years after, his body was digged up by them, not in spite, but honor: that man accomplishing himself happy who could get any of his bones, to preserve as a relic; supposing that as long as he had it about him, he should be invincible. But with him died the liberty of his Country also, not long after subdued by the Turks, and made a Province of that Empire, as it still continueth: the name of Albania being by them extended over all Epirus, and so much of Dalmatia also as is under their power.

The Arms of this Kingdome (or rather of the Kings thereof) were Gules, an Eagle Sable.

5. MACEDONIA.

MACEDONIA is bounded on the East, with the Aegean Sea; on the West, with Albania; on the North, with Moesia Superior, and a part of Thrace; and on the South, with Epirus, and Achaia: it was first called Emonia from Mount Hemus, which shattereth up that side hereof which is towards Moesia; after Emathia, from a King of it called Emathus; Macedonia, from Macedo, the Son of Deucalion, and the Father of Caranus, the first King of the line of Alexander; and finally Kisth, the Land of Kethim, whereof see Maccab. c. 1. v. 1. & cap. 8. v. 5. from Kistim the Son of Javan, and Grandchild of Japhet, who was planted here. Antiently of more large extent than it is at the present; extending from the Aegean Sea unto the Adriatick, till the taking of Albania out of it, which hath streighten'd it upon that side, but the rest as formerly.

The Country, taking it together, is very fruitful and pleasant, though on the outward parts thereof begirt with rough mountains and thick forests: in former times much celebrated for its mines of Gold and Silver, but long since exhausted. It contained formerly the Provinces of Emathia, Pieria, Pelagisia, Estiotis, Thyniotis, Thessalia, Mygdonia, Amphaxitis, Paraxia, Edonis, and many others of less note; inhabited by 150 several Nations; now principally divided (besides Albania) into 1. Thessalia. 2. Macedon (specially so called), and 3. Mygdonia, which the Turks call Tamboli.

1. THESSALIE hath on the East, the Aegean Sea; on the West, Albania; on the North, Macedon, and Mygdonia; on the South, Achaia. A sweet and delectable Country, the pleasures and delights whereof inclined the people to be very effeminate, and dissolute in their course of life: in love with luxury and ease, and much like the Persians in behaviour; whose entrance into Greece they did therefore favour. Yet notwithstanding this debauchedness, they were esteemed the best Horsemen of all the Grecians: by their excellent managing of which creature (as if they had been one piece with it, and either lent the Horse their minds, or borrowed his body) they gave occasion unto the fiction of the Centaures; half men, half beasts.

It is now called Comenolitani, and of old was very famous for many things, especially for the Hill Olympus: of so great height, that it seemeth to transcend the clouds: and therefore frequently by the Poets used for Heaven it self. 2ly. For the Hill Othrys, inhabited by the Lapithae, over whom Pirithous was King. 3ly. For the Mountains of Pelion and Ossa, the dwelling places of the Centaures; who intending to ravish Hippodame the Bride of Pirithous, on her wedding day, were slain by Hercules and the Lapithae. 4ly. For the delectable Valley of Tempe, situate betwixt Ossa and Olympus; extending in length six miles, and five in breadth: so beautified with Natures gifts, that it was supposed to be the Garden of the Muses. 5ly. and lastly, for the Dolopes, and Mygdonides (who did here inhabit) over whom Achilles had command at the siege of Troy: these last, by reason that they were a laborious and thrifty people, being fabled by the Poets to have first been Emmetts, transformed into men at the prayers of Aeneas, when he wanted Souldiers.

Nunc quoque habent; parcum genus est, passensq; laborum
Quasique tenax; et quod quaesita reserves.*

The custome they of Emmetts still retain,
A sparing Folk, and unto Labour set;
Strangely addicted to all kind of gain,
And wary Keepers of what ere they get.

Places of most observation in it, 1. Tricca, the Episcopall See of Heliodorus, the Author of that ingenious piece, called the Ethiopic History: which he so prized, that he chose rather to lose his Bishoprick, than consent to the burning of his Book; which a Provincial Synod had adjudged to the Fire. A piece indeed of rare contexture, and neat contrivances, without any touch of loose or lascivious language: honest and chaste affection being the subject of it, not such as old or modern Poets shew us in their Comedies, or other Poems. For here we have no incestuous mixture of Fathers, and daughters; no Pandarism of old Nurses; no unseemly action specified, where heat of blood and opportunity do meet; nor indeed any one passage unworthy of the chastest Ear. 2. Lamia, where the Athenians after the death of Alexander, hoping to recover their freedoms, besieged Antipater, which was the last honourable enterprise, undertaken by that great and renowned City; known in old Histories by the name of Bellum Lamiacum. 3. Larissa, situate on the South of Demetrias, but on the same Bay; memorable for the birth of Achilles, from hence called frequently in the Poets Larissæus Achilles; his birth ascribed by others to the Town of Phthia (from whence the Region called Phthiatis takes the denomination) frequently mentioned in the Poets upon that account; and possibly being neighbouring Cities, the one might be the place of his birth, and the other of his Habitation. 4. Demetrias, situate on the Bay, called Sinus Pelagicus, (now the Gulf of Ammonia) of very great strength by Art and Nature. Which being held by the Macedonians, together with Chalcidæ in the Isle of Eubœa, and the City of Corinth, kept all Greece in awe, and were therefore commonly called the Fastens of Greece: the Grecians never thinking themselves at liberty, till those Towns were dismantled by the Romans. 5. Pharsalia, night to which was fought the great battle betwixt Cæsar and Pompey, for the Sovereignty of the Roman Empire: a battle more famous than bloody; 60000 only of 300000, which were in the field on both sides, being therein slain. A battle before which the Pompilians were in such a miserable security, that some of them contended for the chief Priesthood, which was Cæsar's Office; others disposed of the Consulship, and preferments in the City of Rome: Pompey himself being so wretchedly that he neither considered into what place, it were best to flee, if he lost the day; or by what means he might provide for his own safety, and end the war. As if the war had been made against some ignoble Enemy, and not against that Cæsar, who had taken 1000 Towns, conquered 300 Nations, took prisoners one million of men, and slain as many. 6. Philippi, so named from Philip the Macedonian, the first founder of it; situate in the further part of the same plains of Pharsalia, and famous for as memorable a battle as that before, and of no less consequence: that namely betwixt Augustus and M. Antonius on the one side, against Brutus and Cassius on the other; these later being rather overcome by chance, than valour. For either of them thinking the other vanquished, slew himself in the field: being the two last that ever openly stood out for the common Liberty, and therefore called by Crematius Cordus, Ultimi Romanorum, or the last of the true Roman Spirits. 7. Gomphus, an ancient City bordering on Epirus. 8. Phœ, in which City Alexander the Tyrant reigned, against whom that noble Captain Pelopidas the Theban fighting, was slain in battle: The Tyrant being not long after murdered by his wives brother, and by that means all Thessalie recovering liberty. 9. Pegasa, situate on the Bay called Sinus Pelagicus, which from hence is sometimes named Pegæus, in which the ship called Argo, was said to be built, so famous for the renowned voyage of the Argonauts. The hill Pelion spoken of before, is not far from hence. 10. Pythion, or Pythæum, of great note for the Pythian games, there celebrated in the honour of Apollon, who hereabouts killed the Serpent Python: the Conquerors in which games were crowned at the first only with an Oaken Garland, but afterwards with one of Lawrel. Of which thus the Poet:

*Neve operis famam posses abolere vetustas,
Iustitiam sacros celebri certamine ludos
Pythia de domitis Serpentis nomine dictos, &c.*

Thus made to speak English by G. Sandys:

Then lest the well-deserved memory
Of such an act in future times should die,
He instituted the so famous Games
Of free contention, which he Pythia names.
Who ran, who wrestled best, or rak'd the ground
With swiftest wheels, the Oaken Garland crown'd.

These games, together with the Olympick, Isthmian and Nemean spoken of before, made the four annual meetings amongst the Grecians; renowned for the universal concourse of the noblest spirits. 11. Doliche, which together with Pythium, and 12. Azorium, another City of this tract, standing near together, are called in Livius the Historian by the name of Tripolis. 13. Hypata, the Metropolis of Thessalie, so called by Heliodorus in his Æthiopic History before mentioned, who placeth it near the Bay called Sinus Maliacus, now Golfo di Ziron, and not far from Mount Ossa, bordering on the Province of Doris, upon which Mountain, Hercules being tortured with a poisoned shirt, sent by his innocent wife Dejanira, is said to have burned himself; thence called Hercules Oœtus. Of all which Towns, Lamia, Pegasa, and Demetrias, are in the Region called Phthiatis; Larissa, Doliche, Pythium, and Azorium, in that called Pelagias; Gomphi, and Tricca in Efiosis; the rest in Thessalie properly and specially so named.

This Country at first called Æmonia, afterwards Pelagias, then Pyrrhæa from Pyrrha the wife of Dionælion; & finally Thessalie, from Thessalus one of the Companions of Hercules by Pliny is called Driopis, Efiosis, by Strabo; Pelagias, by Diodorus; and by Homer, Argos: the name of some chief City or particular Province

vince, being figuratively used for the whole. Divided commonly into four parts, 1. Thessalotis, 2. Efiosis, 3. Pelagiotis, and 4. Phthiotis, the name of Thessalie or Thessalotis in the end prevailing; accordingly distributed into several governments, united finally in the person of Philip the Father of Alexander, who partly by force, but specially by art and practice, made himself Master of the whole. Continuing in a mixt condition betwixt free and subject, under the Macedonian Kings of the second Race; it became subject with that Kingdom to the State of Rome: first reckoned as a part of the Province of Macedon, after, a Province of it self, when Macedon was made a Diocese; part of which it was. But from a Province of that Diocese, and a member of the Eastern Empire, it was made a Kingdom: given with that title to Boniface Marquess of Mont-ferrat in exchange for Candia, together with the City of Thessalonica, and some part of Peloponnesus, at the division of that Empire amongst the Latines. Which title he affected, in regard that Reiner, the Brother of Boniface his Grandfather, had formerly been created Prince of Thessalie, by the Emperor Emanuel; whose Daughter Cyri-Maria (or the Lady Mary) he had took to wife. In him as it began, so this title ended; Thessalonica falling to the State of Venice, Thessalie reverting to the Empire when the Greeks recovered it: from whom subdaed, and added to the Turkish Empire in the reign of Amurath the 2d. Anno 1432.

2. MACE DON specially so called, is bounded on the East, with Mygdonia; on the West, with Albania; on the North, with Mount Hæmus; on the South, with Thessalie. The Country, for the most part fruitful, as before was said; but not so fruitful with delights as to make the people wanton or effeminate in their course of life: as being naturally good soldiers, exact observers of military discipline, and inured to hardnesse: which their many signal victories do most clearly evidence, both in Greece and Asia.

The Greeks in the pride of their own wits, reckoned them amongst the barbarous Nations; and yet by a strange kind of contradiction, ascribe unto their country the seats of the Muses. For in this Country was Mount Pimple, with a Fountain of the same name at the Foot thereof; both consecrated to the Muses, from hence called Pimpleides. Here also was the Hill Libetbris, and the Province of Pieria, from hence the Muses had the names of Libetbrides, and Pierides: by this last called more frequently than by any other name what ever, especially by the Greeks themselves. But the birth of Aristotle in this Country doth more convince the Grecians of this foolish arrogance, than all the Muses in the world. A man so admirable in the general course of learning, so universally comprehensive of all Arts and Sciences, that the best-witted Grecian might have been his Scholar, and thought it a great happiness, as King Philip did, that they had any Children to be tutored by him.

The principal Rivers hereof, besides Erigon and Alaicomon, spoken of before; are 1. Axius; now called Vardari, rising out of the hill Scardus, a branch of Mount Æmus; and passing through the whole extent of this Country into Sinus Thermaicus, or the Gulf of Thessalonica, as it is now named: the sweetest River of those parts, and of sweetest waters; but such as maketh all the cattle black which drink of it. 2. Chabris, 3. Echedorus, both rising out of the mid-land Countries, and both falling into the same Bay also. Besides which there are three other fair and capacious Bayes, ascribed to Macedon, though two of them belonging properly to Mygdonia; that is to say, Singeticus, now Golfo di monte Sacro, and Toronicus, now the Gulf or Bay of Aiomama; and the third common unto Thrace also, which is Sinus Strimonicus, now the Bay of Contessa.

Towns of most observation in it, according to the several Regions and parts hereof, were for the Almper, 1. Homia, called afterwards Selencia. 2. Eurpus, of which name there were four in Macedon. 3. Apfalus. Of Syntica, 4. Trifolus. 5. Parocacopolis. 6. Gariscus, 7. Heraclea, for distinction called Heraclea Syntica; there being many others of that name in Greece. In Edonis bordering towards Thrace, 8. Sentusa, 9. Berga, 10. Amphipolis, on the River Strymon, with which encompassed, whence it had the name; feared so close on the edge of Thrace, that it is questionable to which of them it belongs of right; once garrisoned by the Athenians, and from them took by Philip the Macedonian, in the first time of his fortunes. 11. Crenides, bordering on Thrace also, and by some Writers laid unto it, but I think erroneously: repaired and beautified by Philip before mentioned, by whom called Philippi; and situate in a Country so rich in mines of gold, that the said Philip drew thence yearly 8000 talents, which make 600000 French Crowns, or 140000 l. of our English money. Afterwards made a Roman Colony, and accounted the chief City of Macedonia, as appeareth Acts 16. 12. to the people of which S. Paul writ one of his Epistles. Next in Emathia, we have 12. Tyrissa in the mid-lands, bordering upon Thessalie, now called Cerefa. 13. Ædessa, called afterwards Ægeus, and now Vodena; the first town of all this Country taken by Caranus, the founder of the first race of the Kings of Macedon. 14. Beræa on Sinus Thermaicus, honored with the preaching of Paul and Silas; the Citizens whereof are by S. Luke commended for their readiness in receiving the Gospel. 15. Pella, on the same Bay also, the birth-place of Alexander the Great, from hence called Juvenis Pellens. 16. Pynda, upon the same Bay, at the influx of the River Alaicomon, in which Cassander besieged and took Olympias the Mother, Roxane the wife, and Alexander the heir apparent of Alexander, all whom he barbarously murdered. This cruelty he committed, partly to revenge himself of Alexander, who had once knocked his head and the wall together: and partly to cry quit with Olympias, who had before as cruelly murdered Ariadus the base Son of Philip, and Euridice his wife; with whom Cassander was supposed to be over-familiar. Memorable also is this Town for the great battle fought near it, betwixt Perseus the last King of Macedon, and P. Æmilius the Consul, in which Perseus having shamefully defeated his Army, lost both the battle and his Kingdom, with no less than 20000 of his foot which were therein slain; the Romans having to cheap a victory, that it cost them not above an hundred or sixscore men. 17. Diam not far from the hill Olympus, and about a mile from the Sea; of which mile the River Helicon becoming there a Lake, and called Baphirus, taketh up one half. Situate in the borders towards Thessalia, the way unto it out of the Tempe being strait and narrow, and almost impassable, by reason of the spurs of the mountains running overthwart it: which had it been well defended by the Macedonians, would have kept their Country from the Romans, who that way attempted it. But Perses hearing that the Enemy had got into Tempe, only took care to get his creature out of Dium, and so abandoned both the passage, and the Town together. 18 Philace, more within the land; as is 19 Eribea. But these four last are in that part hereof which is called Pieria.

3. MYGDONIA hath on the East, the Aegean Sea; on the West, Macedon, properly and specially so called: on the North, Edonia and Sinus Strimonicus, on the South, Sinus Thermaicus, or the Gulf of Thessalonica. So that it is almost a Peninsula, environed on three sides with water.

Here is in this Country the hill Athos, standing in a Peninsula (the Isthmus being once cut thorow by Xerxes, but since closed again) said to be 70 miles in circuit, 3 daies journey long, half a daies in breadth, resembling the shape of a man lying with his face upwards: the highest point whereof covered perpetually with snow, is said to cast a shadow as far as Lemnos. Exceeding fruitful in grasse, fruit, oil, and wine; and wondrous plentiful in hares, according to that of Ovid;

Quot Lepores in Atho, quot Apes pascuntur in Hybla!

How many Hares in Athos feed,
What swarms of Bees on Hybla breed!

Inhabited only by Greek Monks, whom they call Caloires, of the order of St. Basil, to whom the hill commonly called the Holy Mountain, hath been long since dedicated: the place being so privileged by the Grand Signeur, that neither Turk nor Grecian may inhabit in it, except such Grecians only as profess this life. Of these there are about 6000, dispersed in 42 Monasteries, built after a military manner, for fear of Theeves and Pyrats, wherewith much infested in times past: frequented with great concourse of people coming thither to behold and adore some Reliques (for which they are of much esteem) the free oblations of those Pilgrims, and some benevolence from the Turks, which do much respect them, being the chief means of their subsistence. The manner of their life is like that of the ancient Hermits; poorly clad, their shirts of wollen, which they both spin and weave themselves: none of them idle at any time, doing still somewhat for their livelyhood, and the advancement of the house of which they are, as dressing vines, felling timber, yea and building ships. Few of them giving themselves to study, and some of them of to gross ignorance, that they can neither write nor read: bound by their Order to lodge and entertain such strangers as have occasion to passe that way, according to their rank and calling, and that of free cost too, if it be desired.

Towns of most note, according to the several Regions and parts hereof, are for Mgdonia, specially and properly so called, 1 Antigonis, so called from Antigonus a King of Macedon, the first founder of it. 2 Xilopolis, 3 Terpillus, 4 Phyco, 5 Assorus, all mentioned by Ptolemy, but not else observable. 6 Apollonia, for distinction sake called Apollonia Mgdonia, to difference it from Apollonia in Albania then a part of Macedon: famous for the studies of Augustus Caesar, who here learnt the Greek tongue. For Amphaxitis, there was 7 Arethusa, 8 Stagira, now called Nicalidi renowned for the birth of Aristotle, hence named Stagirites. 9 Thessalonica, situate on the bottom of Sinus Thermaicus, now called the Bay of Salonichi, by the name of the Town. Antiently the Metropolis, or head City of Macedon, the seat of the Præfatus Prætorio for Illyricum, after the removal thereof from Sirmium; as also of the Primate of the Greek Church, who resided here. To the people of this City did St. Paul write two of his Epistles, continuing in great power and credit till the fall of the Constantinopolitan Empire into the hands of the Latines: at which time it was bestowed first on Boniface, Marquis of Montferrat; the new King of Thessalia; after whose death it fell unto the State of Venice, who held it till the year 1432, when forced by Amurath the 2d, to become Turkish. Which notwithstanding it still preserves the reputation of a beautiful and wealthy City, inhabited by rich Merchants, who drive here a great trade, especially for the commodities of the Indies; for beauty, riches, and magnificence, little inferior unto Naples: and though the Turks and Jews make the greatest number of Inhabitants, yet here are reckoned 30 Churches for the use of Christians. As for the Jews, they swarm here in such great abundance, that in this City and that of Constantinople only, there are reckoned 160000 of them; but generally hated and condemned by all sorts of people. 10. Sydenrocaspe, of old called Chrysis; remarkable for its mines of gold and silver; so beneficial to the Turk, that he received hence monthly 18000, and sometimes 20000 crowns de claro. Next for Chalcidice, there was 11. Panormus, a Port Town, 12 Stratonice, in the Peninsula of Mount Athos. 13. Athos, or Athosa, in the same Peninsula, with a Promontory of the same name, nigh which it stood. 14. Acanthus, now called Eryssa, on the Bay of the Holy Mountain. And finally in Paraxia, we have 15. Ampelus, 16. Torone, giving name to the Bay adjoining, called antiently Sinus Toronicus, now Golfo di Asomama. 17 Cassandra, on the Sea-side, so called from Cassander King of Macedon, who repaired and beautified it; being before named Petideia. 18. Derris. 19. Merillus, 20. Pallene, situate in the Chersonese, or Demy Island, called Petalene, and by some Pallia: formerly consecrated to the Muses, but before that infamous for the war which the Giants are fabled to have made here against the Gods; at what time it was called Phlegra, the fields adjoining Campi Phlegrai, in which this great battel is supposed to be fought. The occasion of the Fable was Macedon.

(as both Theagenes and Endoxus do expound the same) that the Inhabitants hereof in those elder times being men of a moit impious and insolent life, got the name of Giants, whom which Hercules endeavored to subdue, and reduce to reason; it happened that there fell a great tempest of thunder and lightning, by which they were constrained to flee and submit themselves. Hence the report that those Giants made war against the Gods. Others have placed these Phlegraean fields in Thessalia, and perhaps more probably. Certain I am that some place nearer to the hills of Pelion, Ossa, and Olympus, doth agree best with it: if at least Ovid were not out in his narration, who makes those Mountains to be heaped upon one another, for their better reaching to the skies, and fighting upon even ground, as the saying is. For thus that Poet:

*Afflatus ferunt regnum caeleste Gigantes,
Atque congestos struxisse ad sidera Montes.
At pater omnipotens misso perfregit Olympum Fulmine, & excussit subiectum Pelion Ossæ.*

Which may be Englished in these words;

The Giants once the Throne of heaven affected,
And hills on hills unto the Stars erected:
Till Jove with thunder high Olympus brake,
And Pelion did from under Ossa take.

But from those Fables to proceed to more real stories: this Country was first peopled by Cittim, the son of Javan, passing over out of Asia Minor; in memory whereof here was not only a Town called Cittim, spoken of by Livie l. 42. but the whole land of Macedon is in the book of Maccabees called the land of Keitim, Maccab. 1. v. 1. and the inhabitants hereof called Cittims, in the 8 chapter of the same book, v. 5. (spreading in tract of time from one Sea to the other, from the Aegean to the Adriatick, some Colonies of them passed from hence to Italy, and first inhabited that Country, as hath been said. Such as continued in these parts, divided into several tribes, as in all parts else, became in time to be united in the name of Macedons: a people not much taken notice of in the former times, living a poor and painful life, Goatherds and Shepherds for the most part, scarce able to defend their own Mountains from the next invader; much less to dream of conquering either Greece or Persia: And therefore Alexander told them, and not much untruly, (though by him spoke in passion, and to their disgrace) that his father Philip had first made them Gentlemen. For Philip having learned the Rumours of war under Epaminondas, (being then an Hostage with the Thebans) and by that means acquainted with the temper and state of Greece: not only freed his own kingdom from the Illyrians, Thracians, and other barbarous Nations, who had gained upon it; but taking advantage of the factions raised amongst the Grecians, (which he knew how to feed and cherish for his own improvement) brought them at first wholly to rely upon him, and after to be subject to him. Inasmuch that never any Monarchy had a swifter growth, nor a more speedy dissolution: there passing not full 40 years from the first of Philip to the last of Alexander; in which space it was both begun, perfected, and broke to pieces. For the foundation being laid in murders, perjury, and treason, as at first it was; was never likely to be blessed with a long continuance.

3386 8 Alceas 29	3568 16 Amintas II. 6.	24 Aridans 6.

Of these 24 Kings, only 6 are famous viz. Caranus, the first King, originally of Argos, of the race of Hercules; and by an Oracle commanded to lead a Colony into this Country, and to follow the first flock of Cattel he saw before him. Being here arrived in a tempestuous stormy day, he espied a herd of Goats flying the fury of the weather. These Goats he followed unto Edeffa, into which by reason of the darkness of the air he entered undiscovers, won the Town, and in short space became Lord of all the Country, on which occasion as the Goat afterwards became the Arms and Ensign of the Kings of Macedon, so by that beast those Kings were figuratively designed in the holy Scripture, of which see Dan. cap. 8. v. 5, 21. 2. Perdiccas the fourth King, who at Egea, built a burial place for all his successors: assuring the people that as long as their Kings were there buried, his race should never fail; and so it happened. For the Kingdom of Macedon, after the death of Alexander the great, who was buried at Babylon, was translated to the sons of Demetrius. 3. Europus, who in his infancy was carried in a cradle against the Illyrians his Enemies, and returned victorious. This the Macedons did, either because they thought they could not be beaten, their King being present: or perwaded themselves that there was none so void of honour and compassion, as to abandon an infant, no way able to save himself from destruction, but by the valour and fidelity of his servants. 4. Alexander, the son of Amintas, famous for a notable exploit on the Persian Embassadors; who being sent from Megabizus, requested a view of the Macedonian Ladies. No sooner were they entered, but peculanisms on Persis contrabantibus, as Justine relateth the story, they were called back by this Alexander, sending in their steads young springalls maidenly attired; who upon the like indignities offered, slew these effeminate Asians. After which he behaved himself so discreetly, that the Persian Monarch gave him all Greece, between Hemus and Olympus. 5 Philip father to Alexander, who governed first as a Guardian to Amynas, the son of Perdiccas his elder brother; but afterwards took unto himself both the kingdom and title of King: which he continued in the deposition of his Nephew and natural Sovereign, the murder of the rest of his brethren, and the destruction of all such as opposed his practice. But being otherwise a man of approved abilities, he cleared his own Country of the Illyrians; subdued Achaia, Thrace, and a great part of Peloponnesus, and was chosen General of the Greeks against the Persians. But as soon as he had made all things ready for this expedition, he was slain by one Pausanias a young Gentleman, whom he had formerly abused in the heat of his unnatural lusts. 6 Alexander, the son of Philip, who recovered such parts of Greece, as on the death of his Father had befooled themselves with a hope of liberty. He subdued Darius the great King of Persia, Taxiles and Porus Kings of India; founded the Monarchy of the Grecians, and in the height of his successes was poisoned at Babylon (as it is conceived) by Cassander, one of his great Captains, his revenue at the time of his death, amounting to 300000 talents yearly. After his death his new got Empire was much controverted in the point of succession; he himself dying without lawful issue, and having at his death bequeathed it to him, who was thought most worthy by his Army; and the souldiers according to their several affections and relations, thought their own Leaders most deserving. At last the title of King (and in effect nothing but the title) was by consent of the Commanders cast on Aridens, a bastard of Philip, to whom Perdiccas was appointed to be Protector (for Aridens was a little crazed in his brain) and to be general of the Army, by whose design he was also married to Eurydice daughter to Amynas, whom Philip had before disposed of that Kingdom. As for the Provinces, they were assigned unto the government of the chief Commanders; viz. Egypt, to Ptolomy; Syria to Laomedon, Cilicia to Philorus, Media to Pytho, Cappadocia to Enmenes, Pamphylia, Lycia, and Phrygia major to Antigonus, Caria to Cassander, Lidia to Minander, Pontus and Phrygia minor to Leonatus, Assyria to Seleucus, Perlis to Pencestes, Thrace to Lysimachus, and Macedon it self unto Antipater: the other parts of the Persian Empire being left to them, unto whose hands they were committed in the time of Alexander. But this division held not long, for Perdiccas being once slain by Ptolomy, and Enmenes made away by Antigonus; these two became quickly too great for the rest: Ptolomy adding Syria and Cyprus, to the Kingdom of Egypt; and Antigonus bringing under his command not only all Asia minor, but Assyria, Media, and almost all the Eastern parts of the Persian Empire. Antipater in the mean time succeeding in the Protectorship, banished Olympias the mother of Alexander, out of Macedonia, as bearing but a step-dames love unto Aridens. But he being dead, she returned out of Epirus (the place of her banishment) into Macedonia, where raising a strong party amongst the people, she put Aridens and his wife Eurydice to death, proclaiming Alexander, the son of Alexander by Roxane; both slain not long after by Cassander the son of Antipater, who to make sure work, murdered also with the like cruelty Hercules, the son of Alexander by Barsina (another Persian Lady, as Roxane was) the last survivor of that house. And so the royal family being rooted out, Antigonus took unto himself the Title of King: as did Seleucus, who had now recovered all the Persian Provinces, beyond Euphrates: The like did Ptolomy in Egypt, and Cassander in Macedon.

The second Race of the MACEDON KINGS.

A. M.

- 3648 1 Cassander, sonne of Antipater, supposed to have been the poisoner of Alexander, rooted out the blood-royal of Macedon; his reign full of troubles and difficulties, 19.
- 3667 2 Alexander and Antipater, sons to Cassander, but not well agreeing, called unto their aid Lysimachus and Demetrius; by whom they were both in short time murdered, 4.
- 3671 3 Demetrius, son to Antigonus, the powerful King of Asia, after he had in one battel against Seleucus, lost both his father, and all his Asian Dominions; settled himself in Macedon: but being there ousted by Pyrrhus, he fled to Seleucus, and with him dyed, 6.
- 3677 4 Pyrrhus King of Epirus, was by the souldiers, voluntarily forsaking Demetrius, made King of Macedon; but after 7 months, the souldiers revolted to Lysimachus, as being a Macedonian born.
- 3678 5 Lysimachus, King of Thrace, being thus made King of Macedon, was in the end vanquished and slain by Seleucus, the last survivor of Alexanders Captains; 7.
- 3683 6 Ceraunus, or Ptolomis Ceraunus, son to Ptolomy of Egypt, having traiterously slain his friend and Patron Seleucus, seized on Macedon; but lost it, together with his life, unto the Gauls, who then plagued these Countries. After whose death, this Kingdom being distracted amongst many Competitors, settled at last upon
- 3687 7 Antigonus Gonatus, the son of Demetrius, who for his valour shewn in expulging the Gauls.

- was made King of Macedon. And though for a while he gave way to Pyrrhus, then returning from Italy; yet after the death of Pyrrhus he again recovered his estate; but ousted once again by Alexander the son of Pyrrhus, 36.
- 3723 8 Demetrius II. son of Antigonus, recovered Macedon from the power of Alexander, the son of Pyrrhus, 10.
- 3733 9 Antigonus II. surnamed Dodon, left by Demetrius as Protector to his young son Philip, usurped the Kingdom. He divers times vanquished and crushed the Grecians, beginning then to cast off the yoke of Macedon, 12.
- 3745 10 Philip, the son of Demetrius, 42.
- 3787 11 Perses, the son of Philip, the last King of Macedon, the subversion of which estate was first begun in the time of his Father, who had not only warred upon the Aetolians, and others of the Greeks, whom the Romans had taken into their protection; but sided with Hannibal against them. Upon which grounds they sent first Titus Qu. Flaminius, one of their Captains, by whom Philip was vanquished at the battel of Cunus-cephalos, and his Kingdom made tributary unto Rome. After which picking a quarrel against Perses also, managed with variable success by Licinius Marcius, and others of their Commanders; they dispatched Paulus Emilius with an Army into Macedon, to bring him to absolute subjection. Who sped so well, that Macedon was made a Province of the Roman Empire; and Perses led captive unto Rome, Anno 3789. In which triumph, besides the pomp of leading a Captive King in bonds, Emilius caused the ready money which he brought out of Greece, to be carried in 750 Vessels, every Vessel containing 30 Talents: which made so infinite a sum, that the Roman people were free for many years after, from all taxes and impositions. A. M. 3798.
- Macedon* thus made a Province of the Roman Empire, and afterwards divided into three parts or Provinces, that is to say, Macedonia Prima, Macedonia Secunda, or Salutaris, and Prevalitana; in the new model of Constantine became a Dioecese, the Dioecese hereof containing the Provinces of Grete, Achaia, and new Epirus, Macedonia Prima, and the greatest part of Salutaris, the residue of Salutaris and Prevalitana, (which makes up the Country now called Albania) being laid to the Dioecese of Dacia. It continued part of the Eastern Empire, till towards the last fatal dissolution of it; though many times harassed and depopulated by the Scythians, Bulgarians, Rosses, and others of the barbarous people at their several invasions off: finally conquered by the Turks, first under the conduct of Bajazet, their fourth King, taking Nicopolis, a Town hereof bordering on Thrace, and lying North of Sini Strimonius, now the Bay of Consto; and after unto Amurath the second, their sixt King, making themselves masters of Thessalonica, the chief City of it, and therewith of all the Country. By reason of which many invasions and last desolation by the Turks, there is scarce one of all those many Cities before mentioned, now of any eminence; except Thessalonica only: the rest being miserably destroyed. And for the Country it self it is governed by a Turkish Sanziack, under the Beglerbeg of Greece, his annual Revenue being but 8000 Crowns, nor any thing else required of him than to maintain 100 horse in ordinary pay, for defence of his Province; and to find 400 horse on extraordinary occasions at the Grand-Signieur shall command him.

6 TH R A C E.

TH R A C E hath on the East, Pontus Euxinus, Propontia, and Hellespont; on the West Macedon, on the North, the Hill Hemus; on the South the Aegean Sea, and part of Macedon. A very large and goodly Province, extending 20 days journey in length, and 7 days journey in breadth; and in relation unto the heavens, reaching unto the 44 degree of the Northern latitude; so that the longest day in summer is about 15 hours, three quarters.

By several men, according to the times they lived in, it hath been called by divers names; by Strabo, Aria; by Strabo, Odrysa; by Lycophron, Crestona; by some writers, Scythia; by Josephus the Hebrew, Thyras. But generally it is called Thrace, or Thracia, and that as some say from Thras, the son of Mars, as others from Thrace, an Inchantress: more probably from the ferity and barbarous condition of the first Inhabitants; the name in the Original Greek bearing that construction: Most likely from Thyras, the son of Japhet, who first planted here, in memory of whom it did retain the name of Thyras in the time of Josephus, besides many other footsteps and remembrances of him, in the name of many of their Towns, and some of their Princes: of which we have already spoken in our general Preface. Finally, by the Turks it is called Romania, either from the many Roman Colonies which were planted here; or because Constantinople, the chief City of it, was antiently called Nova Roma: and by that name it is now called in most modern Writers.

The Country generally is neither of a rich soil, nor a pleasant air, the corn and other fruits by reason of the coldness of the Climate, leisurely ripening, the Vines yielding more shade than juice, and the trees for the most part more leaves than fruit: yet in some parts there be many large and goodly plains, where they reap good store of corn, but of Pulse especially; and towards the Sea-side they have plenty of wine, which Pliny much commended both for strength and goodness.

The people antiently were very bold and valiant, and called by some Autroques, because every man was a law to himself. So that it was truly said by Herodotus, that it they had either been all of one mind; or under one King, they had been invincible. Of manners they were rude and savage, somewhat near to brutishness; buying their Wives, and selling both their sons and daughters, as in open market: in which, since imitated by the Turks, who possess their Coun-

Country. The men were more courageous than comely, wearing Cloaths according to their conditions, ragged and unseemly. The married women were in love to their Husbands for constant, that they willingly sacrificed themselves at their Funerals. The Virgins were bestowed, not by their own Parents, but the common Fathers of their Cities. Such as brought neither beauty nor virtue for their dowry, were put off according to their monie; most times sold as other Cattel, in the Markets. In matters of Religion, they worshipped Mars, Bacchus, Diana, Mercury, as did other Gentiles: swearing especially by the first, from whom they bragged themselves to have been descended. But their chief national deity, was one Zamolxis, sometimes a native of this Country, who having been brought up under Pythagoras, and returning home, prescribed them good and wholesome Laws; assuring them that if they did observe the same, they should go unto a place when they left this World, in which they should enjoy all manner of pleasure and contentment. By this means having gotten some opinion of a divinity amongst them, he absented himself; after was worshipped as their God. Upon these principles, when any one was born amongst them, his Parents and other friends sitting round about him, lamented bitterly his coming into the World; ripping up all the miseries and afflictions whereto he was to be exposed in this present life, and so deplored his condition as absolutely miserable and unhappy. But on the contrary, when any one chanced to dye; they buried him with all joy and alacrity; highly rejoicing that by this means he was freed from the crosses and disasters of this wretched World. Expressed thus briefly, after his wonted manner, by my Author, Lugentur Puerperia, natiqne deflorant; funera contra fletu sunt, & veluti sacra canis lusque celebrantur. A piece of such sound and Orthodox Divinity, that I wonder how they hit upon it in those times of darkness; and favouring very much of the Primitive piety: by which the Obit of the Saints were kept as Festivals, no notice being taken of the day of their births. According to that of the good old Writer, Non natiuitatem sed mortem Sanctorum Ecclesia pretiosam & festam iudicat.

Here lived the Tyrant Polymnestor, who villainously murdered Polydorus, a younger son of Priamus: for which fact, Heclia the young Princes Mother, scratched him to death. Here also lived the Tyrant Terentus, of whom before in Phocia: and Diomedes, who used to feed his Horses with man's flesh, was slain by Hercules, and cast unto his Horses. And finally, here reigned King Corys, whom I mention not as a Tyrant, but propose as a pattern of rare temper, both in mastering and preventing passion. For when a neighbour Prince had sent him a present of Glasses, of the purest metal, and no lesse accurate in the workmanship or fashion of them: (having dispatched the Messenger with all the due complements of Majesty and gratitude) he broke them all to pieces; lest if by mishap any of his servants should do the like, he might be stirred to an intemperate choler.

Chief mountains in this Country, besides Hemus spoken of already, are 1. Rhodope, the highest next Mount Hemus in those parts of the World; craggy and rough, the top whereof continually white with snow: memorable for the fate and fable of Orpheus, who in a melancholy humour (having lost his Wife) betook himself to these Mountains; where with his Musick he affected both Woods and Beasts, who are said to have danced unto his Musick: from this place of his abode called Rhodopius, from his Country Thracius; Non me carminibus vincet nec Thracius Orpheus, &c. as the Shepherd boasteth in the Poet. The truth is, that he was a man of an heavenly Muse, and by his dictates and good counsel laid down in verse, first of all civilized this people, and weaned them by degrees from their bestiality. Hence the occasion of the Fable. But for Mount Rhodope it self, it is in the midst of this Country, thwarring it from Mount Hemus towards the West: which with the spurs and branches of it, and the plains adjoining, lying betwixt the River Nessus on the West, and Melas or Niger on the East, made up the Province of the Empire called Rhodope, by the name of the Mountain. 2. Pangæus, rich in mines of Silver; 3. Melampus, shooting towards the Sea, full of rocks and cliffs; and 4. Orbelus, lying towards Macedon, where there is a little Region from hence called Orbelia.

Principal Rivers hereof, besides Strymon spoken of before, the boundary in some places betwixt this and Macedon, are 1. Nessus, by the Grecians, now called Messus, by the Turks, Charafon, which rising out of Mount Hemus fallerth into the Sea, near the Isle of Thassus, in which came, the memory of Thyras the son of Japhet, seems to be preserved: which rising in Mount Hemus also loseth it self in the Propontick; as doth, 3. Bathynius, another River rising from the same Mount Hemus. 4. Hebrus, the most noted River of all this Country, rising out of Rhodope, and falling into the Egean near the Isle of Samothrace; a River of so slow a course, that it is not ealie to discern which way it goeth: but memorable in the Poets for the fate of Orpheus, who being torn in pieces by the Thracian women, had his limbs thrown into it by those Furies. 5. Therapus, good against the scab both in Man and Beast, issuing out of 30 Fountains, some hot, some cold; with the pleasantness of whose waters Darius the King of Persia, was so delighted, that he erected a Pillar in honour of it.

The chief Towns 1. Abdera, now called Polyphilo, situate not far from the fall of the River Nessus into the Egean, the birth-place of Democritus, who spent his whole life in laughing at the follies of others. 2. Pecidea, of old a Colonie of Arbens, from whom it revolted, and submitted to the State of Corinth. But the Athenians not enduring the affront, beleaguered it, and after two years siege, and the expence of 2000 Talents, could not recover it again but on composition. 3. Actus, on the Egean Sea, a Town of great strength and safety, and therefore used by the later Constantinopolitan Emperors for the securing of great persons. For hither Michael Palaeologus sent Jacobus the Turkish Sultan, flying to him for aid; and hither Mahomet the Great sent Demetrius Prince of Peloponnesus, when he yielded up his Country to him: both under colour of providing for their their ease and safety, but in plain terms to keep them in honorable Prisons. 3. Lysimachia, on the Sea-shore, once of great importance, built by Lysimachus, who after Alexanders death laid hands on this Country: afterwards garrisoned by Philip the father of Perseus, on the withdrawing of whose Forces for some other service, it was taken and razed to the ground by the barbarous Thracians, and all the people of it carried into captivity, but by Antiochus the Great re-edified, and new peopled again, moved thereunto by the convenient situation and former glories of the place. 5. Philippopolis so called from Philip King of Macedon, the father of Alexander, who built and fortified it as a bridge to hold in the Thracians; called also Trimontium, from three hills on which it was situate: beautified in the time of the Romans, with a goodly Amphitheatre, continuing entire and whole till these latter days, and might have lasted longer by many ages, did not the Turks daily take away the stones thereof, which are all of Marble, to make money of them. Here are also many other ancient Monuments, though the Town be much watted and destroyed, the Scythians at one time killing in it above 100000 persons: which notwithstanding it is populous, and well-frequented; by reason of the convenient situation of it on the River Hebrus, which they now call Mariza. 6. Trajanopolis, so called from the Emperour Trajan, by whom either founded or repaired; indifferently well peopled, and still preserving its old name. 7. Selimbria, on the coast of the Propontick Sea; beautified with a commodious port for receipt of small vessels, and many Bayes adjoining capable of greater: by Pothinus called Selubria, and Olibria by Suidas. 8. Apollonia, upon Pontus Euxinus, or the Black Sea, now Sisopolis. 9. Phinopolis, on the same Sea also. 10. Nicopolis, at the foot of the Mount Hemus, there being another of that name near the River Nessus. 11. Perinthus, on the Propontick sea, near the influx of the River Arfus. A Town of great note in the ancient businesses of Greece; of great strength, and peopled formerly with men of such resolutions, that they maintained their liberty against Philip of Macedon, after almost all the rest of Thrace had submitted to him. 12. Heraclea, at first a Colony of the Thubans, and afterwards of much request in the time of the Romans, as being beautified with the Palaces of Vespasian, Domitian, and Antoninus, Emperours of Rome, as also with an Amphitheatre, cut out of one entire Marble, and accounted one of the worlds seven Wonders: and finally, made the Metropolitan City of the Province of Europe, one of the Provinces of the Diocesi of Thrace; whereof more anon. 13. Olynthus, called by Xenophon the greatest City of Thrace, as possibly enough it was in power and riches, though not in greatness of extent. A Colony of the Athenians, rich in trade, and mistress of a fair and goodly territory adjoining to it: the people whereof had been malicious enemies to the Kings of Macedon, which principally induced Philip spoken of before, to set upon them. In which attempt he sped so well, that what he could not get by force, he obtained by money; bribing some of the principal Officers to betray it to him: for the recovery whereof, Demosthenes oft moved the people of Athens, in those elaborate Orations called the Olynthiacke. 14. Sestos, in the Thracian Chersonese: which being a Peninsula abutting over against Troas, on the Asian side, is now called Saint Georges Arm. Opposite whereunto, on the other side of the Water, is the Town of Abydus; remarkable for the Tragical Loves of Hero, and Leander, celebrated by Musæus, an old Greek Poet. 15. Callipolis, on the Northern Promontory of this Chersonese, the first City of note that ever the Turks possessed in Europe; taken by Solyman, the son of Orchanes, the second King of the Ottoman race, Anno 1538. from whence they easily, and in little time, spread themselves all over the rest of Thrace: the ordinary passage of late times betwixt Europe and Asia, by reason of the convenient Harbour, and safe Anchorage. 16. Cardia, seated on the Western side of it, opposite to the Isle of Lemnos, and the birth-place of Emmenes, who being a poor Carriers Son, attained to such an ability in the Art of War, that after the death of Alexander the Great, under whom he served, he seized on the Provinces of Cappadocia, and Paphlagonia, and siding (though a stranger to Macedon) with Olympias, and the Blood-royal, against the Greek Captains, vanquished and slew Craterus, and divers times drove Antigonus (afterward Lord of Asia) out of the field. But being by his own Souldiers betrayed, he was by them delivered to Antigonus, and by him slain. 17. Sardica, situate towards Mount Emus, memorable for the Council there held against the Arians, An. 351. 18. Adrianople, seated near the midst of Thrace, called anciently Uscudama, but got this name from Adrian the Emp. who repaired and beautified it, made subject to the Turks by Bajazet, An. 1362. from the first taking of it made the Seat of the Turkish Kings, till the taking of Constantinople, by Mahomet the Great; by whom removed unto that City. 19. Pera, opposite to Constantinople, on the further side of the water (as the word doth signifie in the Greek) by some called Galata, once peopled by a Colony of Genoese, as the Mart and Factory of that State, taken by Mahomet the Great, An. 1453. but still replenished, for the most part, with Christian Merchants &c Artificers.

But the chief glory of this Country, and of all the East, is, the renowned City of 20. Constantinople, seated in so commodious a place for Empire, that it over-looks both Europe and Asia, and commands not only the Propontis and Bosphorus, but the Euxine Sea. First founded by one Byzas, from whom named Byzantium; but being taken by the Persians, and from them recovered by the Spartans (unwilling that the Persians should grow strong in Europe) it was repaired and fortified by Pausanias, one of their Commanders, 663 years before the birth of our Saviour. In vain besieged by Philip of Macedon, and of great strength in the flourish of the Roman Empire. The walls of a just height, every stone whereof was so joynted with Couplers of Brass, that the whole seemed but one intire piece, adorned besides with Towers, Bulwarks, and other Arts of Fortification. Siding with Niger, in his war against Severus the Emperour, it endured a Siege of three years against all the forces of the Romans: during which time the people were so distressed by Famine, that men meeting in the streets, would draw and fight the Conqueror feeding on the Vanquished. For want of Artillery to discharge on the Assailants, they cast down upon them whole Statues made of Brass, and the like curious imagery. Houses they pulled down to get timber for Shipping; the women cut-cutting off their hair to inch out their tackle: and having thus patched up a Navy of 500 Sail, lost it all by one Tempest. Compelled to yield by this misfortune, the principal of the Nobility were put to the sword, the wealth of the Inhabitants given for a prey to the Souldiers; the walls thereof dismantled, the Town left in rubbish. Yet there appeared to much of Majesty and beauty in the very ruins: Ut mireris utrum eorum qui primi extruxerunt, vel eorum qui deinceps sunt demoliti, vires sint potiores, as Herodian hath it. Re-erected afterwards by the Emperour Constantine, he honored it with his own name, and made it the chief Seat of the Roman Empire. The City finished May 11 Anno 331. And being so finished, was endowed with all the privileges of Rome, an equal number of Senators, one of the Annual Consuls, and all other Officers of State chosen out of both; the Citizens of the one being Free of the other, and capable of all places of most trust and power. For that cause called NOVA ROMA, in some following times. This City he adorned also with magnificent Buildings, curious Statues, and such like Ornaments, transported hither from Old Rome: which City he spoiled of more costly pieces, than any twenty of his Predecessors had brought unto it. At this day the chief buildings are the Turks Seraglio, and the Temple of Saint Sophia; which as they differ not much in place and situation, so as little in magnificence and State. The Temple of Saint Sophia; was, if not built, yet re-edified by the Emperour Justinian. It is built of an oval form; surrounded with Pillars of admirable workmanship, adorned with spacious and beautiful Galleries: roofed all over with Mosaicque work, and vaulted underneath, very strongly for the Fabrick, and pleasing for the eye. The Doors are very curiously wrought and plated; one of which, by the superstitious people is thought to have been made of the planks of Noahs Ark. And yet this Temple is little more than the Chancel of the ancient Church, which contained in length 260 foot, and 180 in breadth: and yet to our Saint Pauls in London, may seem for the bigness, to have been but a Chapel of ease. But what it wants in Greatness, it hath gained in Beauty, and in the elegance of the building, wherein it is thought to exceed all the fabricks in the whole World: the sides and floor, all flagged with excellent Marble, and before the entrance a goodly Portico, or Porch, in which, as well the Christians, who visit it out of curiosity; as the Turks, who repair thither for Devotion, are to leave their shoes. By Mahomet the Great, after the taking of the City, converted to a Turkish Mosque, as it still continueth; frequented by the grand Signeur almost every Friday, which is the Sabbath of that people. Near hereunto standeth the Palace, or Seraglio of the Ottoman Emperours, on the North-east Angle of the City, where formerly stood the ancient Byzantium: divided from the rest of the City by a wall, containing three miles in Circuit; and comprehending goodly groves of Cypress intermixed with Plains, delicate Gardens, artificial Fountains, and all variety of pleasures which luxury can affect, or treasure compass. The Palace it self enjoying a goodly prospect into the Sea, was first built by Justinus the Emperour, afterwards much enlarged by the Ottoman race; containing three great Courts one within another: the buildings yielding unto those of France and Italy for the neat contrivances; but far surpassing them for cost, and curiousest.

As for the City it self, it is said to be 18 miles in compass, and to contain 700000 living souls; yet would be more populous than it is, if the Plague, like a cruel Tertian Ague, did not every third year to rage amongst them. Fortified towards the Land with three strong, and high Walls, the one higher than the other, the outermost highest of them all: towards the Sea with one wall only, built after the old fashion with many Towers, which very strongly flanker, and defend the same. But formerly both the Town and Chersonese in which it standeth, was defended from the incursions of the barbarous people, by a strong Wall built on the very Isthmus of it, some ten miles from the City, reaching from one side to the other. The work of Anastasijs, who succeeded Zeno, Anno 494. A City which as farre off gives to the eye a most pleasing object; so intermixt with Gardens, and beset with Trees, that it seems a City in a Wood: but being entered, much deceiveth the expectation which it promised, the buildings of it being mean if not contemptible. The streets for the most part exceeding narrow, but rated on each side for the greater cleanliness: the houses but of two stories high, some of rough Stone, and some of Timber; without any outward grace, or exterior garnishing: in many places nothing but low Sheds, or rows of shops; and in some places long dead walls belonging unto great mens houses. The principal beauty of the whole, next to some Monuments of Antiquity, which are still preserved, and the Tombs, or Sepulchres of some of the Ottoman Kings, which are very sumptuous; are the Mosques or Temples of the Turks, about eight thousand in number: And the Port or Haven, so conveniently profound, that Ships of greatest burden may safely lay their sides to the sides thereof, for the receipt or discharge of their lading; and so commodiously seated on the Thracian Bosphorus, that there is no wind, whatsoever it be, which brings not in some shipping to it. But that which gives the greatest pleasure to the sight, from the Hills adjoining, is the situation of it on seven Mountens, most of them crowned with magnificent Mosques, built all of white Marble, round in form, and finished on the top with gilded Spires, reflecting the sun beams with a marvellous splendour. On the first whereof, standeth the ruins of Constantines Palace, exceeding barely to behold. On the second, a fair Turkish Mosque, built on the Place anciently belonging to the Greek Patriarch; On the third, stands a stately Mosque, the Sepulchre of Mahomet the second; and a very large Hospital, for entertainment of Pilgrims, an relief of the poor: the Annual tents whereof are valued at 200000 Chicques. On the fourth and fifth, the Sepulchre of Selimus the first, and Bajazet the second. On the sixth, the Mosque and Sepulchre of Selyman the magnificent, numbered amongst the present wonders of the World: and on the seventh, the Temple of Saint Sophia, and the Turks Seraglio, spoken of already. In which respect it is called Πόλις ἑπτὰ κρήνη, by Nicetas; Urbs septecollis, by Paulus Diaconus; and so acknowledged to be by Jann Dou-

Thrace.

Douza, Rhines, Morison, G. Sandys, and other of our modern travellers, the eye-witnesses of it. So that if there be any Mystery in the number of Seven, or that the sitting of the Great Whore on a seven-headed Beast, be an assured direction to find out the Antichrist, we may as well look for him in Constantinople, or Novia Roma, where the Great Turk, the professed enemy of Christ, and the Christian Edith, hath his seat and residence; as amongst the seven hills of Old Rome, where the Pope resideth. On his sitting in the Temple of God, shew us where to find him; we may as well look for him in the Temple of Saint Sophia, now a Turkish Mosque, as in Saint Peters Church at Rome, till a Christian Temple.

But to return again unto Constantinople, as it was made by Constantine the Imperial City, and consequently the chief City of the East, in all Civil matters: so it became in little time to have a great sway also in affairs of Religion. The Christian Faith said to be first preached in Byzantium, by Saint Andrew the Apostle, the first Bishop thereof. Afterwards spreading over Thrace, and the Churches of it regulated by many Bishops; the chief prehemience in matters which concerned those Churches, was given unto the Bishops of Heraclea, Heraclea being at that time the Metropolis, or principal City of the Province. But after that Constantinople was built by Constantine, and made the Imperial City, as before was said, it did not only over-top Heraclea, and draw unto it self the Metropolitan dignity; but stood in competition with the other Patriarchal Churches, for the Supreme power; inasmuch as at the second General Council, holden in this City, it was unanimously decreed; that the Patriarch thereof, should in degree of honour be next unto the Bishop of Rome, and above those of Antioch and Alexandria; the same Decree confirmed in the Council of Chalcedon also. By which, not only all the Churches in the Dioce of Thrace, but also of Natolia, or Asia Minor, (except Cilicia and Isauria, which remained to the Patriarch of Antioch) containing no less than 28 of the Roman Provinces, were made subject to him. And though Pope Leo the first, pretending only the preservation of the Privileges of those two great Churches; but indeed fearing lest New Rome might in the end get the predecency of the Old, did oppose this Act; and some of his Successors persisted in the same resistance: yet they were forced in the end to give way unto it, especially after the Emperour Justinian had by his Imperial Edict confirmed the same. By whom it was finally ordained, Seniores Romae Patrum primum esse omnium Sacerdotum, beatissimum autem Archiepiscopum Constantinopoliticos, Novae Romae secundum habere locum: that is to say, that the Pope of Rome, should have the first place, in all General Councils, and the Bishop of Constantinople, or New Rome, should have the second. Encouraged wherewith, and with the countenance and favour of the Emperour Mauritius, John Patriarch of Constantinople, in the time of Gregory the Great, took to himself the title of Universal or Oecumenical Bishop, the Pope General (as it were) of the Church of CHRIST. And though Pope Boniface, by the grant of that bloody Tyrant PHOTAS, got that title from him; yet the Patriarchs of Constantinople made good their ground, never submitting either themselves, or their Churches to the Popes Authority; for that cause specially accounted by the Church of Rome for Schismaticke, accordingly reviled, and persecuted with all kind of indignities. How it succeeded with these Patriarchs in the times ensuing, and by what means their jurisdiction was extended over all Greece, Muscovia, part of Poland; and many other Churches in the North and East, hath been said already. Certain it is, the constant residence of the Emperours, from the time of Constantine, gave great ground unto it: of whom I should here add the names, but that I must first sum up the affairs of Thrace, before the building of this mighty and predominant City; and take a brief view of the rest of those Provinces which we have comprehended under the name of Greece.

Concerning which we are to know, that the ancient Inhabitants of it had the names of Strimonis, Bardi, Dolongi, Sapei, Saii, and some others, united by most writers in the name of Thracians. Governed at first by the Kings or Princes of their several Tribes, as most Nations else: distinguished from the common peoples as in other poms, so most especially by their Gods, which their Kings had to themselves apart, and were not to be worshipped by the best of their Subjects. These not agreeing well together for the common good, gave the Athenians, Spartans, Thebans, and other Nations of the Greeks, a good opportunity to invade their Country, to seize on the Sea-Towns thereof, and plant Colonies in them: the Country in those times being meanly peopled, and consequently giving that advantage unto the Greeks, as the Indies in these later times have to the Spaniards, Portuguese, English, Hollanders, and all other Adventurers. Such of them as lay next to Macedon proving bad neighbours hereunto upon all occasions, at last provoked Philip, the Father of Alexander, to put in for a share, who being chosen Arbitrator betwixt two Competitors for that Kingdom (drawn at last into fewer hands) came not unto the Council with such poor attendants as Justice and Piety, but with a great and puissant Army: wherewith having vanquished and slain the two Pretenders, he pronounced sentence for himself, and made Thrace his own, compelling the Inhabitants to pay him the tenth part of their Revenue for his yearly Tribute. After the death of Alexander, this Country was seized on by Lysimachus, as his part of the spoil, who here built the City Lysimachia; from hence invading Dacia, Macedon, and the neighbouring Regions: and he being dead, the Thracians now accustomed to a foreign yoke, were either Subjects, or at least Tributaries to the Macedonians. Aiding them in their wars against the Romans, they incurred the disfavour of that people; who having settled their affairs in other places, and repulsed the Cimbri, thought it fittest to call the Thracians to account for their former Actions; and sped to ill in the attempt, that Porcius Cato lost his whole Army in the onset, cunningly intercepted in their woods and fastnesses. Didius the Prator coming in, whilst the Thracians were busied in the chase, gave them such a stop, that he deserved a Triumph for it: and made the Victory more easie to Metellus, who succeeded ceeded Cato in that charge, and triumphed also over them; as also did Lucullus on another Victory, U. C. 680. Broken with so many ill successes, that they were finally subdued by Piso in the time of Augustus: becoming so obsequious to that fortunate Prince, that Rhisemaces, a great and puissant King hereof, aided him with a strength of Horse against the Pannonians and Illyrians, who had then rebelled. Afterwards made a Province of the Roman Empire; in Constantine's new Model it became a Diocese, under the Præfatus Prætorio Orientis: Thrace it self being cast into four Provinces, that is to say, Thrace (specially so called, Hæmimontum, Rhodope, and Europa; Scythia, and the Lower Mæsa), spoken of before, being added to it: of which the Presidents of Rhodope and Hæmimontum, were not to be appealed from to the Præfatus Prætorio, as the others were; but only to the Præfatus Constantinopolis, the Imperial City. But as Alfensius King of Castile, surnamed the Wise, was once heard to say (never the Wiser for so saying) That had he stood at the elbow of Almighty God; when he made the World, he would have shewed him how some things might have been better ordered: so give me leave to play the fool, and to say this here, that had I stood at Constantine's elbow, I would have counselled him to lay the Diocese of Thrace to the Præfatus of Illyricum, who had originally only the Dioceses of Macedonia and Illyricum under his command; and not have placed it under the Præfatus of the East, who had both Asia, and all Egypt, under his Authority. For being that there lay Appeals from the Vicars of Lieutenants of the several Dioceses to their several and respective Præfatus, how great a trouble must it be to the subjects of Thrace, on every occasion of Appeal, to post to Antioch, there to complain unto the Præfatus of the Orient; when Sirminum and Thessalonica, the ordinary residences of the Præfatus Prætorio for Illyricum, were so hard at hand? But Constantine was an absolute Prince, and might doe what he listed. He had not else removed his seat so far towards the East, and left the Western parts of the Empire open to the barbarous people, out of a fancy only to preserve the Eastern. For that it was a fancy only, the event did shew, the Persians for all this, prevailing more than ever formerly; and Thrace it self, though honoured with the Imperial City, and planted with so many Roman Colonies, so ill inhabited, that a great part thereof lay waste and desert many ages after. Insomuch as the Goths being by the Huns driven over the Danow, were by the Emperor Valens planted in this Country, (the Emperor having a design to use them in his following wars) where not contented with the portion allotted to them, they bid fair for all, wasting the whole Province, taking divers towns, and endangering Constantinople it self, from whence not driven (Valens himself being killed in the war against them) but by the coming of some Saracens to the aid of the Citizens. Nor could the residence of the Emperours so protect this Country, but that it was continually harassed and depopulated by the Sclavens, Bulgarians, Rosses, Saracens, and other barbarous people falling in upon it: nor hinder one Bryoninus in the time of Michael Ducas, and Nicephorus Botaniates from assuming to himself the title of King of Thrace; nor finally prevent the Turks of the Ottoman race from getting ground every day on the lesser Asia, incroaching upon Thrace it self; and in the end obtaining the Imperial City.

And here perhaps it is expected, considering the Turks are now possessed of Thrace, and the rest of Greece, that we should make relation of the nature of that people, their customs, forces, policies, original, and proceedings. But the discourse thereof we will defer till we come to Turcomania, a Province of Asia, from whence they made their first inundations, like to some unrefillible torrent into Persia; and after into the other parts of the world now subject to them. And therefore letting that alone till another time, we will proceed to our description of the rest of Greece, consisting of the Islands scattered in the Pontick, Propontick, Ægean, Cretan, and Ionian Seas: leaving out such as properly belong to Asia, to our description of that Country, though otherwise Greek Islands, and so accomplished both for their Language and Original.

7 The ISLANDS of the PONTICK and PROPONTICK SEAS.

BEFORE we come to the descriptions of these Islands, we must first look upon the Seas in which they lie: beginning with the PONTICK first, because the Greatest, and that which doth communicate and convey its waters unto all the rest. A Sea made up Originally of the confluence of those mighty Rivers (the greatest in those parts of the world) which do fall into it: that is to say, the Danow, Borysthenes, and Tanais falling out of Europe; besides many other fair and large Rivers (though of lesser note) to the number of at least an hundred, which pay tribute to it: the whole compass of it being 2700 miles; in form, by some resembled to a Scythian Bow when it is bended. A Sea not so safe as many others, and therefore much annoyed with ice in winter; seldom remitted in the spring on the Northern shore: the Traffick of it wholly in a manner engrossed by the Turks, who is master of all the Sea coast of it, save what belongs to the Polonian and Crim-Tartar. At first called Ægeus from the inhospitableness of the neighbouring people; which being brought to some conformity, caused the Sea to be called Ægeus. By Florus it is called Mare Sinistrum, because in the way from Rome to Asia Minor, it lay upon the left hand, as the Mediterranean did upon the right. It is commonly called at this time Mare Maggiore, for its greatness; and the Black Sea, because of the great mists thence arising. Others not improbably affirm that it is called the Black Sea, from the dangerous and black shipwrecks here happening. For it is a very dangerous shore full of Rocks and Sands: and for this cause there is on the top of an high Tower, a Lanthorn, in which there is a great pan full of pitch, rozen,

rozen, tallow, and the like, in dark nights continually burning, to give warning to Mariners how near they approach unto the shore. This Sea being the biggest of all those parts, gave occasion to them which knew no bigger, to call all Seas by the name of Pontus, as Ovid, Omnia pontus erant, decrant quæque litora ponto; and in another place of the same Poet, — nil nisi pontus & ær; a better reason doubtless of the name, than that of the Etymologists: Pontus, quia ponte caret. Of this Sea the chief Isles are Thinnius, and Eristhinus, little famous.

From hence the Sea bending Southward, is brought into narrower bounds, not being fully a mile broad; and called Thracius Bosphorus: Thracius, for its site nigh Thrace; and Bosphorus, for that Oxen have swum over it, and hath no Island worth naming. Fortified on each side with a very strong Castle, that on the Asian side being the elder and the lesser, is by the Greeks called Asio Castron; by the Turks named Acce-chisar: The other just opposite to it, by the Turks called Genichisar; by the Greeks named Neo Castron, or New Castle. This last, the work of Mahomet surnamed the Great, in the beginning of his reign: in highness not inferior to a little City; built by him in or near the place of the ancient Damalis, environed with a wall 22 foot broad, and containing three great Towers; their wall exceeding 10 yards in thickness, exceedingly well stored with all sorts of Ordinance and Ammunition. By the English commonly called the Black Towers, partly because seated at the entrance of the Euxine or Black Sea, and partly because they serve as a Prison for Malefactors of principal note, who seldom are discharged thence, till released by death.

This Streight having continued 26 miles in length, openeth it self into the Propontis, 30 miles in compass; confined with Thrace on the one side, and with Bythia on the other: so as they which sail in the middle, may descry the land on all parts. Now called Mare di Marmora, from the Island Marmora, which formerly called Proconnesus, hath for its abundance of Marble purchased this new name. The soil apt for Vines, and not destitute of Corn, yielding also good pasturage for Goats, whereof here plenty, with an incredible number of Partridges amongst the Rocks: the Country of Aristani, a famous Poet, who flourished in the times of Cæsar. Anciently it had in it two Cities of the same name by the Island, called the Old and New Proconnesus; the former first built by the Milesians, an Asian people; the latter by the natives of this Island. But both these being long since decayed, it hath now only a small Village towards the North, with an Haven to it; inhabited by the Greeks, as is all the rest of the Island: such Christian Slaves as are in great numbers employed here by the Turks in digging Marble for their Mosques, and other buildings, being only sojourners, not house-keepers, and therefore not accounted amongst the Inhabitants. Here is also in this Propontick Sea, the Isle of Cyzicus, being it is on Asia side, we shall there speak of it.

The Sea having gathered her waters into a lesser Channel, is called Hellepont, from Helle, daughter to Atamas, King of Thebes, who was here drowned. Over this famous Streight did Xerxes, according to Herodotus, make a bridge of Boats to pass into Greece: which when a sudden tempest had shrewdly battered, he caused the Sea to be beaten with 300 stripes; and cast a pair of Fetters into it, to make it know to whom it was subject. Xerxes in this expedition wasted over an Army consisting of two hundred the King in the unconquerableness of his forces; Artabanus told him that he feared no enemy, but the Sea and the Earth; the one yielding no safe harbour for such a Navy; the other, not yielding sufficient subsistence for so multitudinous an Army. But his return over this Hellepont was as swift as his passage magnificent; his Fleet being so broken by the valour of the Greeks, and the fury of the Sea: that for his more speedy flight, he was compelled to make use of a poor Fisher-boat. Neither yet was his passage secure; For the Boat being overburdened, had sunk all, if the Persians by casting away themselves, had not saved the life of their King. The loss of which noble spirits so vexed him, that having given the Steersman a golden Coronet, for preserving his own life: he commanded him to execution, as a Co-author of the death of his servants. It is now called the Castles, or the Sea of the two Castles; which two Castles stand one on Europe, the other on Asia side; in the Towns of Sestos, and Abydos. These Castles commonly by the Turks called Dardanelli, are exceeding well built, and abundantly furnished with munition. They search and examine all Ships that pass that way: they receive the Grand Signeurs Customs, and are in effect the principal strength of Constantinople. At these Castles, all Ships must stay three days; to the end, that if any Slave be run away from his Master, or Thieves have stolen any thing, they may be in that place pursued and apprehended. So that these Castles are as it were the out-works of Constantinople to defend it from all invasions, and from any forces which may come unto it by Sea, out of the Mediterranean; As for the safety thereof, from such as may find passage out of the Euxine, there are the Thracian Bosphorus the two strong Castles, the one above Constantinople on Europe side: the other on the Asian shore, which before we spake of. No European Isle of note in either Streight. And therefore on unto

8. The ISLANDS of the ÆGEAN SEA.

Hellepont, after a forty miles course, expatiateth its waters in the Ægean Seas; so called either from Ægeus, the father of Theseus, who misdoubting his Sons safe return from the Minotaur of Cret, here drowned himself: or secondly, from Æge, once a principal City, in the prime Island Eubœa; or thirdly, because that the Islands lie scattered up and down like the leaps of a wanton Goat, from the Greek αἶγες.

The chief Islands of it are, 1 Samothrace, 2 Thassus, 3 Imbros, 4 Lemnos, 5 Eubœa, 6 Salamis, 7 Ægina, 8 Gg Lemnos.

7 Ægina, 8 the Cyclades, 9 the Sporades, and 10 Cythera: all which, especially from Euboea Southwards, are called the Islands of the Archæes; the Sea being by the Greeks called the Archipelago, in regard of its greatness, compared unto the narrow Seas which lie above it.

I. SAMOTHRACE is a small Island opposite to the Coast of Thrace, where the Hebrus falls into the Sea; so called quasi Samos Tracia, to difference it from the Asian Samos, bordering on Ionia. Formerly it was called Dardania, from Dardanus the Trojan, who fled hither when he carried the Palladium thence. But Aristotle writing of the Common-weal of these Samo-Thracians, telleth us that it was first called Leucefia, and afterwards Samandracchi, plentiful in Honey, and Wild Deers, and better stored with commodious harbours, than other in these Seas. It hath a Town of the same name with the Island, situate on an high hill on the North part hereof, overlooking a capacious Haven; of late, by the Pirates frequent infesting of these Seas, in a manner desolate.

II. THASSUS, another little Island on the same Coast, opposite to the influx of the River Nesrus, lying betwixt that and Athos in Macedonia, at the mouth of the Strimonian Bay: by Pliny called Eria, and Æthria; by Plutarch, Thalassia; at the present, Thassia. In compass betwixt forty and fifty miles, sufficiently fruitful, well replenished with Woods, and yielding good store of the best Wines. Mountainous in some places, but those mountains fraught with Quarries of excellent Marble, which the Romans called Thassian, from the Island: and in the times of Philip, and Alexander the Great, rich in Mines of useful metals, that those Kings received yearly 80 Talents for their Customs of them. It hath one Town of the same name with the Island, situate on a large Plain in the north part of it; bordering on a goodly Bay, which serves for an Haven to the Town: and on the South parts where the Country is more mountainous and hilly, there are two Towns more, each of them situate on an hill; but the names thereof occur not amongst my Authors.

III. IMBRUS, another small Island, now named Lembo, is situate betwixt Samothrace and the Thracian Chersonese: in compass about thirty miles, but more long than broad, stretching north and south; and distant from Samothrace about ten miles. The Island mountainous for the most part, except towards the West; where it hath some pleasant and well-watered Plains: in which a Town of the same name situate at the foot of the mountain, once sacred unto Mercury, but not else observable.

IV. LEMNOS, an Island of more note, lyeth betwixt Thrace and Macedon, not far from Imbrus; memorable amongst the Poets for the fabulous fall of Vulcan; who being but an homely brat, hardly worth the owning, was by Juno in great passion thrown out of Heaven, and falling on this Island, came to get his halcing. Howsoever, he was anciently worshipped by the people hereof, and from hence called Lemnias. In compass about an hundred miles, but more long than broad, extended from the East to the West: on every side well furnished with convenient Creeks, and some pretty Havens; by which the want of Rivers is in some sort recompensed.

The Country for the most part plain, if compared unto the adjacent Islands, but otherwise swelled with rising mountains; the interposed Valleys being very fruitful of wheat, pulse, wine, flesh, cheese, wool, flax, linnen, and all other necessities, only wood is wanting. And though here be no Rivers, as before was said, yet have they good fishing on the Sea-coast, for their use and sustenance; and in some parts Hot baths for health and medicine. But the chief riches of this Island is in a Mineral Earth here digged, of excellent Vertue for curing wounds, stopping of fluxes, expelling poisons, preservative against infections, and the like: called Terra Lemnia, from the place; and Terra Sigillata, from the Seal or Character imprinted on it. For being made up into small pellets, and sealed with the Turks Character or Signet, it is then, (not before) sold unto the Merchants; by whom dispersed over most parts of the Christian World. Upon the sixth of August yearly they go to gather it; but not without much Ceremony, and many religious preparations: brought in by the Venetians, when they were Lords of this Island; and still continued by the Greek Monks or Caloires, who are the principal in the work. There is one hill only where it groweth, the top whereof being opened, they discover the vein, resembling the casting up of Worms; and having gathered as much of it that day, as the Priests think fit, it is closed again; certain bags of it being sent to the Grand Signer yearly, the residue sealed up, and sold to the foreign Merchant.

But to return to the Topography of the place, the Eastern parts hereof are said to be fat and fruitful, the Western very dry and barren: in both containing 57 Towns and Villages, all of them inhabited by the Greeks, except only three, and those three garrisoned by the Turks; who being Lords of the whole Island, have new named it Stalimene. In former times, from two prime Cities in it, it was called Dipolis. Of which the first was called Lemnos, by the name of the Island, as large and well-peopled now, as ever formerly, but of no great estimation, when it was at the best: seated upon an high hill looking over the Sea; with a handfom market-place, on which mount Athos casts a shadow, though distant 87 miles from it. It was formerly by another name, called Myrina; but that held not long, the name of Lemnos still remaining. 2 The second of the two Cities was then called Hephæstia; methinks for the Temple of Vulcan, hence called Hephæstides; since desolate and destroyed, and a morable for the Temple of Vulcan, being called Chockino. This Town not great, but of a reasonable strength, strength, memorable for the stout resistance, which a notable Virago named Marrilla, made against the Turks, in the time of Mahomet the Great: the Venetians then being Lords of the Island. For suddenly landings, when they were not looked for, with a purpose to surprize this Town, they found more resistance at the gates than they did expect: none more commended than this Maiden, who seeing her Father slain, took up such weapons as lay by him, and manfully made good the place, until the rest of the Citizens wakened with the Alarm, came unto her rescue and forced the enemy to retire. Near hereunto is the hill on which Vulcan is fabled to have fell; more eminent for the Mineral Earth here only gathered. And not far hence Pliny reports a Labyrinth to have stood in the days of old; little inferior unto those of Crete or Egypt; the ruins of it so decayed, that Bellonius, who took great pains in it, was not able to trace them. 3 The third place of note is Setira, though an ordinary Village, yet memorable for the Chappel in which the Greek Caloires begin their Orisons on the sixth day of August, before their gathering of the earth so often mentioned. In this Country anciently reigned Theseus, the Son of Bacchus and Ariadne, during whose time the women of the Island upon some displeasure murdered all the men, the King only excepted, preserved by Hypsipile his daughter, whom they made their Queen, and by whom Jason with the Argonauts were so kindly entertained for two years together, that they had almost forgot their intended expedition for the Golden Fleece, she her self being got with Child by Jason at his being there; the other women probably following her example. Following the fortune of the other parts of Greece, it came at last under the power of the Constantinopolitan or Eastern Emperours; In the subversion of that Empire by the Latinis or Western Christians (of which more hereafter) it fell to the share of the Venetians, who held it till the year 1463. or thereabouts.

Besides these on the Coast of Thrace, there are also some of less note on the shores of Macedon. The principal whereof are 1 Peparinthus, as Plutarch; Enonius, as Pliny calls it; containing about 40 miles in compass: now, called Sarginius, as Castaldus; or Limene, as Niger hath it; fortified on the Eastern part with a Castle built upon a Rock. Others of less note are, 2 Scynthos, now Scyatis; 3 Scopelos, 4 Alonissus, 5 Cyrenethus, now Pontico, and 6 Dromus, of which little memorable. All which, together with those formerly described on the Coast of Thrace, being but the Accessories of the several Continents upon which they border, followed the fortune of the Principal, and were conquered in them.

V. EUBOEÆA known to the ancients by the names of Æolis and Abantis; to the moderns, by that of Negropont; fronteth all along the Coast of Achaia, parallel to which it is in fertility: one part hereof, torn away from it by an Earth-quake, and lying still so near unto it, that between the Island and the Continent is only a little Eurippus, which ebbs and flows seven times in one day. The reason of which, when Aristotle could not find, it is said, that he threw himself into the Sea, with these words, Quia ego non capio te, tu capies me. In this Island is the Promontory Capareum, where Nauplius the father of Palamedes, placed his false fires, to the destruction of so many Greeks. For understanding how his Son Palamedes, whom he deemed to have been slain by the hand of Paris, was treacherously circumvented by the policy of Ulysses, and Diomedes: he conceived such a displeasure against the whole host of the Grecians, that he intended their general destruction. To this end he caused fires to be made on the tops of the most dangerous and inaccessible rocks in this whole Island; which the Greeks taking (according to the custom of the time) to have been the marks of some safe Haven, made thitherward; and were there most miserably cast away, there perishing 200 Ships, and many thousand men. But when Nauplius understood how Diomedes and Ulysses, whose ruine he principally intended, were escaped; he crownd himself for very vexation, in this very same place. Palamedes, this Nauplius son, is said to have invented four of the Greek Letters, viz. Δ, Ξ, Ε, Θ; to have first instituted *Centinel*s in an Army, and to be the first inventor of the Watch-word.

It is in length 150 miles, stretched out from the North-west, to the South-east; in breadth, not above twenty, where it is broadest; the whole compass 365 Italian miles. The Queen of the Ægean Sea, not only for greatness, but for fertility and strength; plentiful in Corn, Wine, Oyl, Fruit, and wood fit for Shipping; enriched with many fair Harbours, and capacious Bays, and those well fortified: watered also with the Rivers of Cireus and Nelus; two Rivers of so strange a nature, that if a sheep drink of the former, his wool turneth white; but coal-black, if he drink of the latter. For the credit whereof I refer the Reader unto Strabo. Here is also said to be a stone called Amianthus, which is drawn into thread like hemp, and good cloth made of it: which, when it is stained, in stead of being sent unto the Fullers, is thrown into the fire, and so cleaned. But whether this be so, or not (for I put it only upon hear-say) certain it is, that it was once enriched with Mines both of Brass, and Iron, though those now decayed; and Quarries of pure Marble, which continue still.

The Island, before it was conquered by the Turks, was very populous; but the people most delighted to live in Villages; the Cities or walled Towns being only three. 1 Crisso, anciently Caryssus, with little or no variation, but by Pliny called Ægea, and Chironia; memorable for its Marble Quarries, of which were made the Pillars called Columna Carystia. 2 Chalcis, now Negropont, by the Turks, Eribo, seated on a Plain near the waters side, there growing into a fair and goodly Bay, called the Gulf of Negropont; a populous, strong, and wealthy City, so fortified with Walls and Bulwarks; that in the judgement of most men, it was held invincible, when the Turks first laid down before it. Nor was it purchased by the Turk (though Mahomet, who had took Constantinople, undertook the business) at a lower price, than the loss of forty thousand men, who were spent upon it: but taken at the last, and the people put unto the Sword, without consideration of Sex, or Age. A Town in former times of so great wealth and power, that it sent Colonies abroad into Macedonia (a principal Region of the which was hence called Chalcidice) as also into Sicily, and some parts of Italy: and had a strong influence on the affairs of Achaia also, as being situate so near the Continent, that it was joyned to it by a bridge. When it was in the hands of the K. of Macedonia, this Town, together with Demetrias in Thessaly, and the Castle of Acrocorinth, were called the feters of Greece: inasmuch, that when the Roman Senate commanded Philip, the Father of Perseus, to set the Grecians at liberty; the Grecians made answer, that in vain was their liberty restored them, unless these three Towns were first dismantled. Permitted by the Romans to live according to their own Lawes, in memory of that benefit, they refused to declare against them in behalf of Antiochus; who thereupon made himself master of the Town, and consequently of the Island. But forced to leave the place upon the loss of the battle at Thermopylae, it became free again; till finally made subject unto Rome, with the rest of Greece, and with it made a part of the Eastern Empire. In the division whereof amongst the Latines, it fell to the share of the Venetians; who from hence used with their Gallies to infest the shores of Turkey, and disturb their trade. Provoked wherewith, especially with their taking of Agas a City of Thrace, under the conduct of Nicholas Canalis, the Venetian Admiral, who in that enterprise had took 2000 Turks, which he carried with him into this Island: Mahomet the Great resolves upon the conquest of it; and with a puissant Army sets before the Town. And though it cost him dear, yet at last he got it, and there-with all the Island also, which depended on the fortunes of it, An. 1471.

VI. SALAMIS is nigh unto Megara, one of the Provinces of Achaia; famous for the overthrow of the populous Navy of Xerxes, by the Athenians, and their confederates. What was the number of the Souldiers and Gallies of the Perfian side, hath been already declared. The Grecian fleet consisted of no more than 270 Vessels, whereof 127 were rigged and set forth at the charge of the Athenians only; the rest by the Associates. Yet was the admiralty committed to Eurybiades a Lacedaemonian; the Athenians preferring the main care of the common safety, before an unreasonable contention for priority. The Spartans seeing the inequality of forces, intended not to have hazarded the battle, but with full sail to have retired to Peloponnesus, into which Countrey the Perfians had made incursions; respecting more the welfare of their own Countrey yet defensible, than the desperate estate of Africa. This design was by Themistocles (as careful for the estate of Athens, as they for Sparta) signified to Xerxes: who getting between them and home, compelled them to a necessity of fighting; but to his own ruine. For in the conflict more than 200 of his Ships were sunk, and most of the rest taken; the Confederates having lost of their Navy, forty only. Between the Athenians and the Megarenses were many contentions for this Island; the fortune of the Athenians in the end prevailing. It hath in it a City of the same name, the Royal Seat of Telamon the father of Ajax, so famous in the warre of Troy: more memorable for giving birth to Solon the Legislator of Athens, one of the seven wise men of Greece.

VII. ÆGINA, now called Engie, an Island situate over against Sinns Saronicus, being that Bay of Corinth which openeth into the Ægean: hence called Golfo di Engia, the Realm of Æacus, made for his justice and integrity one of the three Judges of Hell: the other two being his brother Rhadamanthus, and Minos the King of Crete. It had formerly been called Oenone, and Oenope; but took this name from Ægina the daughter of Afops a King of Bœotia, on whom Jupiter is said to have begot both Æacus and Rhadamanthus. The people hereof are properly called Æginenses, and Ægina, much spoken of in the wars of Athens, from which distant about 12 miles. The ground hereof is very stony, but good for Barley, of which very plentiful: inhabited in former times by a laborious and thriving people, to whom they gave in those dayes the name of Myrmidons, (the Island being also called Myrmidonia) quod formicarum more terram foderent, because Emmet-like, they digged up and under the earth, to make it the more fit for tillage; and dwelt at first in Caves without any houses. Hence the occasion of the fable of turning Emmets into men at the prayers of Æacus; both tale and people, after (I know not how) carried into Thessaly, where before we found them.

VIII. The CYCLADES, so called because they lie in a circle round about Delos, are in number 53. They are also called the Islands of the Arabes, because they are in the Sea called Archipelago. They stand so close together, that in a clear day a man may see 20 of them at a time; for which cause it is with good reason accounted to be a dangerous place for saylers in a storm. The chief of these Cyclades, are 1 DELOS, quasi Δῖλος, signifying apparent, because when all the earth had abjured the receipt of Latona, at the request of Juno; this Island then under water, was by Jupiter erected aloft, and fixt to receive her; and in it was the delivered of Apollo and Diana: of which thus Ovid,

Erratica Delos
Errantem accepit, tunc cum levis insula nabit,
Illic incumbens, sub Palladis arbore, palma;
Edidit, invita, Geminis Latona, noverca.

Unsetled Delos floating on the wave,
A little Island entertainment gave
To wandering Latona, spight of Juno's head,
Under Minerva's Palm-tree brought to bed.

Nota.

Cyclades.

Notable also is this Island for the Temple of Apollo, and a custom, neither permitting men to die, or Children to be born in it; but sending sick men, and great-bellied women to Rhene, a small Island; and not much distant. By a more ancient name it is called Ortygia; and by that name mentioned in many of the Poets both Greek and Latines. The chief town of it called also Delos, is situate on a plain environed with rocks, near the hill called Cynthus: whence Apollo had the name of Cynthius; and Diana of Cynthia; as of Delias, and Delia, from the Island. In this Town had Apollo both his Temple and Oracle, delivered here more plainly than in other places; and for that reason (as some say) called Delos; the word in Greek signifying manifest or apparent: made famous by the resort of people from all places thither, especially from the neighbouring Islands; who sent yearly multitudes of men; and troops of Virgins, to celebrate his solemnities with herds of Sacrifices. More wealthy afterwards by the removing of the trade of Corinth thither; that Town being utterly destroyed by the Romans; and this made choice of by the Merchants; partly by reason of the immunities of the place, but principally in regard of the convenient situation betwixt Europe and Asia. Continuing in great wealth and power, till Mithridates laid it waste; and at last on the ceasing of the Oracles, utterly forsaken. Both Town and Island now called Diles. By which name also Rhene an adjoining Island (before mentioned) is at this day known; chained to the other by Polyorites the Tyrant of Samos, and now united to it, at the least in name.

2. TENOS, by Aristotle called Hytrosta, by some Ophiasa, by the Moderns, Tyna. The chief Town of it of the same name; so called from one Tenes the builder of it, and giving name unto the Island. Memorable for a fountain called Dipnosus, of which Aristotle and Athenians do both affirm, that the waters will not mix with wine. The only Island of this Sea, which remaineth under the power of the State of Venice; the rest being subject to the Turk; deserving therefore the first place in our description of those Islands that compass Delos; though anciently.

3. ANDROS, (prima inter Cyclades) was reckoned chief amongst the Cyclades, or first at least in order, because next to Delos: originally called Cawron, afterwards Anandros, and at last Andros; from Andrus the Son of Eurymachus, who founded the chief Town in it, of the same name also. Memorable for a pleasant fountain mentioned by Pliny, the waters whereof, on the Nines of January yearly, had the taste of wine. It still retains the name of Andros.

4. NAXOS, now Niesia, one of the biggest of the pack; as being about 80 miles in compass. In ancient times called Veneris Insula, or the Island of Venus; afterwards Dionysia, by reason of its abundance of Wine, and the goodness of those Wines together, consecrated to Bacchus, whom the Greeks call Dionysus. From its wonderful plenty of Wheat, called by some Sicilia minor, or the lesser Sicily; but at last Naxos from one Naxos, who had the conduct of a Colony of Carians thither. But notwithstanding this new name, Bacchus did still retain the honour to be worshipped in it, in regard of his love unto the place; marrying here Ariadne, (as the Poets fable) whom Theseus had left upon the Rocks: whose Coronet or Chaplet being by his means made one of the heavenly Constellations, is by Columnella called Ardor Naxius, by the name of the Island; though commonly by Astronomers, Corona Ariadnes, from the name of the Lady. The women of this Island are said by Pliny to be delivered generally in the eighth moneth, as Bacchus was: more certainly famous in true story for the beauty and fertility of it, and for a kind of excellent Marble called Ophtia, or Serpentinus; the ground whereof is green, diapered with blew or purple spots, in much esteem amongst the Romans. When these Islands fell to the Venetians, they conferred this on one John Quirino, a Patritian, or Gentleman of that City, (as they did divers of the rest on other Undertakers) from whom it came to the Noble Family of the Crispos, who held it till the year 1572. when James the last of that house sold it to Selymus the second.

5. GYAROS, a little Island into which the Romans used to banish delinquents: hence that of Juvenal, cited by G. Sandys, Aude aliquid brevibus Gyaris, vel carcere dignum,

Si vis esse aliquid; probitas laudatur, & alget.

If thou intend'st to thrive, do what deserves
Short Gyaros, or Gives: prais'd virtue serves.

6. PAROS, now Paria, by some of the Ancients called Pallia; by others, Minois; but obtained this new name from Parnus, a Son of Jason: memorable for quarries of the whitest Marble, of which commonly the Statues of the Gods were made, called from hence Marmor Parium by the Latines. In compass about 50 miles, running in a long Plain from East to West, having once a Town of the same name seated in the North; once famous, but now utterly ruined. The Inhabitants hereof were noted to be very careless of keeping their promises and contracts: whence drameides, grew into a by-word, applied to those who made no reckoning of their promises. There is now a Town in it called Cephalo, but of no great note.

7. SCYROS, opposite to Magnesia in Asia Minor, famous for the birth of Neoptolemus or Pyrrhus; and

and that it was the lurking place of Achilles. For his mother Thetis being forewarned by an Oracle, that he should be slain in the Trojan war, sent him to Lycomedes King of this Island; where he was brought up in women's attire among the Kings daughters, and deemed a Virgin; till by getting Pyrrhus on Deidamia the Kings daughter, it was proved to be otherwise. Others relate that Ulysses discovered him by a wile, who coming thither like a Peddler or Petit-Merchant, with arms, and other covered him by a wile, who coming thither like a Peddler or Petit-Merchant, with arms, and other ware to avoid distrust; exposed his Merchandise to the view of the Damocels: and that the other Ladies falling on the sires and Laces, Achilles took into his hand the Spear and Shield. Which when Ulysses had observed, he made him leave that Company, and away for Troy. The handfomness of the fraud take from Ovid, thus;

*Conscia venturi genitrix Nereia fati
Diffimulat cultu natum; & deceptat omnes,
In quibus Ajacem, sumptis fallacia vestis.
Arma ego famelicis animum motura virilem
Mercedibus inferni, &c.*

Thus Englished by G. Sandys in his Translation of the Metamorphosis.

The whole design in Order to relate,
Thetis fore-knowing great Achilles fate,
Disguiz'd her Son, so like a Virgin drest,
That all mistook, and Ajax with the rest.
When Arms, with womens trifles, which might bli'd
Suspect, I brought to tempt a manly mind;
Yet was the Heros Virgin-like array'd;
Who taking up the Shield and Spear, I said,
O Goddess-born, for thee the fate of Troy
Her fall reserves; why doubtst thou to destroy Great Pergamus! then made him d'off those weeds,
And sent the mighty unto mighty deeds.

There is another of this name, betwixt Negropont and Lesbos, which Ortelius conceives to be the Scene of this action: but the general opinion is for this, (though that the greater:) to which the situation of it amongst the rest of those Islands, where reigned so many of the Greek Kings interested in the war of Troy, seems to give good countenance; the name and power of Greece not reaching in those days, so much towards the North.

8. MELOS, situate betwixt Crete and Peloponnesus, and equally distant from them both: the Promontories of Scyllium in the one, and that of Dylemeum in the other, shooting out against it. Inhabited in former times by a Colony of Phanicians, who coming out of Biblus, a Town of that Countrey, gave that name unto it: called Melos afterwards by the Greeks, from its abundance of Honey. The birth-place of Diagoras the Philosopher, hence surnamed Melius, but more properly Aëtes, or the Atheist: the first who in those dark times of ignorance, absolutely denied that there was a God. Protagoras Deos in ambum vocavit, Diagoras exclamavit, saith Lactantius of him. It is now called Milo, round in form, and containing 80 miles in compass. The soil sufficiently fruitful in Corn and Oyl, but defective in Wine. Here is great plenty of Marble curiously bespotted, and no small store of Millstones: as also great quantities of Pitch, and Brimstone, and some sulphury or hot springs good for many diseases. The chief Town of it called Milo also.

9. SERIPHUS, 20 miles from Delos, memorable of old for the education of Perseus, the Son of Danae. It is reported of this Island, that the Frogs bred there are naturally mute; but such as are brought from other places, keep their natural tone: from whence Proverbially, silent and sullen persons were called Rana Seriphia. It is now called Serphena, a stony and rocky Island, and hath a Town of the same name.

10. CIA, by some called CEOS, and now Zea, opposite to the Promontory of Achia called Sunium, in compass about 50 miles; made towards the West in fashion of a Crescent or half-Moon. Mountainous and hilly, except towards the North. By Pliny said to have been torn from Euboea by a sudden violence of the Sea, many men perishing in the waters. Of old times beautified with three fair Towns, 1 Julis, 2 Carthaa, and 3 Caressus; of which there is nothing now remaining.

Others there are whose names occur amongst the Ancients, as 11 Miconum, now called Micole; 12 Cythinus, now Cainro; 14 Syphnus, now Sifno; 15 Therasia or Thensia, now Santorini; 16 Cimolus, called formerly Echinusa, but now Polino; 17 Olyarus, now Quiminio; 18 Sicenus, now Sicino; 19 Pygros, now Falconara; 20 Amurgos, now Murgo, one of the biggest of them all, but not else observable.

The SPORADES, so called from σπαργω, spargo, eo quod in mari sparse sunt, & non in circulo coniecta, because they lie dispersed and scattered; not formed into a Circle, as the Cyclades are. In number number twelve, viz. 1 Anaphe, so called by the Argonautes, and the diaparellons οὐρανόπλοος, because the Moon did suddenly, and beyond her natural course, appear unto them, then grievously distressed by tempest. Apollo worshipped here, is hence called Anapheus. It is now called Namfo. 2 Astypalea, now Stampalia, in compass 88 miles; by some of the Ancients called Theon Trapeza, or the Table of the Gods. In Astypale, the chief Town of it, was Apollo worshipped, from hence sometimes called Astypaleus. 3 Helene, so called from that fair Greek Dame, whom Paris is here said to have first deflowered; now called Macroniso. 4 Los, fifteen miles from Navos, where Homer is said to have first been buried: But others find his grave at Naxos, and some at Chios; the difference being almost as great about the place of his burial, as the place of his birth. Then are 5 Lagnusa, 6 Phocusa, 7 Phacusa, 8 Philocandros, 9 Schinusa, 10 Strybia, of little note either in Poetry or story. And finally Thera, not far from Agina, before mentioned, formerly called Calliste; but named thus by Theras a Theban Gentleman, the Son of Antefan, conducting thither a Colony of Spartans and Minians, (these last of Thesphly) cast out of Lemnos by Pelasgus: in memory of whom, as the founder of their name and Nation, the Islanders used to celebrate an Annual Feast. A sedition after happening amongst this people, the weaker party under the conduct of one Battus, admonished so to do by the Oracle of Apollo, passed over into Africk, and there built Cyrene: the birth-place of the Poet Callimachus, who ascribes his Original to this Island, as himself thus witnesseth.

ΚΑΝΙΣΘΙ ΔΕΜΕΝΕΙΣ, ΤΟ Δ' ὈΥΡΟΝ ἙΡΟΙΩΝ ΘΗΤΗ,
ΜΗΤΡ' ἄνδρ' ἡ μάστιγος ἡμετέραν.

That is to say,

Calliste, which men Thera now do call,
Of my dear Countrey, the Originall.

X. CYThera, now called Cerigo, lyeth in the bottom of this Sea, not above five miles distant from Capo Malo in Peloponnesus; formerly called Porphyris from the abundance of Marble, whereof the Island yields good plenty. In compass about 60 miles, enriched with a delightful soil, and many Havens, but those small, and unsafe, and very difficult of entrance: environed on all sides with rocks, of themselves inaccessible, by which defended from the Turks, who hitherto have suffered the Venitians to enjoy it; to whom it fell in the division of the spoil amongst the Latines, so often spoken of before. It had a Town of the same name; some two furlongs from the Haven stood the Temple of Venus, (the ancientest dedicated to that Goddess which the Gracians had) and therein her Statue in complete Armour, like another Pallus. Out of this Temple (the ruins whereof are still to be seen) was Helene the wife of Menelaus, willingly ravished by Paris the Son of Priam; but not enjoyed by him, till he had brought her to a small Island of the Sporades, by her name called Helene, as before is said. From the devotions of this people paid so duely to her, did Venus get the Adjunct of Cythera; by which often called in the Poets. Thus, for one, in Virgil.

*Pace metu Cytherea, manent immota tuorum

That is to say:

Drive fear fair Cythera from thy mind;
Thou thy Sons Fate immovable shalt find.

And so I pass from the Aegean to the Cretan Sea, observing this only by the way, that most of the 69 Kings, which accompanied Agamemnon in the warre of Troy, were Kings only of these small Islands; or else of other places as inconsiderable for wealth and potency: every small town and territory having in those early times, amongst the Grecians (when ambition had not taught the great ones to devour the less) a peculiar King.

9. The ISLANDS of the CRETAN SEAS.

THE CRETAN SEA is properly that part of the Aegean or Ionian Seas, which lieth about the shores of Crete, and formerly was under the command and power thereof: as in those times, the Sea about Carpathos, another Isle of the Aegean, had the name of Carpathian; and that about Icaria, the name of Icarian; though situate in the Aegean also. The Isles hereof are 1 Crete, 2 Claudi, 3 Dia, and 4 Letoa: for Melos, and Cimolis, named by Ptolomy amongst the Islands which adjoin on Crete, have been already spoken of amongst the Cyclades, in the account whereof they pass by consent of Writers.

1. CRETA, now Candie, hath on the East, the Carpathian Sea; on the West, the Ionian; on the North, the Aegean; on the South, the African or Libyck. In form extending East and West, with three points or Promontories, whereof that towards the East, called anciently Samonium, is now called Capo di Salomone; that on the South-west, looking towards Africk, formerly named Hermia, now Capo

Crete.

Capo Gnabasse; and finally that on the Northwest towards Peloponnesus; of old called Cimarns, and now Capo Cbesin. This last directly opposite to Malea, a Promontory of Laconia; the Sea betwixt them being so troublesome and tempestuous, especially on Laconia side, that at last it grew into an ordinary caveat, Maleam prateruictus obliuiscatur qua sunt domi, viz. that he which was to sail by the point of Malea, should lay aside the care of all other matters, and attend his present safety only.

It hath in several Ages, and in several Authors, obtained several names: by Homer and Eustathius called Hecatompolis, from the number of an hundred Cities then contained in it; by Pliny and Solinus, Macaros and Macaronos, that is to say, the happy Island, from the goodness of the soil, and temper of the Air. By Stephanus, Idea, from Ida, a famous Mountain of it; by Giraldus, Telchionia, from the Telchini, the Priests of Cybele, who was here had in great request. At the present, Candie, either a vandore, from the whiteness of the rocks wherewith environed; or from Candie the Metropolis or chief Town thereof. But the general name, which hath prevailed most in all sorts of writers, is that of Crete, so called quasi Cureta, by a Syncope, or abbreviation from the Curetes, the first inhabitants hereof: who together with the Corybantes and Telchini, were the Priests of Cybele, the principal goddess of this Island; and they so called ἀνὴρ νύκτος, from their tonsure, or shaving of the head. A custom much in use amongst the Priests of some of the Pagan Deities, and possibly enough from them transmitted to the Church of Rome. And to this Etymology I do rather incline, than either to derive the name from Crete, the Son of Jupiter, and the Nymph Idea; or from Crete, the daughter of Hesperus: though both these have their Authors also. Nor dare I to reject the conceit of Bochartus, who fetching the Etyms of most people from the Punic language or Original, will have the Cretans to be descended from the Cerethites, a Nation of the Philistines, well known in Scripture: the word Cereth being abbreviated into Creth, from which into Crete and Cretans, is no difficult passage. But in my mind his conjecture is better than his proof. For though it may be granted without inconvenience, that the chief arms of the Philistines, were their Bow and Arrows, as appears 1 Sam. 31. 3. and that the Cretans anciently were expert at those weapons also: yet this concludes no more that the Cretans are of the race of the Philistines, than that almost all Nations else had the same Original; the Bow and Arrows being the ordinary weapons of most people formerly, till custom and experience trained them up to others of a later date; as he himself acknowledgeth in many places of his excellent and elaborate tractates.

In reference to the heavenly bodies, it is situate under the beginning of the fourth Climate, so that the longest day in Summer is no more than 14 hours and a quarter. And in relation to the earth, set in the middle of the Sea, at so even a distance from Europe, Asia, and Africa, as if naturally delineated to be what Aristotle hath pleased to call it, the Lady and Mistress of the Sea. For it is distant from Peloponnesus, an hundred miles, as many from Asia the less, and not above 150 from the shores of Africa: So verifying that of Virgil, Creta Jovis magni medio jacet insula Ponto.

Jove's birth-place Crete, a fruitfull Land,
In the middle of the Sea doth stand.

It is in length 270. in breadth 50 miles; in compass about 590. The soil is very fruitful, especially of Wines which we call Muscadels, of which they transport yearly 12000 Batts: together with Sugar-Candy, Gums, Honey, Sugar, Olives, Dates, Apples, Orengees, Lemmons, Raisons, Melons, Citrons, Pomgranats. Yet as other Countreys of the like hot nature, it is not a little deficient in Corn; the most or greatest part of which is yearly brought hither from Peloponnesus.

The Island is very populous, inasmuch that it is thought that upon any sudden occasion, the Seignury of Venice can raise in it 60000 men able to bear arms. The people have formerly been good sea-faring men; a virtue commaculated with many vices, which they yet retain, as envy, malice, and lying: to which last so infinitely addicted, that an horrible lye was called proverbially Cretische mendacium. This fault was aimed at by the Poet Epimenides, a native of this Island, whose words thus cited by S. Paul in that to Titus, cap. 1. v. 12.

Κρήτος ὁν λῶνται, καὶ δόλια, καὶ σέπες ἀπαί.

The Cretans alwayes lyers are;
Unruly beasts, of labour spare.

To which this Proverb may be added, viz. Tela Karmu xamra, that is to say, There are three Nations, whose names begin with the letter K. worse than any others; viz. Karmidus, Kyrtus, Klarus, the Cappadocians, Cretans, and Cilicians: though some I know apply this Proverb to the Cities of Corinth, Capna, and Carthage, beginning all with the same Letter, and all conceived to be very dangerous to the State of Rome. At this day they are sick of their old diseases, as great Lyers, and as idle as ever formerly; covetous withall, and very subtle, impatient of labour, and not caring to learn any science perfectly: only well practised in shooting, to which accustomed from their youth, and therein thought more expert than the Turky themselves.

The language generally spoken is the Greek tongue, though the Gentleman and Merchant by reason of their dependence on the State of Venice, speak Italian also. Both languages used also in divine Offices; the people being generally of the Communion of the Church of Greece; but the Latine service used also in many places, since the subjection of this Island to the Venetians. Converted first unto the faith by S. Paul the Apostle, who having planted the Gospel of life amongst them, left the watering of it unto Titus, whom he made Bishop of this Isle: recommending unto him the care of the Churches there, with power of Ordination and Ecclesiastical censure, as appears clearly by the Text. Which power, that it belonged to Titus as Bishop, and not their Evangelist only, is affirmed expressly not only by the subscription of the said Epistle, where he is plainly called, Ἐπίσκοπος τῆς Κρήτης, the first Bishop of the Church of the Cretans: but by the concurrent testimonies of Euseb. Ecl. Hist. l. 3. c. 4. S. Amb. in prefat. ad Tit. S. Hieron. in Tit. c. 1. v. 5. and in his tract de Scriptori Ecclesiasticis. Theodoret cited by Occumen. in prefat. ad Ep. Tit. Occumenius himself in Tit. 1. and finally by Theophylact, in his Preface to the same Epistle. All which in plain terms call him Bishop, and the Bishop of Crete; according to that sense and meaning of the word Episcopos, as it was used in their times distinct from Presbyter. The Church hereof whilst wholly under the Greek Patriarchs was governed by four Archbishops, and 21 Bishops. But since the subjection of this Island to the State of Venice, there is but one Archbishop, which is he of Candie the chief City, and eight Bishops only: besides the titular Patriarch of Constantinople, who hath there his residence; some Prelate of the Latine Church having been always honoured with that empty title, ever since the recovery of that City from the Western Christians.

Famous was this Island amongst the Ancients for many things, memorized both by the Poets and old Historians. For here reigned Saturn in the first ages of the World, fashet of Jupiter, born here, and secretly nursed in the hill called Ida. For seeing that by the compact betwixt Saturn and his brother Titus, Saturn was to enjoy the Kingdom for his own life only, but all his male children to be murdered as soon as born; Jupiter, by the care of his mother Cybele, was conveyed away, and secretly nursed in Mount Ida, as before was said: the crying of the Infant being drowned by the noise of loud-sounding Cymbals, purposely used by his Rockers to avoid discovery. Whence afterwards the Corybantes or Priests of Cybele, used in her sacrifices the like musical instruments, continually founding, and withall shaking of their heads (like Fiddlers) in an antick and ridiculous manner. Alluding whereunto, thus the Poet Claudian;

Non te progenitum Cybelei are canoro
Imbravit Corybas.

That is to say,

No Cybeleian Corybas that day
That thou wast born, did on his Cymbal play.

Here also lived Minos and Radamanthus, whose Laws were after imitated in the prime Cities of Greece; and who for their equity on earth, are feigned by the Poets to be (together with Aeacus) the Judges in Hell. In this Island also lived the lewdly-lustfull Pasiphae, wife of Minos, who is fabled by the Poets (if it be a fable) to have doated on a white Bull, who they say, begat on her the Minotaure: Daedalus having framed for her an artificial Cow, into which she conveyed her self, and by that means obtained her desire. The fable is thus expounded, that Pasiphae was in love with Taurus, one of Minos Secretaries: whose company by the Pandarisim of Daedalus she enjoying, was delivered of two Sons; one called Minos, the other, Taurus. And whereas it is said, that the Minotaure was slain by Theseus, like enough that the annual tribute of 7 children which the Athenians paid to Minos, was laid up in some prison, Minos and Taurus being the Keepers or Jailors. As for the action of Pasiphae, I think it not altogether impossible to be true, considering how Domitian, to verify the old relation, exhibited the like beastly spectacle in his amphitheatre at Rome: for thus saith Martial.

Junctam Pasiphaen Dictæo credite, Tauro
Vidimus; accepti fabula prisca fidem.
Nec se miretur (Caesar) longæva vetustas,
Quicquid summa caput, donat arena tibi.

The Fable's prov'd a truth, our eyes did see
The Cretan Bull sport with Pasiphae.
What cause hath then antiquity to glory?
We saw it done, she only heard the story.

Finally, here was the so much celebrated Labyrinth, made by Daedalus for the including and safe keeping of the Minotaure; so full of various windings and turnings, that when any one was got to the end thereof, it was impossible for him to come out, but by the help of a clew of thread. By this Minotaure (half a man, half bull) the children of the Athenians paid yearly to Minos in way of tribute, are said to be murdered; till killed by Theseus son of Aegon King of Athens, with whom Ariadne the daughter of Minos falling in love, taught him a means to kill the Monster, and gave him the clew of thread before spoken of, to conduct him out again: the moral or history whereof hath been shewn before. Nor must it be forgotten, that Strabo the Geographer who flourished in the time of Tiberius Caesar,

Crete.

Cæsar, was of Cretan Parents (though born in the City of Amassia, in the Realm of Pontus) which adds unto this Island as much true renown, as any of the fictions or stories, (be they which they will) of the former times.

Things most observable at the present are these that follow. 1 That it breeds no Serpents, nor venomous worm, or ravenous or hurtfull creature; so that their Sheep graze very securely without any Shepherd. 2 If a woman bite a man any thing hard, he will hardly be cured of it; which if true, then the last part of the privilege foregoing (of breeding no hurtfull creature) must needs be false. 3 They have an herb called Alimos, which if one chew in his mouth he shall feel no hunger for that day, if Quade may be believed who speaks it. 4 Here is (besides many other medicinal herbs) that called Dilamum, or Dilamnos, of special vertue against poison, either by way of prevention or present cure, peculiar only to this Island: it affordeth great store of Laudanum, a juice or gum forced with incredible labour out of a certain tree called Cisso, of which the mountains yield abundance; good to cause sleep, if moderately and carefully taken; but if not very well prepared and taken with moderation, it brings the last sleep upon a man, out of which not to be awakened, till the sound of the last Trumpet raise him.

Chief Mountains of it, 1 Ida, now Pflorist, situate in the midst of the Island, begirt about with many fair and pleasant Villages, sheltered by it from the violence of Wind and Sun, the hill being so high, that from the top hereof both sides of the Island may be easily seen. Here Jupiter is said to have been secretly nursed, from hence called Idams. And at the bottom of it the Cretans use to shew some tracks of the ancient Labyrinth, being indeed no other than the ruins of some larger Quarry: the Labyrinth made by Dædalus being so detaced in the time of Pliny, that he knew not where to find any ruins of it. 2 Diète, now called Sethia, in some places Laffi, so high, that all the winter long it is covered with snow; yet all the sides thereof garnished with Cypress trees; a mountain of such fame, that the whole Island sometimes had the name of Diète, the City Dielynnia, the Promontory Dielynnium, and the Herb Dièlamos, all seeming to take name from hence. 3 Lenci, a long chain of Hills, so named from the whiteness of them, now called De Marina, and by some La Spachia.

Rivers of any eminence here are few or none. The Principal of those that be, are 1 Melipotamus, 2 Scafinus, 3 Epiciadus, and 4 Divotro, towards the North; 5 Populiar, towards the East, and 6 Limens, towards the West: none of them navigable, or capable of Ships of burden, scarce of little Barks. But that defect supplied by the neighbouring Sea, which affordeth many Creeks and Bays, some capacious Havens, and great store of Fish, among which a kind of bearded mullet reckoned among the delicacies of the ancient Romans. By the convenience of which Harbours, their Fish-trade, and the situation of it in the midst of the Sea, the people antiently were esteemed so good Sea-faring men, that when the people of those times did tax a man with any incredible report, they used to say, Cretensis nescit pelagus, meaning thereby the matter to be as improbable as for one of Crete to be no Saylor.

In former times there were reckoned in this Island an hundred Cities, thence called Hecontopolis, of which about 40 were remaining in the time of Ptolomy: for so many of their names he gives us. Those of most note were 1 Gnosus, the seat-royal or Court of Minos, whence Ariadne, the daughter of Minos, had the name of Gnosus; in former times called Ceratus, from a little River of that name running not far off. 2 Cydon, or Cydonia, a Midland City (as the former) memorable for an excellent kind of Apple, which the Latines call Poma Cydonia, amongst whom they were in great request, as they are at this day, (though by the name of Adams apples) amongst the Turks; the most ancient of all the Cities of Crete, many of which were at first Colonies of this; for which reason it was called commonly mater urbinum. 3 Eleuthera, as Ptolomy; Erythrae, as the printed Copies of Florus corruptly call it, one of the first Cities taken here by the Romans. 4 Miletum, mentioned by Strabo, though omitted by Ptolomy, the place in which S. Paul left Trophimus sick, as is mentioned 2 Tim. 4. 20. which happened when the Apostle hovered about that coast, as is said, Act. 27. 7. 8. &c. For that it could not be that Miletum to which he congregated the Elders of Ephesus, appeareth by his being at Hierusalem, Act. 21. 19. and other circumstances of the story. 5 Cortyna, high to which stood the Labyrinth made by Dædalus: memorable also for a reed, growing on the River Lenais, (near to which it stood) of which they made their strongest Arrows, by Virgil, Æneid. 11. called Spicula Cortyna; as also for a light garment much used by Hunters, which Claudian calls Cortyniam vestem, apprelling Diana the great Huntress with it. 6 Dilamum, as Ptolomy; or Dielynnia, as Pliny calls it, so named from the hill Diète, near to which it is situate; one of the chief Cities of the North parts of this Island; as 7 Ampelas, so named from its plenty of Vines, was upon the South. 8 Minos, a Port Town (now called Alotomara) so named from Minos, in the East; and 9 Corytus, on a Promontory of the same name in the West side of it.

But these and almost all the rest spoken of by Ptolomy, being so destroyed by time and wars, that the ruins of them are hardly visible, we must behold it in the present condition and estate thereof: divided into four parts or Provinces, according to the names and number of the four chief Cities, that is to say, 1 Sittia, 2 Candie, 3 Rhetimms, and 4 Canea.

In the first part called SITTIA, lying towards the East, are 74 Villages, and but 17 Parishes, of which six only are of the Church of Rome, the residue holding the Communion of the Church of Greece; the principal whereof are 1 Sittia, or Cytia, conceived by so some to be the Cissum of Ptolomy; a small Town, but populous and very well fortified. 2 Gerapetra, betwixt Sittia and Candia, seated on the Sea-side on a lofty rock, at the bottom whereof is said to be a dangerous whirl-pit, supposed to be the Panormus of Ptolomy. 3 S. Macor, the dwelling place of one of the Bishops of the Latines.

Crete.

2. In the second part hereof called the Territory of CANDIE, lying directly West of Sittia, are reckoned 465 Towns and Villages, making up amongst them 99 Parish Churches; whereof 77 are of the Communion of the Church of Greece, the other 22 only of the Church of Rome. Of these the principal, 1 Candia, an Archbishop See, the Metropolis or head City of the Island, which takes name from hence; situate on the North-coast hereof towards the Ægean, beautified with a safe and commodious Haven, and fortified so strongly, that it seems impregnable; affirmed by some to be the Mastum of the Ancients; but I find no such place in Ptolomy, or in Orelus his Thesaurus. The City fair and large, built for the most part of free-stone, with low roofs, after the manner of Italy, the streets broad and spacious: from whence a fair and pleasant plain leadeth to a place called the Cave of Minos, reported by the common people to be the Sepulchre of Jupiter. 2 Malvisin, 3 Thement, 4 Castell, 5 Bonifacio, 6 Belvedere, 7 Mirabello, of which little memorable.

3. In the third part, being the territory of RHETIMO, lying North-west of the territory of Candia, are accounted 265 Towns and Villages, making up 44 Parishes, whereof 36 are Græcians, and but 8 of the Latines. The chief of which are 1 Rhetimo in the shore of the Northern Sea, as Candia is, well fortified, and a Bishops See; but not else observable. 2 Melipotamo, an Episcopal See also, so called of the River Melipotamus, on which it is seated. 3 Agifiman, 4 Mandrus, 5 Lappa, hardly worth the naming.

4. In the fourth and last part hereof, being the Territory of CANEA, taking up all the West of the Island, are contained 240 Towns and Villages, distributed into 47 Parishes: of which 33 are of the Greek Church, and the 14 remaining of the Church of Rome. Those of most note are 1 Canea, built by a Colony or Plantation of Venetian Gentlemen on the North coast also, supposed to stand in the same place where once Cydon did; second to none but Candie for wealth and beauty; but far before it for the commodiousness of the Port, commonly called Porto della Suda, capable of more than a thousand good Gallies at a time, and therefore strongly fortified with two Cittadels, or Castles, on each side of the Haven, one; as the door and entrance of the Countrey. 2 Chisamo, in Latine called Cysaminus, old and decayed, the walls thereof only holding good against the ruins of time, situate in a low moorish place towards the Ægean. 3 Selino, built upon a hill on the Sea-side, opposite to Chisamo. 4 Spachia, or Spachia, situate on the foot of the mountains, of old called Lenci, now della Spachia from this Town: unwall'd, but fortified with a Castle, built for a place of refuge against the Incursions of such Barbats as annoyed the Coasts; in which the Governour for his part hath his chief abode. By which account it will appear that in the whole Island are no more than 1044 Towns and Villages, 207 Parish Churches: of which there be but 48 which are accounted Members of the Church of Rome, the residue 159 in number, retaining their Communion with the Church of Greece.

As for the story of this Island, we can ascend as high as the times of Saturn, for his Antiquity affirmed to be the Son of Uranus and Vesta, or of Heaven and Earth: who better favoured by his Mother, obtained the Kingdom of Crete, his elder brother Titan being quite excluded. Hereupon wars arising betwixt the Brethren, it was ordered thus, that Saturn for his own life should enjoy the Kingdom, which after his decease should return to the Titans: and for the performance of this contract the son of Saturn to be strangled as soon as born. But Cylele the wife of Saturn unawares to her husband, preserved first Jupiter, and after other of her Sons, which coming to the knowledge of Titan and his sons, they made war against Saturn, but in conclusion were subdued by the aid of Jupiter: whence grew the Fable of the Titans warring against the Gods, Saturn, and Jupiter his Son, being after reckoned in that number. The Titans being vanquished, a new war arose betwixt Saturn and Jupiter, occasioned only (as many unnatural wars since these times have been) by fears and jealousy: which ended at the last in the flight of Saturn, Jupiter became sole King of Crete, reigning there in great power and honour till the time of his death; and dying was interred at Gnosus, with this Inscription or Epitaph in old Greek letters, ὁ Ζεὺς ὁ Κρητὸς, that is to say, Jupiter, the Son of Saturn. After his death worshipped by the blind Gentiles, as the chief of their Gods; and honoured frequently with the title of Πατὴρ ἀνθρώπων διώων, the Father both of Gods and Men, though most incongruously, and absurdly, as Lactantius noteth, there being many thousands living, in and before the times of Saturn, when Jupiter was yet unborn. But to proceed, he being dead, Minos begotten by him on Europa, succeeded here: who wisely taking the advantage which the convenient situation of the Island gave him, made himself master of the Seas; and afterwards enlarged his Dominions, by the conquest of the Megarenses and Athenians, upon which last he imposed amongst other hard conditions, a tribute of seven male Children yearly, to be kept as Hofages; determined after three years, by the valour and good fortune of Theseus. But Minos being slain in Sicily, and his Posterity extinct, the Cretans would no longer admit of Kings, but governed themselves after the manner of a Common-wealth, or Free State: the Laws and Ordinances whereof first devised by Minos, were of such esteem, that they were much imitated by Lycurgus, and are at large described by Aristotle in the 2d Book of his Politicks, ch. 8. Under this Government it continued till the Romans, having taken in all the rest of Greece, picked a quarrel with them. For though it was pretended that they had been aiding unto Mithridates in his war against them, yet Florus states the matter rightly, affirming, that the war was undertaken on no other ground, but sola nobilitatem insulam vincendi cupiditate, a covetous desire only of subduing such a wealthy Island. And to this War they went with so proud a confidence, that M. Antony who commanded in it, carried more chains with him to bring home his Prisoners, than Arms to conquer them. An insolence which he paid right dear for, his Navy

Crete.

Navy being vanquished by the Cretans, the bodies of his slain Souldiers hanged upon the Masts, and himself perishing in the action, by a fit of sickness. Metellus, who succeeded him in that charge went on more successfully, first taking Gnosus, Elenibera (or Erythraea, as Florus calls it) and Cydonia, their principal Cities; and not long after all the Island: using the vanquished Islanders with such inhumanity, that most of them poisoned themselves to avoid his cruelty: rewarded with no other honour for so great a Victory, then that he got the surname of Creticus; his triumph being denied by the faction of Pompey, against whose will he had put himself upon that service. Thus added to the Roman Empire, it was united unto Cyrenicia by Augustus Caesar, both making up one Province only, governed by a Proconsul till the death of Nero: afterwards separated from it, but the time I find not. During the reign of Constantine, in 36 years together there fell no rain, so that this Island was in a manner wholly desolated. But Helma the mother of Constantine having obtained rain for it by her prayers to God, it was again new peopled by several Colonies brought out of Egypt, Syria, Greece, and the parts adjoining. By Constantine made a Province of the Diocese of Macedonia, it continued a member of the Eastern Empire till the time of Michael Balbus, when subdued by the Saracens: from whom recovered by the more fortunate conduct of Nicephorus Phocas, who came into the Empire Anno 963. In the division of the Spoil amongst the Latins, it was first given to Beniface, Marquis of Montferrat, by whom surrendered willingly to the State of Venice, who had a mind to be possessed of all the Islands of that Empire: he being recompensed with the Kingdom of Thessaly, the fair and wealthy City of Thessalonica, and many Towns and Territories in Peloponnesus. Under that State it still continueth, in vain attempted by Selymus the second, in the year 1571. at what time he invaded and conquered Cyprus: and gallantly defended for this year last past, against all the Forces of Ibrahim the late Grand Signor. What the success of this war will be we shall see hereafter.

For the defence hereof against the Insurrections of the Inhabitants, who did at first ill brook the Venetian Government, there are some standing forces kept in constant pay; besides such as are maintained in several Garrisons, the City of Canea having in it no fewer than six Companies of Souldiers; Candje 2000 Souldiers, and the lesser Cities proportionably: over which there is set so strong a guard, that a natural Cretan is not permitted to enter weaponed into any of them. And for the preservation of their interest in it from a foreign power, they have furnished the Island with 70 or 80 Gallies for the defence of the shores: and have exceedingly fortified the Haven of Suda, with two strong Castles, this Haven being capable of more than 1000 Vessels, and therefore meritoriously reputed the door and entry into the Countrey. It is reported, that the King of Spain, Philip the second, did offer unto the Venetians for this Haven, money more than enough; but it could not be accepted. For though the Spaniard seemed only to intend the retreat and relief of his own Navy, when he should undertake any expedition against the Turk; yet the wise Venetians saw, that by this Haven he might at all times awe, and when he listed, surprize the whole Countrey.

II. The other Islands of this Sea, as of lesser note, will be pass'd over in few words. The first of which is called CLAUD, mentioned Alt. 27. 16. situate on the South-west of Crete, by Antila called Gaulos; wherein in Plinius time was a Town or City named Gaudos; now called Goli, with the Island. 2 DI, now Standia, a very small Island, and of little note. 3 LETHA on the South-east of Crete, now called Christiana. And 4 AGILIA, or Agialia, by Pliny, Agila, more in the Sea towards Peloponnesus; now called Ceterigo by Sophianus. Of which, and others of less note (if less may be) there is no more to be said, but that they have always followed the fortunes of Crete, on which they seem to have their principal dependence.

10. The ISLANDS of the IONIAN SEA.

THE IONIAN SEA is so called either from Ionius, the Son of Dyrachius, whom Hercules having ignorantly killed, threw into this Sea, giving that name unto it to preserve his memory; as Didymus is of opinion; or from Iona, a Region in the extremity of Calabria, as Solinus; or from Io, the daughter of Inachus, as Eucyphron the Poet hath it. It containeth all that part of the Mediterranean, which lieth from the Aegean or Cretan Seas unto the Adriatick, from which parted about Epidaurum (otherwise called Dyrachium) as is said by Ptolomy: or rather at the shooting out of the Acroceraunian hills, as affirmed by Pliny and other writers; and so along the shores of the two Calabrias, to the Isle of Sicily. Chief Isles whereof which pass in the account of Greece, (for of those lying on the Coast of Italy we have spoke elsewhere) are 1 the Strophades, 2 Zacynthus, 3 the Echinades, 4 Cephalonia, 5 Corcyra, and 6 Ithaca.

1 The STROPHADES are two small Islands, now called Strivali, lying against Messene in Peloponnesus; famous for nothing but the Harpyes, ravenous birds, affirmed to have the Faces of women, but the talons of Vultures, sent by the offended Gods, (as the fable goeth) for the punishment of Phineus King of Arcadia, who had put out the eyes of his Sons by a former wife, at the instigation of their Step-dame. For which so plagued by these Harpyes, that he could see no meat on his Table, wheresoever he was, but these ravenous creatures first devoured it, and then bewrayed the dishes in which it was. Much pitied by the Argonauts, whom he had courteously entertained, they sent Zeithus and Calais the winged issue of Boreas and Orythia, who drave them thence, and having pursued them to those Islands, turned back again: whence the name of Strophades. Under which fable was contained the sad condition of ignorant or unhappy Princes, devoured by Flatterers, Informers, and false-accusers, by whom their name and Government was made distastful; till by good Counsel they had purged their Courts of such ugly Monsters: concerning which Alphonsus King of Naples was used to say, that these Harpyes had left the Strophades, and dwelt at Rome. They are inhabited only by some few Greek Friars: and in one of them there is a Spring of Fresh water, which hath his Fountain in Peloponnesus, and passing under the Sea, ariseth here. The Greek Priests are called Calairs, quasi caloi ista, boni Sacerdotes: About 30 in number: they wear long hair; never eat flesh, and but seldom fish: feeding usually on Herbs, Olives, Oyl, and the like: They never go out of the Islands, neither do they, on any occasion, permit women to come amongst them. They all labour for their sustenance, some in Tillage, some in Vineyards, some in Fishing; so that among very many of them, three or four only can read. But of these somewhat hath been said elsewhere already.

2 ZACINTHUS, or Zant, is 60 miles in compass; and distant from Peloponnesus 20 miles; so called of Zacynthus son to Dardanus. The Country is wonderfully stored with Oyl, Wines, Currans: of which last they made yearly 150000 Zechines, for their own Coffers; and 48000 Dollars which they pay for custom to the Signeury of Venice. They were a very poor people when the English used to traffique there first, but now they grow rich and proud. At our Merchants first frequenting the Country, they much marvelled to what end they bought so many Currans, and demanded whether they used to dye Cloathes, or fat Hogs with them; for so they themselves did: but now they have learned a more profitable use of them. Here are also very good Salt-pits, Fresh Water plenty, but little or no wood, and less Corn; their ground being husbanded, as the case stands with them, to their better advantage: but so that many times they are ready to starve, if either the Wind or the Sea prove cross unto them, and hinder them from fetching their provisions both of Flesh and Corn out of Peloponnesus. In which respect they are fain to hold fair Quarter with the Turks, considering how easie it is for him to distress them for want of Victual. The Island is much troubled with Earthquakes, commonly once a week; in regard whereof they build their houses very low; and when they perceive them coming, the Priests are to ring the Bells, to stir the people to prayers. They have a Custom here at Weddings to invite many young men whom they call Compeers; of which every one giveth the Bride a Ring. Which done, it is accounted as detestable a sin as Incest, to accompany her in any carnal kind; and therefore they choose such to be their Compeers, who have formerly been suspected of too much familiarity with her.

The Island is very populous and well inhabited, but the people of a spiteful and vindicative nature; not to be reconciled, if angered. It containeth in it 48 Towns and Villages, the chief whereof which passeth by the name of a Citie is called also Zant, stretched out about the length of a mile on the foot of a Mountain, but in breadth not answerable: beautified with a fair and convenient Haven opening towards Greece, safe from the danger of Pirates, though not of winds, capable of great Fleets of shipping; both for bulk and number; and so frequented from all parts, that he who hath a mind to go out of it, need not stay for a passage: yet notwithstanding this great concourse and resort of strangers, the Town is rather rich, than well built or beautiful: the streets hereof uneven and rugged, and the buildings, by reason of the often Earthquakes, very low. On the East side of it, on a round steep Mountain, standeth a very strong Castle, a little City of it self, well garrisoned, impregnable fortified, and of a very difficult entrance: which commandeth not the City and Harbour only, but a great part of the Sea adjoining. Upon the Wall thereof continually stands a Watchman, to descry what shipping is at hand, and hangerh out as many flags as he discovereth Vessels. And over the door of the Town-hall (the better to instruct the Magistrates in their publick duty) it is said these verses are inscribed:

Hic locus 1 odit, 2 amat, 3 punit, 4 conservat, 5 honorat,
1 Nequitiam, 2 pacem, 3 crimina, 4 iura, 5 probos.

Thus Englished by George Sandys, whence I had the Latine,

This place doth 1 hate, 2 love, 3 punish, 4 keep, 5 require;
1 Voluptuous riot, 2 peace, 3 crimes, 4 laws, 5 th' upright.

In matter of Religion, the people being generally Greeks both in birth and language, are for the most part of that Church also; but some adhere unto the Latine, each party having their own Bishop: of which the Greek Bishop hath his Cathedral in the Church of St. Nicolas, near unto the Haven (which it giveth name to) and therein a Monasterie of Calairs, or Monks of Basil; the Latine Bishop hath his residence and Cathedral within the Castle, and therein a Convent of Franciscans. The Jews have in this Town their Synagogue also: but there are not many of them, if not lately increased. In civil matters they are subject to the State of Venice, the Governour hereof (whom they call the Providore) having his residence in the Castle, assisted by a Chancellor, and two Counsellours, (all Gentlemen of Venice) whom they change every third year. The fortunes of this Island in former times; and by what means it fell to the Venetians, we shall shew anon.

But as weak a man as Ajax thought him, he was the Master Wit of Greece, for the times he lived in, and one that did as good service in the War of Troy, as the best Sword-man of them all. A War to which he went somewhat unwillingly, as fearing the sad consequences and events thereof: insomuch that he feigned himself mad, ploughing the shore, and sowing Salt in stead of Corn. But Palamides, to make trial whether this was real, or but counterfeit only, cast young Telemachus the son of Ulysses before the Plough: which he observing, either drove the Plough besides him, or lifted it over him. Discovered by this means, and engaging with the rest in the Trojan War, he found out the design of Thetis, and brought Achilles to it also; in the course whereof, by his wit and courage, he did very good service: brought against Diomedes in the action against Rhesus King of Thrace, and with Palamides in foraging the Country for provisions. By his policie was the Palladium stolten out of Troy, and consequently the City taken and destroyed; whose fate depended on the preservation of that fatal Relick. After the ending of the War, which held out ten years, he was with-held from Ithaca ten years longer by winds and tempests, and the displeasure of the Gods which favoured Troy: in which he saved himself from the enchantments of the Sirens, the allurements of Circe, the cruelty of Polyphemus; and after many dangers came home in safety. A man of so compleat a virtue, that Homer maketh him the Pattern of a temperate and prudent man, in the Books called Odyssey, (by his name as the Greeks pronounce it) as he doth Achilles, in his Iliads, of a compleat and perfect Soldier.

The Country is generally very rocky and barren, exceeding plentiful of Goats, but no Hares live in it: inhabited for the most part by Pirates and Exiles, men banished out of civil society, and willingly acknowledging no Superiour over them: but subject, if to any, to the State of Venice; which hitherto hath maintained these Islands against the Turks, though many times attempted by them in the most prosperous times of their arms and victories. For the Venitians being gratified at the taking of Constantinople by the Latines with almost all the Islands of the Aegean and the Ionian Seas (as being a people strong in shipping, and so most able to preserve a possession of them:) some of the greatest and most considerable, either for their riches, or commodiousness of situation, were furnished with convenient Garrisons in the name of the State. The rest they did bestow on the better sort of Citizens, to be defended and made good at their own costs and charges; who accordingly possessed themselves of one, two, or more of them, as they were of ability to set out their Gallies for the keeping of them: the Signeury having nevertheless a care of all, and to that end keeping a Fleet at Sea continually under one of their Admirals: whereby they did not only preserve those Seas from the Genoa Pirates, but for long time defended all their Islands also as well against the Greeks, as the Turkish Emperours. But all the Isles of the Aegean being lost to the Turks, except Cythera, and Tenos on the European, and Carpobor, or Scarpanto on the Asian side: they have now only Crete with the Isles adjoining, and those of the Ionian Sea, under their command, and these (but especially the Isle of Crete) endangered at the present by the Turkish Tyrant.

Thus having took a view of the several Provinces and Isles which belong to Greece, according to the ancient and present state of each particular: let us next take a view of the Grecian Emperours, who have had here their principal residence, and possessed the whole, though for a while their Empire was extended over all the East; as they here follow in this ensuing Catalogue of

The CONSTANTINOPOLITAN, GRÆCIAN, or EASTERN

EMPEROURS.

A.Cb.

- 331 1 Constantine, surnamed the Great, having reigned 12 years in Rome, translated his Imperial Seat to Constantinople, which himself had founded.
- 341 2 Constantinus, the second son of Constantine, in the division of the Empire, had for his part, Thrace, Constantinople, and all the Provinces of the East. After the death of his two Brethren, he remained sole Emperour, but resided for the most part in the East; a great Patron of the Arians, and as great a Persecutor of the Orthodox Christians.
- 366 3 Julian, surnamed the Apostate, son of Constantinus the Brother of Constantine the Great: at first a Christian, afterwards a professed Enemy of the Gospel: fortunate in his Wars against the Almans, Franks, and other Transalpine Nations, whilest he was a Christian: prodigiously slain in the Persian War, when become a persecutor.
- 368 4 Jovian, or Jovinian, chosen by the Army, a religious Prince, made peace with the Persians, and settled the affairs of the Christian Church: who being dead, Valentinian, one of mean birth, but great abilities in War, was elected Emperour.
- 369 5 Valens, the Brother of Valentinian, made partner in the Empire with him, ruled in Constantinople, and the East; Valentinian taking more delight in Rome, and the Western parts. A great Patron of the Arian faction, and the first who brought in the Goths on this side of the Danow, whom he placed in the desert parts of Thrace, to the destruction of the Empire and himself to boot.

- 382 6 Gratian, the eldest son of Valentinian, succeeded his Father in the West, and his Uncle Valens in the East; after whose death he left Italy and the West, to Valentinian his younger brother. Distressed by the Goths, he made Theodosius partner in the Empire with him, and was treacherously murdered by Andragathius, at the appointment and command of the Tyrant Maximian.
- 383 7 Theodosius, a Spaniard born, revenged the death of Gratian on the Tyrant Maximian, and of Valentinian the 2^d. on the Traitor Eugenius. He vanquished the Goths, utterly suppressed the Pagan superstitions, which till his time continued even in Rome itself; and strengthened the Church of Christ with good Laws and Ordinances.
- 399 8 Arcadius, the eldest son of Theodosius, succeeded his Father in the East, as his brother Honorius did in the West: the Roman Empire after this last division of it, being so distracted and torn in pieces, that it was never since united.
- 412 9 Theodosius II. son of Arcadius, made peace with the Goths, whom he employed against the Hunnes and Persians, his more dangerous Enemies, and caused the Ephesine Council to be called against Nestorius.
- 454 10 Martianus, Lieutenant to Theodosius, succeeded his Master, and married with Pulcheria his Masters sister; he called the Council of Chalcedon against Discorus.
- 461 11 Leo, a Thracian born, elected by the joyned consent of the Senate and Souldiery, sitting the Council of Chalcedon; the Acts whereof he approved and ratified.
- 478 12 Zeno, the son-in-law, and Lieutenant of Leo, sent Theodoric, and the Goths into Italy against Odoacer: A Tyrant and a great drinker, in one of his drunken fits, buried quick by his Emperors. In his time Constantinople was almost wholly destroyed by fire; in which perished amongst other things 120000 Volumes of good Manuscripts.
- 494 13 Anastasius, a mean Officer of the Court, by the power and favour of the Empress created Emperour; a great Patron of Eutiches; yet fortunate in his Wars against the Persians and Arabians. In his time Constantinople besieged by the Scythians, was likely to have fallen into great distress, if Proclus, a famous Mathematician, like another Archimedes, had not fired their Gallies.
- 511 14 Justin, the son of a Thracian shepherd, and Captain of the Guard unto Anastasius, a Catholic Prince, and Patron of the Orthodox Clergy, whom he called from banishment.
- 528 15 Justinian, the sisters son of Justinus, with whom first consort in the Empire, recovered Africa from the Vandals, by Belisarius, and Italy from the Goths, by Narses: and finally reduced the Laws of Rome into form and method.
- 566 16 Justin II. Nephew of Justinian, instituted the Exarchate of Ravenna, and lost a great part of Italy to the Lombards. Unable of himself to oppolite the Persians, he chose
- 577 17 Tiberius, one of his chief Commanders, to be consort with him, who afterwards succeeded in sole Command.
- 584 18 Maurice, a Cappadocian born, fortunate in his Wars against the Persians, from whom he recovered Mesopotamia in the time of Tiberius; by whom at his return married to Constantine his daughter, and declared his Successor. Refusing to ransom some of his Souldiers, taken prisoners by Caganus King of the Avars, he lost the affections of his Army.
- 604 19 Phocas, a Common Souldier, in a military tumult chosen Emperour, murdered the Emperour Mauritius, with his wife and children; and made Pope Boniface supreme Bishop or Head of the Church: slain in a popular tumult by the common people for his lusts and cruelties.
- 611 20 Heraclius, a noble man of Constantinople, chosen by the general consent, repaired the ruins of the Empire, vanquished the Persians, recovered Jerusalem out of their hands, and brought home the Cross unto Constantinople in triumphant manner, whence the feast called Exaltatio Crucis, September 14. In his time Mahomet began to disperse his dotages.
- 641 21 Constans, or Constantine II. son of Heraclius, unfortunate in his Wars against the Saracens, who prevailed in all places; picking a quarrel with the Romans he desaced Rome, robbing it of all the choicest Ornaments, which the Goths and other barbarous people had left: and ransacking the Isle of Sicily, was there slain by the women.
- 670 22 Constantinus III. son of the former Constantine, from his long or early beard, surnamed Pogonatus, repulsed the Saracens from Constantinople, but could not hinder the Bulgarians from passing over the Danow.
- 687 23 Justinian I. son of Constantine the 3^d subdued Mesopotamia, Armenia, and some part of Persia; forcing the Saracens to sue for peace, and become his tributaries. Against whom Leontius on the one side, and Abdimarius on the other, severally taking arms were declared Emperours: Justinian taken by Leontius, hath his nose cut off, and his person committed to custody: but making an escape, by means of Trebollin King of the Bulgarians, recovered his Imperial dignity; and being too violent in the pursuit of his revenge, was finally murdered at the Altar by the Command of
- 713 24 Philippus Bardanes, Admiral of his Navy, elected Emperour by the Souldiers, a great enemy of Images, which he caused to be cast out of the Church: whereby incurring the displeasure of

- 715 25 Anastasius II. called also Artemius, his principal Secretary, who thrust himself into the Empire; forced to relinquish it by that Army which he had raised against the Saracens: in which tumult the City of Constantinople was sacked and spoyled.
- 717 26 Theodosius III. made Emperor in this tumult by the Soldiers, hearing of the approach of Leo, Commander of the Eastern Armies, resigned the Empire, and took Orders to preserve his life.
- 718 27 Leo Isauricus, in whose time Caliph Zuleiman besieged Constantinople the space of three years, and when by cold and famine 300000 of the Saracens were slain, they desisted. At this Siege was that fire invented, which we for the violence of it call Wild fire; and the Lathigines, because the Greeks were the Authors of it, Græci ignis: by which the Saracens Ships were not a little molested. He was also a great enemy to Images, for which cause he was hated by the Pope and Clergie of Rome, who gave him thereupon the Nick-name of Iconomachus.
- 741 28 Constantinus IV. son of Leo, surnamed Copronymus, for that when he was baptized, he betrayed the Font; followed his Father's zeal in removing Images, which created him much trouble, one Ariabardus being chose Emperor against him, but at last defeated.
- 777 29 Leo III, son of Constantine Copronymus, honoured with the Adjunct of Porphyrogenitus, but commonly called Leo the 4th. (Leontius the Usurper (as I conjecture) being reckoned for one) an enemy of Images, and fortunate in his Wars against the Saracens.
- 782 30 Constantine V. the son of Leo and Irene first governed the Empire with his Mother, by whom at last supplanted, and deprived of sight, he died of a Melancholy.
- 798 31 Irene, wife of Leo, the 3d. first Consort with Constantine her son, and afterwards sole Empress of Constantinople: for her better support in which estate she sided with the Popes of Rome, and called the second Council of Nice for defence of Images. In her time Charls, surnamed the Great, was by the Pope and People of Rome created Emperor of the West. For the Popes knowing their own greatness to grow out of the ruins of the temporal power, committed the Empire of the West unto the French Princes: whereby the Greek Emperours became much weakened; and the French being the Popes Creatures, were in tract of time brought to their devotion. In following times, when Frederick Barbarossa, was by Pope Alexander the 3d. pronounced non-Emperor; Emanuel of Constantinople sued for a re-union of the Empires: but the crafty Pope returned this answer, Nemo sibi licere illi conjungere, quæ majores ejus de industria disjuncterunt: Let no man presume to joyn, what the God of Rome, the Pope, hath put asunder.
- 803 32 Nicephorus a Patritian, made Emperor by the Soldiers, persuaded that Irene had made choice of him to be her Successor: slain in a Pitch Field against the Bulgarians.
- 812 33 Michael, surnamed Euphrates, from his Office, (the Myrrour of the Palace as it were) his band to Procopia, the Daughter of Nicephorus, assumed the Empire: which, finding his own weakness, he did soon relinquish, and betook himself unto a Monastery.
- 814 34 Leo V. surnamed Armenius from his Country, General of the Horse to Michael, demolished the Images which his Predecessors had set up; slain in the Church during the time of Divine Service.
- 821 35 Michael II. surnamed Ballus, having murdered Leo, assumed the Empire; unfortunate in his Government, and died of madness.
- 830 36 Theophilus, the son of Michael Ballus, an enemy of Images, like his Father, and as unfortunate as he; losing many battels to the Saracens, at last died of Melancholy.
- 842 37 Michael III. son of Theophilus, first with his Mother Theodora, who took unto her self the supreme command; and after of himself sole Emperor; his mother being made a Nun.
- 866 38 Basilus, surnamed Macedo, from the place of his birth, made consort in the Empire by Michael the son of Theophilus, whom he basely and treacherously murdered; killed casually by a Stag.
- 886 39 Leo VI. for his Learning surnamed Philosophus, the son of Basilus, a vigilant and provident Prince; most of his time, with variable success, spent against the Bulgarians.
- 912 40 Constantine VI. commonly called the VII. son of Leo Philosophus, first under his Uncle Alexander, next under Zoe his Mother, and after under Romanus Lacopenus, governed the Empire: by which last so miserably depressed that he was fain to get his livelihood by painting. But Lacopenus being deposed and turned into a Monastery by his own sons, Constantine at last obtained his rights, and restored learning unto Greece.
- 961 41 Romanus, the son of Constantine.
- 963 42 Nicephorus, surnamed Phocas, first Governour or Protector to the young Emperor Romanus; and after whose death created Emperor by the Army, he recovered Antioch, Cilicia, and the greatest part of Asia minor from the power of the Saracens; slain in the night by John Zimisces, his wife Theophania being privy to it.
- 971 43 John Zimisces, Emperor in the place of Nicephorus Phocas, governed the Empire better than he did obtain it; vanquishing the Bulgarians, Rosses, and others of the barbarous Nations: and left it at his death to the sons of Romanus.

- 977 44 Basilus II. surnamed Porphyrogenitus, as many of the Emperours had been before him, in regard that at their births they were wrapped in purple (which the Greeks call Porphyrie) the Imperial colour: subdued the Bulgarians, and made them Homagers to the Empire.
- 1027 45 Constantinus VII. or VIII. brother of Basilus, and with him partner in the Empire; after whose death he governed three years by himself; but did nothing memorable.
- 1030 46 Romanus II. for his prodigality surnamed Argyropolis, husband of Zoe, the daughter of Constantine the 8. drowned in a Bath by the treason of his wife and her Adulterer.
- 1035 47 Michael IV. surnamed Paphlago from his Country, first the Adulterer, and afterwards the husband of Zoe; but died very penitent.
- 1042 48 Michael V. surnamed Calaphates, a man of obscure birth, adopted by Zoe, whom he deposed from the Government, and turned into a Monastery. Out of which being again taken, in a popular tumult, she put out the eyes of Calaphates, and being then 60 years of age, bestowed both the Empire and her self upon
- 1043 49 Constantine IX. surnamed Monomachus, formerly husband to a Niece of Romanus the 2d.
- 1055 50 Theodora, sister unto Zoe, after the death of Constantine, managed for two years the affairs of the Empire, with great contentment of all people. But grown in age, surrendered it to
- 1057 51 Michael VI. surnamed Stratioticus, an old, but military man, deposed within the year by
- 1060 52 Isaacius, of the noble family of the Comneni; valiant, of great courage, and diligent in his affairs: which having managed for two years, he left it at his death, with consent of the Senate and people, to
- 1063 53 Constantine X. surnamed Ducas, a great Justiciar, and very devout, but exceeding covetous, whereby he became hated of his subjects, and contemned by his enemies.
- 1071 54 Romanus III. surnamed Diogenes, married Eudoxia the wife of Constantinus Ducas, and with her the Empire. Took prisoner by the Turks, and sent home again, he found a faction made against him; by which Eudoxia was expelled; himself at his return, deposed, and so died in exile.
- 1075 55 Michael VII. the son of Constantinus Ducas, surnamed Parapinacius, by reason of the famine which in his time happened, made Emperor in the aforesaid tumult. But being found unable for so great an honour (the Turks prevailing in all places) he was deposed again, and put into a Monastery.
- 1081 56 Nicephorus II. surnamed Botoniates, of the house of the Phocas, succeeded in the place of Parapinace, deposed within three years by his enemies.
- 1084 57 Alexius Comnenus, son of the Emperor Isaacius Comnenus, obtained the Empire: in whose time the Western Christians with great forces prepared for the recovery of the Holy Land. Of whose purposes being very jealous, he denied them passage through his Country; in the end forced to find them victuals and other necessities.
- 1113 58 Calo-Johannes, the son of Alexius, had a good hand against the Turks, from whom he took Laodicea, and some other places of importance. He also vanquished the Scythians or Tartars passing over the Ister, most of which he either slew in battle, or sold as Captives; permitting the remainder to abide on this side that River. He also conquered the Servians and Bulgarians, transporting many of them into Bithynia.
- 1142 59 Manuel, or Emanuel, the younger son of Calo-Johannes an under-hand enemy to the Western Christians, and an open enemy to the Turks; by whom entrapped in the dangerous streights of Cilicia, and his Army miserably cut off, he was on honourable terms permitted to return again.
- 1180 60 Alexius II. son of Manuel, deposed, and barbarously murdered by Andronicus, the Confin German of his Father, with his wife and mother.
- 1183 61 Andronicus Comnenus, confined by Manuel to Oenum in Paphlagonia, by reason of his dangerous and ambitious practices; after his death, pretending to reform the State, came unto Constantinople: first made Protector, afterwards Consort in the Empire with young Alexius. Whom having barbarously slain, and got the Empire to himself, he was not long after cruelly torn in pieces in a popular tumult.
- 1185 62 Isaacius Angelus, a Noble man of Constantinople, and of the same Comnenian race, designed to death by Andronicus, was in a popular Election proclaimed his Successor; deposed by Alexius his own brother, and his eyes put out.
- 1195 63 Alexius Angelus, deprived his brother, and excluded his Nephew from the Empire; but it held not long.
- 64 Alexius Angelus II. son of Isaac Angelus, who being unjustly thrust out of his Empire by his Uncle Alexius, had recourse to Philip the Western Emperor, whose daughter Mary he had married: who so prevailed with Pope Innocent the 3d. (upon a promise for subjecting the Church of Greece to the See of Rome) that the Army prepared for the Holy Land, was employed to restore him. On the approach whereof Alexius the usurper fled; Alexius the young Emperor is seated in his Father's Throne, and not long after slain by Alexius Ducas. In revenge whereof the Latines assault and win Constantinople, make themselves Masters of the Empire, and divide it amongst them: allotting to the Venetians Candia, many good Towns of Peloponnesus, and most of the Islands; to Boniface Marquess of Monferrat the kingdom of Thessaly; to the others of the Adventurers other liberal shares; and finally, to Baldwin Earl of Flanders, the main body of the Empire, with the title of of Emperour. The seat of the Empire of the Greeks being transferred unto Nice a City of Bithynia in the Lesser Asia by Theodorus Lascaris, son-in-law to Alexius the Usurper, continued there till the regaining of Constantinople by the Greeks again; after it had been 60 years possessed by the Western Christians.

EMPEROURS of the LATINES in CONSTANTINOPLE.

- 1200 65 Baldwin, Earl of Flanders, first Emperour of the Latines reigning in Constantinople, taken in fight by John King of Bulgaria, coming to aid the Greeks, and sent Prisoner to Ternova, where he was cruelly put to death.
- 1202 66 Henry, the brother of Baldwin, repulsed the Bulgarians out of Greece, and dyed a Conquerour.
- 1215 67 Peter, Count of Anzerre in France, the son of Peter youngest son to Lewis the Gros of France, and Husband of Poland the daughter of Henry, succeeded in the Empire after his decease: cunningly entrapped by Theodorus Angelus a great Prince in Epirus, whom he had besieged in Dyrrachium. But of an Enemy being persuaded to become his Ghelt, was there murdered by him.
- 1220 68 Robert, the son of Peter, having seen the miserable usage of his beautiful Empress, whom a young Burgundian formerly contracted to her, had most despitefully mangled, cutting off both her nose and ears; died of hearts grief as he was coming back from Rome, whither his melancholy had carried him to consult the Pope in his affairs.
- 1227 69 Baldwin II. son of Robert by a former wife, under the protection of John de Breme the titular King of Hierusalem, succeeded in his Fathers Throne: which having held for the space of 33 years, he was forced to leave it: the City of Constantinople being regained by the Greeks, and the poor Prince compelled to sue in vain for succours to the French, Venetians, and other Princes of the West. And though both Philip the son of this Baldwin, and Charles of Valois, Father of Philip de Valois French King, in right of Catharine his wife, daughter of that Philip, did sometimes please themselves with the title of Emperours of Constantinople, yet neither of the two had ever any footing or possession there.

The EMPIRE restored unto the GREEKS.

- 1260 70 Michael VIII. surnamed Paleologus, extracted from the Comnenian Emperours, Emperour of the Greeks in the City of Nice, most fortunately recovered Constantinople; the Town being taken by a party of 50 men secretly put into it by some Country labourers under the ruins of a Mine. Present in person at the Council of Lyons, at the persuasion of the Pope he admitted the Latine Ceremonies into the Churches of Greece; for which greatly hated by his Subjects, and denied the honour of Christian burial.
- 1283 71 Andronicus II. vexed with unnatural wars by his Nephew Andronicus, who rebelled against him.
- 1328 72 Andronicus III. first partner with his Grandfather, afterwards sole Emperour.
- 1341 73 John Palaeologus, son of Andronicus the 3. in whose minority Contaczenus his Protector usurped the Empire, and held it sometimes from him, and sometimes with him, till the year 1357. and then retired unto a Monastery: leaving the Empire unto John, during whose reign the Turks first planted themselves in Europe.
- 1384 74 Andronicus IV. the son of Johannes Paleologus.
- 1387 75 Emanuel Paleologus, the son of the said John, and brother of Andronicus the 4th. in whose time Bajazet the sixth King of the Turks did besiege Constantinople; but found such notable resistance, that he could not force it.
- 1417 76 John II. son of Andronicus the 4th.
- 1420 77 John III. son of Emanuel Paleologus, in person at the Council of Florence for reconciling of the Churches; in hope thereby to get some aid from the Western Christians, but it would not be.
- 1444 78 Constantinus Paleologus the brother of John the 3d. In whose time the famous City of Constantinople was taken by Mahomet the Great, 1452. the miserable Emperour, who had in vain gone from door to door to beg or borrow money to pay his Souldiers, (which the Turks found in great abundance when they took the City) being lamentably trod to death in the throng. Now concerning this Empire of the Greeks, we may observe some fatal contrarieties in one and the same name: as first, that Philip the father of Alexander laid the first foundation of the Macedonian Monarchy, and Philip the Father of Persius ruined it. Secondly, that Baldwin was the first, and Baldwin the last Emperour of the Latines in Constantinople. Thirdly, that this Town was built by a Constantine, the son of Helena, a Gregory being Patriarch: and was lost by a Constantine the son of a Helena, a Gregory being Patriarch also. And fourthly, the Turks have a Prophecie, that as it was won by a Mahomet, so so shall it be lost by a Mahomet. So Augustus was the first established Emperour of Rome, and Augustulus the last: Darius the son of Hystaspis, the restorer; and Darius the son of Artabanus, the overthrower of the Persian Monarchy. A like note I shall hereafter tell you of Hierusalem. In the meantime I will present you with a fatal observation of the letter H, as I find it thus versed in Abiens England.

Not superstitiously I speak, but H this Letter still Hath been observed ominous to Englands good or ill.
First Hercules, Hefione, and Helen, were the cause
Of War to Troy; Aeneas seed becoming so outlaws.
Humber the Hun with foreign arms did first the Brutes invade, Helen to Rome imperial Throne, the British Crown convey'd.
Hengist and Horsus, first did plant the Saxons in this Ile:
Hungar and Hulba first brought Danes, that sway'd here long while.
At Harold had the Saxon end, at Harold came the Dane:
Henries the first and second did restore the English reign.
Fourth Henry first for Launcester did Englands Crown obtain.
Seventh Henry, jarring Launcester and Turk, unites in peace:
Henry the eighth did happily Romes irreligion cease.

A strange and ominous Letter; every mutation in our State being as it were ushered by it.

What were the Revenues of this Empire since the division of it into the East and West, I could never yet learn. That they were exceeding great, may appear by three circumstances, 1. Zonaras reporteth, that the Emperour Basilius had in his treasury 200000 talents of gold, besides infinite heaps of silver, and other monies. 2. Lipsius relateth, how Benjamin a Jew in his discourse of Europe, saith, that the custom due to the Emperours, out of the vituals and Merchandize sold at Constantinople only, did amount to 20000 Crowns daily. 3. We find, that at the sack of Constantinople, there was found an invaluable mass of gold, silver, plate, and jewels, besides that which was hid in the earth. For so the covetous Citizens chose rather to employ their wealth, than afford any part of it to the Emperour: who with tears in his eyes, went from door to door to beg and borrow money, wherewith he might wage more Souldiers for the defence of the Town.

The Arms of the Empire were Aurs, a cross Sol between four Greek Betas of the second: the four Betas signifying, (as Bodin saith) Βασίλειος, Βασιλεύς, Βασιλίδευς, Βασιλισσα.

It may perchance be expected that we should here make an additional Catalogue of those Turkish Emperours, who have reigned in Constantinople since the taking of it: and being they are possessed of Greece and do now inhabit it, that we should here also speak of the Turks themselves, their Customs, Forces, Policies, Original, and Proceedings. But the discourse of those things we intend to reserve for Turcomania, a Province of Asia, from whence they made their first inundation into Persia, and afterwards into other parts of the World now subject to them, the only Province which retains any thing of their name. And though the Peninsula called anciently Taurica Cherfoneusus (now part of Tartaria Propontica) be within the bounds of Europe also; yet we will defer the description and story of it, till we come to the affairs of the Tartars; and will here conclude our discourse of Europe, and prepare for Asia.

And so much for GREECE, the last of the Provinces of EUROPE.

COSMOGRAPHIE, The Third Book,

CONTAINING THE CHOROGRAPHE

LESSER and GREATER

ASIA,

AND ALL THE

Principal Kingdoms, Provinces, Seas, and Isles, thereof:

OF ASIA.

ASIA is bounded on the West, with the Mediterranean, and Egean Seas; the Hellepont, Propontis, Thracian Bosphorus, and the Euxine Sea, the Palus Maeotis, the Rivers Tanais and Donina, a line being drawn from the first of the two said Rivers unto the other, by all which parted from Europe; on the North, it hath the main Scythick Ocean; on the East, the Straights of Anian (if such there be) the Indian Ocean, and Mare del Zuy, by which separated from America; on the South, the Mediterranean, or that part of it which is called the Carpathian Sea, washing the shores of Anatolia; and the main Southern Ocean, passing along the Indian, Persian, and Arabian coasts: and finally, on the South-west, the Red Sea or Bay of Arabia, by which parted from Africa. Environed on all sides with the Sea, or some Sea-like Rivers, except a narrow Isthmus in the South-west, which joyns it to Africa, and the space of ground (whatsoever it be) betwixt Donina, and Tanais, on the North-west, which unites it to Europe;

It took this name, as some will have it, from Asia, the daughter of Oceanus and Thetis, the wife of Japetus, and (by him) mother to Prometheus: as others say, from Asius the son of Atis, a King of Lydia, from whence that Countrey first, afterwards all Anatolia; or Asia minor, and finally, the whole Continent, had the name of Asia. Others again (but more improbably) derive the name from Asius the Philosopher, who gave the Palladium unto the Trojans; in memory whereof that Countrey first, and after the whole Continent did receive this name. But these Originations being very uncertain, Bochartus (out of his great affection to the Punick or Phœnician language) will have it called so from Asa, a Phœnician word, signifying Medium, or the middle: because Anatolia, or the Lesser Asia, which gives name (as he conceiveth) to the Greater also, lieth in the middle, as it were, betwixt some parts of Europe and Africa. And so far the Conjecture doth find countenance from some antient writers, that Asia is said by Pliny to be inter Africam & Europam, to be betwixt Africa and Europe; by Mela, mediam nostris æquoribus except, to be embraced in the middle of two Seas (he meaneth Pontus Euxinus, and the Mediterranean) and finally, by Eusebinius (conceive them all of Anatolia, or the Lesser Asia) ῥητοῦ ἀπορίῃ ἔχειν ἀδύνατον, to have a middle situation betwixt Europe and Africa. But by what name, and on what grounds soever it be called by the Greeks, and Latines; it is otherwise, and with better reason called in holy Scriptures by the name of Semias; as being that portion of the world, wherein the whole posterity of Sem had their seats and dwellings; if the observation of Maginus be of any weight.

It is situate East and West, from the 52. to the 169 degree of Longitude; and North and South, from the 400 Towns; some of them destroyed by Earthquakes, the falling sickness of most great Cities in the East) but most by war and have little now to boast of but the commodiousness of the Havens, which are very many; though most of them but meanly traded, as in a Countrey ill manured, and of little manufactures.

Bithynia

The people antiently, especially those of Greek original, and the nations bordering on the Euxine, were very warlike and industrious: the rest, especially the Lydians, and those of the greater Phrygia, as idle and effeminate, wholly addicted to their pleasures. All of them at this time affected with the same disease, inasmuch that the Turk, (unless compelled thereto by extreme necessities) never inroll their Children in the number of Janizaries. The greatest part of them generally profess the Christian faith; but overpowered by Mahometanism, which is here most prevalent: all followers of the Church of Greece, and subject all (except those of Isauria and Cilicia) to the Patriarch of Constantinople. And as they are of the Communion of that Church, so they retain the Greek Liturgies for Sacred Offices; nor so well understood amongst them as in former times, when it was more generally spoken there than it is at the present; now over-topped in most places by the Turkish and Slavonian tongues. And though in former times, by reason of the many Greek Colonies planted in this Countrey, the Conquest of it by Alexander the Great, and the subjection of it to the Syrian Kings of the Macedon race, that language became generally understood amongst them; in so much as three of the Greek Dialects, viz. the Dorick, the Ionian, and the Eolick, were spoken here: yet did it never so prevail, as to become the Vulgar language of the people, or to extinguish any of the Vulgar tongues. For it is said of Mithridates King of Pontus, that he understood two and twenty languages, without any Interpreter; which were no other than the languages of so many Nations subject to himself, whose Dominion was contained for the most part within Asia Minor.

Principal Mountains of this Countrey, are Hermione in Pontus, Argæus in Cappadocia, Ida in the Lesser Phrygia, Olympus in Mysia, Tmolus in Lydia, Amamus in Cilicia, and finally Antetaurus, and Scordiscus in Armenia Minor: Out of which, for the most part, flow the chief Rivers hereof, that is to say, Iris (now Caslmach.) 2 Thermodon. 3 Hallis (now Ottomangruch.) 4 Parthenius (now Dilop.) 5 Sangarius (now Sangry.) All of them falling into the Euxine Sea. 6 Ascanius. 7 Rhyndacus. 8 Æsupus, and 9 Granicus, passing into the Propontis. 10 Simois. 11 Scamander, called also Xanthus, enoing their short course in the Hellespont. 12 Caicus. 13 Hermus. 14 Caystus, and 15 Meander, losing themselves in the Ægean. 16 Calpis. 17 Xanthus, called also Lycus. 18 Limychus. 19 Catareates, dischanelling into the Mæditeranean; and 20 Melus, adding to the waters of the great River Euphrates. Of most which we shall speak more particularly in their several places.

In reference to the State of Rome, it contained the whole Diocese of Pontus, except Armenia the Greater; the Asian Diocese intirely, without any exception; and the peculiar jurisdiction of the Proconsul of Asia; together with the Provinces of Isauria and Cilicia, parts of the Diocese of the East. But because the names of many of those Provinces were of new invention, and some of them of as short continuance, we will consider it according as it stood divided antiently, and before the Romans had made any conquests in it, into the Provinces of 1 Bithynia. 2 Pontus. 3 Paphlagonia. 4 Galatia. 5 Cappadocia. 6 Armenia Minor; which (together with Armenia Major) made up, though in other names, the Pontick Diocese. 7 Phrygia Minor. 8 Phrygia Major. 9 Mysia the greater and the lesser. 10 Asia, specially so called, comprehending Eolis and Ionis. 11 Lydia. 12 Caria. 13 Lycia. 14 Lycæonia. 15 Pisidia. 16 Pamphilia. 17 the Province of the Rhodes, all comprehended under the command of the Vicarius and Proconsul of Asia. 18 Isauria. 19 Cilicia, parts of the Diocese of the East, as before was said.

BITHYNIA.

BITHYNIA is bounded on the East with Pontus, and the River Sangarius; on the West, with part of the Euxine, the Thracian Bosphorus, and part of the Propontis; on the North, wholly with the Euxine; and on the South, with Mysia, and Phrygia Minor: Formerly called Betrycia, afterwards Mygdonia, and at last Bithynia, and that as some say from Bithynius, once a King hereof; more probably from the Thyni, a people of Thrace, who passed over the Bosphorus, and subdued it, called therefore by some writers Thracia Asiatica. So witnesseth the Poet Claudian, saying, Thyni Thraces erant, quæ nunc Bithynia fertur.

By Justin the Historian it is called by the name of Metapontus, by reason of its neighbourhood to the Euxine, and the Pontick Regions.

The Countrey naturally rich, and in those parts hereof which lie next the Bosphorus, opposite to Constantinople, so plentifully enriched with fruitful hills, and pleasant Orchards, when kept by the more curious Christians, that it was thought not to be inferior to the so much celebrated Tempe: now robbed of all those former beauties by the carelessness of the Turks, who affect neither art, nor sumptuousness, in their retirements and delights.

Chief Rivers hereof are Phillis. 2 Sangarius, now called Sangri, both falling into the Euxine Sea; this last arising from Mount Dindymus, in the furthest parts of Phrygia Major; and making two long reaches in his journey hither. 3 Ascanius, which rising also in Phrygia Major, but more near the borders of this Countrey, falleth into the Propontis, making the Bay called Sinus Ascanius; Which with a lake in the same Countrey called Lacus Ascanius, doth plainly manifest, that the Bithynians are derived from Askenaz, the son of Gomer, and grand-son of Japhet.

The

Bithynia.

The Principal Towns hereof are 1 Scutari, over against the Haven of Constantinople, called antiently Chrysopolis, for that there the Persians received their tribute from the other Cities of all these parts of Asia Minor. An ample Town, well garrisoned within, and surrounded round about with most pleasant Orchards, and honoured with the neighbourhood of a Royal Seraglio. Not far off is a Tower called the Maiden-Tower, serving both for a Fort and watch-tower; and being furnished for defence with 20 pieces of Ordnance. 2 Caledon, on the same shore also, a Colony of the Mægarenæses, called blink by the Oracle, for neglecting Byzantium, and choosing the less convenient place for their habitation. And yet did Constantine the Great resolve upon the same place also for his Regal City; but changed his resolutions on a kind of miracle: it being observed, that when his workmen began to draw the platform, some Eagles conveyed away their lines to the other side of the Bosphorus, and let them fall directly upon Byzantium. Memorable after that for the fourth General Council there assembled by command of the Emperour Martianus, for repressing the heresie of Nestorius; in which were 500 and 30 Bishops: now so decayed, that it can only shew some few of the ruines of it; Scutary being risen on the fall thereof. 3 Nicomedia, so called from Nicomides King of Bithynia (the son of Ziper, and grandchild to that Bithynian King, who so valiantly defended his own and his Countreys liberty against Cassander, one of great Alexanders Captains) by whom founded: Situate on the top of an hill, environed with a pleasant and delightfull plain, honoured with the seat and residence of many of the Roman Emperours, when their affairs called them into the East, before the building of Constantinople; on that occasion made the Throne on which many of Gods Saints received the Crown of Martyrdom, especially in the persecution under Dioclesian. In those times wealthy, and of fame, now much decayed; but notwithstanding well inhabited both by Greeks and Turks, for the commodiousness of the fresh springs which are thereabouts. 4 Libussa, betwixt Nicomedia, and the River Ascanius; memorable for the death and sepulture of the famous Antibal, who to prevent his being made prisoner to the Romans, when Prusias King of Bithynia intended unworthily to betray him, here made away himself by poison. 5 Prusa, founded by another Prusias, whose name it beareth; a large and wealthy City as most in Asia: honoured for a long time with the residence of the Turkish Kings, till the removal of their seat to Adrianople, by Mahomet the first; and still ennobled with the sepulture of the Princes of the Ottoman race, except the Emperours themselves. By the Turks called Bursa. 6 Nica, or Nicaa, by the Turks called Neichia, but most commonly Isaichs, situate near the fens of the River Ascanius, occasioned by the frequent overflowings of that River: by some affirmed to be the Metropolis of Bithynia; but I think Nicomedia hath more right to claim that honour. First named Antigonis, from Antigonus the founder of it; and afterwards Nicaa, by the name of Nica, wife unto Lysimachus: both of them Captains of the Great Alexander; which last had the happiness to survive the overthrow of the former, and was the longest liver of those Great Commanders. Sufficiently famous both in Ecclesiastical and Civil story, for the first General Council there holden, by the appointment of Constantine the Great, Anno 314. for settling the peace of the Church, then miserably distracted by the Arian Heresie. The number of Bishops there assembled, no more than 318. yet of such high esteem for learning and piety, that never Council hath been held in so great an Honour. Here was also held the Council by the Emperess Irene, for establishing the veneration of Images; that passing by the name of the Nicene Council, the Act thereof might be of greater reputation amongst ignorant men. In which it was decreed by such doubtful Arguments, as Let us make man after our own Image, once mainly insisted on by a Legate of the Eastern Churches, that they should be revered and adored in as ample and religious manner, as the blessed Trinity it self. This City was also the Imperial City of the Greek Emperours, after the taking of Constantinople by the Western Christians, and there continued till the expulsion of the Latines, under these Emperours of the GREEKS residing at NICE.

A. Ch.

- 1200 1 Theodorus Lascaris, son-in-law to Alexius Angelus the Usurper, upon the taking of Constantinople by the Latines, passed over into Asia, and fortifying the City of Nice, made it the head City of this Kingdom, containing Bithynia, both the Phrygia, both the Mysia, Lydia, Eolis, and Ionis.
- 1223 2 John, surnamed Ducas, the husband of Irene daughter of Theodore Lascaris, succeeded his Father-in-law in the Empire; to which he added Pontus, most of the Isles of the Ægean, and not a few places of importance in Thrace it self.
- 1256 3 Theodorus II. the son of Ducas.
- 1259 4 John II. the son of Theodore the second, an Infain of about six years old, supplanted first, and after cruelly deposed and deprived of sight.
- 1259 5 Michael Palæologus, descended from the Imperial family of the Comneni, first took upon him as Protector of the Infant-Emperour, and afterwards as his associate in the Empire: in which confirmed by many fortunate successes, as well against the Latines, as some Greek Usurpers in Thessaly and Peloponnesus, especially the taking of Constantinople; he deprived the young Emperour of his sight, made himself sole Emperour, and left it unto his posterity, who held it with a great deal of trouble and continual disquiets, till the year 1452. when conquered by Mahomet the great, as before was said. But this recovery of Constantinople was the loss of Nice, taken not long after the removal of the Imperial seat, by Sultan Ottoman, Anno 1299. who presently thereupon took on himself the title of King, from which before he had abstained.

As

As for the fortunes of Bithynia, it self, I look upon the Bithynian as a Thracian people, whom both Sirabo and Herodotus speak of, as the founders of the name and Nation. Of such a King of theirs as Bithynius I find some mention in my Authors; and possibly it might be he who had the leading of the Thyni, or Bithyni, in this expedition; that being the name rather of his Nation, than his proper Family. But for the line of Kings which held out till the flourish of the Roman greatness, they begun to reign here some few generations, before the time of Philip, and Alexander, the Macedonians: by which last, having other employment, and lying out of the road towards Persia, they were little troubled. Calanus one of Alexander's Captains, made an expedition into their Country, and was vanquished by them: and afterwards they had to do with one of the Lieutenants of Antigonus, (one of Alexander's greatest Princes;) who though he humbled them for the present, yet got he neither title nor possession by them: And thus they held it out till the time of Prusias, so shuffling with the the Macedonian and Syrian Kings, that betwixt both they still preserved their own estates. This Prusias, when the Romans became so considerable, as that no danger need be feared from Greece, or Syria, peeced himself with them: and having aided them in their wars against Philip, and Antiochus both, and most unworthily promised to deliver Annibal (who had fled to him for succour) unto their Embassadors, made all sure to this side. His son and successor Nicomedes, being outed of his Kingdom by Mithridates King of Pontus, and restored again unto it by the power of the Romans, held it as their Fendatory, as did Nicomedes, his next Successor, surnamed Philometor: who dying without issue in the time of Augustus, gave the whole Kingdom to the Romans. By them, with the addition of that part of Pontus which lay next unto it, it was made a Province of their Empire, by the name of Pontus and Bithynia, continuing so till the division of that Empire into the Eastern and Western; when falling to the share of the Constantinopolitans, and with them to the power of the Turkish Tyrants, who do still possess it.

2 PONTUS.

PONTUS is bounded on the East, with Colchis, and Armenia; on the West, with Bithynia, and the River Singarius; on the North, with the Euxine Sea; and on the South, with Phrygia Major, Paphlagonia, Galatia, and Cappadocia. So that it taketh up the whole length of Anatolia, or Asia Minor, from Bithynia, to the River Euphrates, which parts it from Armenia Major; but not of answerable breadth: and gives name to the Sea adjoining, à Ponto regione illi adjacenti ita appellari, as Ortelius hath it; called from hence Pontus by the Latines, the adjunct of Euxinus coming on another occasion, which we have spoken of before. A Country of a large extent, and therefore divided by the Romans (when Masters of it) into these four parts, viz. Metapontus, or Pontus specially so called. 2 Pontus Galaticus. 3 Polemoniacus, and 4 Pontus Cappadocius.

1 PONTUS, especially so called, or Metapontus, bordering on Bithynia, and bounded on the East with the River Parthenius, which divided it from Paphlagonia, had for the chief Cities thereof. 1 Claudiopolis, so called in honour of Claudius, the Roman Emperour; as 2 Flaviopolis, in honour of Flavius Vespasianus; and 3 Julisopolis, in honour of the Julian family; all midland Towns. 4 Diopolis, on the Euxine Sea, so called from a Temple consecrated to Jupiter, of great resort. 5 Heraclea, a Colony of the Phocians, called for distinctions sake, (there being many of that name) Heraclea Ponti: memorable of late times for being the seat or residence of a branch of the Imperial family of the Comneni; when at the taking of Constantinople by the Western Christians, David and Alexius Comneni fled into these parts: the first fixing here his Royal residence, commanded over this part of Pontus and Paphlagonia; the other possessing himself of Cappadocia and Galatia, made Trabezond his Regal or Imperial City. But these two Empires, though of the same date, were of different destinies: that of Heraclea and Pontus, being partly conquered by the Greek Emperours residing at Nice, and partly seized on by the Turks; in the beginning and first fortunes of the Ottoman family; the other keeping up the Majesty and State of an Empire, till the year 1461. when subdued by Mahomet the Great. 6 Phillium, at the mouth or influx of the River Phillis upon which it is seated. 7 Amasris, the farthest Town of this part towards the East, on the Sea-side also, once of great strength, but taken by Lucullus, together with Heraclea, Synope, Amisus, and other Towns, in the war against Mithridates, the great King of Pontus.

2 Eastward of Pontus, specially so called, or Metapontus, as Justin the Historian calls it, lyeth PONTUS GALATICUS, so named, because added to Galatia in the time of the Romans. The chief Cities whereof were 1 Synope, pleasantly seated on a long point or Promontory, shooting into the main; remarkable in ancient story for the birth and sepulture of Mithridates, before mentioned; and in the later times for being the chief seat of the Iffendiars, a noble family of the Turks; who had taken it with the rest of this tract from the Comneni, and held it till the same year in which the Empire of Trabezond was subdued by Mahomet. First built by the Milesans, and continuing in a free estate, till taken by Pharnaces, a King of Pontus, and made the Metropolis of that Kingdom. 2 Castamona, the head City of the Principality of the Iffendiars, before mentioned; preferred by them for strength and conveniency of situation, before Heraclea, or Synope. 3 Themiscyrya, now called Favagoria, seated on a spacious plain near unto the Sea, and antiently giving name to the Province adjoining. 4 Amisus, the birth-place of Sirabo the Geographer, remarkable in the Ecclesiastical Histories for the Martyrdom of St. Theodorus, and of late times for being the residence of the eldest Sons of the Grand Signeur, sent hither as soon as circumcised, never returning back again till the death of their Father. Accompted now amongst the Cities of Cappadocia, and the chief of that Province: a midland Town, as also is 5 Calira, call'd afterward Diopolis, memorable for the great defeat which Lucullus gave there unto Mithridates; more for the trick which Mithridates there put upon Lucullus. For being well acquainted with the co-

ness of the Romans, he saw no better way to save himself and the rest of his forces after the defeat, than to scatter his treasures in the way which he was to take; that by this means his enemies might slacken the pursuit to collect the spoils, and he preserve himself to another day; and so accordingly it proved. 6 Eomana, to difference it from another of that name, called Comana Pontica; to which other being, of Cappadocia, or Armenia Minor, Mithridates came in safety by the trick aforesaid; and thence escaped unto Tygranes the Armenian King, with 2000 horse.

3 Eastward of Pontus Galaticus lies POLEMONIACUS, so called by the Romans either from Polemonius a chief Town of this tract, or from Polemo the last King hereof; after whose death this Kingdom came unto the Romans. Places of most importance in it, 1 Polemonium on the Sea-side, spoken of before. 2 Hermanassa, a Sea-town also: More in the land; 3 Neo-Cæsarea (now Nixaria) the Metropolis of Polemoniacus, when made a Province of it self. 4 Zela; enlarged by Pompey, and called Megalopolis; by Constantine laid unto the Province of Helenopontus. 5 Sebastia; so called in honour of Augustus, whom the Greeks called Sebastos; a place of great strength, and one of the first Towns in the Lesser Asia, which held out against Tamerlane: in revenge whereof, when he had took it, he caused 12000 men, women, and children, to be most cruelly buried alive in some hollow pits, which he had digged for that purpose. Nigh to this City is Mount Stellas; where Pompey gave Mithridates his fatal overthrow: where also Tamerlane with an Army of 800000 of his Tartars, encountered with Bajazet the Turk, coming to the relief of Sebastia, with an Army of 500000 fighting men. The issue of which fight was this, that Bajazet having lost 200000 of his foaldiers, was himself taken prisoner, and carried by the insolent Conquerour in an iron cage, against the bars whereof he beat out his brains. 6 Barbaniassa. 7 Megaloessus. 8 Gedavia, &c. not much observable in story.

In this part of Pontus is the rise and fall of the River Thermodon, on the banks whereof the Amazons, sort of warlike women, are said to dwell; so called either quasi dyacas, because they used to cut off their right pappes, that they might not be an impediment to their shooting; or from a and μαζα, σινεπαις, because they used not to eat bread; or from a and μαζα, because they used not to live together. They were originally of Scythia, and accompanied their husbands to these parts, about the time of the Scythians first irruptions into Asia, in the time of Sesostris King of Egypt. The leaders of this people into Cappadocia, were Phinos and Scopisphus, two young men of a great house, whom a contrary faction had banished. They held a great hand over the Themiscyrii, who inhabited this Region, and the Nations round about them. At last they were by treachery all murdered: But their wives now doubly vexed, both with exile and widowhood, and extremity of grief and fear producing its usual effect, desperateness; they set upon the Conquerours under the conduct of Lampedo and Marpesia; and not only overthrew them, but also infinitely enlarged their Dominions, and for some time continued in great reputation: the names of whom, or of so many of them at least as occur in story, we shall here subjoin.

The Amazon Queens.

1 Lampedo, } First Queens of the Amazons in these parts.
2 Marpesia, }
3 Ortara.

4 Asiopia, whose sisters Hippolite and Menalippe, challenged Hercules and Theseus to single combat, and were at last hardly vanquished, to their eternal credits.

5 Penthesilea, who came with a troop of brave Viragos, to the aid of Priamus King of Troy: she invented the Battail axe, and was at last slain by Pyrhus, son to Achilles. Long after her death reigned Thyrhis, who came to Alexander, being in Hyrcania, and plainly told him that she came to be his bedfellow; which done, she returned; and at last by little and little this female Nation was extinct. They used in matters of copulation, to go to their neighbouring men thrice in a year: if they brought forth males, they sent them to their fathers; if females, they kept them, and trained them up in all discipline of war and courage. Of these more elsewhere.

6 The most Eastern part of Pontus, called CAPPADOCIUS, for that it bordered on that Province, and for a time was added to it by the Romans; extended from Polemoniacus to Colchis, and the River Euphrates; the utmost boundaries of this Country. Places of most consideration in it, 1 Pharnacia, built by Pharnaces, a King of Pontus. 2 Cerasus, by Constantine laid unto the Province of Polemoniacus, from whence Cherries were brought first to Rome, An V. C. 680. called therefore Cerasa by the Latines; brought first into Italy by Lucullus, at the end of his war with Mithridates, no less deserving for that service to be made a God (as wittily Tertullian scoffs it) then Bacchus was for his transplanting of the Vine from the Eastern Countreys. 3 Ischopolis, on the Euxine Sea, as the others are. And so is also, 4 Trapczus, now Trabezond, the Imperial City of the Comneni, here reigning over Cappadocia, Galatia, and these parts of Pontus. An Empire founded first by Alexius Comnenus (Nephew of the great Tyrant Andronicus Comnenus by his son Emanuel) who at the taking of Constantinople by the Western Christians, fled into these parts, which willingly submitted unto his command. Anno 1200. Here his posterity flourished in great prosperity, preserving the Majesty of the Empire in a better measure, than the Constantinopolitans themselves, till the time of David the last Emperour; in whose reign the City of Trabezond, and therewith all the whole Dominion belonging to it, was taken by Mahomet the Great; the poor Emperour led prisoner unto Greece; and there cruelly murdered. A famous Empery, and specially for the trade of fish, caught by the people on the shores of the Euxine Sea; here falked, and from hence transported in great quantities, to Constantinople, Cæsarea, and other places. And for their better help herein, it is said that there is a Mountain not far from this this City, affording a black stone, which being beaten in a Mortar serves in stead of salt, wherewith they season the fish, which they send abroad. A City honoured heretofore with the residence of the Lord Deputies, or Lieutenants of the Grecian Emperour; for defence of the out-parts of the Exum against the Persians; and now the Station of such Gallies, as are maintained by the Grand Seigneur, to scout the coasts of the Black Sea, and secure their trade. More in the land stand 5 Zephirium, 6 Aza, 7 Coclia, 8 Cordyle, and many others named in Strabo, but not else observable.

The ancient inhabitants of this Countrey were called LEUCOSTRI, or White Syrians, governed by a race of Kings descended from the Royal house of Achæmenes King of Persia. The first of them called Mithridates, one of the seven Competitors for the Persian Kingdom, on the death of Cambyses. But that honour falling on Darius (of which more hereafter) he seated himself in these remote parts of Asia Minor; the Ancestor of many great and puissant Princes, but none more memorable than one of his own name, Regum Orientis post Alexandrum Magnum Maximus, the most potent King of all the East since the time of Alexander the Great, as my Author hath it. A Prince of great abilities, both in war and counsel, and one who longer held it out against the Romans, than Pyrrhus, Annibal, and the great Kings of Macedon, and Syria, had done together. This was that famous Mithridates, who being once a friend and confederate of the Romans, took their part against Aristonice; who would not consent to the admission of the Romans unto Pergamus, according to the will of Attalus. Afterwards, conceiving an ambitious hope to obtain the Monarchy of Asia, in one night he plotted and effected the death of all the Roman Citizens dispersed in Anatolia, being in number 150000: in like manner, as in after times the English, taught perhaps by this example, murdered all the Danes then resident in England; and the Sicilians massacred all the French, inhabiting Sicilia, as we have formerly declared. He dispossessed Nicomedes, son to Prusias, King of Bithynia; Ariobarzanes, King of Cappadocia; and Philumenes, King of Paphlagonia, of their estates; because they persisted faithful to his enemies of Rome. He excited the Grecians to rebell, possessed himself of Athens, and divers places of importance in Greece, Thrace, and Asia; and allured all the Isles, except Rhodes, from their obedience to the Romans. And finally, having disturbed their victories, and much shaken their estate, for the space of 40 years, he was with much ado vanquished by the valour and felicity of L. Sylla, Lucullus, and Pompey the Great; three of the greatest Souldiers that ever the Roman Empire knew. Yet did not the Roman puissance so much pluck down his proud heart, as the rebellion of his son Pharnaces, against him; which he no sooner heard, but he would have poisoned himself; but having formerly so used his body to a kind of poison, allied, (which from his inventing of it, we now call Mithridat) that the venom could not work upon him, he slew himself. He is said to have been an excellent Scholar, and to have spoken perfectly the languages of 22 Nations; the languages of so many Nations which were subject to him. But neither his learning nor his courage could preserve him from those common miseries, which ordinarily attend a falling greatness. And so ended this long and tedious war, exceeding troublesome to the Romans, but withall very beneficial. For under colour of having given aid to Mithridates, they took in Crete, Galatia, Colchis, Iberia, and both Armenias; inasmuch as it is truly said by L. Florus, totum pene Orientem & Septentrione involvit, that in his ruines he involved both the East, and North. But to proceed, after his death the Kingdom continued unto his posterity, but Tributaries to the Romans, till the time of Nero: when Polemo the last King hereof dying without issue, it was cantoned and divided into many parts, and laid unto the Provinces of Bithynia, Galatia, and Cappadocia; only that part of it which was called Polemoniaca, retaining the dignity of a Province, distinct and separate. And so it remained till the reign of Constantine the Great, who changing the names, lessening the bounds, and increasing the number of the Provinces, left only the Province of Pontus and Bithynia, in the state he found it. And for the rest, he cast it into two new Provinces, that towards the East, retaining the name, but not the bounds of the old Polemoniaca, wherein were the Cities of Trapezus, Neo-Cæsarea, Cerasus, Comana Pontica, Palamonium, and Petrevum Civitas, called afterwards Iustiniana; of which Neo-Cæsarea was the Metropolis. That towards the East, separated from the Province of Pontus and Bithynia, by the River Partheminus, he caused to be called Helenopontus, by the name of Helena his Mother: and thereunto assigned the Cities of Amasia the Metropolis of it, Ibora, Enchaita, Zela, Andrapus, Egeum, Climacus, Sinope, Anisus, and Leontopolis. But this division held not long, both being united into one, and called Helenopontus, by Iustinian; continuing after that a member of the Roman Empire, till the coming of David and Arxius Comneni from Constantinople; whereof the one reigned in Heraclea, and the other in Trabezond, as before is said. But their estates being overthrow, it remains wholly to the Turks, who do now possess it.

The Arms of the Emperours of Trabezond, the greatest Princes of these parts, till the Turks subdued them, were Or, an Eagle volant Gules.

3 PAPHLAGONIA.

PAPHLAGONIA is bounded on the East, with the River Halys, by which parted from Cappadocia; on the West, by the River Partheminus, which parteth it from the Province of Pontus and Bithynia; on the North, with that part of the Kingdom of Pontus, which was named Galaticus; and on the South, with Phrygia Major, and Galatia. So called of Paphlago the son of Phineus, eldest in it by his Father, who had newly conquered it.

The Countrey was but small, and of little power, and consequently the Cities were not very many, and of no great note. The principal of such as were, were 1 Gangra, observable for a Council holden there in the Primitive times, Anno 339. commonly called Synodus Gangrensis. 2 Conica, or Cometa, of so convenient a situation, that it was entrenched and fortified by Mithridates, when he was master of

of this Countrey. 3 Pompeopolis, raised out of the foundation of some lesser town, by Pompey the great, and by him so named. 4 Germanopolis. 5 Xoana. 6 Andrapa, called afterwards Nova Claudiopolis, to difference it from another City of that name in Pontus.

This Province, though but small in circuit, was heretofore the seat of four different Nations, viz. 1. The Tibareni, of whom it is said, that they never waged war on any enemy, but they faithfully certified them before-hand, of the time and place of their fight. 2. The Heptacometæ. 3. The Mossynoci, both which were a people so beastly and shameless, that they used to perform the work of generation in public; not knowing that Multa sunt honesta facta, quæ sunt turpia visa: and 4. The Heneti, to whom the Persians, as we have already said, do owe their first original. The Kings which ruled in this Countrey, derived themselves from Philomene, who assisted Priamus King of Troy in his defence against the Greeks; in memory of whom, this Region for a while was called Philomenia. Applying themselves unto the times, they were always favourable to the strongest, serving the Persian, and submitting to Alexander as he passed that way; and so maintained their estate without much molestation, till the time of Mithridates King of Pontus: who finding them firm unto the Romans, then growing to great power in the lesser Asia, deprived Philomene, then King hereof, and took the Kingdom to himself, fortifying the chief Towns and places of it. Restored again unto his Kingdom by the power of the Romans, he gave it to them at his death. But the Countrey being very much wasted, and most of the Cities of it destroyed and desolated in the course of that war; it was not thought worthy a particular care, and therefore laid unto Galatia. Not reckoned a distinct Province in the time of Saint Peter, who writing to the Jews, dispersed in Pontus, Cappadocia, Galatia, Asia, and Bithynia, takes no notice of this Paphlagonia; nor was it otherwise esteemed than as a member of Galatia, in the time of Polomy. Afterwards it was joyned to Pontus, by the Emperour Constantine: part of it after that, with some parts of Pontus and Bithynia, being made into a new Province by the Emperour Theodosius, and called Honorius, in honour of his son Honorius; whereof Claudiopolis, a City of Pontus properly so called, was made the Metropolis. But by Iustinian the name of Honorius being abolished, and that of Paphlagonia revived again, the whole Countrey, as before limited, was governed by an Imperial Officer, whom he called Prætor Iustinianus: continuing under the command of the Constantinopolitans, till the taking of that City by the Lathins. After which made a Member of the Empire of Trabezond, till the conquest of it by the Turks, by whom called Rom.

4 GALATIA.

GALATIA is bounded on the East, with Cappadocia; on the West, with the River Sangarius, and some part of Pontus specially so called, or Metapontus; on the North, with Paphlagonia; on the South, with Lycania. So called from the Galls, who having ranged over Greece, passed into Asia, and brought a great part of it under their command: but being broken by Attalus King of Pergamus, and drove out of Myssa and the lesser Phrygia, were at last confined to this Countrey. It was also called Galla Græcia, from that mixture of Galls and Grecians; who uniting into one body when they came for Asia, were commonly called Gallo-Græci. By Suillas, Græco-Galli, and the Countrey suitably Græco-Gallia. Which mixture of Grecians notwithstanding, the Galls (being both the greater and prevailing Party) not only preserved their own Language, but in short time made it the common Language of the whole Countrey. And it continued so till S. Hierons days, who telleth us in the Preface to his Commentaries on Saint Pauls Epistle to this People, that it was Simillimus Trevirensium, a language like to that of the Treveri, or people of Triers. A sure and certain Argument of their first Original.

The Countrey very plentifull of all manner of fruits, even unto voluptuousness; and providently provided of the stone called the Amethyst, which is said to preserve from drunkenness the man that weareth it. The name doth signifie as much, derived from A privativum, and μεινός, ebrius, which cometh from μεινός, signifying wine.

The people had a custom in their publique funerals, to cast letters fairly written, into that last and fatal fire, wherein the dead body was to be burned; supposing that their friends should read them in the other world. Much given to Sacrifices, in the number and frequency whereof they excelled all Nations: inasmuch that Athenæus telleth us of one Arimæus a rich Galatian, that he feasted the whole Nation for a year together with the Sacrifices of Bulls, Sheep, Swine, and other provisions, boyled in great Caldrons made for that purpose, and distributed amongst them in Tents and Booths erected for that entertainment. A brave flash of a vain-glorious hospitality.

Rivers of note here are not any, but what are common unto them with their neighbouring Nations, as Halys, Sangarius, and some others. The Towns of most consideration in it were, 1 Ancoya, on the banks of the River Sangarius, the chief City of the Tectosages, a Gallick Nation, and the Metropolis of the whole Countrey; memorable in Church-story for a Synod here held in the Primitive times, Anno 299. called Synodus Ancyranæ, but of most note at the present for the making of Chamlets, now called Angeli. 2 Olenus. 3 Agrinæa, Cities of the same people also. 4 Tavium, or Tanium, (for I find both names) the chief City of the Trocmi or Trogmi, where was a brazen statue of Jupiter, whose temple there was a privileged Sanctuary. 5 Androsia, 6 Phabarena, Cities of that Nation also. 7 Therma, a Roman Colony, so called of the hot Baths there; the chief City of the Tolistobii, as Strabo, or Tolistobii, as Strabo nameth them. 8 Talachbachora, belonging also to that people.

Besides the Nations above named, here dwelt also the Byceni and Procliminæ; who had also their peculiar Cities, mentioned by name in Strabo, but of little or no observation in the course of story. Of all all which Nations, only the Troasages, were of Gallick Original; who with others of their Countrymen under the conduct of Belgius and Brennus, having ransacked Pannonia and Illyricum, fell at last into Macedon; where having tyrannized a while, and laid waste the Country, they were at last vanquished and expelled by Antigonus Gonatas. After this overthrow, under the conduct of Lamurinus and Latorius, they ferried over the Hellspoint, and subdued almost all Asia Minor on this side the Taurus; employed there by those petty Kings and States against one another: their reputation grown so great, that no Prince thought himself secure without their alliance, or able to make war without their assistance. The very Spitzers of that age; as mercenaries, but more faithful unto those that hired them. But being over-rigorous in compelling their neighbouring Princes to become their Tributaries, and too severe in the exacting of their Tributes, they enforced Attalus King of Pergamus, by whose favour they had settled about the Hellspoint, to become their enemy. Vanquished by him, they were constrained to certain themselves within the bounds of this Province, which from them in the following times was called Galatia, and Galligracia. Here for a while they kept their ancient courage and estimation, molesting many times their neighbours, and sometimes letting themselves to hire in the wars of others; but in the end they lost both courage and esteem, and were Galls only in name, retaining little in them of their Ancestors' valour. For as most plants and trees lose much of their virtue, being transplanted into another soil: so these men lost their native courage, strength, and hardiness, being weakened by the Asian pleasures and delicacies. And as Tully saith, for a man to be good in other places, is no mastery; but in Asia to lead a temperate life, is indeed praise-worthy: so might one have said to the Galls, that to be courageous and patient of travel amongst the mountains, was no whit to be admired; but to have continued so amidst the delights of Asia, had been indeed meritorious in them. But these men were so far from assailing the Romans in the Capitol, that they lost their own Country to Manlius, a Roman General. A war which Manlius undertook for no other cause, but that they had been aiding to Antiochus against the Romans; nor was there any memorable act performed herein, but that of Chionnia, the Kings wife, who being ravished by one of the Roman Captains, took her advantage whilst he busied himself in telling the money agreed on for her ransom, to cut off his head; which she presented to her husband. But Manlius got little honour by his success, not being welcomed with a triumph, at his coming home, according to the Roman custom; because he undertook the war of his own accord, without commission from the Senate. And yet the Senate was content to enjoy the fruits of it, keeping the Galatians as their Subjects, and the Kings their Fendatories. This happened An. U. C. 564. After which time, I find Deiotarus, by consent of the Romans, to reign here as King: who siding with Pompey in his war against Cesar, incurred the anger of the Victor; and had died for it, had not Tully pleaded his cause, and obtained his pardon. But he being dead, his Country in the time of Augustus was made a Province of the Empire; Lollius Paulinus being the first President or Governour of it: enlarged afterwards with the addition of Paphlagonia, and some part of Pontus, from whence called Galatians. Reduced to its first bounds by the Emperor Constantine, and divided into two Provinces by Theodosius; the one called Galatia Prima, the other Salutaris, from its medicinal waters. Of both which Ancyra remained the Metropolis. In the falling of the Eastern Empire, it was partly seized on by the Turks; nor totally come into their hands, till the subverting of the Empire of Trabesond, upon which it depended. By the Turks at this day called Chianger.

S CAPPADOCIA.

CAPPADOCIA is bounded on the East, with Armenia Major, and some part of Armenia Minor; on the West, with Galatia; on the North, with Pontus Polemoniacus, and Cappadocia; and on the South, with Lycania, and the rest of Armenia Minor. So called of the River, as Pliny telleth us, which runneth betwixt it, and Galatia.

The Country very plentiful of wine, and most kind of fruits, rich in mines of Silver, Brass, Iron, and Allom: affording also besides a mean sort of Alabastrer, good store of Crystal, Jasper, and the Omyx stone. But the greatest wealth hereof is their breed of horses, infinite almost in numbers, and fit for any service they can be put to. And this is universal, in all parts of the Country, but not the other: there being some parts of it mountainous and very barren, especially about the spurs and branches of the Antitaurus; which is a chain of hills thrusting out of the Taurus, and bending themselves unto the North, upon the edges of this Country, and the two Armenias. Here is also in this Country the mountain Argus, said to be of so great an height, that from one of the summits or tops thereof, a man of perspicuous eyes may discern the Euxine on the one hand, and the Mediterranean on the other.

The People of this Country in the time of the Romans were of ill report, so vicious and lewd of life, so monstrously addicted to all kind of wickedness, that besides the share they had in the old Greek proverb, of τετα κεννα κδυστα, they had some proverbs to themselves: Καταδδυστα, and Καταδδυστα ησαν, that is to say, a man of Cappadocia, and a Cappadocian Monster, being used pro verbally, to signify a man most extremely wicked. The words so used by Gregory Nazianzen, speaking of Gregory or George, the Arian Patriarch of Alexandria, if either Suidas or Erasmus, two right learned Criticks, understand him rightly. And they made good the Proverb in the times of the Gospel: Gregory that bloody butcher of Alexandria, Auxentius, Asterius, Eustathius, principal Patrons of the Arians, and that Arch-Heretic Eunomius, being all of this Country. Yet such is the influence of Christianity, where once entertained, that this lewd disposition of the Cappadocians was so corrected and restrained by it, that this Country afforded as many godly Prelates, and courageous Martyrs, as any others whatsoever. Highly commended for it by Nazianzen before remembred; who with Gregory Nysian, and and St. Basil, all learned and religious Bishops, were all Cappadocians. And amongst many Martyrs of great faith and constancy, St. George, a noble Cappadocian, Colonel or Tribune of soldiers under Dio-clesian, more celebrated in the Churches both East and West, than any other Saints in all the Calendar, the blessed Apostles and Evangelists excepted only, and for that reason made Patron of the Order of the Garter by King Edward the third. Finally, it is reported of these Cappadocians, that they were not only morally wicked, but naturally venomous also; inasmuch that if a Serpent did bite any of them, the mans blood was a poison to the Snake, and killed him.

Principal Rivers of this Country, were 1 Halys, spoken of before, which had here its Fountain and Original; the end of Croesus Empire both in fire and fate, the utmost bound of his dominions on that side: which purposing to pass over in his way to Media, which he intended to invade, he was encountered with, and vanquished by Cyrus the great King of Persia. 2 Iris, which ariseth in this Country also, and passing thorough it, and a part of Pontus, dischannelleth it self, as the other doth, in the Euxine Seas.

Places of most observation in it, 1 Mazaca, beautified and enlarged by the Emperor Tiberius, after the uniting of this Province to the Roman Empire; and in honour of Augustus Caesar, by him called Caesarea: the Metropolis of Cappadocia, and the Episcopal See of renowned St. Basil. 2 Nysa, the See of Gregory, surnamed Nysenus, the brother of Basil. 3 Nazianzum, the Episcopal See of another Gregory, surnamed Nazianzenus: three men, which as for the piety of their conversation they were not equalled in those times; so for their admiral abilities in all kind of learning, nothing more inferior to the most eminent of the ancient Greeks. 4 Tjana, the Metropolis of Cappadocia Secunda, after the subdivision of it by the Emperor Valens. 5 Archelais in the Prefecture of Gardnacrete, so called from Archelais a Cappadocian King, the founder or repairer of it. 6 Comana, for distinctions sake called Comana Cappadocia, to difference it from another of that name in Pontus; by Plutony placed, I know not why, in Armenia Minor; as is also Nysa before mentioned. Memorable in old times for a Temple consecrated to Belona, whose Priests, and other inferior Officers of both Sexes, amounted in the time of Strabo to 6000 and upward; for maintenance of whom the Priests received the Revenues of the Region next adjoining to it; in honour next unto the King, and commonly of the same kindred also. 7 Dio-Caesarea; called formerly Cabira, as we find in Strabo. 8 Faustopolis, so called in honour of Faustina, wife of the Emperor Antoninus. 9 Andraca. 10 Phia, 11 Salambrida, 12 Campa, spoken of by Plutony, with many others as obscure, and not worth the naming. Of more note, though not found in the ancient Writers, is 13 Erzurum, situate on the very confines of the Greater Armenia, for that cause made the Rendez-vous, or place of meeting for the Turkish Soldiers when there is any expedition in hand against the Persian; at which place also after the ending of the war for the present year, they are disbanded and sent home to their several quarters. And 14 Pterium, not named in Plutony; but memorable for the great battle fought in sight thereof, between Croesus King of Lydia, and Cyrus of Persia; in which Croesus having lost the field, and with it his Kingdom, found the Oracle true (though not in the sense which he expected) that Croesus passing over the River Halys, should overthrow a great estate, as indeed he did; but it was his own, and not the Persians.

That the Cappadocians are derived from Togurmas, the Son of Gomer, hath been so fully proved already in our General Preface, that we shall not trouble our selves to repeat it here: Nor shall we need to say more in confuting of their opinion, who would fetch Capthorim out of Egypt from the rest of his brethren, to plant him in this Country, than hath there been said. Their fortunes in the former times I find little of: subjected by the Persian, with the rest of Asia Minor, after the overthrow of Croesus, who before had given the law unto it, as to the Phrygians, Paphlagonians, Bithynians, Mysians, and others of the neighbouring Nations. By Cyrus given, together with Alossa his Sister, to Pharnaces a noble Persian, who had saved him from the fury of a ravenous Lion running upon him with full mouth, as he was a hunting. A noble loyalty, and no less royally rewarded. From him descended Ariarathes King hereof in the time of Alexander the Great; continuing steadfast in his duty to the Crown of Persia, when almost all the rest of the Kings of Asia yielded to the Enemy. Nor did Alexander call him to account in his march for Persia. But after his decease, Perdiccas having the command of the Army, set upon him, vanquished him, and most cruelly crucified him, together with as many of his kindred as could be found. One of his sons, who fortunately had escaped this slaughter, spying his time, when the Macedonians were at wars amongst themselves, recovered his estate again, and passed it over to his off-spring: continuing in his line, without any subjection, till the time of that Ariarathes, who by Mithridates was deprived of his dominion, as was told before. Restored again unto his Kingdom by the power of the Romans, he became their Homager, holding, as did his Successors, by their charter only: Continuing yet in state of Kings, till the death of Archelais the last King hereof; Who having angered Tiberius for not attending on him when he lived at Rhodes, during the life time of Augustus, as did others of the tributary States and Princes; was by him then possessed of the Empire, cited unto Rome under colour of projecting somewhat against the State. Where the old Prince, even spent with Age, the Gout, and some other Diseases, had without question been condemned by the servile Senate; but that one of the witnesses deposed, that he had said, that if ever he went back into Cappadocia, Tiberius should find, quales sibi nervi essent, what a man he was. Which moved such a laughter in the Senate, the old King being neither able to sit nor stand, that he was dismissed: Tiberius thinking that he could not punish him more effectually, than to let him live. A favour which the old King construed to the best, and in the way of gratitude, bequeathed his Kingdom at his death to the Empire of Rome. Being added to the Roman Empire, it was exceedingly enlarged by the addition of the greatest part of the Kingdom of Pontus: and so it stood in the time of Ptolomy, who reckoneth Pontus Galaticus, Cappadocius, and Polemoniatus, as parts and Members of this Province. Divided besides those into these eight Præfectures, that is to say, Claniantensis, Sargaranensis, Gardiocretæ, Cilicia, Tyanidis, Lycæonia, Antiochiana, and Cætanina. But Pontus, Lycæonia, and Antiochiana (he means Pisidia as I take it) being made Provinces of themselves, by the Emperour Constantine; it returned unto its natural bounds, and made one Province of the Empire, of which Cæsarea, as is said before, was the Metropolitan: and so remained, till the Emperour Valens, a great Patron of the Arian faction, of purpose to despight St. Basil, who opposed that Heresy, created another Province out of it, called Cappadocia secundæ, whereof the Metropolis was Tyana. After this it continued part of the Eastern Empire, till the erecting of the new Empire of Trabzon; together with which it fell into the hands of the Turks; by whom the whole Province with the addition of Pontus, is now called Anatolia, after the name of that City, which the Beglerbeg of Anatolia honoureth with his residence; and is said to yield yearly to the Grand Seigneur 60000 Ducats.

6. ARMENIA MINOR.

ARMENIA MINOR is bounded on the East, with Euphrates, which parteth it from Armenia Major; on the South, with Mount Taurus, which separates it from Cilicia; on the West, and North, with a long chain of Hills, called Mons Scordiscus, by some called Mons Amanus, by others Anti-Taurus, according to the change of places; by which divided from Cappadocia. Of the reason of the name hereafter.

The Countrey of the same nature with Cappadocia, before described; in some parts overgrown with Mountains, by which, and by the River Euphrates to inclosed and fenced, that it is difficult of entrance: in others pleasant and delightful, well watered with sweet streams, and some fair Rivers issuing out of the Mountains, the principal whereof is Melas, so called from the blackness of the water thereof, which falleth into the Euphrates.

Divided in the time of the Romans into these four Regions, that is to say, Leviana, Aravena, Melitene, lying on the Euphrates; Moriana more within the land towards Cappadocia: each of which had their several Cities, whose names are to be found in Ptolomy. The principal 1 Melitene, the chief City of the Region so called, and the Metropolis of the lesser Armenia. Called afterwards Malaxia, and now Suur: the Territory thereof abounding in Oyl and Wine, not inferior to the best of Greece. The City said by Onuphris to be a Colony of the Romans; much spoken of by Eusebius, and other Writers of Ecclesiastical story, for the piety of the Christians there inhabiting in the fiery times of Persecution. 2 Nicopolis, and 3 Orómandus in the Mountain Countries; the former built by Pompey, in memory of his victory there obtained against the forces of Tigranes, King of Syria, and both Armenians. 4 Garnace, a well-fortified Town, mentioned by Tacitus in the twelfth book of his Annals, and by him called Gorneas. 5 Cucusun, and 6 Arabyssus, memorable for the exile of St. Chrysostom, Patriarch of Constantinople, confined unto these places by the power and malice of the Emperess Eudoxia, by whom hated for his Orthodoxie in points of faith; who dying afterwards at Comana of Cappadocia, was there interred.

This Countrey was once part of Cappadocia, till the Armenians by their incursions and Colonies possessed themselves of it, and gave unto it the name of Armenia Minor: continuing part of their estate till the war of Mithridates against the Romans; who being discomfited by Lucullus, fled with two thousand Horse to the Court of Tigranes the Armenian, who had married his daughter. By whom at first neglected, and not suffered to come into his presence; but afterwards on the apprehension of the common danger, more esteemed and set by: inasmuch that his royal entertainment there, and the refusal of Tigranes to yield him up when required by the Romans, occasioned Lucullus to bring his forces into these parts, subduing all before him to the banks of Euphrates. His Victories being seconded by Pompey, and confirmed by Augustus, this Countrey was made a Province of the Roman Empire: the greater Armenia, lying on the other side of that River, though conquered also in that war, not being taken into the account of the Roman Provinces, till the time of Trajan, Augustus thinking it an high point of wisdom (as no doubt it was) not to extend the Empire beyond those banks. After this it continued Roman, till the declining times of the Eastern Empire; when wasted by the Persians, and subdued by the Turks; by whom called Genech, or as some say Pegia.

And so much of the Provinces of the Pontick Diocese, lying within Anatolia, or Asia Minor; converted to the Christian faith by the two great Apostles of the Jews and Gentiles; as appeareth by S. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians, and St. Peter's to the Strangers dispersed in Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia and Bithynia.

7. ASIA PROPRIA.

Come we now to the ASIAN Diocese, and first to that part thereof which Ptolomy and others (for the reasons spoken of before) call Asia Propria. Antiently the most rich and flourishing part of all this Peninsula; and so affirmed to be by Tully, who telleth us that the tributes which the Romans had from other places, hardly sufficed to defray the publick charges for defence thereof, Asia vero tam opima est & fertilis, ut & ubertate agrorum, & varietate fructuum, & magnitudine passionis, & multitudine rerum rerum qua exportentur, facile omnibus terris antecellat. But as for Asia (saith he) it is so fertile and so rich, that for the fruitfulness of the fields, variety of fruits, largeness of pasture-grounds, and quantity of commodities which were brought from thence, it very easily excelled all other Countreys. The for-fortunes of the several Provinces we shall see anon. Brought under the command of the Persians, they continued subject to that Crown, for some generations: but at last taken from them by the Greeks, under the prosperous enligens of victorious Alexander. After whose decease, the Empire being divided among his Captains, Asia fell to the share of Antigonus, whose son Demetrius seized on the Kingdom of Macedonia, and left Asia to Seleucus Nicator, King of Syria and the East, being also one of Alexander's heirs. The list from this Seleucus, was Antiochus called the Great, who waging war with young Ptolomy Philopater, King of Egypt, committed by his father to the protection of the Romans, and otherwise practising against their estate, provoked the Senate of Rome to send Scipio (surnamed from his Asian victories) against him; who compelled him to forsake Asia, which the Romans presently took into their possession. But finding it agreeable to the present estate of their Affairs, (the Kingdom of Macedonia standing in their way) to make further use of Eumenes King of Pergamus, and the people of Rhodes, who had been aiding to them in the former war, they gave unto Eumenes the Provinces of Lycæonia, Phrygia, Mysia, Ionia, Lydia; Lycia and Caria to the Rhodesians: knowing full well, that they could easily take them back again, when they saw occasion. More hereof in the story of the Kings of Pergamus, on the decease of Attalus the last King thereof; these Provinces returning fully to the power of the Romans.

It contained only after the account of Cicero, the Provinces of Phrygia, Mysia, Caria, Lydia, as he reckoneth them up in his Oration for Flaccus: computing the two Phrygias for one Province only, and comprehending Æolis and Ionia, under that of Lydia. But for our more punctual and particular proceeding in it, we will consider it as divided into 1 Phrygia Minor. 2 Phrygia Major. 3 Mysia. 4 Æolis and Ionia, or Asia more especially so called. 5 Lydia, and 6 Caria.

7. PHRYGIA MINOR.

PHRYGIA MINOR, is bounded on the East, with Mysia, interposing betwixt it and the Greater Phrygia; on the West, with the Helle-spont; on the North, with the Propontis; on the South, with the Ægean Sea. Called Phrygia from Phryx, a River in the Greater Phrygia; or as some say, from Phryxus, the son of Athamas King of Thebes, who flying from the treacherous snares of his Mother-in-law, did here feat himself. Minor was added to it to distinguish it from the other Phrygia, which being the bigger of the two had the name of Major. It was also called Phrygia Helle-spontiacæ, from its situation on that Strait: and Troas, from Troas the chief City of it; by which name it occur- reth in the book of the Aët. It was called also Epistetus, but the reason of the name I find not, except it came from the Episteti, a People dwelling on the East parts of Bithynia, and consequently near this place.

Chief Rivers of it, 1 Scamander, whose Banks stood the renowned City of Troy, honoured by Hesiod with the title of Divine Scamander: in which the Virgins of this Countrey a little before they were to be married, used to bathe themselves, and to say these words, Μέλας τὸς μὲν Ζεῦσιν ἀνδρῶν μαγδαρίαν, that is to say, Take O Scamander my Virginity. Which opportunity Cimon an Athensian taking, clapped a Coroner of Reeds upon his head, like a River-god, and so deflowered Callirhoe a noble Virgin, then betrothed to another: occasioning thereby the leaving off of this foolish custom. It was also called Xanthus by the Poets, Xanthus, bibbissens, as in Virgil, and watered a little Region called Lycia, whence Ovid in his first Epistle useth Lycius hæstium, (Sanguine Telepolemus Lyciam tep: fecerat hæstium) to signify a Trojan Spear. But of this more anon in the greater Lycia. 2 Æsopus, parting this little Region from the Lesser Mysia, the boundary of it on the North; as the Promontory called Leitium, is the furthest point of it towards the South. 3 Simois, now called Simores, falling into the Helle-spont not far from the Promontory called Rhetæum (memorable for the Statue and Sepulchre of Ætæus;) but rising out of Mount Ida, an hill of this Region, on which Paris (being by his Father exposed to the fury of wild Beasts) judged the controversy of the golden Ball in favour of Venus; respecting neither the great riches of Juno, nor the divine wisdom of Pallas, but transported with a sensual delight, fatal in the end to the whole Countrey.

Cities of most observation in it, 1 Dardannum, or Dardania, the Town and Patrimony of Æneus. 2 Assus, mentioned Aët. 20. v. 13. by Pliny called Apollonia; who telleth us that the earth about it is of such a nature, that it will consume a dead body in forty days. 3 Trojanopolis, whose name declareth its founder. 4 Lyrnessus, on the Sea-side, opposite to the Isle of Leibos, destroyed by Achilles and the Greeks in the very first beginnings of the Trojan war, who brought thence amongst other captives the Lady Briseis, reserved by Achilles to himself for his part of the booty, and after taken from him by Agamemnon, which caused such a deep displeasure in him, that he would not go into the field, till she were restored. 5 Siganus, the Port-town to Troy, near a noted Promontory of the same name. 6 Troy, situate on the River Scamander, the beauty and glory of the East; called Ilium, and Pergamus for the reason to be shewn anon. A famous Town, from the people whereof, all Nations desire to fetch their original. The beauty of it may be (as some write) yet seen in the ruins, which with a kind of Majesty entertain the beholder: the walls of large circuit, consisting of a black hard stone cut four-square; some remnants of the Turrets which stood on the walls, and the fragments of great Marble Tombs and Monuments of curious workmanship. But certainly these are not the ruins of that Ilium, which was destroyed by the Greeks, but 7 Troas, or New-Troy, built some four miles from the situation of the old, by Lysimachus, one of Alexander's Captains; who peopled it from the neighbouring Cities, and called it Alexandria, or Troas Alexandria, in honour of Alexander the Great, who begun the work, but lived not to bring it to any perfection. In following times called or art. It hapned that one of the Vestal Virgins named Claudia, being suspected of unchastity, resolved to pur her self upon this experiment: and fastning her girdle to the ship, prayed to the Goddess, that if she were causelessly suspected, the ship might be suffered to go forward, which was no sooner heard than granted, Claudia drawing the ship up the water to Rome; where I leave the people wondering at the miracle, as well they might. But to return unto the City, it stands in the borders of Galatia, and is by some made to be the City of Gordius, and the Gordian knot placed in it also; but neither rightly. Not far off stood the Mountain Dindymene, overlooking the City, in which the Priests of Cybele had their usual residence, thence called Dindymene. 5 Apamea, situate not far from the banks of Meander, antiently a most flourishing Emporie, and the Metropolis of the whole Countrey, till Constantine divided it into the two Provinces of Salutaris, and Pacatiana: making 6 Symada, the Metropolis of the first. 7 Hireapolis, and 8 Laudicea, two noted Cities in those times, the principal or the other Province. 9 Juliopolis, and 10 Tiberiopolis, so called from the Emperour to whose honour dedicated. 11 Dorylaeum, &c. Not known unto the antient Writers, but of more note in modern stories, are 1 Sagusa, the habitation of Etrogul, Father of Ottoman the first King of the Turks. 2 Charachisar, by the Grecians called Melampyrus, or the Black Tower, 3 Bilixuga, 4 Einegal, places of consequence and importance, taken by the said Ottoman from the Christians, in the first rise of his fortunes.

As for the Phrygians, they descended (as was shewn before) from Gomer the eldest son of Japhet, and Akenaz, the eldest son of Gomer: of which, Gomer first placed himself in the mountainous Countreys of Albania, and afterwards in the more pleasant plains of the Greater Phrygia, where the City of Cimmeria (the posterity of Gomer being generally called Cimmerians) did preserve his memory. And as for Akenaz, he first took up his dwelling in the Lesser Phrygia, and the banks of the Hellespont; where was antiently a City and Territory called Ascania, some Isles adjoining called Insulae Ascania, the name of Ascanius also very frequent in Troy it self. An antient people they were doubtless, esteemed the antientest of the world by Psammiticus King of Egypt, upon this experiment; Desirous to inform himself to what Nation the privilege of greatest Antiquity did of right belong, he caused two children to be kept in a fold, where they were suckled by Goats; all mankind being prohibited upon very great penalties, to have recourse to them: All the language which the children learned from their speechless nurses, was no more than Bec, which in the Phrygian language signifieth bread; and being of no signification at all in any other which was then known to the Egyptians, gave up the Verdict on their side. But other Nations of the world not yielding to this sentence, by a Writ of Error, or an Ad melius inquirendum, impannell'd a new Jurie; wherein it was pronounced on the Scythians side, Scytharum gens semper antiquissima. Where by the way, Goropius Becanus, makes the like use of this experiment, to prove the High Dutch to be the Original or Mother-tongue of the world: because Becker in that language signifieth, as with us, a Baker, or a maker of Bread. In this Countrey reigned Niohe, who preferring her self before Latona, the mother of Phaebus and Diana, had her children slain before her face by an unseen means, and was her self turned into a stone, as the Poets fable. Here also reigned Tantalus, who being rich, and wanting wisdom to make use of it, is feigned to stand in Hell up to the chin in water, and that too under a tree whose fruit toucheth his lips; yet both the one and the other flie from him, when he offereth at them. Of which thus Ovid,

—Tibi Tantale nulla
Dependuntur aquae; quæq; imminet, effugit arbor.
In English thus,
Thou canst not, Tantalus, those waters taste;
The tree just at thy lips, flies off as fast.

But this race of Kings being worn out by the tyranny of time or war, the Phygians were made subject to the Kings of Lydia; continuing under their command till the conquest of Lydia by the Persians, with which they fell together to the Crown thereof, not made the stronger by the accession of effeminate Subjects. Gained from them by the Sword of Alexander, they fell unto Anisognus one of his great Captains, and on his overthrow at the battel of Ipsus, to Seleucus the Conquerour, the first King of that race: following the same fortune after that with the rest of Asia, till they came to be possessed by the Romans, and made a Province of that Empire. But Constantine laying to it the Greater Mysia, made two Provinces of it: the one called Salutaris, from some miraculous cures there wrought by the Arch-Angel Michael, as was then generally believed; the other called Pacatiana, from Pacatianus, who in the time of the said Constantine was Prefect for the Prætorium of the East, and divers years before had begun his honors with the Lieutenanship of Britain. In the declining of the Constantinopolitans, it became a prey unto the Turks of the Selæucian Family; possessed by them till the death of Aladine, the last King of that race: when seized upon, together with the Greater Mysia, and those parts of Lydia which lay next unto it, by Adin, a great Turkish Prince, and made a peculiar Kingdom, called by his name, Adinia, or Adin-lis; extorted shortly from his heirs by the house of Ottoman.

p. MYSIA.

Interposed betwixt the two Phrygias lyeth the Countrey of MYSIA, bounded on the East, with Phrygia Major; on the West, with Phrygia Minor, and the Ægean Sea; on the North, with parts of Bithynia, Bithynia, Propontis, and the Hellespont; and on the South, with part of Lydia, Eolie, and the Ægean. So called from the Mysians, the Inhabitants of it.

Whether these Mysians were originally a Phrygian Nation, or some interlopers which thrust in afterwards amongst them, I find not determined. Most probable it is, they were natural Phrygians; being as superstitious in the worship of their several Deities, as any Phrygian of them all; and that they had this name given them by the Lydians, from the abundance of Beech-trees which grow amongst them; by them called Mysa. A people of so base and contemptible quality, that it grew into a common proverb to call a fellow of no worth, Mysiorum posterum.

The principal Mountain of this Countrey is that called Olympus, situate in the North-parts hereof bordering towards Bithynia: which as it is called Olympus Mysius, to difference it from Olympus in Greece; so the people of the Greater Mysia, where this Mountain is, are called Olympenii, to difference them from the Mysii or Mæsi of Europe. And as for Rivers, those of most note besides Ægeus, parting it from Troas, or the Lesser Phrygia, are, 1 Caicus, on whose banks stands the City of Pergamus; and from thence passeth into the Ægean Sea, at the Bay of Elaa; and 2 the famous River of Granius, which hath his fountain in Mysia Major, and passing through Mysia Minor, fallerh into the Propontis. A River memorable for the Victory which Alexander obtained on the banks hereof, in his first essay against the Persians: by whom upon the first noise of his preparations he was so flighted, that Darius King of Persia, gave command to his Lieutenants residing in Asia Minor, that they should take him alive; whip him with rods, and so convey him to his presence; A notable example of the pride and folly of the Persians. But Alexander soon taught them another lesson. For though the Persians were, possessed of the higher banks of the River, with an intent to stop his passage; yet he resolved to charge them in the face of their strength: knowing full well, that if he could beat them on a place of so great advantage; he should not only lessen them in point of reputation, but begger an opinion of himself that he was invincible. And so accordingly it proved, the Persians being vanquished by him, and all the Kingdoms and Provinces of this Asia, submitting to him on the noise of the Victory (as an Enemy not to be resisted upon equal terms) some few Towns excepted. And therefore it was wisely advised by Machiavel, that he who takes upon him to defend a passage, should with his ablest forces oppose the Assailant; because in all Invasions where the Nations invaded have been beaten upon a great advantage of place, as defence of Rivers, Streights, and Mountains, they do not only discourage their Souldiers from dealing afterwards on even ground with that Enemy, but leave no hope unto their fellows and partrakers, of being succoured and defended by such weak Protectors. Which caution if the Persian Commanders had observed either here, or at Pyle Cilicia, spoken of hereafter, Alexander had not so easily subverted the Persian Monarchy. But the fatal period of it was now drawing on, and the men either naturally Cowards, or else prodigiously befotled.

It is divided commonly into Mysia Minor, or the Lesser Mysia, which lying on the West towards Troas and the Hellespont, is called sometimes Mysia Hellespontica; and joyned unto Troas by the Emperour Constantine, made up that Province which he called the Consular Hellespont; and Mysia Major, called from Olympus which was in it, Mysia Olympica, and the Inhabitants Olympenii; which joyned by that Emperour to the Western parts of Phrygia Major, made up that Province which he caused to be called Phrygia Salutaris, for the reason formerly delivered.

Places of most observation in the Lesser Mysia, were 1 Abydus, standing on the narrowest of the Hellespont, opposite unto Sestos in Thrace; first built by the Mysians with the consent of Gyges King of Lydia, to whom the Countrey then belonged; Memorable both in the antient and modern histories. In antient story for the famous resolution of the Inhabitants, when besieged by Philip the father of Persius King of Macedon. For being brought by him into some distress, and hopeless of good conditions from him, the young men of the town who had bound themselves by oath to die rather than fall into his hands, set fire thereof, and barbarously slew themselves, with us many of the women and children, as could be met with. Which news being brought to Philip, moved so little compassion, that he said would give the Abydeni 3 days leisure to die; and therefore would not suffer any of his souldiers to enter the Town, then set open to him, either to take the spoil thereof, or hinder this bloody execution, till the 3 days and. An Modern story no less memorable for the taking of it by the Turks, in the reign of Orchanes the son of Ottoman, through the Treason of the Governors daughter: who bewitched with the person and valour of Aderach-men, a young Turkish Gallant, whom she had beheld from the Towers of the Castle, threw a letter to him as he drew near the wall; wherein she manifested her affection, and promised to make him Master of that fortress, if he would persuade his General to raise the siege, and come with a strong party in the dead time of the night to receive it from her, which was done accordingly. The Town continuing ever since in the power of the Turks, well fortified, and one of the two Castles spoken of before, which defend Constantinople on that side from all force by Sea. 2 Cyzicus, seated in the Propontis, in an Island of the same name also, but so near the Continent, that it joyned to it by 2 bridges. The Metropolis of the Consular Hellespont, by consequence an Archbishop See in the prosperous times of Christianity; as were all other Cities in the Roman Empire, which were the Mother-Cities or Metropoles of their several Provinces. A town of wonderful strength and beauty, when first known to the Romans, called therefore by E. Florus, the Rome of Asia, who gives this Character also of it, Cyzicum nobilitas civitas, arces, magnitudo, portus, turrisq; memorabilis. Altiataque litore illustrata, that is to say, that the noble City of Cyzicus by the excellency of the Walls, Bulwarks, Haven, and Towers of Marble, both beautiful and illustrate the shores of Asia. Honored amongst many other goodly and magnificent buildings, with a glorious Temple the pillars whereof being 4 Cubits thick, and 50 Cubits high, were each of one piece of stone only; the whole fabrick all of polished Marble, every stone joyned unto the other with a line of Gold. In vain besieged PERGAMUS. Sieged by Mithridates in the time of his war, who lost before it by the Sword, Pestilence, and Famine, no fewer than 300000 men, and yet could not force it. Afterwards ruined by an Earthquake, the Falling-Sickness of the East, as before is said, it could never be restored to its former lustre: the very ruins of it daily made more ruinous, by transporting the Stones and Marbles to Constantinople, for the Embellishing of that City. 3 Lampsacus on the same Propontis, in which the beauly god Periapus was worshipped in as beauly a figure: quem non denudo (as wittily Laetantius scoffeth it) ne quid appareat risu dignum: supposed to be the same with the Syrian or Phoenician Baal, so often mentioned in the Scriptures. For this and on some other reasons, Alexander had conceived against it such an high displeasure when he was in Asia, that he resolved to raze it to the very ground. And seeing Anaximenes coming to him as an Ambassador from the Town to obtain his favour, commanded him to hold his peace; and sware as by way of prevention, that he would deny whatsoever he requested of him: whereupon Anaximenes intreated him to destroy the City, which now for his Oaths sake he could not do; and so this wicked City at that time escaped. 4 Parium, so called, as some say, from Paris the son of Jason, a Colony at first of the Milesians, of the Romans afterwards: Troas and this, the only two Roman Colonies in all the Province. By Homer called Adrastia; as Lampsacus in the same Author, is called Pityusa. More in the land, are 5 Scepis. 6 Hiragerme, both mentioned by Ptolemy, but of more antiquity than fame.

Chief Cities in MYSIA MAJOR or OLYMPENA, are 1 Dainta, in the North-parts, not far from Olympus. 2 Apollonia, near a large Lake sacred to Apollo, in the same parts also. 3 Pala Scepis, or Scepis Vetus, on a Bay of the Aegean Sea, joyning upon Troas, or the Lesser Phrygia. 4 Adramyttium, mentioned Act. 27, where Saint Paul took ship to go to Rome. 5 Antandrus, on the same Sea also, now called Saint Dimitri; named at first Cimmeris from the Gomerites or Cimmerians here inhabiting (which sheweth that Mysia antiently was a part of Phrygia) afterwards Edonis, and at last Antandrus, and that either because built or repaired rather by the men of Andros, an Island of the Aegean, spoken of before, amongst the Cyclades; or because the Grecians having taken Polydorus the son of Priam, from the King of Thrace, received this City for his ransom or rather in exchange for him, as the word doth intimate. 5 Proteselene, on the same coast also. More in the Land, 6 Prapemissus, 7 Trojanopolis, 8 Alydda, of which little memorable. 9 Pergamus, the Regal City of this tract, situate in a goodly plain on the banks of the River Caicus; of a small Town or Fortrefs made a stately City by the Kings hereof, and beautified with an excellent Library containing 200000 Volumes; for the writing or transcribing whereof, Parchment was here first invented, which from hence to this day is called Pergamenum. Here also were those costly hangings first invented which we now call Tapestry; by the Romans called first Aulae, from Aula, signifying a Hall; the Hall of Attalus King hereof (by whom invented) being the first room furnished and adorned herewith. Here was born Galen the famous Physician, living very healthfully to the age of 140 years: his health preserved to so great age, by these means specially. 1. Never eating or drinking his fill. 2. Never eating any thing that was raw. 3. Always carrying about him some sweet perfumes. Finally, this was one of the seven Churches to which Saint John writ his Revelation. For though it were originally a City of Mysia, yet being near unto the borders of Lydia, it was reckoned as a City of Lydian Asia; within the limits whereof those seven Churches were all comprehended.

As for the Kings hereof which flourished here for some ages in such wealth and splendor, they came but from a poor and obscure original. The first of them one Philetarus, an Ennuch, belonging to Antigonus, one of the Great Alexanders greatest Captains; and after his death to Lysimachus King of Thrace, by whom trusted with his money and accompis. Fearing the fury of his Master then grown old and tyrannous, he seized on the Castle of Pergamus, and therein on 90000 talents, which he offered with his service unto Seleucus, the first King of Syria. But both Lysimachus and Seleucus dying shortly after, he kept the money to himself, and reigned in this City as an absolute King; leaving the Kingdom at his death to his Brother Eumenes, no better man than a poor Carter, till raised by the fortunes of this Ennuch. Eumenes furnished with money, though of no great territory, was able by the Galls and other Merceharies, not only to preserve himself against the Syrian Kings, who laid claim to his City, but also to enlarge his bounds as he saw occasion. But the main improvement of this Kingdom hapned in the days of Eumenes the second, the son of Attalus, the brother and successor of this Eumenes: who being useful to the Romans in their wars against Philip of Macedon, and Antiochus, the Great, King of Syria, was liberally rewarded by them with the Provinces of Lydia, Phrygia, Aeolis, Ionis, Troas, and both the Mysias; which they had taken from Antiochus in the end of that war. The rest of the affairs hereof, till it fell in fine unto the Romans, take here in this short Catalogue of

The KINGS of PERGAMUS.

- A. M.
 3668 1 Philetarus, the first King of Pergamus, of whom before 20.
 3688 2 Eumenes, brother, or as some say, the brothers son of Philetarus, vanquished Antiochus, surnamed Hierax, in a fight near Sardis; and awed Seleucus Callinicus, both Kings of Syria. 22.
 3710 3 Attalus, brother of Eumenes, restored Ariathes the Cappadocian to his Kingdom, and discomfited the Galls, compelling them to keep themselves within the Countrey since named Galatia. A Confederate of the Romans, and by them much courted.
 3754 4 Enmenes II. son of Attalus, gratified by the Romans with the spoils of Antiochus. He was an hereditary Enemy to the Kingdom of Macedon, which he laboured the Romans to destroy destroy, as in fine they did; and thereby finding no more use of these Pergamon Kings, began to grow to less liking with them.

- 3782 5 Attalus II. Brother of Eumenes, to whom the Kingdom was offered by the Romans in the life of his Brother, then less gracious with them; but he most gallantly refused it, to the great indignation of the Roman Senate.
 3792 6 Eumenes III. Brother of Attalus the second, and Tutor or Protector to his Nephew Attalus, in whose minority he governed the Estate, as King.
 3813 7 Attalus III. son of Attalus the second, succeeded on the death of his Uncle Eumenes, and having held the Kingdom but five years only, deceased without issue, and bequeathed it by his last Will unto the Romans. But before the Romans had possession of so great a Legacy, Aristonicus the base son of Eumenes, made himself Master of Mindus, Colophon, Samos, and many other Towns and Estates hereof. Against whom the Romans making war were aided by the greatest part of the Asian Kings; not seeing their own danger and destruction to draw near unto them, by letting such a potent neighbour come amongst them, to undo them all. But the Romans got little by this war, though they had the better of it. For being now made Masters of the Riches and Sweets of Asia, they took with them their Vices also: growing thereby to great riot, and unparalleled luxury; which overcame the rigor and severity of their former discipline, and made them apt for Faction, and those bloody quarrels, which proved the ruine of their State. So truly was it said by Justine, Sic Asia facta Romanorum, cum opibus suis ista quoque sua Romanis transmissa. This Kingdom, taking it in the largest extent thereof, being thus subdued and fetled as a Roman Province, had the name of Asia, according to the name of the Greater Continent; by Ptolemy, and others, called Asia Propria: continuing under the subjection of the Roman Emperours, till the translating of the Imperial seat unto Constantinople; as after that unto the Emperours of the East, till conquered piece-meal by the Turks of the Selametic family. Which being ended in the person of Aladine the second, those parts hereof which lay next Troas, made up the Kingdom of Carasus, or Carasus-III; as those which had been laid to the Greater Phrygia, made up the Adinian: both of them swallowed up long since by the Ottoman Kings, the Accessories running the same fortune as the Principals did.

10. ASIA SPECIALIUS DICTA.

BESIDES the Proper Asia spoken of before, containing all the Provinces of the Pergamon Kingdom; there was one part hereof which antiently had the name of Asia, before it was communicated to the greater Continent, or this whole Peninsula. This for distinctions sake the Romans called the PRO-CONSULAR ASIA; because committed to the government of one of their Pro-consuls (who had his residence in Ephesus, the principal City of this Province) together with the Consular Hellepont, and the Province of the Istes of Asia. This we have spoken of before, as also how the Countrey lying about Ephesus, had more especially the name of Asia, than any other: so specially, that Erasmus thereupon inferreth, that by Asia in the New Testament, (but more peculiarly in the Acts) is meant that part of Asia only in which Ephesus standeth.

This being agreed on for the name, we shall bound it on the East with Lydia, whereof it was antiently a part; on the West, with the Aegean Sea; on the North, with Mysia; and on the South, with Caria. And having so bounded it, we shall divide it into the two Regions of AEOLIS, and IONIA: that of Aeolis lying on the North, towards Mysia; as Ionis doth upon the South, towards Caria: possessed both of them by Greek Nations, and of them so named.

Principal Towns in AEOLIS, are 1 Acarnes, over against the Isle of Lesbos, The Royal seat sometimes of the Tyrant Hermias; who being once a Scholar of Aristotle, but unworthy of so good a Master, seized on this City, and here committed so great cruelties, that at last he was taken by the people, sewed in an Oxes hide, and so baited to death. 2 Pitane, on a little River so named, falling into Caicus, not far from the influx or fall thereof into the Aegean; in which Town they had an Art of making Bricks which would swim on the water. 3 Elaea, on the mouth of Caicus, the Port-Town to Pergamus. 4 Myrina, afterwards in honour of Augustus, called Sebastopolis. 5 Cene by Strabo called Came, by Mela, Cunna, not far from a Promontory of the same name. 6 Cunna, the principal and greatest of all Aeolis, the birth-place of Ephorus a learned man of elder times; and the habitation of Silylla, surnamed Cumana, to difference her from Silylla Cumae, so named from Cumae, a City of the Realm of Naples. 7 Phocaea, a Colony of the Athenians, so named from the multitudes of Sea-Calves (the Greeks call them Phocae) which thrust themselves a shore at the building of it. The people hereof over-burdened by the Persians, and impatient of so great servitude as was laid upon them, forsook their Countrey, binding themselves by a fearful Oath, never more to return unto it: and after many and long wanderings came at last into Gaul, where they founded the famous City of Marseilles.

The Inhabitants of this little Region are by Josephus said to be descended of Elisha the son of Javan, who therefore calleth them by the name of Elisai. And it is possible enough that so it was, Elisha being planted in Greece, where he gave name to Elis, one of the Provinces of Peloponnesus; from whence some of his race in succeeding times might pass over into Asia, and possess those coasts. For that they were a Greek people, is confessed by all; the Aeolic dialect or phrase of speech, taking name from hence. Nor otherwise much mentioned in the course of story, than as partakers of the same fortunes with the rest of their Asian neighbours before related, and so not necessary to be now repeated.

IONIA, as a larger tract, requires a more particular and punctual description. For here the River Lycus, Asia spec. Dist. Lycus falleth into the Maander, and here Maander and Caystrus, two of the most famous Rivers of Asia Minor, (of which more hereafter) fall into the Egean. Here is the renowned City of Ephesus, honored with one of the worlds seven wonders; the long abode of St. Paul, and the death and sepulture of St. John; the Promontory Trogylum, with a little Isle adjoining of the same name, mentioned Act. 20. v. 15.

Principal Cities of this tract, are 1 Mysus, on an arm of the Sea, assigned by Artaxerxes, together with Lampfacus, and Magnesia, to Themistocles; when being banished his own Countrey, he fled to his greatest Enemy for entertainment; and there met with more safety than Athens would, and more honour than it could afford him; So that he well might say (as he often did) Periissem nisi periissem. And on the other side, the King was so overjoyed at his coming to him, (as having now upon his side the man who had most hindered him in the Conquest of Greece) that many times in his sleep he was heard to clap his hands, and say, Habeo Themistoclem Atheniensem. In after times, the water drawing further off, the foyl brought forth such an innumerable multitude of Fleas, that the Inhabitants were fain to forsake the City, and with their bag and baggage to retire to Miletus: nothing hereof being left but the name and memory in the time of Pausanias. 2 Erythra, memorable for the habitation of one of the Sibyls, from hence called Sibylla Erythraea; of which Prophetesses we shall speak more when we come to Africk. 3 Lebedus, of most note in the elder times, for those publick Playes which were here annually held in the honour of Bacchus. 4 Clazomene, situate on a small Ile, near unto the shore, of much esteem amongst the Romans for the wines there growing; and no less honoured by the Africans for a beautiful Temple of Apollo seated near unto it. 5 Priene, the birth-place of Bias, one of the seven wise-men of Greece. 6 Ipsus, renowned for the great battel betwixt Antigonus and Seleucus, two of Alexanders chief Commanders; the Victory wherein falling to Seleucus, with the death of his Adversary, ektated him in all the Conquests of his Master, except Egypt only. 7 Tcos, the birth-place of Anacreon, that lascivious and drunken Poet, hence surnamed Teius; the Ovid of the Grecians both for wit and wantoness: of both which it may well be doubted, whether the smoothness of the verse, or the wantoness of their expressions, be the more predominant. 8 Smyrna, a fair and ancient City, on a Bay thence named the Bay of Smyrna: the greatest part whereof lay towards the Sea, but the fairest on the side of an hill overlooking the waters. Destroyed by the Lydians, it was re-edified by Antigonus and Lyfimachus, two of Alexanders great Commanders; of good account in the time of the Romans, and one of the seven Alian Churches, to which Saint John inscribed his Revelation. Much traded and frequented to this very day, especially for Chamleins, Groggrains, and such Stuffs; made for the most part at Ancyra, the chief Town of Galatia, and here vended to the foreign Merchant. For government of the trade whereof, and of other commodities of these parts, the English Merchants have an Officer called the Consul of Smyrna. In old time there was in it, amongst others, a goodly Temple dedicated unto Homer, said to be born in this City, and to have writ his Poems in a Cave hard by. 9 Colophon; most memorable for the Inhabitants of it, so skilled in Horse-man-ship, that the side on which they served in war was sure of Victory; whereupon Colophonem addere, to put a good end to any business, grew into a Proverb: It was also another of those Cities, which so ambitiously contended for the birth of Homer; of which there were seven in all, as the old Verfestell us, saying,

Smyrna, Rhodus, Colophon, Salamis, Chios, Argos, Athena.*

Whether Homer purposely concealed his Countrey, that all places might challenge him for theirs, I am not able to say: But sure I am that Paterculus speaketh it in the commendation of Hesiodus (the next Greek Poet after him in course of time) that he had specified his birth-place: Qui vitavit ne in id quod Homerus incidit, patriam & parentem testatus est. 10 Ephesus, the Metropolis of the Roman Asia, and the seat of the Primate of the Asian Diocese: memorable in the purest times of Christianity, for being the Episcopal See of Timothy the Evangelist, the first Bishop hereof: 2ly. In that St. Paul directed to the people of it, one of his Epistles; and 3ly. for the burial of St. John the Apostle, who by some learned men of the elder times, is said to have gone alive into his Grave, and that he is not dead, but sleeping; building that thought upon that saying which went abroad among the Brethren, that that Disciple should not die, Joh. 21. v. 23. And no less memorable amongst the Gentiles for that sumptuous and magnificent Temple here consecrated to Diana; which for the largeness, furniture, and workmanship of it, was accounted one of the wonders of the World. The length thereof said to be 425 foot, 220 foot in breadth; supported with 127 Pillars of Marble seventy foot in height; of which twenty seven were most curiously engraven, and all the rest of Marble polished. The model of it contrived by one Cleophon, and that with so much Art and curiosity of Architecture, that it took up two hundred years before it was finished. When finished, it was fired seven times, the last time by Erasistratus, only to get himself a name: which hapning on the same night in which Alexander the Great was born, gave occasion to that weighty but witty scoff, that Diana (she was counted one of the Goddesses of Midwifery) could not attend the preservation of her Temple, being then busied at the birth of so great a Prince.

As for those Iones, or Ionians, they were no doubt the descendants of Javan, the fourth son of Japhet, as hath been shewn before in our general Preface: but whether they came hither out of Gracia, or passed from hence into that Countrey, hath been made a question. The Athenians boasting of themselves to be Aborigines, men growing as it were out of the Soil it self, without any Ancestors, report that those Ionians were a Colony of their Plantation. But Heccataeus in Strabo doth affirm the contrary, Saying, that the Athenians or Iones of Greece, came from those of Asia; for that Attica was anciently called Ionis, Plutarch in the life of Theseus doth declare expressly. Most probable it is, that Heccataeus was in the right; these parts of Asia lying so directly in the way from the Valley of Shinaar unto Greece, that Javan may very well be thought to leave some of his company here, when he ferried thence over to the opposite Continent. I know Pausanias ignorant of their true antiquity, deriveth them from Ion the son of Xuthus, and grandchild of Dencalion: wherein he came so near the truth, though he missed the men, that it was the Grandson of that man who escaped the flood, from whom both the Athenians and those Ionians had their true original. In regard of which relations betwixt the Nations, the Athenians gave aid to those Ionians against the Persians; who on this overthrow given to Craesus, pretended to the Lordship or Dominion of Asia, and conquered them in the time of Cyrus, the first Persian Monarch. Upon which ground, and the sending of fresh aid to them upon their revolve in the time of Darius, that King first undertook the invasion of Greece: Xerxes and the succeeding Kings pursuing that first quarrel with great animosities. After this yielding to the times they followed the fortune of the strongest, subject successively to the Persians, Macedonians, Romans, Constantinopolitans, and Turks, till the death of Aladine before mentioned: when both Eolis and Ionis got a new name, and are now called Sarcans, from Sarachan a Turkish Captain, who on the death of that Aladine seized upon this Countrey, and erected here a petit Kingdom, long since subdued by those of the race of Ottoman.

LYDIA is bounded on the East, with Phrygia Major, and some part of Pisidia, from which separated by a branch of the Mountain Taurus; on the West, with Eolis and Ionis, or Asia specially so called; on the North, with the Greater Myfia; on the South, with Caria. So called from Lud, the son of Sem, by some of whose posterity it was first inhabited. In the full Latitude and extent thereof, as anciently; comprehending Eolis and Ionis, the adjoining Provinces, it made the Lydian Asia spoken of before; within the verge whereof all the seven Churches were contained, mentioned by St. John in the Revelation.

The people of this Countrey are said to have been the first Coyners of Money, the first Hucksters and Pedlers, and the first inventors of Dice, Ball, Chess, and the like games: necessity and hunger thereunto enforcing them, according to that of Persius, Artis Magister, ingeniiq, largitor venter. For being sorely vexed with famine, in the time of Atis, one of the progenitors of Omphale, they devised these games; and every second day playing at them, beguiled their hungry bellies. Thus for 22 years, they continued playing and eating by turns: but then seeing that themselves were more fruitful in getting and bearing children, than the foil at that time in bringing forth sustenance to maintain them; they sent a Colony into Italy under the conduct of Tyrrhenus, the son of Atis, who planted in that Countrey, called at first Tyrrhenia, and afterward Tuscany.

This Countrey was also called Mæonia, and was thought to have been the native soil of Homer, in regard that Colophon and Smyrna, two of the seven contending Cities, and those which seem to have most colour for their claim, were anciently accounted as parts of Lydia, as was said before. Hence Homer hath the name of Mæonides, and Mæonium Vates: and in some Authors Curmen Mæonium is used for Homer's Poetical abilities, as Carminis Mæonio consurgere, in Ovid. Bacchus is also called sometimes by the name of Mæonius; but for a very different reason, viz. because anciently there were no trees in all this Countrey but the Vine only.

Principal Mountains of this Countrey are 1 Sipylus, and 2 Tmolus, this last of most account in regard of the great fruitfulness of it, covered over with Vines, and yielding abundance of the best Saffron. Chief Rivers of it are 1 Hermus, which rising out of Phrygia Major, passeth only by the skirts hereof, and so falleth into a fair Bay of the Egean, opening towards the Isle of Clazomene. 2 Pactolus, which rising at the foot of Mount Tmolus, falleth not long after into Hermus; famous amongst the Poets for its golden Sands. 3 Caystrus, no less notable for the abundance of Swans which swim thereon, whose Fountain is in Phrygia Major also, near the borders hereof; and his fall into the Egean also over against the Isle of Samos. 4 Maander, which rising out of a branch of the Taurus, in the furthest parts of the said Phrygia, towards Lycania; passeth by Magnesia, and endeth his course in the same Sea, near the City of Ephesus. A River famous for its many turnings in and out, 600 at the least, as Præsan counteth them. Of which in general thus the Poet,

*Mæander toties qui terris errat in iisdem,
Et lapsus in se, sepe retorquet aquas.*

That is to say,

Mæander wandering in the self same soil,
Whose waters meeting do as oft recoil.

And in another passage thus,

Quique recurvatis, ludis Mæander in undis.

Mæander.

Meander plays his warty pranks,
In his so many winding banks.

The Country by reason of these Rivers was exceeding fruitful, abounding in all sorts both of wealth and pleasures, well cultivated and manured above ground, and underneath enriched with prodigious veins of Gold and Silver, and some precious gems. Which made the people, after their overthrow by Cyrus, to become more sensual and voluptuous, and less fit for action, than any plot of their new Masters could have brought them to; had not the natural delicacies of the soil itself contributed to the advancement of their design. And yet before they were sufficiently infamous for their luxury, and excess of riot, when best seen in wars: so that it is a marvel they were able to prevail on the neighbouring Nations, and bring them under their command; as in the times of some of Cræsus predecessors, it is said they did. Unless perhaps they did participate of the temper of Mænas, the great favorite of Augustus Caesar, of whom Paterculus hath left this Character: Ubi res vigiliam exigeret, erat sancti infamnis, providens, & agendis; simulac aliquid ex negotio remitti possit, otio ac molliore penè uera feminam fluens; No man more vigilant than he in times of business, nor woman more effeminate in his times of leisure.

Principal Cities of this Country were 1 Sardis, on both sides of Pactolus, the seat royal of Cræsus, and the Kings of Lydia; till the conquest of Lydia by the Persians. After which time, being taken by the Grecians, it so startled Xerxes, that he commanded one of his Attendants, to say aloud every day, whilst he was at dinner, that the Grecians had taken Sardis; continuing that Memento till it was recovered. Which course (I note this only by the way) was commonly observed in the Parliaments of France, as long as Calice did remain in the hands of the English; and might be profitably revived, till again recovered from the French. Overthrown by a most terrible Earth-quake (to which discomfiture of these Asian Cities had been very much subject) it was re-edified again at the cost of Tiberius; continuing long after the Metropolis of this Province, and one of the seven Churches of the Lydian Asia, of which the holy Spirit took such special notice. The others (besides Pergamus, already mentioned in the Greater Mysia, and Ephesus, and Smyrna, in the Proper Asia) were 2. Philadelpia, near, or on the banks of the River Cassius, the second City in account next to Sardis itself: and honoured with the dignity of a Metropolitan, as appears by the Acts of the Constantinopolitan Council, where Eusebius Bishop hereof doth subscribe himself, Επισκοπος της Ευαγγελικης Μετροπολεως, Bishop of the Metropolis of Philadelpia, in the Province of Lydia. 3 Thyatira, honoured with the same privilege also, as appears by the constant Order, observed as well in the Civil as Ecclesiastical Catalogues of the Cities belonging to this Province. The reason whereof (for otherwise it was contrary to the practice both of Church and State, to have in one Province more than one Metropolis) was the respect had to those several Churches, in regard of their primitive antiquity, and the foundation of them by St. John the Apostle, as it was generally believed. 4 Laodicea, by Polomy placed amongst the Cities of this Province, as it stood in his time, and before: but afterwards laid by Constantine to the Greater Phrygia, and made the Metropolis thereof (which honour Hierapolis had before enjoyed) it being well observed by Strabo, that the Romans did not dispose of their Provinces according to Nations; αλλ' οὐδ' ἔτινος τῶν πρὸς ταῖς δυνάμεις, ἐν αἷς τὰς πόλεις διακρίνουσι, but according to those Districts, or Circuits, in which they kept their Courts of Justice. Next unto these, there were of especial consideration, 5 Magnesia ad Maandrum, so called because situate on that River, to difference it from 6 Magnesia pene Siplym montem, another of the same name near the hill Sipylus. The first assigned over to Themistocles, together with Mysus and Lampsacus, as was said before. The other memorable for the great battle fought near unto it, betwixt Antiochus and the Romans; the loss whereof falling unto Antiochus, occasioned the loss of all his Asian Provinces on this side of Taurus, and the payment of 15000 talents for the charge of the war, besides some other hard conditions then imposed upon him. 7 Abanda, opposite to Magnesia on the other side of Maander, the people whereof, immediately on the overthrow of Antiochus, not only sent Ambassadors to Rome to congratulate with them, as many other Nations did; but built a Temple to it, and appointed Anniversary Games to be celebrated in the honour of that new-made Goddess. A thing more to be wondered at in the Roman Senate for receiving, than in this poor people for bestowing on their City so divine an honour. 8 Trallis, on the banks of Cassius, to the Inhabitants whereof, Ignatius that Reverend Bishop and godly Martyr, writ the Epistle ad Trallenses.

That the Lydians were derived from Lud the son of Sem, is testified by the general consent of such ancient Writers as treat of the dispersions of the Sons of Noah: to which opinion the nearness of the names of Lud, Ludim, and Lydi, (or Lydi, as the Grecians call them) seem to give good countenance. Nor shall I here dispute it further, as a point unquestioned: the tale of Lydus, I know not what Nobleman that should name this Country, being taken up amongst the Greeks for want of more certain truths. Once sealed here, they grew up suddenly to a Kingdom: Amongst the ancient Kings whereof are numbered Manes, as the first, Cotus, and Atis, and then Asius, (from whom Lydia first, and after all the Continent, had the name of Asia) as his immediate Successors. After them I find mention of one Cambletes, said by Athenaus to be so great a Gormandizer, that in his sleep he eat his wife; and finding her hand in his mouth next mornings, slew himself for shame: and of another named Andromytes, as infamous for his filthy lusts, as Cambletes for gluttony. But the race of these Kings ending in Omphale, the mistress of Hercules, who made that valiant Champion spin amongst her Damocels; the Heracleide or posterity of Hercules succeeded next: of whom there is no constant and continued succession till the time of Ardisius, the 19th. in order of that line; who began his reign not long before the building of the City of Rome. Under his Successors the affairs hereof so exceedingly prospered, especially under Haliastres the Father of Cræsus, that Phrygia, Bithynia, Baphlagonia, Mysia, Æolis, Doris, and Ionia, acknowledged themselves Vassals to this Crown: conceived both in Syria and Egypt, by Nebuchadnezzar, gave him the prebeminence. But being come unto the height it hereof from the time of the said Ardisius, take in order following.

THE KINGS of LYDIA.

- A.M. 3190 1. Ardisius. 36.
3226 2. Haliastres. 14.
3240 3. Azelos, who overcame the people of Sardis. 12.
3252 4. Candaules, who shewing his wife naked to Gyges, was by him slain; who marrying his wife, succeeded him in his Kingdom. The whole Story is this: Candaules had to his wife a woman of unparalleled beauty: And supposing the greatness of his happiness not to consist so much in his own fruition, as the notice which others might take of it; intended to shew her in natures bravery to Gyges, the Master of his herds. Gyges at first disdained him from an attempt so foolish; but seeing no persuasion could prevail; he condescended. When he had seen the naked Queen, and was ready to depart, Candaules cried to him, οὐκ ἔστις Εὐφελδης Gyges: which words the Queen marking, and seeing the back of Gyges as he left the chamber, the next morning sent for him: When holding a ponyard in her hand, she gave him his choice, either presently to be slain, or else to kill the King, and take her to wife, with the Kingdom of Lydia for her Dower. Of which two evils he made choice of that which he thought the least, and so killed Candaules.
3258 5. Gyges, the first of this new line, added Ionia to his other dominions. A Prince of so great wisdom, for the time he lived in, that all other Kings his neighbours (as it were) in the light to him; and he as in the dark to them: occasioning thereby the fiction of a Ring he had, by which made invisible, when and as often as he pleased.
3305 6. Ardis II. the son of Gyges. 37.
3342 7. Sardiatres. 19.
3357 8. Haliastres II. of whom before. 57.
3406 9. Cræsus, the last King of Lydia, subdued Doris and Æolis; after which victories, he was overcome by Cyrus, King of Persia; in which battle, a son of Cræsus who had been dumb from his cradle, seeing a Souldier ready to kill his father, suddenly broke out into these words, Rex est, cave ne occidas. After his overthrow, and the Captivity of Cræsus (one of the richest Kings that ever was of old) Lydia was made a Persian Province, A.M. 3420.

The Lydians after this rebelled, but being again subdued, Cyrus bereaved them of all their horses of service, dispoiled them of all their armour, and trained them up in all manner of loose and effeminate living; weakening by this means a powerful Nation, which before that time had not only maintained its own liberty, but awed all the Provinces adjoining. After this they continued Persian till the Conquest of Asia by the Macedonians, in the division of whose spoils they fell to the portion of Selucus and the Kings of Syria: following the common fortune of the rest of this Asia, till they came under the power of the Romans. Made by them one of the Provinces of their Empire; it had the Lower Mysia, or Mysia Olympica annexed unto it: by means whereof the limits of each became so confounded, that the Towns and Cities of the one, are many times ascribed to the other. In the falling of the Eastern Empire it was made (as all the rest of Anatolia) a prey to the Turks: that part of it which lyeth next to Æolis, subject to the Carsian Family; as the other parts towards Phrygia Major, were to the Adinian.

12 C A R I A.

C A R I A is bounded on the East, with Lycia; on the North, with Lydia and Ionia; on the West, with the Ionian or Ægean Sea; and on the South, with the Carpasian. So called from Cares, the Son of Phoroneus King Argos, once the Lord hereof; who is said to have invented the Science of Divination by the flying of Birds, called Augury; though others ascribe it to the Phrygians, and others unto other Nations, all alike uncertain.

In this Country is the Hill called Latmus, the dwelling, or rather retiring place of Endymion, who being much addicted to the study of Astronomy, found out the changes and courses of the Moon, and is therefore by the Poets feigned to have been her Paramour. Others add, that Jupiter hid him in a Cave under this Hill, and cast him into a dead sleep; (which notwithstanding, she descended sometimes to his him) whence came the old By-word, of Endymionis somnium dormit. Here is also in this Country the River Salmacis, said to infect all such as either drink of it, or bath in it: from whence the Poets raise the fiction of Salmacis and Hermaphroditus described by Ovid; and the Proverb of Salmacida spolia sine sanguine & sudore, mentioned by Tully in his Book of Offices, and there used for effeminate and wanton exercises.

to the State of Athen, in the time of the Peloponnesian War (when almost all Greece banded against that City) they revolted from it, and were so straightly besieged by Paches, an Athenian Captain, that they submitted unto mercy. The General sends to Athen to know what should be done with the Mitylenians; Answer was sent, that he should put them to the sword. But the Senate on the morrow after, repenting of that cruel Decree, sent a countermand. These latter Messengers made no stay, but eating with one hand, and rowing with the other, came to Mitylene, just as Paches was reading the former Order; by this speed prevented. So near were these miserable people to a fatal destruction. Subdued by the Romans with the rest of Greece, they fell together with it to the Constantinopolitan Emperours: from whom taken, with Chios, Samos, Andros, and some other of these Isles, Anno 1124. by the State of Venice, upon a quarrel between them and the Grecian Emperour. Confirmed unto that Signeury by the Emperour Baldwin, and all the rest of the Aegean added to their portion; those above-named were again recovered by the valour and good fortune of John Ducas, the Greek Emperour, then residing at Nice. Afterwards in the year 1335. the Emperour Calo-Johannes gave it to Franciscus Catalusius, a Noble Gentleman of Genoa, with one of his sisters, for her Dowry. By whose posterity enjoyed, till the year 1462. when Mahomet the Great incensed against Dominicus Catalusius the then Lord hereof, for the murder of his elder brother, a Vassal and Tributary of his Empire (those Princes paying to the Turk an annual tribute of 4000 Ducats;) but more for harbouring the Pirates of Spain and Italy, besieges him in Mitylene his principal City, which in 27 days (for so long it held) he constrained to submit unto him, and therewith all the Island also. Some of the chief families being removed unto Constantinople, upon some reasons of State, the main body of the people were permitted to remain here to till the land, and so continue to this day, with some few Turks, inconsiderable for their strength or numbers, intermixed among them.

3 CHIOS, the next to Lesbos both in site and bigness, lyeth opposite to the shore of Ionia, from which distant not above four leagues, is in compass about 126 miles. So called, as some say, from Chione a fair Nymph hereof, much sought after by many Suters: as others say, from χαιος, a Greek word signifying Snow, wherewith the Mountains of it are sometimes covered. And some again will have it take name from Chios the chief City of it, which being built in the form of the Greek Letter χ, first got that name unto it self, and afterwards did communicate it to the whole Island. Isidore in his Origines gives another reason, and will have it called so from a Syrinck word signifying Mastic, whereof there is plenty in this Isle. Chios Insula (saith he) Syrā linguā appellatur, eo quod ibi Mastix gignitur; Syrinck Mastic Chion vocant. And were it so, that Chios in the Syrinck did signifie Mastic, there could no better reason be assigned for the name: this Island being more furnished with that commodity, than any place in the world besides. A gum it is growing out of the Lentisk tree, which in the months of July and August the Inhabitant force out of those trees, by making with sharp instruments a deep incision into the barks of them; out of which the juice dropping is afterwards hardened like a gum, and in the September following gathered. A Commodity which yieldeth yearly to the Inhabitants 18000 Sultanies, every Sultanie being valued at the rate of a Zechine of Venice: and therefore the selling of the Lentisk tree, at the time of the distilling of this precious juice interdicted, on the penalty of losing the right hand of him that doth it.

Other Commodities of this Island are Corn and Oyl in indifferent plenty, some quarries of most excellent Marble, a certain green earth like the rust of brass; some Silks and Cotton-Wool, but scarce in worth to those of Smyrna, and other places: Honey as good as any the World affordeth; and a sort of most delicious Vines, those specially which grow on the Mountain Arvis, now called Amista. Of which Pliny gives this commendation, In summa gloria suere Thalium, Chiumque ex Chio, quod Arvium vocant. Of all Wines (saith he) those of Thassus and Chios, are of best esteem; and of those of Chios, the Arvisian. Strabo extollet them in the Superlative degree, and calleth the Wine hereof, δρον αειδον δρ Ερμινος, incomparably the best of Greece. And Plutarch, speaking of an Epicurean, or voluptuous liver, affirms, that he conceived it the supreme felicity, Δειν ον σφαιδς, ε μιν δρον Αειδον, to lie with Thais, and drink these Arvisian Wines. Here are also infinite store of Partridges, of a red colour, kept tame, and fed in flocks like Geese, in the Streets and Greenswarths of their Villages: some little Boy or Girl driving them to field, and calling them home again with a Whistle, when the night comes on.

The Island divided commonly into two parts, the Higher, called Apanomera, lying towards the North and West; hilly and rough, but intermixt with fruitful Vales and pleasant Rivers; the Lower opposite unto it, called Catamorea, swelled here and there with gentle hillocks, on which groweth the Lentisk. The whole inhabited by Greeks intermixt with Genoese, and (since their conquest by that people) some few Turks amongst them. Which mixture with the Genoese, tempereth the levity of the Greeks with Italian gravity: the better sort of people both in apparel, and manners, coming near the Genese, once the Lords of this Island; the common sort continuing their old Greek humour of mirth and jollity (not sensible of the Turkish Thraldom under which they suffer) with as much licentiousness as ever. And though this intermixture hath so corrupted their language, that neither the Greek nor the Italian be here rightly spoken, but a compound tongue made up of both; yet keep they their Religions still distinct and separate, as if they had never known another.

Here are reckoned in it six and thirty Towns and Villages, the principal whereof are, 1 S. Elier, in the North. 2 Pigrine, in the midst hereof; and 3 Chios is self, now called Sio (as is all the Island) one of the seven Cities contending for the birth of Homer; whose Sepulchre they pretend to shew in an old Castle near the Mount and Town of S. Elier, (which were it his, would be a better argument for his burial here, than it is for his birth.) The Town situate in the most pleasant and fruitful part of the Country, Samos.

Country, to which both industry and Art have given great advantage; there being few houses without Orchards of excellent fruits, as Oranges, Lemons, Pomegranats, Citrons, and a kind of Fig, much praised for their quickness of taste by the ancient Romans. It standeth on the East-side opposite to the shores of Asia, stretched along the bottom of the Haven, and on the West-side backed with a rocky Mountain, upon which it formerly did stand. The buildings ordinary, the Streets narrow, and the Haven every day decaying: though otherwise secure once entered, and for directing of the entrance, a Lighthouse advanced by the Genoese (when Lords hereof) to give light by night, and serve for a land-mark in the day. Fortified on the North-side by a large and strong Castle, environed with deep ditches, well furnished with munition, and a Turkish Garrison. And because the Island is on all parts accessible, not naturally fortified with rocks, and dangerous precipices, as many others; besides this Castle, they have all along the Coast small Watch-towers, which with smoke by day, and fire by night, give notice unto one another of such Vessels as they see approaching: the Guards about the Castle being so intent also about their charge, that every minute of the night there goeth a word about the walls to declare their vigilance.

The Chians were at first a free people, governing themselves as a Commonwealth; and by reason of their many harbours, able to furnish out a Navy of 80 Sails, which gave them the Lordship of those Seas, till eclipsed by the *Rhodian*s. Besieged by Philip the father of Perseus, with his utmost power, who when he could not get it by force, proclaimed freedom to the Slaves (of which here were many) and liberty to marry with their Masters wives, if they would rebel against their Masters. And when this policy would not do it, the Town being held out with greater heat of indignation, he gave over the siege. At last they became subject to the Romans with the rest of Greece, and followed punctually the same change of fortunes, as did those of Lesbos; which we have spoken of before: till given by Andronicus Paleologus, one of the last Greek Emperours, to the Justinians, a noble Genoese family, assistant to him in his wars. Under them it continued as tributary to the Turks (after the Turks had made themselves Masters of Constantinople) to whom they annually paid eighteen thousand Ducats, till the year 1566. When Solymán the Magnificent picking a quarrel with them for some suspected correspondency with the Knights of Malta, commanded Pial, one of his greatest Bassas, to seize the Island. And he accordingly presenting himself before the City, with a strong Fleet of eighty Gallies, did so astonish and amaze the Inhabitants of it, that without any other summons than the sight of his Navy, they surrendered themselves unto his disposing, upon Easter-day, being the same day he came before it. Since that time it hath continued Turkish, all save their Religion, enjoyed by them with like liberty, as in former times.

4 SAMOS, is on the South-east of Chios, distant about five miles from the shores of Ionia; about eighty, or eighty seven in compass; environed for the most part, especially on the North-west, with inaccessible rocks, but beautified with a fair and capacious Haven; of little use by reason of Pirates which infested those Seas. The soyl sufficiently enriched with most kind of fruits; abundantly plentiful of Oyl, and Olives, but of Vines altogether unfurnished; which is the more to be admired, in regard all the Islands and shores about it, produce them in so great a plenty. It stretcheth from the East to the West: and on the South part of it stood the City of Samia, near unto the Haven before spoken of. In former times populous, and well inhabited, as was the rest of the Island; now wholly desolate in a manner, because of the Pirates, and in most places very much over-grown with woods: becoming thereby very useful to those publick enemies, who find here Timber enough for Shipping, and can upon the sudden put a Ship to Sea, for pursuit of their Robberies. The chief commodity it affordeth besides those above, is a medicinal Earth, usefull for Chirurgery and Physick: of which in former times were those Vessels made, called Vasa Samia; in great request amongst the Romans.

Antiently it had the names of Dryusa, Anthemusa, Melamphyllus, and Ciparissa; out-worn by that of Samos, which it still remaneth. Memorable in old times for the birth of Pythagoras, of one of the Sibyls, hence called Samia; and finally of the wife-man Pythagoras (a wiser then any of the seven wise Masters forenamed amongst them) who first brought Philosophy into Greece, and from thence into Italy. Once a free Commonwealth of no small esteem, the Institutions whereof are mentioned by Heraclides, in his Books of the several Commonwealths then being: afterwards made subject to the Tyrant Polycrates, a man so fortunate, that for a long time he never fell into any mischance. Fearing lest such a long calm would bring on a tempest, he let fall into the Sea a most precious Ring, by him deservedly esteemed: that so it might be said he had some misfortunes. Which after he had found again in the belly of a fish brought accidentally to his table, he was overcome by Orantes a Persian, and brought to a miserable death. Leaving a notable example, that fortune is certain in nothing but uncertainties; and like a Bee with a sharp sting, hath alwaies some misery following in the train of a long concatenation of felicity. From this time forwards it ran the same fortune with the rest of these Islands; subject successively to the great Monarchies in former times, as of late times to the Venetians, Greeks, and Turks, who do now enjoy it.

5 ICARIA, (now called Niesria) lyeth not far from Samos, to the West-ward of it, narrow, but extended out in length; the whole compass 22 ven and thirty miles: neighboured by two great Rocks, or little Islands, of old called Melanibii, now the Fernaces; formidable at all times to Mariners, in the night especially. Meantime inhabited at the present, though abounding in pasturage, and yielding sufficiently of corn; Havenless, and therefore the less frequented, yet that defect supplied by commodious Roads. In former times called Dolichus, then Micris, after Ischia: which name it held till the flight of Dedalus out of Crete. Who justly fearing the anger of Minos, for being Pandarus to his wife, in her loves with Taurus, secretly with Icarus his son, fled out of that Island. And because he would be sure to out-strip the Rowers who pursued him, he added sails unto his Boat, which it is said he first invented. But Icarus, coming after in another Bark, delighted with the new device, clapped on too much Canvass, and bearing too great a sail, was here cast away. Hence the new name both to this Island, and the Seas adjoining to it: and the occasion of the Fable of Daedalus putting wings upon his shoulders, when he fled from Crete; and of his flying too high, whereby the wax melted which his wings were fastned with, and he perished in the water. Of which thus Ovid,

*Palmos,

Icarus, Icaris nomina fecit aquis.*

In English thus,
Whilst Icarus weak wings too high did soar
He fell, and gave name to th' Icarian shore.

6 PATMOS, now called Palmosa, is situate on the South of the other two; A little Island, not above 30 miles in compass. Mountainous, but indifferently fruitful, especially of wheat and pulse; of other commodities, and fruits, not so well provided. On one of these Mountains stands a town of the same name with the Island; having on the top thereof a Monastery of Greek Calovers; and on the bottom a fair Haven (I mean in reference to the Island.) Forty sail of Ships are said to belong unto it; by the trading whereof they bring in those provisions which the soil affordeth not: the soil about the town being so incomparably barren, that nothing groweth on or near it, but on such earth as is brought thither from other places. Unto this Island (as to others in other parts of the world) did the Roman Emperours use to confine offenders. A punishment laid by Domitian on S. John the Divine, who in this place writ his Revelation to the Churches of Asia. So much the Text affirms for certain, as to the writing of it in this Island. And the Inhabitants by tradition point unto an house on the North-side of the Town, in which it was written, and not far off the Cave where it was revealed. Both places equally honoured by the Greeks and Latines. They also shew a dead mans hand, which they affirm to be his, the nails whereof grow again as oft as cut. But the Turks (saith Maginnus) claim it for the hand of one of their Prophets. Let them dispute the controversy, whilst we haste to 7 CLAROS, another Island not far off, containing about 40 miles in compass. Well stored with commodious Harbours, but very mountainous; some of those hills of such an height, that from the tops thereof, the City of Ephesus in Ionias, (though distant at least eighty miles) may be easily seen. It is now called Calamo. Neighbour'd by Lero (of old called Ileron) a little Island not above eighteen miles in circuit; but very populous, inhabited both by Greeks and Turks, and furnishing the neighbouring Countries with some store of Aloes. Sacred in former times was Claros to Apollo; reckoned by him amongst his honours, in his brags to Daphne: where he declares,

Mibi Delphica tellus, Et Claros, et Tenedos, Pataxaze Regin servit.

That is to say,
The folk of Diphos, Tenedos, and Clare,
And Royal Pataxa, my Vassels are.

8 COOS, COS, or COUS, for by all these names it was called of old, is situate over against Caria, in the very bottom of the Aegean, that is to say, in that part thereof which is called Mare Myrtoan, the Myrtoan Sea. A Sea so called, as some say, from one Myrtillus, the Coachman or Charioteer of Oenomaus, who having betrayed his race with Pelops, and importunate for his reward, was by Pelops precipitated into this Sea. Pliny less probably conceiveth that it took name from Myrtos, a little Island not far from Euboea, a little too far off to extend its name to the shores of Caria. And therefore considering that Lydia antiently was called Myrtus, and that in those times Aeolis, and Ionias, lying on this Sea, were accounted but as parts thereof, I think we may resolve with more probability, that it deriv'd this name from that Lydian Myrtus.

In this Sea stands the Isle of Coos, now called Lange, affording Saylers as they pass by a most beautiful prospect, lying for the most part flat and level, but swelling towards the East with some graceful mountains, out of which issue many sweet and pleasant springs to refresh the Island which maketh it more than ordinary fruitful. Productive of Cypress trees, Turpentine, and sundry other, both delightful and medicinal; but most especially celebrated for those rich wines, which the Good fellows of Rome so much loved to quaff, called Vinum Cos. It is in compass 70 miles, having a Town of the same name, in the suburbs whereof stood antiently the Temple of Aesculapius, famous and rich with the offerings of those, who having by his assistance (as they supposed) recovered health, came hither to make payment of their vows, and express their gratitude. It is now fortified with a strong Castle; held by a Garrison of Turks; and besides this, two Villages only in the Island, and both inhabited by Greeks.

In elder times it had the name of Merope, Caria, and Nymphaea, and at last of Coos. Memorable in being the Country of many famous men who were here born; viz. of Hippocrates, the Reviver of Physick, then almost decayed, who is hence called Hippocrates Cos. 2 Sinias, a Physician also; 3 Ariston, a Peripatetic Philosopher; 4 Philetas, as good an Orator, as a Poet; 5 Nicias, who for a time oppress'd the liberty of this people; and 6 of Apelles, the famous Painter; who to express his art in the picture of Venus, (rising naked out of the Sea) assembled together all the most beautiful women of this Island, uniting in that piece their divided perfections. Which famous piece being afterwards hanged up in the Temple of Stomalime, one of the principal of this Island, was thence conveyed to Rome by Augustus, and there dedicated to Cesar, as the mother of the Julian family: the Coans in regard hereof, being eased of a great part of their annual tributes. Not much less memorable for which at once shewed them clothed and naked. Perlucida nuntur vestes, ita, ut nude conspici possint, as my Author hath it. These they called Vestimenta Cos, and Vestes Cos, so often mentioned by the Poets, especially in their Amatoria; as Coa puellis Vestis, in Tibullus; Indue me Cois, in Propertius; Sive eris in Cois, saith the Poet Ovid. So in others also, too many, and too long to be added here. I pass to 9 CARPATHOS, situate on the South of Caria, in the Mediterranean, from this Island, called hereabouts the Carpathian Sea. A rugged and unpleasing soil, full of difficult Mountains, but those mountains stored with quarries of most excellent Marble. In circuit about 60 miles, extending more in length than breadth. Heretofore beautified with four Cities, and thence named Tetrapolis. But three of the four Cities are long since perished, that of Carpathos being still remaining, and still the principal one of them furnished with some Port or Haven; but small, and for the most part very unsafe. Situate in the middle as it were betwixt Crete and Rhodes, it hath continued hitherto in the possession of the State of Venice (if not taken from them very lately:) to whom being given with other of the Islands of these Grecian Seas, at the taking of Constantinople by the Western forces, it hath the fortune or felicity to continue theirs, when almost all the residue were subdued by the Turks. The people Greek, of the communion of that Church, notwithstanding their subjection to a State of Italy.

10 RHODES, situate in the Rhodian or Carpathian Sea, lyeth over against the coast of Lycia in Asia Minor, from which distant about 20 miles. Formerly called Ophiusa, Asteria, Ehrea, Trinachia, Pessia, Corymbia, Atalysia, and at last Macaria; it settled finally and fortunately in the name of Rhodes. So named by the Grecians from the abundance of Roses, which the soil produceth, Rhodes in that language signifying a Rose, the Isle of Roses, as it were: but as the Poets say, of Rhoda, a Nymph of these Seas, here deloured by Apollo; or rather of Rhoda, one of the daughters of Apollo begat on Venus. For so one of them thus declareth;

Insula Diſta Rhodos, de Sole et Cypride nata eſt.

Rhoda, from whom this Isle took name,
Of Venus and Apollo came.

The Island 140 miles in compass, enriched with a most temperate air, and a fertile soil, producing fruits in very great plenty, full of excellent pastures, adorned with trees which always do continue green: and in a word, so blest with the gifts of nature, that it gave occasion to the fable of those Golden Showers, which were once said to have fallen upon it. The wines hereof so excellent, and so rich of taste, that by the Romans they were used in their second courses, or reserved for the sacrifices of the gods, as too good for mortals, as affirmed by Virgil in the Georgicks. The cause of which perpetual flourishing, and continual spring, is to be ascribed to the powerful influences of the Sun, so dearly cherishing this Island, or so much in love with it, that it is constantly affirmed that no day passeth wherein he shineth not clearly on it, be the air in all other places never so much over-cast with clouds, or obscured by mists. Feigned for that cause to have been naturally a meer Marish, altogether inhabitable, if not covered with waters; till loved by Phaëus, and erected above the waves by his vigorous influence.

Of the People we shall speak anon; Look we in the meantime on the places of most observation: 1 Lindus, (now Lindos) a petty Town, but formerly of more esteem: of note in those times for the Temple consecrated to Minerva, by Darius King of Egypt, landing here when he fled out of that Kingdom. As also for the birth of Chares, the Archibest of the huge Colossus, whereof more presently; but specially for the nativity of Cleobulus, one of the seven wise men of Greece: the other six being Solon of Athens; Periander of Corinth; Chilon of Sparta; Bias of Priene; Thales of Miletum; and Pittacus of Mitylene. Seven men of whom the Grecians most immensely bragged, as if the World could neither afford them equals, or an equal number: for which decided handily by Lactantius, an old Christian writer, who scoffs their paucity, and calleth it a miserable and calamitous age, in quo septem soli fuerant qui hominum vocabula mererentur; in which there were no more than seven who deserved to be accounted men. 2 Rhodes, antiently, as now the chief City of it, the Island from hence taking name, and formerly, as well as in later times, depending on the fortunes and strength hereof. No place in elder times held superior to it, for the conveniency of the Haven, magnificent buildings, delightful Orchards, and other excellencies. Situate on the East part of the Isle, on the declining of an hill, and near the Sea, where it enjoyeth a safe and commodious Haven: treble walled, fortified with thirteen Turrets, and five strong Bulwarks, besides divers Sconces, and other out-works; this Town, and Famagusta in the Isle of Cyprus, being conceived to be the two strongest holds in the Turkish Empire. In former times, one of the principal Universities of the Roman Empire; this Rhodes, Marſeilles, Tarſus, Athens, and Alexandria, being reckoned the old Academies of that Monarchy. And to this Town, as a most noted place of Study, Tiberius (afterwards Emperour) did withdraw himself, when Augustus had declared gallantry and courage of the Defendants, than the Defendants are by their Fortifications. 2 Cerines, situate near the Sea, strong by art and nature, and furnished with all things necessary to endure a siege, but yielded to the Turks by Alfonso Palatinus the unwarlike Governour, terrified with the great slaughter made at the sack of Nicosia, before the enemy came near it. At first called Cecurania, and said to have been built by Cyrus the great Persian King, when he first subdued the nine Kings hereof, and united the Island to that Crown; built with a more temperate and wholesome air, than any other in the Country. 3 Tremisus, the birth-place of Spiridion, a Bishop of the Primitive times, renowned for miracles; many of which reported by Sozomen, lib. 1. chap. 10. and other Ecclesiastical writers. Wholly decayed, the ruine of it much contributing to the rise of Nicosia. 5 Lapithus (by Pliny called Lapies) on the banks of a small Riveret of that name, of so great note in former times, that it gave to this Division the name of Lapechia, in that part standeth the hill Olympus; (now the Mountain of the holy Cross) described before.

4 SALAMINE, the fourth and last Province of this Island, taketh up the whole East-parts hereof: So named from 1 Salamis, once the chief City of the Isle, and the See of the Primate, or Metropolitan hereof in the Primitive times. Destroyed by the Jews in the reign of Trajan, and re-built again; but being after that taken, sacked, and razed unto the ground by the Saracens, in the time of Heraclius, it never could again recover: the Metropolitan See after that subversion, being removed to Nicosia. It was sometimes, and by some writers, called Constantia also; but that name could give it no more perpetuity than the other of Salamis; Memorable whilst it stood for the founder of it, being Tancer the son of Telamon King of Salamis, an Isle of the Aegean Seas; banished his Country by his Father, and settled in this Island by the power of Belus, King of Phenicia; as also for a famous Temple sacred unto Jupiter, hence called Salaminius. Out of the ruines hereof arose, 2 Famagusta, now the prime City of these parts; built as is said by Costa, the Father of Saint Catharine; but that uncertain. Situate at the East end of the Island, in a plain and low ground betwixt two Promontories, the one called the Cape of Saint Andrew, and the other Cape di Griego, or the head of Gracia. In compass not above two miles, in form four-square, but that the side towards the East stretcheth out more in length than the other three. On two parts beaten on with the Sea, the other parts towards the Land defended with a Ditch not above fifteen foot in breadth, an old stone wall, and certain Bulwarks. The Haven (opposite to Tripolis, a Town of Syria) openeth towards the South-east, defended from the injury of the Sea by two great Rocks, betwixt which the Sea cometh in at a narrow passage not above forty paces broad, but after opening wider and wider, maketh a convenient Harbour, rather safe than large, assured both by the difficult entrance, and a chain crossed over it. The whole Town, when the Turks appeared before it, but meanly fortified; the works of it of the old fashion, generally decayed except one Bulwark, which was but according to the modern Arts of Fortification, with Palisades, Curtains, Casemates, and all other Additaments: most gallantly defended by Brigadine the noble General, to the wonder and envy of the Turks, who spent no less than 18000 great shot upon it; and at last yielded upon honourable terms, had they been as punctually performed. 3 Aphrodisium, so named of Venus, whom the Greeks called Aphrodite, who had here another of her Temples. 4 Asiopolis, built also by one of the Argives Queens of Egypt (there being two others of this name, and the same foundation, now called Lezare, and antiently renowned for the Groves of Jupiter.) 5 Tamassus, of good note in the time of Strabo for rich mines of Brasse, as afterwards for abundance of Verdgreene and Pitrit found plentifully in the fields adjoining. 6 Idalium, near a mount of the same name, so called by accident. For Chalceor the founder of it being told by Oracle, that he should fear himself, and build a City, where he first saw the rising sun: one of his followers, seeing the Sun begin to rise, cried out Idon Idon, that is to say, behold the Sun. Which omen taken by Chalceor, he here built this City. But whether this were so or not (as for my part I build not very much upon it) certain it is, that Venus had here another Temple, neighboured by the Idalian Groves, so memorized and chanted by the antient Poets. So strong an influence had lust and sensuality on this wretched People, that every corner of the Island was defiled with those brutish Sacrifices, which day by day were offered to that impure deity: though to say truth, it was no marvel if having made their Belly their God, they made in the next place, their glory their shame.

The first Inhabitants of this Island were the posterity of Cittim the son of Javan, and grand-son of Japhet: who having seen his brother Tarshish settled in Cilicia, (where his memory is still preserved in the City of Tarsus) planted himself and his retinue in this opposite Island. The City of Cettim, as Ptolemy, or Cittim, as Pliny calleth it, one of the antientest of the Island; taking name from him; which with the authority of Josephus, and others of the antient writers, put it out of question. But being this Island was too narrow to contain his numbers, and willing to seek further off for a larger dwelling, he left here so many of his followers as might serve in time to plant the Country; and with the rest passed into Macedon, where we have already spoken of him. Made tributary first to Amasis King of Egypt, from which distant about three or four days sailing. Subjected afterwards to the Phenicians, a near neighbour to them, who being a Sea-faring people, made themselves masters of the Sea-coasts and maritime places. Cinyras the Father of Myrrha, (by whom both Father and Grand Father to Adonis) is said to have been King of both. The like affirmed of Belus one of his Successors, who is said to have been the founder of the City of Cittim, named so (if not rather repaired than new built by him,) with reference no doubt to Cittim, the first Progenitor of this People. By the power and favour of this Belus, Tencer the son of Telamon, banished his Country, accompanied with many followers from Salamis, Athenis, and Arcadin, was settled in the East parts hereof; where the City of Salamis, by him built, was his first plantation. Yet so, that the Phenicians kept their former hold: it being evident in

Story that Elulus one of the successors of this Belus, (but a King of Tyre), and a Co-temporary with Salmanassar King of Assyria, passed over into Cyprus with a puissant Navy to reduce the Citians to obedience, who had then rebelled. The Island at first coming of Tencer hither so infinitely overgrown with woods, that the people were not able to till the Island. Inasmuch, that notwithstanding the great waste made of them, both in building ships, and casting metals, a law was made that every one which would should fell them, and take as much ground in severalty for his own inheritance, as he could overcome and make fit for tillage. Encouraged herewith, the natural Cypriots, together with the Colonies of Grecians, Phenicians, Egyptians, so bestirred themselves, that at last they brought it unto Champagn: parcelled out in succeeding times, amongst nine Kings, for so many Cyrus the great Persian Monarch found at his coming hither. But Cyrus, though he did subdue all those petty Princes, yet he took not from them their Estates or titles: contented with the conquest of it, and an annual tribute. For after this, in the time of Artaxerxes Mucmon, we find Evagoras, and Nicacles, to whom Iscrates inscribed two of his Orations, to be Kings hereof. And in the time of Alexander the Great, Cittium itself (such was the honour born unto the Mother-City) had a King apart, not subject unto any other. The King whereof to indear himself with the Conquerour, gave to him a sword, μαχαιρα δαμαστηρ, saith Plutarch, an admirable sword, both for colour and lightness, which he after used in all his fights. And after the death of Alexander, his great Commanders cantoning his estates amongst them, the Princes and people of this Island were in great distractions, not knowing to whom they might submit for their best advantage. But Ptolemy, who had seized on Egypt for his part of the spoil, being strong in shipping, ferled them by a personal visit; and fortifying some of the best pieces in it, assured the Countrey to himself. To him and his posterity it continued subject till the time of Ptolemy Auletes, the ninth King of this line in our Account, who gave it for a portion to one of his Brethren: in whose time, the Romans, without any colour or pretence of quarrel, but only to enrich themselves with the spoil of the Island, sent Porcius Cato to subdue it. And he at first assayed to get it with the Kings consent, offering him in the name of the Roman Senate, the Priest-hood of the Temple of Paphos, being a rich and gainfull Office, and of high esteem among that people. But when Ptolemy for fear of worse mischief had made away himself by poison, Cato without more ceremony takes possession of it. And because Ammianus Marcellinus the Historian, hath so significantly expressed this business, and withall described so punctually the Estate of this Island; we will add this discourse from him, though somewhat repeated which was said before. Cyprum insulam precat a Continente distantem, & portus suum, &c. The Isle of Cyprus, far distant from the Continent, and well stored with Harbours, is famous, besides many Municipal Towns, for two principal Cities, that is to say, Salamis, and Paphos; the one sacred to Jupiter, and the other to Venus. An Isle so admirably fruitfully, and with all things furnished, that without the help of any foreign Nation, it is able of itself to build and rig for a ship, from the very keel unto the top-sail, and trim it with all tackle necessary for a present voyage. Nor do I shame to say, that with greater Avarice than Justice, the Romans did invade this Island, King Ptolemy my old Confederate and Ally, being unworthily proscribed, for no other reason, but that our Treasury was bare, our Exchequer empty. And he no sooner had prevented this dishonour by a quick & voluntary death, making away himself by poison, but the Island was forthwith made tributary, and the riches of it, velut hostiles exuvia classis impositae & in urbem adductae per Catonem, as the spoils of some conquered enemy, were brought on Ship-board, and conveyed by Cato unto Rome. So far, and to this purpose he.

I know there is another cause alleaged for the sending of Cato on this Errand, viz. that Clodius who was then Tribune, and spied the Edict, might have opportunity by his absence to revenge himself on Cicero, and some others of the opposite faction: but the main business was the money, as before was said; the prey amounting to 7000 Talents, which comes to two Millions, and one hundred thousand Crowns of coin new current. Which money and movables, amounting unto so vast a sum, he fearing to lose by Sea, divided it into many small portions, which he put into several boxes, viz. in every box two Talents and fifty Drachms. At the end of every box he fastned a long rope with a piece of cork; by which, floating above the water, the money, if by Shipwrack lost, might be espied again: which was not much unlike the buoys which Mariners fasten by long ropes to their Anchors, that they may be the sooner found. We see by this, that the pretence of the Romans to this Countrey was very weak: Avarius magis quam justus sumus affectus, are the words of Sextus Rufus also. But being made a Roman Province, it was in the division of the Empire assigned to the Constantinopolitan Emperours: under whom it suffered, as all other parts of the Empire did, by the violent invasion of the Saracens, who spoiled and ransacked it in the time of Constantine the second, destroying then the City of Salamis or Constantia. But that tempest being overblown, they returned again unto that Empire, governed by a succession of Dukes, till the year 1184. At which time Andronicus Comnenus usurping the Græc Empire, compelled Isaacius Comnenus, one of the blood Royal, to shift for himself: who seizing on this Island made himself King thereof, and ruling till the year 1191. when Richard the first of England, being denied the Common courtesie of taking in fresh water, and seeing his Soldiers abused by the Cypriots, not only took the King Prisoner, but subdued the whole Island. And as Paterculus telleth us, that when Marcus Antonius had captivated Artamides King of Armenia, Catenis, sed ne quid horum deesset, aureis vinxit: So did our Richard keep a decorum towards this Prisoner, binding him not in bonds of Iron, but silver. King Richard having thus possessed himself of this Countrey, sold it for ready money, (which for the managing of his intended wars against the Turks, he most needed) unto the Templers: and taking it, upon I know not what discontent, again from them, he bestowed bestowed it on Guy of Lusignan, the titular and miserable King of Hiernsalem; receiving in way of exchange, the title of that lost and shipwrecked Kingdom; with which title he and some of his Successors for a time were honoured.

In the posterity of this Guy, this Island continued free and absolute, till the year one thousand four hundred twenty three; when Alecbella (or Melechnaser) Sultan of Egypt, invaded this Countrey, took John King hereof Prisoner, ransomed him for 150000 Sultanies, restored him to his Kingdom, and imposed on him and his Successors, the yearly tribute of 40000 Crowns. This John was father to another John, whose two children were Carlote a legitimate daughter, and James a bastard Son. James after the death of his father, dispossessed his sister Carlote of the Crown, by the consent and help of the Sultan of Egypt; and the better to strengthen himself against all opposition, he took to wife Catherine Cornari, daughter by adoption to the Venetian Senate: whom at his death he made his heir, if the child he went withall (having then none by her) should die without issue, as it did, not long after it was born; and the feeing the factions Nobility too head-strong to be bridled by a female authority, like a good child relinshed her Crown and Scepter to the Venetian State, Anno 1473. These defended it against all claims, (paying only as tribute to the Egyptian, and after to the Turkish Sultans, the 40000 Crowns before mentioned) till the year 1570. when Mustapha General of the Turks, wrested it from the Venetians, to the use of his Master Selimus the second, who pretended title to it as Lord of Egypt. The Governour of the Venetian Forces at the time of this unfortunate loss was Signior Bragadino, who as long as hope of succours, means of resistance, or possibility of prevailing continued, with incredible valour made good the Town of Famagusta, in whose defence consisted the welfare of the whole Island. At last he yielded it on honourable conditions, had they been as faithfully kept, as punctually agreed on. But Mustapha the Turkish General inviting to his Tent the principal men of worth in the Town, caused them all to be murdered: and as for Brigadin himself, he commanded his ears to be cut off, his body to be head alive, and his skin stuffed with straw, to be banged at the main yard of his Gally. The chief of the prisoners and spoils were in two tall ships, and one Gallion sent unto Selimus; but he never saw them. For a Noble Cyprian Lady destined to the lust of the Grand Seigneur, fired certain barrels of powder; by the violence whereof both the vessels and the booty in them, were in part burned, in part drowned. A famous and heroick act; inferiour unto none of the Roman Dames, so much commended in their Stories, though more to be commended in a Roman, than a Christian Lady.

Thus having summed up the affairs of this Island from the first plantation of it, till this last said conquest, I will lay down the succession of the Cyprian Kings of the Noble Lusignan Family, in this ensuing Catalogue of

The KINGS of CYP R U S.

- 1 Guy of Lusignan, the titular King of Hiernsalem, created in the Kingdom of Cyprus, by Richard the first of England.
- 2 Americus, the brother of Guy.
- 3 Hugh, the son of Americus.
- 4 Henry, the son of Hugh.
- 5 Hugh II. son of Henry.
- 6 Hugh III. son of Hugh the second.
- 7 John, son of Hugh the third.
- 8 Henry II. the brother of John.
- 9 Hugh IV. son of Guido, the younger brother of John, and Henry the second.
- 10 Peter, the son of Hugh the fourth.
- 11 Petrinus, the son of Peter.
- 12 James, younger brother of Peter, and Uncle to Petrinus.
- 13 Janus, the son of James, made Tributary by Alechnaser, to the Kingdom of Egypt.
- 14 John II. the son of Janus.
- 15 Carlote, sole daughter and heir of John the second, first married to John the Prince of Pinigal, and after to Lewis Prince of Savoy; outed of her estate and Kingdom, by
- 16 James II. the bastard son of John the second, who by a strong hand seized upon it, and by help of the Venetians kept it during life.
- 17 James III. born after the decease of his father, whom he survived not very long. After whose death, being the last of this Family, the Venetians possessed themselves of Cyprus: which they invaded with no better title, than the Romans had done in former times; not likely to be blest with a long fruition, of that which they had so unjustly got into their hands. But of that already.

And here is to be observed, that these Cyprian Kings retaining the title of Hiernsalem (towards which they sometimes cast an eye) bestowed upon their greatest Subjects, and deserving Servitors, both titles of honour and Offices of State, belonging antiently to that Kingdom. So that we find amongst them a Prince of Antioch, a Prince of Galilee, a Count of Tripoli, a Lord of Cesarea, and a Lord of Mount Tabor; a Seneschal of Hiernsalem, a Constable, Marshal, and High Chamberlain of that Kingdom also. With better reason, though no doubt with as little profit, as the Pope gives Bishopricks and Archbishopricks in Greece, or Egypt. But those titular Offices are now quite extinct, though possibly some of the Titles of honour which were took from thence, may be still remaining.

But to return unto the Turks, having thus taken Famagusta, and Nicosia, on which the whole Island did did depend, all other Cities of it, and the whole by consequence, were forced to submit to the Turkish Tyranny. The Noblemen, and Citizens of principal quality, either most cruelly massacred in the sack of those Towns, or banished for ever their native Countrey, as men whose living there might possibly endanger their new conquest: But the Countrey people, Artificers, and persons of inferior rank, permitted to enjoy both their lives and livelihoods, together with their several and respective religions, in the same manner as before: paying such ordinary taxes as were laid upon them. And so this goodly Island came into the hands of the Turks, who have hitherto enjoyed the possession of it: For notwithstanding that the Venetians in the year next following, with the help of the Pope and King of Spain, gave the Turks that great and memorable overthrow, at the famous battel of Lepanto; yet did they nothing in pursuit of so great a victory for the recovery of this Island; and indeed they could not, the confederates returning home, and dissolving their Fleet, as soon as they had secured their own estates by the overthrow of the Turkish Navy. And though the Venetians, to put the best face they could on so great a loss, so highly pleased themselves with the following Victory; that they put the same in balance with the loss of Cyprus; yet an ingenious Turk, to let them see the folly of so vain a boasting, compared the losing of Cyprus, to the loss of an Arm, which could not without a miracle be recovered; and the loss at Lepanto, to the shaving off of ones beard, which grows the thicker for the cutting, as indeed it proved: For the next year the Turks armed out another Navy, no less formidable than the other had been before; braving therewith the whole Christian Forces, either not then disbanded, or re-assembled.

What the Revenues of it were to the Kings hereof, I cannot certainly determine. The profits of Salt only, and that of the Custome-house, yielded yearly to the Seignery of Venice, when it was in their hands, a million of Crowns. For the Customs and profits of the Salt were farmed for 500000 Crowns per annum, which being turned into the chief Cyprian commodities, were counted double worth than money, when unladed at Venice: To which if we should adde the lands of the former Kings, and other wayes of raising money on the Subject, I cannot see, but the Intrado of the Crown must needs amount constantly to a million and a half yearly, if it were not more.

The Arms hereof were quarterly, first Argent, a Cross Potent between four Crosses Or; secondly Barre-wise of eight pieces, Arg. and Azure, supporting a Lion Passant Azure, Crowned Or; thirdly, a Lion Gules; and fourthly, Argent, a Lion Gules; as Bara a French Herald hath given the Blazon.

On the East of Cyprus towards Syria lie four small Islands, which Ptolomy calleth by the name of Cliclus, not far from the Promontory of that name; both Promontory and Island now called Saint Andrews; and towards the West another little knot of Islets, which he calls Carpasia; but nothing memorable in either. So I pass them over.

There are in Cyprus;

OF S Y R I A.

SYRIA is bounded on the East, with the River Euphrates, by which parted from Mesopotamia; on the West, with the Mediterranean Sea; on the North, with Cilicia, and Armenia Minor, from the last parted by Mount Taurus; and on the South, with Palestina, and some parts of Arabia. The length hereof from Mount Taurus to the edge of Arabia, is said to be five hundred twenty and five miles; the breadth from the Mediterranean to the River Euphrates, computed at four hundred and seventy, drawing somewhat near unto a square.

In the Scriptures it is called Aram, and the People Aramites, because first peopled and possessed by Aram the son of Sem; though Hamath, Arphad, and Sidon, the sons of Canaan, did also put in for a share: and yet not called thus by the Scriptures only, but by some of the Heathen writers also. For Strabo doth not only acknowledge, that the Syrians in his time were called Αραμαιοι, but citeth Possidonius, a more ancient Writer, for proof that the Αραμαιοι, which Homer speaketh of, must be those Syrians further averring, that the Syrians called themselves by the name of Aramai, or plainly Aramites. But by the Greeks they are called Syrians, or Syriani, from the City Tyre, called antiently by the name Syr, or Tyr, (of which more hereafter:) either because the Tyrians or Tsuriens, had in those times the command of the Sea-coasts of this Countrey; or else that Tyre or Tser being the chief Mart-town of all those parts, was the place where they traded with these Aramites. Conform to which antient Appellations, the City of Tyre is again called Syr, and this Countrey Soria. Others conceive, that being when the Greeks first knew it, a part of the Affyrian Empire, the seat of which was then at Ninive, it was called Syria for Affyria: as afterwards Affyria had the name of Syria (of which more anon) when the seat of that great Empire was removed to Antioch. And this may very well be so, considering that by the like decurtation we have turned Hispania into Spain, as the Greeks before us did into Spania, by which name it occurs, Rom. 15. 28.

But here we are to understand, that though the Syria of the Romans, as it was a member of that Empire, was limited within the bounds before laid down, yet antiently as well the Aram of the Hebrews, as the Syria of the Greeks and Romans, was of greater Latitude: of which, because it may be usefull to the understanding of holy Scriptures, and of some Classick Authors also, I shall enlarge a little further. For Aram, taken in the largest acceptation of it, extendeth from the coast of Cilicia, North, to Idumaea towards the South; from the River Tygris in the East, to the Mediterranean Sea upon the West; containing besides the Syria of the Greeks and Romans (in which Palestine also was included) Arabia the Desert, and Petrea, Chaldea, Babylonia, and all those Provinces to which the name Aram is either prefixed or subjoined in the Book of God, as Arava-Naharaim, Aram-Sobab, Padan-Aram, Aram-Maachab, Sede-Aram, Aram-Beth-Rehob, all mentioned in the holy Scriptures. Some do extend it further yet, and do not only bring Armenia within the Latitude of this name, which they derive from Aram-minni, whose neighbourhood to Syria, may give some colour to the error; but even those People of Cappadocia bordering on the Euxine Sea, the Inhabitants of which were antiently called Lusco-Syri, or white Syrians. But this not having any good warrant or authority wherewithall to back it, shall not come under the compass of this consideration. For the rest, I find it generally agreed upon amongst the learned, that Aram-Naharaim, is the same with the whole Countrey of Mesopotamia, so named both by the Jews and Grecians, because it is environed with the two famous Rivers of Tygris and Euphrates; which Priscian by a meer Latine name, would have to be called Medanma (but Inter-Amna by his leave would express it better.) And as for Padan-Aram wherein Laban dwelt, which is called Sede-Aram by the Prophet Hosea, ch. 12. v. 13. that is a part only of the other: the whole Countrey of Aram-Naharaim, or Mesopotamia, being divided into two parts; whereof the more fruitful lying Northward, is called Padan-Aram, or Sede-Aram, to whose Inhabitants Xenophon gives the name of Syrians; the barren and more desert lying towards the South, which by the same Author is called Arabia. For Aram-Maachab, mentioned 1 Chron. 19. 6. it is conceived to be that part of Syria, which was after named Comagena, whereof Samosata was the Metropolis, or Mother City. And as for Aram-Sobab, of which and of Adadexar the King thereof, there is so frequent mention in the Books of the Kings and Chronicles, it was the Province lying on the North-East of Damascus, and so extending to the banks of the River Euphrates, and is the same with that which afterwards was called Palmyrena, from the City of Palmyra. South-west of which amongst the petty Kingdoms on the North of Gessur in the land of Palestine, lay the Kingdom of Aram-Beth-Rehob, confederate with Ammon, in the war which they had with David, 2 Sam. 10. 6. Nor did the Greeks less extend the name of Syria, than the Hebrews did the name of Aram, if they stretched it not further. Certain I am, that Strabo comprehendeth the Affyrians in the name of Syria, where he affirmeth, that the Medes being overthrown. And in Herodotus it is said, that those whom the Barbarians call Affyrians, Ἰνδοὶ Ἐδδαίον Ἰσθαλόντο Σέσιον, were called Syrians by the Greeks. And to that purpose, Justin also, Imperium Assyrii, qui postea Syri dicti sunt, Annos 1300 tenuere. But these all writ after the time Syria, from whence they might more easily furnish themselves with Souldiers out of Greece, (as they did most commonly for all their military expeditions) caused all the other parts of their large dominions to be called, in tract of time, by the name of Syria. But on the other side, as the Romans extended not so far to the East and South, as the Aram of the Hebrews did; so it contained in the name of Aram; as being planted by a people of another race, and of different Fortunes, till brought together under the command of the Babylonians. In which regard we will treat severally of the natures of the soil and people; their Originals, Government, and successes, till we have brought them into one hand: and then continue their affairs as one joynr Estate. But first we will survey the ancient and present Fortunes of Christianity, and other Religions herein embraced or tolerated, wherein the whole, according to the bounds and limits before laid down, is alike concerned.

Syria

And for Religions in this Countrey here is choice enough; those namely of the Mahometan, Christi-an, Pagan, and one compounded out of all, which is that of the Druisians. The Mahometan embraced by the generality of the people throughout the whole, and by all that be in any office or authority, is only countenanced and approved of, though all the rest be tolerated. The Pagan entertained only in the mountainous Countreys bordering on Armenia; inhabited by a people whom they call Curdi, or the Curdens, supposed to be descended from the ancient Parthians, as being very expert in Bows and Arrows, their most usual Arms. A race of people who are said to worship alike both God and the Devil; the one, that they may receive benefits from him; the other, that he may not hurt them. Se alios deos colere ne profitentur, alios ne necant, as Lactantius doth affirm of the ancient Graecians. But their principal devotions are addressed to the Devil only, and that upon good reasons, as themselves conceive. For God they say is a good man, and will do no body no harm; but the Devil is a mischievous fellow, and must be pleased with sacrifices, that he hurt them not. And for the Druisians they are conceived to be the remainder of those Franks, (by which name the Turks call all Western Christians) who driven unto the mountains, (when they lost the Sovereignty and possession of the Holy Land) and defending themselves by the advantage of the place, could never be wholly rooted out by the Turks, contented at the length to afford them both peace, and liberty of their Religion. But they have so forgot the principles of that Religion, that they retain nothing of it but Baptism; and not that generally neither; accounting it lawfull most unlawfully to marry their own Daughters, Sisters, or Mothers: and yet conform unto the Turks in their habit only, wearing the white Turbans, as the Turks do; but abhorring Circumcision, and indulging to themselves the liberty of Wine, by law forbidden to the Turks. A people otherwise very warlike, stout, and resolute; with great, both constancy and courage, resisting hitherto the attempts of the Turkish Sultans. The Countrey they possess environed with the confines of Joppa, about Cesarea Palestine, betwixt the Rivers of Jordan and Orontes, extending Eastwards as far as the Plains of Damascus: so that here is no part of Syria, except Comagena, unto which their habitations reach not.

But for the Christian Faith, it was first preached here by some of the dispersed Brethren, (which fled from the rage of persecution) in Phonice and the City of Antiochia; amongst whom St. Peter, as he passed through all quarters, Acts 9. 31. is by the Fathers said to have been the chief. The Church more fully planted in it by Barnabas first, after by Paul and Barnabas jointly; Who spend there a whole year together, enlarged the borders of the Church; and gained much people, as is said Acts 11. v. 19. &c. inasmuch that here the Disciples were first called Christians, v. 26. Not called so accidentally, as a thing of chance, but on a serious consultation had amongst themselves, and a devout invocation on the name of God, to direct them in it. The word Χριστιανισμ used in the Original, importeth somewhat of Oracular and Divine direction. And certainly it standeth with reason that it should be so. For if upon the giving of a name to John Baptist, there was not only a consultation had of the Friends and Mother, but the dumb Father called to advise about it; and if we use not to admit the poorest child of the Parish into the Congregation of Christs Church by the door of Baptism, but by the joynr invocation of the name of God for his blessings on it: with how much more regard of Ceremony and Solemnity, must we conceive that the whole body of Christs people were baptized into the name of Christians? And there is some proof of it too, besides probability and conjectures. For Snidas, and before him Johannes Antiochenus, an old Cosmographer, do expressly say, that in the days of Claudius Caesar, ten years after the Ascension of our Lord and Saviour, Eudius received Episcopal consecration, and was made Pa-triarh of Antioch the Great in Syria, succeeding immediately to St. Peter: then addeth, that at that time the Disciples were first called Christians, τὸ ὄνομα τοῦτο ἐκ τῆς ἐκκλησίας τοῦ ἀντιόχειου, & ἔκ τῆς ἐκκλησίας τῆς ἑσπέρης, &c. i. e. Euphrates their Bishop calling them to a Solemn Assembly, and imposing this new name upon them, whereas before they were called Nazarenes and Galileans: A people so hated by the Heathens, that they ceased not to slander them from the first beginning. For as concerning this Sect, we know that it is every where spoken against, said the Jews of Rome to the Apostle, Acts 28. 22. Tacitus, a Roman, but a Geniile, goes yet further with them, calling them homines per flagitia infames, & novissima meritis exempla: the calumny in his time being strong and general, that at their private meetings they devoured Infants, and had carnal company with their Mothers and Sisters. Which defamations notwithstanding, they grew in few years, so to great numbers, that they were a terror to their Enemies; though grievously afflicted, persecuted, and put to several kinds of death, under the ten famous Persecutions, raised against them, by Nero, Anno 67. 2 Domitian, Anno 96. 3 Trajan, Anno 110. 4 Marcus Antoninus, Anno 167. 5 Severus, Anno 195. 6 Maximianus, Anno 237. 7 Decius, Anno 250. 8 Valerianus, Anno 259. 9 Aurelianus, Anno 278. 10 by Dioclesianus, Anno 293. All, but this last especially, so extremely raging, that (as St. Hieron writes in one of his Epistles) there were martyred 5000 for each day in the year, except the first of January, on which they used not to shed blood. But Sanguis Martyrum semen Ecclesie. This little grain of Mustard-seed, sowed by Gods own hand, and watered by the blood of so many holy men, grew to great a tree, that the branches of it spread themselves over all the world: and got such footing, even in the Roman Army itself, (men commonly not of the strictest kind of Religion) that when Julian the Apostate had vomited out his soul, with Vicisti tandem Galilee, they elected Jovianus, though a Christian, for his Successor: with this acclamation, Christiani omnes sumus, We are also Christians. But see how the baptizing of Gods people by the name of Christians, in the City of Antioch, hath drawn me out of my way. I return again, both to the place, and to the Author. In whose evidence, besides what doth concern the imposition of the name of Christian upon the body of the faithful, we have a testimony for St. Peter being Bishop of Antioch, the first Bishop thereof (of the Church of the Jews therein at least) as is said positively by Eusebius in his Chronology, St. Hieron in his Catalogue of Ecclesiastical writers, Saint Chrysostom in his Homilie de translatione Ignatii, Theodoret Dialog. 1. St. Gregory Epist. lib. 6. cap. 37. and before any of them by Origen, in his litter Homily on St. Luke. With reference whereunto, and in respect that Antioch was accounted always, the principal City of the East-parts of the Roman Empire: (the Prefect of the East for the most part residing in it) the Bishop hereof in the first Ages of Christianity, had jurisdiction over all the Churches in the East, as far as the bounds of that Empire did extend that way. To which by Constantine the Great the Provinces of Cilicia and Isauria, with those of Mesopotamia and Osroene were after added; containing 15 Roman Provinces, or the whole Diocese of the Orient. And though by the subtracting of the Churches of Palestine, and the decay of Christianity in these parts by the conquests of the Turks and Saracens, the jurisdiction of this Patriarch hath been very much lessened: yet William of Tyre, who flourished in the year 1130. reciteth the names of 13 Archbishops, 21 Metropolitans, and 127 Episcopal Sees, yielding obedience in his time to the See of Antioch. Since which that number is much diminished, Mahometism more and more increasing, and Christianity divided into Sects and Factions: inasmuch as of three sorts of Christians living in these Countreys, viz. the Maronites, Jacobites, and the Melchites, only the Melchites are subordinate to the Church of Antioch, the others having Patriarchs of their own Religion.

And first for the Melchites, who are indeed the true and proper Members of the Church of Antioch, and the greatest body of Christians in all the East; they are so named in way of scorn, by the Jacobite and Maronite Schismatics, separating without just cause from their communion. The name derived from Melch, signifying in the Syriack language a King, or Emperour: because adhering to their Primate, they followed the Canons and Decisions of preceding Councils, ratified by authority of the Emperour Leo, by whom subscription was required to the Acts thereof; and were in that respect, (as we use to say) of the Kings Religion. Conform in points of Doctrine to the Church of Greece, but that they celebrate divine Service as solemnly on the Saturday, as upon the Sunday: subject to the true and Original Patriarch, who since the destruction of Antioch doth reside in Damascus; and on no terms acknowledging the authority of the Popes of Rome.

Next for the Maronites, they derive that name either from Maroma, one of the principal Villages where they first inhabited; or from the Monastery of Saint Maron, mentioned in the first Act of the Council of Constantinople holden under Menas, the Monks of which called Maronites, were the head of their Sect. Some points they hold, in which they differ from all Orthodox Christians; other in which they differ only from the Church of Rome. Of the first sort, 1 That the Holy Ghost proceedeth from the Father only, without relation to the Son. 2 That the Souls of men were created all together at the first beginning. 3 That male Children are not to be baptized together, but at several times by one and one. 4 That Heretiques returning to the Church are to be re-baptized. 5 That the Child is made unclean by the touch of his Mother till her purification, and therefore not baptizing Children till that time be past, which after the birth of a Male Child must be forty days, of a Female eighty. 6 That the Eucharist is to be given to Children presently after Baptism. 7 That the fourth Marriage is utterly unlawfull. 8 That the Father may dissolve the Marriage of his Son or Daughter. 9 That young men are not to be ordained Priests or Deacons, except they be married. 10 That nothing strangled, or of blood, may be eaten by Christians. 11 That Women in their Monthly courses are not not to be admitted to the Eucharist, or to come into the Church. 12 And finally (which was indeed their first discrimination from the Orthodox Christians) that there was but one will and action in Christ; the Factors of which opinion had the name of Monothelites. Of the last kind, 1 That the Sacrament of the Lords Supper was to be administered in both kinds, 2 and in Leavened bread; 3 that bread to be broken to the Communicants (and not each man to have his wafer to himself) according to the first institution. 4 Not reserving that Sacrament, 5 nor carrying any part of the consecrated Elements to sick persons in danger of death. 6 That Marriage is nothing inferior to the single life; 7 That no man entereth the Kingdom of Heaven till the General Judgement; 8 That the Saturday, or old Sabbath is not to be fasted; 9 Nor the Sacrament upon days of fasting to be administered till the Evening. They withdrew themselves from the See of Antioch, and set up a Patriarch of their own, many ages since (but the certain time thereof I find not) conferring on him for the greater credit of their Schism, the honourable title of the Patriarch of Antioch. His name perpetually to be Peter, as the undoubted Successor of that Apostle in the See thereof. Dispersed about the spurs and branches of Mount Libanus, where they have many Townships and scattered Villages, of which four are reported to retain in their common speech the true ancient Syriack; that is to say 1 Eden, a small Village, but a Bishops See, by the Turks called Echeran. 2 Hatcheth, 3 Sherry, 4 Bolefa, or Blousfa, little superior to the rest in bigness or beauty, but made the seat of their Patriarch, when he comes amongst them. At such time as the Western Christians were possessed of these parts, they submitted to the Church of Rome; but upon their expulsion by the Turks and Saracens, they returned again to the obedience of their own Patriarch, on whom they have ever since depended. His residence for the most part at Tripolis, a chief Town of Syria; but when he came to visit his Churches, and take an account of his Suffragan Bishops (who are nine in number) then at Blousfa, as is said before. Won to the Papacy again by John Baptist a Jesuite, in the time of Pope Gregory the thirteenth, who sent them a Catechism from Rome printed in the Arabian language (which is generally spoken by them) for their instruction in the Rudiments of that Religion: yet so that their Patriarch still retains his former power, and the Priests still officiate by the old Liturgies of those Churches, in the Syriack tongue. So that this reconciliation, upon the matter, is but a matter of complement on the one side, and ostentation on the other; without any increase of Power or Patrimony to the Pope at all. And for the Jacobites, though dispersed in many places of this Countrey; yet since they are more entirely settled in Mesopotamia, where their Patriarch also hath his abode or residence, we shall there speak of them.

The language vulgarly here spoken is the Arabick tongue, continued here ever since the subjugation of these Countreys by the Saracens. But anciently they spake the Syriack and Phœnician languages. Of which, the first (for of the other we shall speak when we come to Phœnicia) was the very same with the Chaldean, (as the learned Brewood hath observed) either originally so, or else received by them when first conquered by the Babylonians. In which respect the Jews, when they returned home from their long Captivity, gave to the language which they brought with them, the name of Syriack; being a compound of the Hebrew and Chaldean tongues: Chaldean for a great part of it, as to the substance of the words; but Hebrew as to the notation of Points, Conjugations, Affixes, and other properties of their former and original speech. And of this more hereafter also, when we come to Palestine. But whatsoever their language was in former time, it is now so overtopped by the Arabick, that it is spoken in four Villages of the Maronites only in all these Countreys; the Arabick being generally used in all the rest, as was said before.

Principal Rivers of these parts, are, 1 Chorsaus, called Chifon by the Hebrews, which hath its fountain in Palestine, but his fall in Phœnicia, not far from Mount Carmel. 2 Orontes, now called Saldino, and by some Writers Jordan the less, ariseth out of the hills called Pieria, not far from Mount Libanus; and after a while running under the ground, breaketh forth again about Apamia, and passing by the great City of Antioch, falleth into the Sea not far from it. It was first called Tiphon, and took this name from one Orontes, who built first the Bridge over it, as we find in Strabo. 3 Eleutherus, which riseth out of some part of Libanus, and glided with a speedy course throw a strangely intricate Channel, into the Mediterranean Sea: guilty of the death of the Emperour Frederick Barbarossa, who falling from his horse as he pursued the Infidels, and oppressed with the weight of his Armour, was here drowned, and lyeth buried at Tyre. It is now called Casmer. 4 Singas, by some said to be called Marfias also, which arising in the mountainous parts of Comagena, and passing by the City of Aleppo, falleth into Euphrates. 5 Euphrates, the most famous River of the East; of which more hereafter.

Chief Mountains of it, 1 Carmel, which being properly of Phœnicia, we shall there speak of it. 2 Pieria, out of which the River Orontes hath its first Original. 3 Casius, not far from Antioch, said to be 4 miles high perpendicularly. 4 Libanus, famous for its multitude of Cedars growing thereupon; affording materials unto Solomon for the holy Temple. Besides which it affordeth such store of Frankincense, that some derived the name from liban, signifying Frankincense in the Greek; and so replenished with Honey falling from the Heavens, and hanging on the Boughs of the Trees, that the Husbandmen used to sing (as Galen telleth us) that God rained honey; and yearly filled their Pots and Vessels with the sweets thereof. This the most famous and greatest Hill of all these parts, extending in length 150 miles, that is to say from Sidon a City of Phœnicia, to Smyrna, one of the Cities of Cælo-Syria; and taking seven hundred miles in compass. Inhabited wholly in a manner by the Maronite Christians, who to keep that dwelling to themselves without the intermixture of Mahometans, do yearly pay to the Great Turk seventeen Sultanies a man, for every one above twelve years of Age: each each Sultany being reckoned at seven shillings and six pence of our money. And yet those Marenites, though intire, without intermixture, are held to be the smallest Sett, for numbers, in all the East; not estimated to exceed twelve thousand households, by reason of the indisposition of this Mountain, in most places unfit for habitation. For besides the cragginess and steepness of it, which makes many parts hereof to be inaccessible; the higher Ridges of it are in a manner perpetually covered with snow, not melted in so hot a Climate at the nearest approaches of the Sun. And thence no doubt it took this name; the word Leban, in the Hebrew and Phœnician language, signifying White, or Whiteness; even as from the like whiteness of snow, the highest part of the Panaan hills had the name of Canus; and that perpetual Ridge of Mountains, which parts Italy from France and Germany, had the name of Alpes. 5 Anti-Libanus, opposite to the former, and from that so called; a rich, but little Valley only being interposed; out of which Valley the Orontes hath its Spring or Fountain, the hill Pieria there beginning to advance it self. Some make but one Mountain of them both, divided into two great Ledges or Chains of Hills. Of which the main body lying towards the North, hath the name of Libanus; that on the South, being but a branch or excursion of it, called Anti-Libanus. And to this the Scripture gives some hint, in which both pass for one, by the name of Lebanon.

The whole Country was anciently divided into these six parts, viz. 1 Phœnicia, 2 Palestine, 3 Syria specially so called, 4 Comagena, 5 Palmyrene, and 6 Cælo-Syria, or Syria Cava. But Palestine, coming under a more distinct consideration, we shall now speak only of the rest.

I PHOENICIA.

PHOENICIA is bounded on the East and South, with Palestine; on the North, with Syria, properly and specially so called; on the West, with the Mediterranean Sea. So called by the Græcians, from the abundance of Palm-trees therein growing, the word Phœnik in that language signifying a Palm. And for a further proof hereof, (for I know there are other Etymons and Originations pretended for it) the Palm was anciently the special Cognisance or Ensign of this Country; as the Olive branch and Cory of Spain, the Elephant of Africk, the Camel of Arabia, and the Crocodile of Egypt, being peculiar to those Countries. And in an old Coyn of the Emperor Vespasian's, stamped for a memorial of his conquest of Judea, the Impress is a woman sitting in a sad and melancholick posture, at the back of Palm-trees, with these two words, Judea Capta inscribed thereon: in which, no question may be made, but that the desolate Woman signifyeth the Land of Judea, and the Palm Phœnicia; Phœnicia being seated immediately on the North, at the back of Jewry.

But it was thus first called by the Græcians only, the Latines and other People after them taking up that name. For by themselves, and the people of Israel their next Neighbours, they are called Canaanites, or the Posterity of Canaan, five of whose Sons, viz. Zidon, Harkî, Arvadi, Senari, and Chamaithi, were planted here: the other six inhabiting more towards the South and East, in the Land of Palestine. For further evidence hereof we may add these reasons: first, that the same woman which in Saint Matthews Gospel, chap. 15. vers. 22. is named a Canaanite, is by Saint Mark, chap. 7. vers. 26. called a Syro-Phœnician. Secondly, where mention is made in the Book of Josiah, of the Kings of Canaan; the Septuagint (who very well understood the History and Language of their Country) call them Baanîthi or Phœnicians, or the Kings of Phœnicia. Thirdly, the Pæni, or Carthaginians, being beyond all dispute a Tyrian or Phœnician Colony, when they were asked any thing of their Original, would answer that they were Chamaî; meaning (as Saint Augustine that Country-man doth expound their words) that they were Originally Canaanites, of the Stock of Canaan. And lastly, from the language of it, which anciently was the old Hebrew, Canaanitish, or the Language of Canaan; spoken both here and in Palestine also, before that Country was possessed by the House of Jacob: as appears plainly by those names, by which the places and Cities of Canaan were called, when and before the Israelites came first to dwell amongst them, which are merely Hebrew. And so much, as unto the Language is acknowledged by Bochartus also, who in the entrance of his Book inscribed Chanaan, declares what profit may ensue from that undertaking to the Hebrew Tongue; cujus Phœnicia lingua dialectus fuit, of which the Phœnician language was a dialect only.

The Country of it self not great, extended in a good length, from the further side of Mount Carmel, where it joyns with Palestine, to the River Volanus on the North, by which parted from Syria; but withall so narrow, that it is little more than a bare Sea-coast; and therefore very rightly called terra angustissima by a modern Writer. Rich rather by the benefit and increase of trade (to which no Nation under Heaven hath been more addicted) than by the natural commodities which the land afforded: yet for the quantity thereof, no place could be more plentifully furnished with Oyl, Wheat, the Best sort of Balm, and most excellent Honey; the lower part hereof being designed for the seat of Ashtor, of whom Moses prophesied, Deut. 32. v. 24. that he should dip his foot in Oyl. So that the Country generally, was well-conditioned, lovely to look upon, populous, and adorned with more beautiful Cities, than such a span of earth could be thought to hold. Of which thus writeth Ammianus, Acetibis monti Libano Phœnicia Regio, plena gratiarum & venustatis, urbilis decorata magnis & pulchris, &c. &c. Falling from Mount Libanus, lyeth the Country of Phœnicia, full of all graces and elegancies, adorned with great and beautiful Cities, of which the most renowned for the fertility of their soyl, and the fame of their achievements, are Tyre, Sidon, Berytus, &c.

The People anciently, by reason of their Marithæ situation, were great Adventurers at Sea, trading in almost all the Ports of the then known World, and sending more Colonies abroad upon foreign Plantæ.

Phœnicia.

Plantations than any Nations in the Earth. An active and ingenious people, said to have been the first Navigators, the first builders of Ships, the first inventors of Letters, (of which hereafter more on some other occasion) and the first authors of Arithmetick, the first that brought Astronomy to an Art or Method; and the first makers of Glass. Defamed in holy Scripture for their gross Idolatry, by which they laid a stumbling-block at the feet of the Israelites: Ashtorah (or Asarte) the Goddess of the Sidonians (but whether Juno, Venus, or some other, I dispute not here) being so highly prized amongst them, that Solomon himself, when he fell from God; made this one of his Idols. Once yearly; as Eusebius telleth us, they sacrificed some of their Sons to Saturn, whom in their language they called Moloch. And in the inmost retreats of Libanus had a Temple to Venus, defiled with the practice of most filthy lusts; intemperately using the natural Sex, and most unnaturally abusing their own. Nor could the purity and piety of the Christian faith prevail so far, as to extinguish these ungodly rites, till Constantine finally destroyed both the Temples and Idols, and left not any thing remaining of them, but the shame and infamy. St. Anstin addeth, that they did prostitute their Daughters unto Venus, before they married them: and it is most likely to be true. For the Phœnicians and Cyprians being so near neighbours, and subject for a time to the same Princes also; could not but impart their impure Rites and Ceremonies unto one another.

Rivers of note there can be none in so narrow a Region but what are common unto others; and shall here be spoken of. Most proper unto this is the River of Adonis, (now called Canis), so named most probably from Adonis the Dearly of Venus, whose rites are here performed with as much solemnity, as they be in Cyprus. His Obsequies celebrated yearly in the month of June, with great howlings and Lamentations, Lucian fabling that the River usually streameth blood upon that Solemnity; (as if Adonis were newly wounded in the Mountains of Libanus;) to give the better colour to their Superstitions. But the truth is, that this redness of the water ariseth only from the Winds; which at that time of the year blowing very vehemently, do thereby carry down the stream a great quantity of Minium or red Earth, from the sides of those hills, wherewith the waters are discoloured. Such use can Satan make of a natural Accident, to blind the eyes and captivate the understandings of beloved people.

Chief Mountains of this Country are, 1 Libanus, spoken of before, which hath here its first advance or rising. 2 Carmel, which Pytolomy placeth in this Country, of which it is the utmost part upon the South, where it joyneth with Palestine. Washed on the North side with the Brook Chison; on the West, with the Mediterranean Sea: steep of ascent; and of indifferent altitude; abounding with several sorts of Fruits, Olives, and Vines in good plenty, and stored with herbs both medicinal and sweet of smell. Theretreat sometimes of Elijah, when he fled from Jezebel; whose habitation here; after his decease; was converted to a Jewish Synagogue. To this place (being then in the possession of the Kings of Israel) did that Prophet assemble the Priests of Baal; and having by a miraculous experiment confuted their Idolatrous follies, caused them to be cut in pieces on the banks of the River Chison near adjoining to it. Upon this visible declaring of the power and presence of the Almighty, the Gentiles grew persuaded that Oracles were there given by God; by Suetonius called the God Carmelus. Where speaking of Vespasian, who had then newly took upon him the Imperial Dignity, he addeth, Apud Jdeam Carmeli Dei Oracula consulentem ita confirmare sores, &c. that consulting in Judea with the Oracle of the God Carmelus, he was assured that whatsoever he undertook should succeed well with him. Inafter-times the Order of the Friers Carmelites, as successors unto the Children of the Prophets left here by Elijah, had their name from hence: the ruins of whose Monastery are still to be seen, with a Temple dedicated to the blessed Virgin; and under that a Cave or Chappel, said to have been the lurking place of that holy Prophet, in the time of his troubles.

Places of most importance in it, 1 Prolemais, now nothing but a ruine of what it hath been, but formerly of great strength and consequence. Named Ace at the first, a refuge for the Persian Kings in their wars against Egypt; enlarged; or rather new built, by Ptolomy, the first of that race, by whom called Prolemais, which name still continued; though Claudius Cesar planting there a Roman Colony, would fain have had it called Colonia Claudia: after the conquest of it by the Saracens, in the time of Omer the great Caliph, it returned towards its first name, and was called Acce, or Acre; both names still remaining in vulgar speech, as that of Prolemais amongst Latine Writers. Situate in the flourish of it on a flat or level, in form of a triangular-Shield; on two sides neighboured by the Sea which comes up close to it; on the third looking towards the Campaign: environed with a double wall, to each wall a Ditch, fortified on the outside with Towers and Bulwarks; within the walls so strongly housed, as if the whole Town had been a Conjunction of Fortresses, and not ordained for private dwellings. In the midst of the City was one Tower of great strength and beauty, which had sometimes been the Temple of Belzebub, and was therefore called the Castle of Fies: on the top whereof was maintained a perpetual light, like the Pharos of Egypt, to give comfort and direction in the night to such Mariners, as made towards this Port. Took from the Christians by the Saracens in the time of Omer, and from them writed by the Turks with the rest of Syria; it became Christian again, An. 1004. in the reign of Baldwin the first, Brother of the famous Godfrey of Bouillon; and second King of Hierusalem, by the help of the Genoese; who for their pains had the third part of the City assigned unto them. Recovered by Saladin the first, and Richard the first of England, An. 1191. it continued in the possession of the Kings of Hierusalem, notably defended by the Hospitaliers (now Knights of Malta) till the year 1291. when besieged by an Army of an hundred and fifty thousand Turks, it was forced to yield, though lost by inches: and the Turks fearing lest the Christians would again attempt it; razed it to the ground: demolishing the large walls and arches of it, which lie like massy Rocks on their old foundations. Memorable in those times for the brave service here done by the Christians of the Western parts, of which none more renowned than those of our Richard the first, and Edward the first. This latter here treacherously wounded by an Infidel, with a poisoned Knife, the venom whereof could by no means be asswaged, till his most vertuous wife (herein propoling a most rare example of conjugal affection) sucked it out with her mouth. And for the former, he became so terrible and redoubted among the Turks, that with their Children began to cry, they would say, Peace, King Richard is coming: and when their Horses started, they would spur them, saying, What you fades, do you think that King Richard is here? By the Mamelucks, when Lords of Syria, it was patched together, and made fit for habitation rather than defence: not Peopled by above 300 Inhabitants, nor would it have so many, but for the Haven adjoining: which though a small Bay and of very ill anchorage, is much frequented by the Merchants of our Western world, trading here for their Cotton Woolls; With which the neighbouring Countrey is abundantly furnished. I have staid the longer in this place, by reason of the great fame and importance of it, as being the last hold which the Christians had of all their conquests; with the loss whereof they laid aside all thoughts of those holy Wars: 2 Tyre, seated in a rocky Island, about seventy paces from the main Land; well built, and circular of form, as well by Art as Nature impregnablely fortified. A Colony of the Sidonians, and therefore by the Prophet Esay, ch. 23. v. 12. called the Daughter of Sidon: but by them built upon an high hill; the ruins whereof by the name of Palatium, or old Tyre, are remaining still. Removed unto the Islands by Agenor, King of the Phœnicians, and by him named Sor, or Tzor, from the rocky situation of it (as that word importeth.) Mollified by the Greeks to Tyris, and from them taken by the Latines, though known to them also by the name of Sora (the Tyrian Purple being by Virgil, and some others of the ancient Poets, called Sappanum Ostrum;) and now at last returned to its first original name, vulgarly at this day called Sor. A City in eldest times of great trade and wealth: the Prophet Esay, ch. 27. v. 8. calling the Merchants hereof Princes, and her Chapmen the Nobles of the World. Excelling all others of those times both for Learning and Manufactures, especially for the dying of Purple, first here invented; and that as Julius Pollux saith, by a very accident: the Dog of Hercules, (or if not his, some Dog or other) whose lips by eating of the Fish called Conchilis, or Purpura, had been made of that colour. Grown to great pride, by reason of the wealth and pleasures, her destruction was fore-signified by the holy Prophets: accomplished in Gods own time by Nebuchadnezzar: who with great industry and toil joyned it to the Continent. But his works being demolished by the fury of the Sea, and the labour of the Tyrrians, it was after seventy years again re-edified; and having flourished after that for two hundred years, by Alexander the Great was again demolished; to whose indefatigable perseverance nothing was impossible. For having filled the Channel with the stones and rubbish of old Tyre, and rammed them in with huge beams brought from Libanus, he made a passage for his Army: and having once approached the walls, so over-topped them with Towers, and Frames of Timber, that at last he made himself Master of it; putting to the sword all such as resisted, and causing two thousand of them to be hanged in cold blood, all along the Shore, for a terrour to others. This rendition of the Town was divined by the Sooth-sayers, who followed the Camp of Alexander, upon a dream which he had not long before. For dreaming that he had disported himself with Satyres; the Diviners only making of one word two, found that Satyres was no more than Sa-tyrus, that is Tyrus; and it happened accordingly. Recovering once again both her riches and beauties, she became a confederate of the Romans in the growth of their Fortunes; endued by them with the privileges of their City, for her great fidelity. Made in the best times of Christianity, the Metropolitan See for the Province of Phœnicia, the Bishop hereof having under him fourteen Suffragan Bishops. Subjected to the Saracens in the year six hundred thirty and six; and having groaned under that yoke for the space of four hundred eighty and eight years, was at the last regained by Guarimund Patriarch of Hierusalem, in the reign of the second Baldwin, the Venetian contributing their assistance to it, An. 1124. In vain attempted afterwards by victorious Saladine; but finally brought under the Turkish thralldom, Anno 1289. as it still continueth. Now nothing but an heap of ruins, but the very ruins of it of so fair a prospect, as striketh both pity and amazement into the beholders; shewing them an exemplary pattern of our humane frailty. Subject at the present to the Emir, or Prince of Sidon, and beautified with a goodly and capacious Haven, one of the best of the Levant; but of no great trading. 3 Sarepta, by the Hebrews called Sarphat, situate on the Sea-coast betwixt Tyre and Sidon. Memorable in holy Writ for the miracle here performed by the Prophet Elijah, in raising the poor Widows Son: in Heathen Writers for the purest Wines, little inferior unto those of Falerum in Italy, or Chios in Greece. Of which thus the Poet;

Vina mihi non sunt Gazetica, Chia, Falerna,
Quaque Serapiano palmite missa bibas.

In English thus,

I have no Chian or Falernian Wines,
Nor those of Gazae or Sarepta Vines.

4 Sidon the ancientest City of all Phœnicia, and the most Northern of all those which were assigned for the portion of the Sons of Aser: beyond which the Countrey of Phœnicia having been hitherto nothing but a bare Sea-coast, beginneth to open towards the East in a fine rich Valley, having Libanus upon the North, and the Anti-Libanus on the South; once closed up from the rest of Syria with a very strong strong wall, long since demolished. It was so called from Zidon, one of the Sons of Canaan, who first planted here; not (as some say) from Sida, the daughter of Belus, once a King hereof: this City being mentioned in the Book of Josias, when no such Belus was in being. Situate in a fertile and delightful Soyl, defended with the Sea on one side, and on the other by the Mountains lying betwixt it and Libanus; from whence descended those many Springs, with which they watered and enriched their most pleasant Orchards. The Inhabitants hereof are said to be the first makers of Crystal Glass, the materials of the work brought higher from the Sands of a River running not far from Ptolemais, and only made suitable in this City. And from hence Solomon and Zorobabel had their principal workmen, both for Stone and Timber, in their several buildings of the Temple. The People hereof so flourishing in Arts and Trades, that the Prophet Zachariah, chap. 9. v. 2. calleth them the wise Sidonians. A City which at several times was both the Mother and Daughter of Tyre; the Mother of it in the times of Heathenism, Tyre being a Colony of this People, and the Daughter of it when instructed in the Christian Faith, acknowledging the Church of Tyre for its Mother-Church. The City in those times very strong both by Art and Nature, having on the North-side a Fort or Citadel, mounted on an inaccessible Rock, and environed on all sides by the Sea: which when it was brought under the command of the Western Christians, was held by the Order of the Dutch Knights; and another on the South-side of the Port, which the Templars guarded. Won by the Turks with the rest of this Countrey from the Christians, and ruined by those often interchanges of fortune: it only sheweth now some marks of the ancient greatness; the present Sidon standing somewhat West of the old, and having little worth a particular description, in respect of what it was in her ancient glories. The Haven at this time decayed, or serving at the best for Gallies; with a poor Block-house, rather for shew than service: the walls of no greater strength, and as little beauty, and the buildings ordinary; but that the Mosque, the Bannia of Bathes, and the Cane for Merchants, are somewhat fairer than the rest: yet gives a title at this time to the Emir of Sidon, one of the greatest Princes of all this Countrey, of whom more hereafter. 5 Berytus, originally called Geris, from Gerges the fifth Son of Canaan, took this new name from Berith, a Phœnician Idol herein worshipped; and now called Barutti. Destroyed by Tryphon in the wars of the Syrians against the Jews, it was re-edified by the Romans, by whom made a Colony, and honoured with the name of Julia Felix; Augustus giving it the Privileges of the City of Rome. By Herod and Agrippa Kings of the Jews, much adorned and beautified; and of no mean esteem in the time of the Christians, when made an Episcopal See under the Metropolitan of Tyre. Being a place of no great strength, nor aimed at by every new Invader, it hath sped better than the rest of these Cities (though stronger than this) retaining still her being, though not all her beauties; well stored with Merchandise, and well frequented by the Merchant. Nigh to this Town is a fair and fruitful Valley, which they call Saint Georges; in which there is a Castle, and in that an Oratory of the same name also. All sacred to Saint George the Martyr, who hereabouts is fabled to have killed the Dragon, and thereby delivered a Kings daughter, but what Kings I know not, nor they neither. 6 Biblis, sometimes the habitation of Hevi, the fourth Son of Canaan, and then called Hevea; afterwards made the Regal Seat of Cinyras, father and grandfather of Adonis, by his daughter Myrrha; whereof we have already spoken when we were in Cyprus. Of such esteem in the Primitive times of Christianity, that it was made a Bishops See; desolate and of no repute since it lost that honour, and became thrall unto the Turks. 7 Orthosia, called also Antaradus, because opposite to Aradus, another old City of this tract; but in after ages called Tortosa, and by that name well known in the Histories of the Holy War, undertaken by the Western Christians. To whom it made such stout and notable resistance, that though besieged on all sides with united Forces (the whole Army formerly divided, sitting down before it;) yet after three months hard siege, they were fain to leave the Town behind them, and content themselves with spoyling the adjoining Countrey. 8 Tripolis, seated in a rich and delightful Plain, more fruitful than can be imagined: one of which fruits they called by the name of Amazza Franchi, i. e. Kill Frank, because the Western Christians, whom they call by the name of Franks, died in great numbers by the intemperate eating of them. A Valley which is said to have yielded yearly to the Counts of Tripolis, no less than 200000 Crowns. As for the Town, it standeth about two miles from the Sea, at the foot of Mount Libanus; so called because built by the joyned purples of 3 Cities, that is to say, Tyris, Sidon, and Aradus. Of no great note among the Romans, for ought I can find, till made one of the Episcopal Sees, belonging to the Archbishop of Tyre in the Primitive times. But thriving by degrees, it grew to principal Account by the time that the Western Christians warred in the Holy Land: when conquered by them, it was made one of the Tetrarchies, or Capital Cities for the 4 Quarters of their Empire; which were, Hierusalem for Palestine; Edeffa for Comagena, or Mesopotamia; Antioch for Syria, and this for Phœnicia. Committed the first taking of it, to the custody of Raymond Earl of Tholose in France: whose Posterity, whilst it lasted, had from hence the title of Earls of Tripolis. A City, which I know not by what good hap, hath sped better than any of those parts, retaining still as much in strength and beauty as ever it had; if not grown greater by the ruine of all the rest. Situate two mile from the Sea, as before is said, but not above half a mile from the Haven, which lieth upon the West side of it; compassed with a wall, and fortified with seven Towers, of which the fourth is commonly called the Tower of Love, because built by an Italian Merchant, who was found in bed with a Turkish woman; for which he had forfeited his life, if not thus redeemed it. Before the Haven is an ill-neighbouring bank of sand, which every day groweth greater and nearer to it; by which in time there is a Prophecy which saith it shall quite be choaked: On both sides of it many store-houses for the Merchant to stow his goods in, and shops to sell them; the way from thence unto the City, having on both sides very pleasant Gardens, Phœnicia. Gardens, more curiously kept, than usually amongst the Turks. The Town it self stretched out in length from South to North, is situate, as before was said, at the foot of Libanus, conveying a Brook into the Streets, and many pleasant springs into the chief of their Gardens: in which, and in those towards the Haven, and on other sides of the Town, the Inhabitants keep great store of Silk-Worms; selling their Silks raw unto the Italians, and buying them again of them in the Stuff or Manufacture. Their buildings generally low, and the Streets but narrow, except that leading towards Aleppo, which is fair and open. Over the Brook, at the East-side of the City are built two Bridges; and on the South-side a strong Castle mounted on an hill, built by the French when they had the custody hereof; now garrisoned for the Grand Seigneur with 200 Janizaries. At this time it is looked on as the Metropolis or chief City of Phœnicia, honoured with the residence of the Patriarch of the Maronites, for the most part dwelling in this Town; and enriched with a great part of the Trade of Scanderone, or Alexandretta, removed hither some forty years ago by the Turks appointment; that Haven lying unfenced and more open to Pirates.

That the Phœnicians were descended of the Sons of Canaan, hath been proved already. And being descendants of that stock, they were at the first governed like them, by the Chiefs of their Families, whom they honoured (as most Nations did) with the title of Kings. But most of the Canaanitish Kings being overcome and slain by Josuah, Agenor, a stout and prudent man, one of those many Kings which commanded in those parts of the Countrey, seeing how impossible it was to resist that enemy, borrowed some aid from Egypt, where he had his breeding, to make good the Sea-coasts of his Countrey: in which the Philistines, who interposed upon those Coasts betwixt him and Egypt, concurred also with him. By which assistance, and by the fortifying of Sidon, Tyre, and Ace, (or Psolomais) which were all the Cities of this Countrey that were then in being; he did not only preserve his own Estate, from the present danger, but left it so assured to the Kings succeeding; that neither Solomon nor David, nor any of the Kings of Israel durst attempt upon them. To Agenor succeeded his Son Phœnix, (Cadmus, his elder brother, going into Greece in search of his Sister Europa, ravished by Jupiter, where he built Thebes, and therein reigned till his death) from whom, as some conceive, this Countrey had the name of Phœnicia. And though I have declared my self for another reason of this name, which I like much better; yet I shall rather yield to this, or to any other, than to that of Bochartus; who will have it derived from Ben-Anak, or the Sons of Anak, (as if the old Phœnicians were such Giantly men) which must first be contracted in Beannack, then by the Græcians turned into Pheanac, and at last into Phœnix. Such far-fetched and extorted Originations never please my Faacy, who had much rather hearken to the old received opinions touching the first Originals of Names and Nations, where there is not very pregnant reason to persuade me otherwise; than strain my self so far for a new invention, or hearken unto those that do. But for what cause soever they were named Phœnicians, certain it is, they were a very active and industrious people, trading in the most parts of the Mediterranean, and planting Colonies in many. Thebes and Sephyra in Beotia, Nola in Italy, Gades in Spain; Utica, Leptis, Carthage, in Africk, were of their foundation. Nay, if we may believe Bochartus, there was no Island or Sea-coast in the Mediterranean, or on the Cædalian, Gallick, or British Ocean, wherein they did not keep some Factory, or erect some Colony. What Kings succeeded Phœnix in a constant and continued course, I can no where find. Most like it is they were not under the command of any one Prince: and that besides the Kings of Sidon, where Agenor reigned, there were some others who called themselves Kings of Phœnicia also, as well as they. Of which sort were Cynirus, Paphus, and Pygmalion, who had their Regal Seat at Biblis, and lorded it over a good part of Cyprus, as did also Belus, who gave some part of that Isle to Tencher, as is said before. There is also found mention of one Phœstis, a Phœnician King, at such time as the Græcians conquered Troy. After him none, till the subjugation of this Countrey by the Babylonians; Tetramnestus, Tennes, and Strato, mentioned in succeeding times, being Tributaries to the Persians, and no absolute Princes. Whether it were that the Phœnicians were made subject to the Kings of Tyre, or that the Kings thereof did nothing to preserve their memory, I am not able to determine. Certain it is, that the Kings of Tyre, came in short time to be of very great repute, and to possess themselves of the coasts of Syria and Phœnicia, and a great part of Cyprus; whereby, and by the benefit of their trade and shipping, they grew rich, and powerful, and of great consideration in affairs of the World. The names and history of whom I shall here subjoin, in this ensuing Catalogue of

THE KINGS of TYRE.

A. M.

- 1 Abibalus, as Josephus; Abermalus, as Theophilus Antiochenus calleth him, Co-temporary with Samuel; supposed to be the same which the Son of Syrach mentioneth, Eccles. 46. verse 18.
- 2 Saron, the Son of Abibalus, whom David, as Eusebius saith, compelled to pay tribute; complained of by that Prophet, Psal. 83. v. 7.
- 2931 3 Hiram, the Son of Saron, confederate with David, to whom he sent Cedars, with Carpenters and Masons, towards his buildings in Jerusalem, after he had beaten thence the Philistines; as he did afterwards to Solomon when he built the Temple. Much mentioned in the Books of Kings, and Chronicles. 53.
- 2955 4 Balestarnus, or Bazarnus, succeeded Hiram. 7.
- 2962 5 Abdastarnus, son of Balestarnus, slain by the four Sons of his own Nurse, having reigned 9 years; the eldest of which four, did for the space of 12 years usurp the Kingdom.

2983 6 Astarnus,

- 2983 6 Astarnus, brother of Abdastarnus, recovered the Kingdom to his house, out of the hands of Syria propria. the Assyrians. 12.
 - 2995 7 Astornus, or Athornus, as Theophilus calleth him, the younger brother of Astarnus. 9.
 - 3004 8 Phelles, the Brother of these three Kings, and youngest Son of Balestarnus, reigned eight moneths only.
 - 9 Ithobalus, called Ethbaal, 1 Kings 16. 13. Son of Astornus, slew his Uncle Phelles, and so regained his Fathers Throne; before which he was the High-Priest of the Goddess Astarte, or Asarta, (a dignity next to that of the King.) He was the Father of Jezabel, the wife of Ahab, so often mentioned in the Scripture. 32.
 - 3037 10 Badezar, or Bazar, Son of Ethbaal. 6.
 - 3043 11 Mettimus, by some called Matgins, Son of Badezar, and father of Elisi, whom Virgil celebrateth by the name of Dido.
 - 3052 12 Pygmalion, the Son of Mettimus, who slew Sichens the husband of his Sister Elisi, to get his riches; but yet was outwitted of his prey: his sister Elisi accompanied with her brother Barca (the founder of the Noble Barcine Family, of which Annibal was) and her sister Anna, flying into Africk; where she built the renowned City of Carthage. The names of his Successors we find not, till we come to
 - 13 Elulau, descended from a Son of Pygmalion, who overthrew the Fleet of Salmanasser, the Assyrian, in the Port of Tyre.
 - 14 Ethobales, or Ethbaal II. who vaunted himself to be as wise as Daniel, and to know all secrets, as saith the Prophet Ezekiel, chap. 28. v. 1, 2. And yet not wise enough to preserve his Kingdom from Nabuchadonosor; who after a siege of 13 years took the City of Tyre, and subjected it unto his Empire.
 - 15 Baal, the son and successor of Ethbaal the second, but a Tributary to the Babylonians. After whose death the Tyrians had no more Kings, but were governed by Judges, or by such similar Kings only as were sent from Babylon. And though Tyre and Sidon did recover breath in the fall of the Babylonian Empire, and the unsettledness of the Persian: yet being of the Persian faction; and having dependence on that Crown, they were by Alexander held unworthy to continue. Who therefore deposed Strato the King of Sidon, and overthrew the City of Tyre; in the taking whereof he had spent more time, than in forcing all the Cities of Asia.
- After this time Phœnicia, being reckoned as a part of Syria, followed the fortune of the whole, subject unto the Syrian Kings of the house of Seleucus, till made a Province of the Romans; subject to the Constantinopolitans, till the fatal year 636. when subdued by the Saracens. Successively conquered by the Turks, Christians, and after their expulsion by the Turks again, then by the Mamelucks of Egypt, and finally with the rest of Syria, by Selimus the first united to the Turkish Empire. Subject at this time, or of late, to the Emir of the Druisians, (commonly called the Emir of Sidon) of which people we have spoken before. A people who in the time of Amurath the third, were governed by five Emirs or Princes; one of which was Man-Ogli, who so resolutely resisted Ibrahim Bassa, Ann. 1585. This Man-Ogli then kept his Court or residence at Andirene, a strong place situate on a hill, and was of that wealth, that he sent to make his peace unto the above-named Ibrahim, 320 Archbuses, 20 packs of Andirene Silks, and 50000 Ducats. At a second time he presented him with 50000 Ducats more, 480 Archbuses, 1000 Goats, 150 Camels, 150 Buffes, 1000 Oxen, and 200 Weathers. By these rich gifts we may not a little conjecture of the Revenue of the present Emir of Sidon; who since the year 1600. hath reduced almost all the Countreys belonging once to five Princes, under his own Empire; containing the Towns and Territories of Gaza, Barnat, Sidon, Tyre, Ace, Saffet, (or Tiberias) his seat of residence, Nazareth, Capia, Mount Tabor, Elkiffe, &c. This present Emir, by name Faccardine, was not long since driven out of his Countrey by the Turks, and forced to flee to Florence: but he again recovered his own, laid siege to Damascus, and caused a notable Rebellion in Asia; not quenched in a long time after. And finally, having possessed himself of the City and Castle of Damascus, prepared for the taking of Hiersusalem also; threatening to make the Christians once more Masters of it. This was in the year 1623. How he sped afterwards, and whether his Son, as stout and valiant as himself, hath since his death succeeded him in his Estates, I am not able to say: having of late heard nothing of them.

2. SYRIA PROPRIA.

SYRIA PROPRIA, or Syria specially so called, is bounded on the East, with Palæstina; on the West, with the Mediterranean; on the North, with Cilicia; on the South, with Phœnicia, and some part of Cæle-Syria.

This part of Syria I take to be the Land of Hamath, so often mentioned in the Scriptures, the Kingdom of Tui or Tuu, next neighbour, and sworn Enemy to Adad-nir King of Aram-Sabab: who hearing of the great discomfiture which David had given unto that King, sent his Son Joram, or Adad-nir, (for the Scripture calls him by both names) with Presents to him, as well to congratulate his success, as to be assured for time to come of his love and amity. So called from Hamath one of the Sons of Canaan, who fixed his dwelling in these parts, and left many Cities of that name in Syria and Palæstina (which we shall meet withal in the course of this work) either built by him or his Posterity. Now that the Land of Hamath was this part of Syria, I am persuaded to believe by these following reasons, viz. 1. From the neighbourhood hereof to Arpad or Arphad, conjoynd together, Syria propria. as in Esfay 10. 9. and Ier. 49. 23. So in other places, viz. Where are the gods of Hamath and Arphad? 2 Kings 18. 34. The Kings of Hamath, and the King of Arphad, Esfay 37. 13. And we know well that Arvad was the name of an Island over against the mouth of the River Eleutherus, one of the Rivers of this Country: so called from Arvad, one of the Sons of Canaan, alluded to by the Greeks and Romans in the name of Aradus; by which this Isle was known unto them. 2ly. By the vicinity which it hath to Palmyrene, the Aram-Solah of the Scriptures, to which it joyneth on the East, with the King whereof (as bordering Princes use to be) the Kings of Hamath for the most part were in open war. Of which see 2 Sam. 8. 9, 10, & 1 Chr. 8. 9, 10. 3ly. From the authority of Saint Hierom, who findeth mention in the Prophet Amos, ch. 6. v. 2. of a City named Hamath the Great, determineth it to be that City which afterwards was called Antiochia (the principal City of this part, and indeed of Syria:) the title of Great being added to it, to difference it from some other Cities of this name of inferior note. And 4ly. from comparing the places in Scripture, with the like passage in Josephus the Historiographer. The Scripture telleth us, that Hiersalem being forced by the Babylonians, Zedekias the King was brought Prisoner to Nebuchadnezzar, being then at Riblah, 2 King c. 2. v. 6. to Riblah in the Land of Hamath, v. 21. where the poor Prince first saw his Children slain before his face; and then miserably deprived of sight, that he might not see his great misfortunes, was led away to Babylon. Ask of Josephus where this sad tragedy was acted, and he will tell us that it was at Reblath (or Riblah) a City of Syria, Antiq. 1. 10. c. 10. And if we ask Saint Hierom what he thinks of Reblath, he will tell us that it was Urbs ea quam nunc Antiochiam vocant, the City which in following times was called Antioch. On these grounds I conceive this part of Syria to be the land of Hamath intended in the Texts of Scripture above-cited; though there were other Towns and Territories of the same name also.

The Countrey is naturally fertile; the hedges on the high-way sides affording very good fruits, and the adjoining fields affording to the Passenger the shade of Fig-trees. Were it not naturally so, it would not be much helped by Art or Industry; as being very meanly peopled, and those few people without any encouragement either to plant fruits, or manure the Land. Their Sheep are commonly fair and fat, but so overlaid in the tail, both with flesh and fleece, that they hang in long wreaths unto the ground, dragged after them with no small difficulty. Pliny observes it in his time, that the tails of the Syrian Sheep were a Cubit long, and had good store of wooll upon them. Natur. Hist. 1. 8. c. 48. And modern Travellers report, that the tails of these sheep do frequently weigh 25 pound weight, and sometimes 30 pounds and upwards. The like hath also been affirmed of the sheep of Palstine comprehended in old times in the name of Syria. And that may probably be the reason why the rumps or tails of sheep (and of no beast else) were ordained to be offered up in sacrifice, of which Levit. 3. v. 9. But besides the store of Wooll which they have from the sheep, they have also great plenty of Cotton Wooll, which groweth there abundantly; with the seeds whereof they sow their fields, as we ours with Corn. The stalk no bigger than that of Wheat, but as tough as a Beans; the head round and bearded, in the size and shape of a Medlar, and as hard as a Stone: which ripening breaketh, and is delivered of a white soft Bombast intermixed with seeds; which parted with an instrument, they keep the Seeds for another sowing, and sell the Wooll unto the Merchant: a greater quantity thereof issuing from that little shell, than can be imagined by those who have not seen it.

The people heretofore were very industrious, especially about their Gardens; the fruitful effects whereof they found in the increase of their Herbs, and Plants. Whence the Proverb, Multa Syorum Olera. But withall they were observed to be very gluttonous, spending whole dayes and nights in feasting; great scoffers, and much given to laughter. Crafty and subtle in their dealings, not easily to be trusted but on good security: and so were the Phanicians, their next neighbours also. Hence came the Greek Adage which Suidas speaketh of, Συροι οὐδὲ δούλῳ, Συρί contra Phaniceῖ, used by them when two crafty Knaves endeavoured to deceive each other. They were noted also to be superstitious, great Worshipers of the Goddesses Fortune, but greater of their Syrian Goddesses, whatsoever she was. Affirmed by Plutarch to be a womanish and effeminate nation, prone unto tears, and such as on the death of their friends would hide themselves in caves from the sight of the Sun. Hierodotus addeth, that they were wavering and unconstant, lovers of Playes and publick Pastimes, and easily stirred up unto Innovations. But at this time, they are almost beaten out of all these humours, having been so often cowed and conquered, that they are now grown servilely officious to them that govern them: not without cause, defective in that part of industry which before enriched them.

Where by the way we must observe, that this Character of the people, and that of the Countrey belong not to this part alone, exclusively of those which follow; but to all Syria, and every part and Province of it, except Phoenicia, which being planted by a people of another Stock, hath had its character by it self. The whole by Protony divided, besides Comagena, Palmyrene, and Celo-Syria, into many petit Regions, and Subdivisions, as 1 Pieria, 2 Cassotis, from the hills adjoining. 3 Seleucia, 4 Apamea, 5 Laodicea, 6 Cyrestica, 7 Chalcidice, and 8 Chalybanotis, from their principal Cities. Of which in all he mulders up the names of an hundred and upwards, then of some note, most of them now grown out of knowledge, and many of them of no mark or observation in the course of business. So that omitting his method, we will follow our own, and take notice only of such places as anciently were, or at this present are, of most observation and importance in the course of Story: with reference notwithstanding to the subdivisions made by Protony, as they come in my way, reckoning Cyrestica, Chalybanotis, Cassotis, and the territories of Seleucus, Laodicea, and Apamea, into Syria Propria; and Pieria into Comagena.

First

First then to begin with those Cities which lye most towards the East, we have in Cyrestica, 1. Zugma, Syria propria. on the banks of the River Euphrates, memorable for the passage of Alexander the Great, who there passed over his Army on a Bridge of Boats. 2 Berraa, supposed by some both ancient and modern Writers, to be that which is now called Aleppo, but the position of the place agreeth not with that supposition; Aleppo being placed by our modern Cosmographers, in the 72 degree of Longitude, and the 38 of Latitude: whereas Berraa is assigned by Protony, to the 36 degree of Latitude, and the 73 of Longitude. Besides that, the River Singas, on which Aleppo is situate, keepeth it self almost on an even course in the Latitude of 37. between 20. and 30 minutes over: which is more by a degree and a half than the site assigned unto Berraa. 3 Cybrus, as in the Latine Copies of Protony, mistook for Syria, once the chief City of this part, from hence called Cyrestica. 4 Heraclea, near which Misra had a Temple: in which, as in that sacred to her in Laodicea, they used once yearly to offer a Virgin for a sacrifice; but afterwards on the sight of that gross impiety, changed it to an Hari. 5 Regis, now Rugia, two dayes journey from Antioch, took by the Chritians in the beginning of the wars for the Holy Land. 6 Hierapolis, of great renown in those dark times of ignorance and Idolatry for the Syrian Goddess therein worshipped; from whence it had the name of Hierapolis, or the Holy City: being formerly by the Gracians called Callinice; by the Syrians, Magog; one of the first seats of Magog the Son of Japhet, and from him denominated. The Goddess so esteemed of in those wretched times, that from all parts, Assyria, Babylonia, Arabia, Cilicia, Cappadocia, and indeed what not, they brought her many rich gifts and costly offerings. Nero himself, who scoffed at all Religions else, being for a while a great Votary of this Syrian Idol, though afterwards he grew weary of her, and desied her with urine. The Temple built by Stratonice, the wife of Selencus, in the midt of the City, compassed with a double wall, about the height of 300 fathom: the roof thereof inlaid with Gold, and made of such a fragrant and sweet-smelling wood, that the clothes of them which came thither retained the scent thereof for a long time after. Without the Temple there were places inclosed for Oxen, and Beasts of sacrifice; and not far off a Lake of 200 fathom in depth, wherein they kept their sacred fishes: the Priests attending here for their several Offices, amounting in number to three hundred, besides many more subservient Ministers. The tricks and jugglings of these Priests to deceive the people, he that list to see, may find them copiously described in the Metamorphosis of Apuleius: which, changing but the names and times, may serve for a relation of those gulleries and Arts of Leger-de-main which the Friers and Pardoners have practised in the Church of Rome. 7 Chalyban, whence the parts adjoining were called Chalybanotis; conceived by Pestellus, and some others to be Chalepinum, or Aleppo, but on no good ground: this City having one degree less of Northern Latitude, than Berraa had. 8 Barbarisus, in the same subdivision, near the banks of Euphrates. 9 Chalcis, the principal of that part of Syria Propria, which is called Chalcidice, but not otherwise memorable. 10 Temedissa, another Town of the same division, and as little famous. 11 Seleucia, so named from the Founder of it, the first Eastern Monarch of that race, and the greatest Builder of the World, founding nine Cities of this name, sixteen in memory of his Father Antiochus, six by the name of Laodice his Mother, and three in honour of Apamea his first wife; besides many others of great note in Greece and Asia, either new built, or beautified and repaired by him. From this the Countrey hereabouts had the name of Seleucia. 12 Laodicea, one of the Cities founded by Seleucus, in honour of Laodice his Mother, from which the Region adjoining is called Laodicea: Built by him in the place where formerly stood the City Rhamantus, so called from a certain Shepherd, who being strook with a flash of lightning, cryed out amazedly Rhamantus, that is to say, Dens ab excessu; before which time it had been named Lenca Alte, from the whiteness of the Sea-cliffs near to which it is situate: the Countrey round about commended anciently for the best Wines, and choise of very excellent Fruits. 13 Apamea, so named in honour of Apamea, the wife of Seleucus; which together with Laodicea and Seleucia before mentioned, having the same founder, and maintaining a strict league of amity with one another, were commonly called the Three Sisters. From this the Countrey near is called Apamea. 14 Emesa, (now Hama) the Episcopal See of Eusebius, hence called Emesenus, who flourished in the time of Constantinus, the Son of Constantine: in whose name are extant certain Homilies, justly conceived to be of a later date. The City seated in a spacious and fruitfull plain of Apamea, watered with many pleasant and cheerfull Riverets: once of great note, as may easily be conjectured from the walls hereof, which are still perfect and entire, built of polished stone, and of very large circuits; but the dwelling-houses so decayed, that it affordeth nothing worthy observation. 15 Epiphania, in the cantred or subdivision of Cassotis; called at first Hamath, from Hamath a Son of Canaan, the founder of it, and upon that account mistaken by Saint Hierome for another Town of the same name, in the Tribe of Nephthali; so different from this place both in Longitude and Latitude (as we shall then hereafter when we come to Palstine) that they can by no means be the same. But that old Town being gone to ruine, it was repaired, if not re-edified by Antiochus Epiphanes King of Syria, who thereupon commanded it to be called Epiphania; obeyed therein as Josephus telleth us, by the Macedonians, though the Syrians still called it Amathas, as in former times, Antiqu. 1. 1. c. 7. 16 Laodicea, which still preserveth its old name, being now called Laris; much mentioned in the wars of the Holy Land, especially for the death of R Baldwin the first, Brother of Godfrey of Bouillon, and second King of Hiersalem, Anno 1118. 17 Gabal, the Gabal of Protony, and others of the ancient Writers, situate on the South of Laodicea, from which twelve miles distant; mentioned Psal. 83. as a confederate with Tyre, and other uncircumcised Nations, in their hatred and designs against the Israelites: at this day called Gaballa (with little difference from the old name of it) and by that name remembered in the Stories of the Holy Wars. 18 Albaria, distant two dayes march from Antioch, remem-

Syria propria remembered also in the wars of the Holy Land. 19 Aradus, one of the Co-founders of Tripolis, situate in a rocky Island of a mile in compass, directly opposite to the mouth or influx of the River Eleutherus, and distant from the Continent about twenty furlongs. So called from Arad, one of the Sons of Canaan, and mentioned by that name in the Prophet Ezek. ch. 27. v. 8, 11. This once a Kingdom of it self, containing not this Island only, but some part of the Continent; especially about Antaradus (so called because built over against it) situate on the Northern banks of the River Eleutherus, of which we have spoken in Phœnicia. 20 Daphne, about five miles from Antioch; but afterwards by the continual enlargements of that City, accounted as the Suburb to it; so named of Daphne, one of the Mistresses of Apollo, who was here worshipped by the name of Apollo Daphneus, and had here his Oracle and his Groves, with other the Additions appertaining unto those Idolatries: as much esteemed of, but more sumptuous than those of Delphos. The Grove about ten miles in circuit, environed round with Cypresses, and other trees, so tall and close to one another, that they suffered not the Sun to enter in his greatest heats: the ground perpetually covered with the choicest Tapestry of Nature; watered with many a pleasant stream, derived from the Casalian Fountains as it was given out; and yielding the most excellent Fruits both for taste and tincture, to which the wind and air participating the sweetness of the place, did add a most delightful influence.

A place devised for pleasure, but abused to lust: he being held unworthy of the name of a man, who transformed not himself unto a Beast, or trod on this unholy ground without his Curtesan, inasmuch as they which had a care of their good names, did forbear to haunt it. A fuller description of it he that lifts to fee, may find in the first Book and 18 chapter of Saxomens Ecclesiastical History, who is copious in it. The Temple said to have been built by Seleucus also, renowned for the Oracle there given, by which Adrian was foretold of his being Emperor; and therefore much resorted to by Julian the Apistate, for that purpose also. But the body of Babylas the Martyr and Bishop of Antioch, being removed thither by the command of his Brother Gallus, then created Cæsar by Constantine, the Devil and his Oracles were both frightened away, as the Devil did himself confess to Julian: Who being desirous to learn here the success of his intended expedition into Persia, received this Answer, that no Oracle could be given so long as those divine bones were so near the Shrine. Nor was it long after, before the Idol and the Temple were consumed by a fire from Heaven; as was avowed by those who observed the fall of it: though Julian did impute it to the innocent Christians, and in revenge caused many of their Churches to be burned to ashes. 21 Antioch, situate in that part hereof which is called Cæsotis, first built, or began rather by Antigonus, when Lord of Asia, by whom named Antigonia; but finished and enlarged by Seleucus, after he had overthrown and slain him at the battle of Issus. Built near the place, and partly out of the ruins of an ancient City, in the second Book of Kings called Riblah in the Land of Hamath; Hamath the Great in the list of Amos; by Josaphus and the Syrians, Reblata. Memorable in those days for the Tragedies of Jehonahaz and Zedechias, Kings of Judah: the first of which was here deprived of his Crown and Liberty, by Pharaoh Neco King of Egypt, 2 Kings 23. 33. the other of his Eyes and Children by the command of Nebuchadnezzar King of Babylon, as was said before. In following times it was by some Greek Writers called Epidaphne, from the nearness of it to that Grove: as afterwards in the times of Christianity, by the name of Theopolis, or the City of God, either from the many miracles there done in the Primitive time; or from the great improvement which the Christian faith did here receive, where the Disciples first obtained the name of Christians. The Royal Seat for many Ages of the Kings of Syria, and in the flourish and best Fortune of the Roman Empire, the ordinary residence of the Præfekt or Governour of the Eastern Provinces; next of the Præfektus Prætorio Orientis, who had not only the superintendency over the Diocese of the Orient, though that large enough; but also of the Dioceses of Egypt, Asia, Pontus, Thrace, extending to his jurisdiction into all the parts of the then known World. Honoured also with the residence of many of the Roman Emperours, especially of Vernus and Valens, who spent here the greatest part of their times; and from the first dawning of the Gospel, with the seat of the Patriarch. A Title of such eminency in all times of the Church, the second in account to the See of Rome (till Constantinople being made the Imperial City, got precedence of it) that there are at this time no less than four great Prelates which pretend unto it: that is to say, the true Patriarch, governing the Christians of those parts, whom they call Syrians or Melchites; the Pseudo-Patriarch of the Jacobite and Maronite Sectaries, both which, for the greater credit to their Schism, do assume this Title; and finally a titular Patriarch nominated by the Pope, who since the time that the Western Christians were possessed of these Eastern Countreys, hath assumed a power unto himself of nominating Patriarchs for Alexandria, Hierusalem, and this City of Antioch.

The City seated on both sides of the River Orontis, about twelve miles distant from the shores of the Mediterranean; the River Parfar passing on the South-side of it. By Art and Nature fortified even to admiration; compassed with a double wall, the outermost of which was of stone, the other of Brick, with four hundred and sixty Towers in the Walls, and an impregnable Castle at the East-end thereof; and on the other side defended with big broken Mountains, whereunto was adjoining a deep Lake, coming out of the River Parfar, before mentioned. Adorned in former times with many sumptuous Palaces, and magnificent Temples, answerable to the reputation of so great a City: till taken by the Saracens, and after by the Turks and Mamelukes, men careless of all State and beauty in their fairest Cities, it began to grow unto decay. Recovered by the Western Christians from the power of the Turks, after a siege of 7 months, June 3. Anno 1098. confirmed in their possession by a great and memorable Victory, got in the very fight hereof within few days after, (June 28.) obtained against Corbanas, Lieutenant to the Persian Sultan; in which, with the loss of four thousand and two hundred of their own, they slew a hundred thousand of the Enemy. The Town and Territory given by the Conquerours to Bohemund a noble Norman, and Prince of Tarentum: who by practising with one Pyrrhus, who had the command of one of the chief Towers thereof, afterwards called St. George's Tower, was secretly let into the City, and so made way for all the rest. Bohemund thus made the Prince, or as some say, King of Antioch, left it to Bohemund his son, about ten years after; succeeded in this principality by Tancred and Roger, Princes of great renown in those holy wars: which last unfortunately slain by the Turks, not far from Aleppo, in the year 1120. Baldwin the second having revenged his death by a signal Victory, joynted this estate to the Kingdom of Hierusalem. Betrayed about sixty years after this, that is to say, in the year 1188. it came into the power of Saladine, the victorious King of Egypt and Damascus; and therewithal no fewer than five and twenty Cities which depended on the fortunes of it: the glories of this famous City so declining after this last Tragedy (but whether laid desolate of set purpose, or destroyed by the injury of the time, I am not able to declare) that it is grown the sepulchre of what once it was, and lieth buried in its own sad ruins; hardly preserving the repute of a sorry Village. Such is the instability of all worldly glories. Some other Towns there are in this part of Syria, but not to be remembered the same day with Antioch.

As for the story of this Province, as a state distinct, we find it had a King of its own, called the King of Hamath (the Kingdom of Toi, or Tou before remembre[d];) who together with the King of Arphad, commanded in this part of Syria, and the Isles adjoining. Vassals in time succeeding to the Kings of Tyre, who joined it over all the Sea-coasts hereof, and consequently had great influence on the Inlands also. And it continued in this State till the Affirian Kings began to turn their forces Westward; when added to that Empire by Tiglah Phileser, after the subversion of the Kingdom of Damascus; or by Salmanasser, after the destruction of that of Israel. The proud but dreadful vantage which Senacherib, the Succedour of those mighty Monarchs, made to Hecchiab, viz. where are the Kings of Hamath and Arphad, shews clearly that those Kingdoms had been conquered not long before; and therefore needs by Salmanasser, or Tiglah Phileser. Afterwards in the struggles betwixt the Babylonians, and Egyptians, for the chief command, it was a while at the devotions of the King of Egypt, it being at Reblata in this Province, that Jehonahaz King of Judah was put into bonds, by the command of Pharaoh Neco, as was said before. But Neco being not long after vanquished by Nebuchadnezzar King of Babylon, it returned again to that Crown; and after followed the same fortunes with the rest of Syria.

3. COMAGENA.

COMAGENA is bounded on the East, with the River Euphrates, by which parted from Mesopotamia; on the West, with the Mountains called Amanus, which divide it from Cilicia; on the North, with Taurus, by which separated from Armenia Minor; on the South, with Palmyrene. Called also Euphratenis and Euphratesia, when a Roman Province; by reason of its situation bordering on that River.

The reason of the name I find not amongst my Authors: but find that many learned men conceive it to be that part of Syria, which the Scriptures call Syria Maacha, mention whereof is made 1 Chron. cap. 19. vers. 6. gain-sayed by others, because they find a place called Maacha in the Tribe of Manasser; but with no great reason as I take it. For being it is joyned (in the 1. of Chron. 19. v. 6. above-mentioned) in the same action with Mesopotamia, and Syria Sobah; and not so only, but placed between them in the Method of that holy Pen-man, I dare not think but that they were all very near neighbours, and ranked according to the natural situation of them. Which agreeth very well with the site of Comagena, having Mesopotamia on the East, and Aram-Sobah on the South. Nor is it any stronger proof unto the contrary, that Maacha is a Town of the Tribe of Manasses; than if a man should say that there is no such Province as Mansfield in High Germany, because there is a Town of that name in England; or no such place as Savoy amongst the Alpes, because there is house of that name in London.

As for the people hereof, besides what they have common with the rest of the Syrians, they were of old much given unto Divinations, and for that cause derided thus in the sixth Satyr of Juvenal,

*Spondet amatores tenerum vel divitiis orbis
Testamentum ingens, calidae pulvisque Columbe Tractato Armenius vel Comagenus Aruspex.

Thus Englished by my honoured friend Sir Robert Stapylton, only, but founded plainly on the Scriptures, of which see 1 King. 11. v. 23, 24. the Scriptures after this taking no notice of any other Kings of Syria (by the name of Kings of Syria) but of those that reigned in Damascus; who in short time had swallowed up the petit Kingdoms of Gessur, Ish-tok, Rehob, besides that of Sobab before mentioned.

The KINGS of SYRIA or DAMASCUS.

- 1 Adad, the Friend and Confedrate of Adad-ezar King of Sobab, in whose quarrel he was vanquished and slain by David.
- 2 Rezin, of whom the Scripture faith, in the 2 of Chron. that when David slew them of Sobab, he fled from Adad-ezar his Lord, and gathered men unto him, and certain Captains over a Band, and went to Damascus, and dwelt therein, and reigned in Damascus.
- 3 Adad II. an Idumean, supposed to be of the family of Adad-ezar, but rather as I think of Adad, for fear of David fled to Egypt, where he married Taphnes, the Queens Sister: and hearing that both David and Joab were dead, returned again into his Countrey, and as some write, expelled Rezin out of Damascus, and reigned there as King.
- 4 Hezion, Successor unto Adad.
- 5 Tabrimon, the son of Hezion, as is said 2 King. 15. 18.
- 6 Ben-hadad, the son of Tabrimon, hired by Asa King of Judah, to aid him in his wars against Baasha of Israel.
- 7 Ben-hadad II. son of the former, twice invaded Israel in the reign of Ahab; but both times notably repulsed; the first time by a fall of 700 men at the siege of Samaria; the next at Aphec, where with the like number in effect he was taken prisoner, and his Army routed.
- 8 Hazael, Captain of the host to Ben-hadad, anointed King of Syria by the Prophet Elisha, whom God appointed so to do, that by his hands he might avenge himself on Ben-hadad, whom Hazael slew; but he proved as ill a neighbour to the Kings of Israel, as those before him. He attempted upon Judah also in the time of Joash, but bribed with the treasures of the Temple, he withdrew his forces.
- 9 Ben-hadad III. Son of Hazael, discomfited in three set Battels by Joash King of Israel.
- 10 Ben-hadad IV. son of Ben-hadad the third.
- 11 Ben-hadad V. son of Ben-hadad the fourth.
- 12 Ben-hadad VI. son of Ben-hadad the fifth, in the time of one of which three Kings, but which one we find not for a certain, Jeroboam the son of Joash King of Israel, subdued both Chatham, and Damascus: of which see 2 King. 14. v. 18.
- 13 Rezin II. son of Ben-hadad the sixth, and the last King of Damascus, who joyning with Pekah King of Israel, against Ahaz of Judah, enforced him to call unto his aid Tiglath Phalaser, King of Assyria; by whom Rezin was taken and beheaded, and the City of Damascus won; the Kingdom of Syria by that means united to the Assyrian Empire.

After this time, the Syrians continued subject to the Babylonian and Assyrian Monarchs: and in the overthrow of that Empire by the Medes and Persians, became a part of their estate: remaining so till the first battel betwixt Alexander and Darius, fought near Issus in Cilicia. The victory wherein falling to the Macedonians, gave him without more trouble than the siege of Tyre, the possession of Syria and Phœnicia. He dying not long after his conquest of Persia, this Countrey lay as it were at stake betwixt Ptolemy King of Egypt and Antigonus the chief Lord of Asia: but the possession of it, together with the rest of the Persian Empire, in both Asias, fell in conclusion to the share of Seleucus, for his many great and signal victories surnamed Nicanor; a man strangely preferred. For being at the first, Governour of Chælia only, he was forced to leave Babylon, and forsake his Province for fear of Antigonus, then dreadful to all the Macedonian Captains; and to flee into Egypt, where he became Ptolemies Admiral. After which Ptolemy fighting a pitched field with Demetrius, son to Antigonus, took Seleucus with him, and having won the battel, gave him aid and license to recover his former government. Seleucus well-beloved of the people, soon made himself Matter, not of Chælia only, but of all the Persian Provinces beyond Euphrates: and not long after (being seconded by his good friends Ptolemy, Cassander, and Lysimachus) he encountered Antigonus at Ipsus in Ionia, where Antigonus himself was slain, and his whole Army routed. This Victory made Seleucus Lord of all Asia, from whence passing over into Europe, he vanquished and slew Lysimachus: Seven months after which Victory, he was slain by Ptolemy Cerannus, whose Parron and Protector he had formerly been; being yet the last survivor of all Alexanders Princes, and the only possessor of all the Dominions which his Matter had, by the way of conquest, Egypt excepted. His Successours, although they were Lords of all Asia, yet since in Syria they kept their residence, to the end that they might the better furnish themselves with Souldiers out of Greece, upon all occasions, as was said before, they were commonly called the Kings of Syria. But long they held not in that greatness of estate and power, which Seleucus left them: though being a full-bodied tree, and of several limbs, it endured the lopping off of many branches, and many a sad blow at the very root of it, before it fell. For in the time of Seleucus Callinicus, the fourth of this house, Asaces a noble Parthian recovered from it all the Provinces of the Persian Empire, lying on that side of Euphrates; and erected the so much celebrated Parthian Kingdom, whereof more in Persia.

And

And in the reign of Antiochus Magnus, so called for his Victories in Egypt, Judæa, and Babylonia, the Romans extorted from it all the Asian Provinces, on this side Mount Taurus, not wanting many provocations to incite them to it: for he not only had made war against Ptolemy Philopator King of Egypt, whom the Romans had taken into their protection; but stirred up the Cities and States of Greece against them: invaded Lysimachia, and some other parts of Europe, in defiance of them, and had received Annibal the Carthaginian, and Thuas the Ætolian, their most mortal Enemies, into his Dominion, governing his Councils by the influences which they had upon him. Nor may we think but that ambition and avarice, to add to their fame and Empire by the overthrow of so great a Prince, did persuade much with them. So that the point being brought to a ready issue, they pleaded it on both sides in the battel of Magnesia, a City of Lydia; to which Antiochus brought an Army of 300000 foot, and as many armed Chariots, besides store of Elephants, if the Roman Writers be not over-lavish in their reports. But rejecting the advice of Annibal, and committing his affairs wholly to Evil-Counselors, he was vanquished by no more than four Legions of Enemies; and for his peace compelled to quit all his Asian Provinces, on that side of Taurus, and to pay 15000 Talents in ready money for the charge of the war. The rest of his estates they were content he should enjoy for a longer time, Et libentius quod tam facile cessisset (as Florus handsomly puts it on him) because he had so easily relinquished that. Afterwards in the civil broils among themselves, about the succession of the Kingdom, Alexander King of the Jews, took from them many of their best Towns in Palestine, as Joppa, Gaza, Anthedon, Azotus, Rhinocorura, almost all Samaria, and Gaulonitis, with Sybopolis, Gadara, and many other strong Towns in celo-Syria. Finally, when they had consumed almost all the Royal race, and changed their Kings no less than ten times in 40 years (a sure sign of a falling and expiring Kingdom) they were fain to cast themselves upon Tigranes King of Armenia, a puissant and successful Prince, till engaged in the quarrel of Antiochus against the Romans: by whom stripped of all his estates on this side Euphrates, he was fain to content himself with his own Armenia; leaving Syria to the absolute disposal of Pompey, who presently reduced it to the form of a Province. This said, we have not much more to do with the house of Seleucus, but to lay down their names, and times of their several governments, till we draw towards the last end of

The MACEDONIAN KINGS of SYRIA.

A. M.

- 3654 1 Seleucus Nicanor, the first King of this house. 31.
- 3685 2 Antiochus, surnamed Soter, or the Saviour; memorable for nothing so much, as marrying with Stratonice his Fathers wife, in his Fathers life-time.
- 3704 3 Antiochus II. by his flattering Courtiers surnamed Theos, or the God; but being poisoned by his wife he proved a mortal.
- 3719 4 Seleucus II. surnamed by the like flattery Callinicus, or fair Conquerour; because shamefully beaten by the Parthians.
- 3739 5 Seleucus III. called for the like reason Cerannus, or the Thunderer; the eldest son of Callinicus.
- 3742 6 Antiochus III. surnamed Magnus, the younger son of Callinicus, a Prince that imbraced many great actions, and was fortunate in his successes beyond Euphrates: he plagued the Jews, but lost all Asia Minor unto the Romans.
- 3778 7 Seleucus IV. called Philopator, the son of Antiochus, who first began to cast his eye upon the riches of the Temple at Hierusalem.
- 3790 8 Antiochus IV. surnamed Epiphanes, or the Illustrious, but more truly Epimanes, or the mad, the great scourge of the Jews; brother of Seleucus Philopator. With whom beginneth the story of the first Book of the Maccabees.
- 3802 9 Antiochus V. called by the name of Eupator, the son of Epiphanes; who by Lysius his Captain tyrannized over the poor Judæans, for the little time that he reigned; as did also
- 3804 10 Demetrius, surnamed Soter, son of Seleucus Philopator, by the hands of Nicanor: having possessed himself of the Diadem by the death of Eupator, slain in his favour by the Souldiers who revolted from him. He was afterwards deposed for a time by Alexander Bala, pretending himself to be the son of Eupator, supported herein by the Antiochians.
- 3814 11 Alexander Bala, discomfited in his first battel by Demetrius, whom he slew and vanquished in the second; married Cleopatra Daughter of Ptolemy Philometor, by whose aid he was victorious. But a quarrel breaking out between them, Ptolemy invaded Syria, and caused himself to be crowned King of it; Alexander being slain by some of his Souldiers.
- 3819 12 Demetrius II. surnamed Nicanor, Son of Demetrius the first, recovered his Fathers Kingdom, a friend of the Maccabees, but so cruel to his own people, that he was driven out of his Kingdom by Tryphon General of his Armies.
- 3821 13 Antiochus VI. surnamed Enthous, the son of Alexander and Cleopatra, advanced unto the Throne by Tryphon, and after slain by him to make way for himself unto the Diadem.
- 3824 14 Tryphon, called also Diodorus, having driven out Demetrius, and slain Antiochus, made himself King.

MOUNT HERMON.

IN our passage out of Cælo-Syria into Palestine, we must cross Mount Hermion; a ledge of Hills; which beginning at the East point of the Anti-Libanus, bend directly South: in different places, and by several Nations called by divers names. By Ptolomy called Alfadamus; by the Amorites, Samir; by the Phanicians, Syrion; and by that name remembered in the Book of Psalms. But Alfadamus they are called only where they border upon Cælo-Syria. Where they begin to part the Region of Trachonitis from Arabia Deserta, they are called by Moses and the Scriptures Hermion, part of the Kingdom of Og, the King of Basan, as is said, Joshuah, ch. 12. v. 6. Syrion by the Sidonians, as is affirmed; Dent. ch. 3. v. 9. Running farther after this unto the South, they are called Gilead or Galaad; by Strabo, Trachonitis, after the name of the Region along which they pass, and are conceived to be the highest part of all Mount Libanus, or rather of that long ridge of Mountains which there take beginning. And so we are to understand the words of the Prophet Jeremy, saying, Galaad tu mihi Caput Libani, as the Vulgar readeth it. That is to say, that as the head is the highest part of a man; so these Hills, or this part of them, was the highest of all the branches, or spurs of Libanus, called Galeed by Jacob, from that heap of stones which was there laid by Laban and Jacob, to be a witness of the Covenant which was made betwixt them, Gen. 31. v. 27. the word signifying in the Original, an heap of Witnesses. And Laban said, This heap is a Witness betwixt me and thee this day; therefore was the name of it called Galeed, ver. 28. By these Hills, and the main body of the Anti-Libanus lying on the North, and the Mountains of Phenicia and Idumea on the West; the land of Palestine is so shut up on every side, that no Fortrefs can be stronger by wit or Art, than that Countrey by Nature: the passages in some parts so narrow, as hardly to afford passage for a single person. Claudius undiq; montibus, hinc abruptis rupibus, & profundis vallibus concussis Torrentium, inde altis & implexis anfractibus sic contractis, ut per angustos collis vix pateat transitus viatori, as my Author hath it. I had almost forgot to add, that that part of these hills, which is commonly known in Scripture by the name of Hermion, is in one place thereof called Sihon, as Dent. 4. v. 48. where it is said, that the Israelites possessed the Land from Aroer on the bank of the River Arnon, even to Mount Sihon, which is Hermion. As also that one of the highest tops or Summits of it, had the name of Amans, alluded to by Solomon in the fourth of the Canticles; by some mistaken for Amans, a branch of Taurus, which divides Syria from Cilicia in the Lesser Asia, with which Solomon had but small or no acquaintance. And so having cleared our selves of so much of this Mountain, as lay before us in our way, we pass over to Palestine: where we shall meet with it again, (or rather with the Western parts and branches of it) under the names of Gilead and Trachonitis, as a part of that Countrey.

OF PALESTINE.

PALESTINE is bounden on the East, with the Hills last mentioned, by which parted from from Cælo-Syria, and Arabia Deserta; on the West, with the Mediterranean Sea, and some part of Phanicia; on the North, with the Anti-Libanus, which divides it from Syria, and the rest of Phanicia; and on the South, with some part of Arabia Deserta.

It was first called Palestine from the Philistines, the most potent Nation of those parts. A name first found in the History of Hærodotus, but generally used in times succeeding, by the Greeks and Romans. And this I look on as the proper and adequate name of the whole Countrey, according to the bounds before laid down: the others, by which commonly called, being more restrained, and properly belonging to so much hereof, as was in the possession of the Tribes of Israel. And of this sort, are 1 Canaan, or the Land of Canaan, so called from Canaan the son of Cham, by whom first peopled after the flood. 2ly, The Land of Promise, because by God promised to Abraham, and his seed, for an habitation; 3ly, Israel, from the Israelites, or sons of Jacob, whose surname was Israel; 4ly, Judea, and by us Jewrie, from the Jews, or people of the Tribe of Judah, the most pre-eminent of the Tribes of Israel; And 5ly, Terra Sancta, or the Holy Land, because the subject of the greatest part of the Holy Scripture; and that the work of our Redemption was herein accomplished by our Lord and Saviour. Which notwithstanding we must know, that though these names do many times by a Synechdoche, express the whole Countrey of Palestine; yet neither the Canaanites or the Israelites were ever Masters of the whole: except only in the time of David, and of some of the Macedonian Princes, as also in some part of the reign of Herod the Great; all which had the good fortune to command it totally.

But being the most considerable people of it were the Tribes of Israel; we will first look upon the Countrey People under that capacity. And for so much hereof as was held by them, it is situate between the third and fourth Climates; the longest day being fourteen hours and a quarter. The whole length but 200 miles, and not above 80 in breadth; yet was of such a fruitful soil, that before the coming in of the Israelites, it had 30 Kings: and after the coming in of that people, so extremely populous, that David numbered a Million and 300000 fighting men, besides those of the Tribes of Levi and Benjamin. Not of the fruitfulness hereof more shortly.

As for the People they were by composition of a middle stature, but strong of body: in their best times a murmuring and stiff-necked generation, never well pleased either with God or Man, with their Priests or Princes; seldom conform unto the Commandments of their God, nor very much constant to themselves: So crippled in their goings betwixt Superstitions and Idolatry, that they knew not how to walk uprightly: Idolatrous above measure, and incorrigible in it, till their coming back from the Captivity of Babylon: and after that as superstitious and severe, in the point of their Sabbath; as they had formerly been exorbitant in the worship of Idols. No Medium on either side, but extreme in both. Divided anciently into these four ranks, that is to say, 1 Jews, 2 Hellenists, 3 Proselytes, and 4 Samaritans; all of them pretending a right unto this Countrey, though not all of them dwelling in it.

Of these the first called Jews, from Judah, the predominant Tribe; and Hebrews, from Heber the son of Seth, grand-son of Sem, and one of the Ancestors of Abraham; were such as naturally descended of the Tribes of Israel, and lived for the most part in their own Countrey; adhering to the Law of Moses, and embracing the whole Canon of the Old Testament, from the book of Genesis to the book of the Prophet Malachi. Called also Israelites, because descended from the loins of their Father Jacob, to whom God gave gave the name of Israel, for his greater honour. But after the ten Tribes were carried away by Salmassar to an endless captivity: and two Tribes (with the remainder of the rest) returned from that temporary one which they found in Babylon, the name of Israelites was laid by, and that of Jews assumed, as more proper to them. These read the Scriptures, and executed all Divine Offices in their natural Hebrew.

2. The Hellenists, were such as were Jews by parentage, but lived dispersed in most Provinces of the Roman Empire: called by that name (we may English it, the Græcizing Jews) because they read the Scriptures in the Greek or Septuagint Translation; and performed all public Offices in that language also. In other things, as superstitions in their Sabbaths, as tenacious of their Circumcision, and others of their rites and ceremonies of the law of Moses, as the Jews of Palestine: and for that reason, scorned and derided by the Gentiles, amongst whom they lived; Credat Judæus apella, faith one of their Poets, relating to their circumcising; Recutitque Sabbata palles, faith another of them, with scorn enough unto their Sabbaths. Novi illicritus & cæteris mortalibus contrarii, faith Tacitus, a graver Author, of the whole body of their Rituals, or Acts of worship.

3. The Proselytes were such, as not being Jews by birth, or descent of parentage, conformed themselves unto their customs, and desired to be admitted to their Religion. And these were also of two sorts, the one called Proselyti Porta; and the other Proselyti fœderis. The first of these, admitted by the Jews to the worship of God, and instructed in the hopes of the life to come; were only tied to those precepts which the Hebrew Doctors call the Precepts of the sons of Noah: but were neither circumcised, nor otherwise conform to the Law of Moses. Which Precepts of the sons of Noah, so called, because supposed to be given by Noah unto his Sons, when he came out of the Ark, were seven in number: that is to say, 1 That they dealt uprightly with every man. 2 That they blessed and magnified the name of God. 3 That they worshipped not any false Gods, but to abstain from Idolatry. 4 To refrain from all unlawful lusts and copulations. 5 To keep themselves from theft and robbery. 6 And from shedding blood. And 7 not to eat the flesh or member of any beast, taken from it when it was alive, by which all cruelty was forbidden. These, though they were admitted to the worship of God, and might repair unto the Temple; yet because of their Uncircumcision they were not suffered to converse with the Jews, nor to come into the same Court of the Temple with them: but were accounted as unclean, and had their Court apart assigned them in the worship of God, which was called Atrium Gentium, or Immundorum, and was the outermost of all. The other Proselytes, which were called Proselyti fœderis, conformed in all things to the Jews, as in Circumcision, Sabbath-keeping, and all other Ceremonies: and were accounted of as adopted Jews, privileged as they were, to worship in the Inner Court; bound as they were, from eating or drinking with a Gentile; and in a word, partakers with them in all things both divine and humane, and different in nothing from them but their race or parentage. These last in the New Testament called simply Proselytes, without any addition: the former by the name of Zēstavaï, or the worshipping Gentiles, of which see Acts 16. v. 14. & ch. 17. v. 4, 17. & ch. 18. v. 4, &c.

4. As for the Samaritans, they possessed a great part of this Countrey, which the Proselytes did not; yet were not so much Jews, as they. But of these more anon when we come to Samaritania, the proper place of their abode.

As for the natural Jews themselves they are divided also into several Septs; as viz. 1 Esseni, 2 the Sadducees, 3 the Scribes, 3 the Pharisees, 5 the Herodians, and 6 the Gaulonites, or Galileans. The Esseni or Esseni, derive their name, as some conceive, from Asa, which signifieth facere, to do, because they laboured with their hands; as others say, from Asa, which signifieth degenaratus, or to turn de-facere, because they were much given to the study and practice of Physick. Their beginning is not yet agreed on. The first time they were heard of, was in the time Jonathan, the brother of Judas Maccabæus, about 150 years before Christ's Nativity; then mentioned by Josephus, Antiqu. Judaicæ lib. 13. cap. 9. A Pythagorean kind of Jew, and not much differing in opinion from those old Philosophers, professing as they did, 1 Community of goods, 2 Abstaining even from lawful pleasures, 3 Forbidding of Oaths, 4 Forbearing Wine, and drinking Water, 5 Ascribing the conduct of affairs to fate or destiny. 6 And using only inanimate or unbloody Sacrifices. Some other Dogmata they had, but these the principal: forbidding marriage not being common to the Sept, but only to some few amongst them. And though we find no mention of them in the New Testament, the Sept in those times being small and inconsiderable; yet it is thought that Saint Paul alludeth to their Tenets: as when he adviseth Timothy to make use of Wine, and glanceth upon those who prohibited marriage. 1 Tim. 4. 3. or condemned others in the use of meat and drink. Coloss. 2. 16. As for the manner of their life, they lived together as it were in Monasteries, or Colleges, and in every one had their Magister, or Oratory: admitting none into their fellowships or society, unless he brought all he had into their common Treasury; and not then neither under a three years Probationship. More of them he that listeth to see, may satisfy himself in that tract of Philo, intitled De Vita Contemplativa, where he most copiously describeth their Institutes and course of life: mistakingly applied by Eusebius to the Primitive Christians, as if that Tract had purposely been composed of them, by that learned Jew.

2. The Sadducees either derive their name from Sadoc, who lived about the time of Alexander the Great, and is thought to be the first founder of them, or from Sadoc an Hebrew word, signifying Justice; the men pretending to be so exact and strict Justiciaries, as if they would justify themselves before Gods Tribunal. The occasion of the Sept or heretic (for both it was) said to arise from a mistake of Antigonus, a right learned man, Who teaching that we ought not to serve God, as Servants do their Masters, for the hope of reward; occasioned Sadoc and Baitus, two of his Auditors, to conceive that there was no reward nor recompence for a godly life; and consequently no Resurrection nor World to come, neither Angels nor Spirits. These were the most capital of their Errors, as appeareth Act. 23. 6, 8. Mat. 23. 3. Luk. 20. 20, 20. 20, 27. &c. But other Dogmata they had, not mentioned in the holy Scripture: ascribing nothing unto Fate, or Predestination, but all things altogether to a mans free-will; 2 Teaching the soul to be annihilated at the hour of death; 3 Rejecting all Traditions; and 4 Allowing no more Scripture than the five Books of Moses. In most of their opinions contrary to the Scribes and Pharisees, but joining with them both in oppoling Christ: and thought like Sampsons Foxes they looked divers wayes, and were tied together by their tails only; yet in those tails they carried fire-brands to destroy Gods harvest, and had done it, if they had been able.

3 But indeed the Pharisees were the men, who were the Master-wits in the Arts of Mischief, Homines rebusis impietatis, in the Fathers words. Fellows of such a perfect and concocted malice, that they were almost able to possess the devil. Their name they derive from Pharez, which is to separate. *Separa*ists we may rightly call them. For they were first apocryphus eis & vñov, separated to the study of the Law of God, as Saul was brought up to that purpose at the feet of Gamaliel: And secondly, apocryphus eis & vñov, separated from the rest of mankind, by a more strict profession of sanctity; as the Pharisee boasted of himself that he was not as other men, or as that Publican. And that they might so seem unto simple men, they did thirdly separate themselves from the society and conversation of others not so pure as themselves, whom they called populum terra, or the Sons of the Earth, upbraiding Christ that he kept company with Publicans and Sinners: and more than so, used a particular kind of habit, and had garb unto themselves which no others had; using it for a by-word amongst themselves, that Vestes populi Terræ, sunt conculcatio Phariseorum. To which end, as their countenances were more clouded and severe than others; so did they wear their Phylacteries of a broader size than others did: which, by the way, were scrolls of Parchment bound about their heads and upon their hands, wherein were writ the Ten Commandements of God; foolishly so interpreting the words of Deut. And they shall be as frontlets between thine eyes, &c. c. 6. v. 8. They began at the same time with the Sadducees; which was about 300 years before Christ's nativity. As for their Dogmata, besides those specified above, which were also practicable, they maintained 1 A Pythagorean Metempsychosis, affirming that the soul of a righteous man passed from one into another, at the time of his death: from whence the divers opinions touching Christ our Saviour, Mat. 16. v. 14. are supposed to spring; as if his body had been animated with the soul of Elias, John the Baptist, Jeremy, or some other Prophet. 2 They adhered to tenacious to unwritten Traditions, that in comparison of them they neglected the written Law as either insufficient or impertinent: And 3 ascribed so much sanctity unto frequent washings, especially when they came from Market, Mark 7. v. 4. (where possibly they might meet with some unclean persons) and before their sitting down to meat, Mat. 15. 2. that if they came unto a place where there was not water enough both to drink and wash, the Pharisee would rather chuse to wash than drink, though he died for thirst. More of them he that list to see, may find it copiously set down in the four and twentieth chapter of Saint Matthew; and thither I refer the Reader. By means of which pretensions to so great sanctity, and some other arts they had to abuse the people; they grew so strong, and had such store of followers, and dependants on them, that they became formidable in short time, to their Kings and Princes. Inasmuch that Alexandra durst not enter on the Government, in her childrens nonage, as Josephus telleth us, Antiq. lib. 13. cap. 23. until she had permitted all things unto their disposing; ἡ δὲ ἄρχη ἐκείνην γινώσκουσα, &c. and promised to do nothing without their advice. And this she did by the direction of King Alexander, her dying husband: whose Government, as she found by too bad experience had in many things proved unsuccessful, ἡ δὲ τὴν ἐκείνην παρ' αὐτῆς, because she had put some scorn upon them, and otherwise offended that prevailing Faction. A Faction so predominant amongst the People, faith the same Josephus, Antiq. lib. 19. cap. 18. ὡς καὶ ἡ βασιλεία πλεονέχουσα, καὶ ἡ ἀρχὴ, &c. that whatsoever they pleased to spread abroad either of the High Priest, or the King himself, how false or scandalous soever; it was received for truth without more dispute, or any enquiry made into it.

4. But of the Pharisees enough, of the Scribes anon. Proceed we now to the Herodians and the Gaulonites, whom I look not on, as either the Authors or Promoters of any Sept of Religion in the Jewish Church; but as the names of two opposite Factions in the Civil Scare. The first were such who depending upon Herod's fortune, as he did on the pleasure of the Roman Emperours; solicited the paying of tribute to the Romans: and earnestly pressed upon that point, that Herod might be thereby the more indebted to his Masters of Rome, and they to him. Upon this ground nick-named Herodians by the people, men that more endeavoured the greatness and estate of Herod, than the prosperity and liberty of their native Country. And possible enough it is; that some amongst them seeing the magnificence of Herod's Palace, and experimentally knowing his prowess; might fawn him to be the Messiah, so long looked for, and thereby own this name with a better Title, than the others did. Opposite unto these were those called the Gaulonites, (we may call the one the Court-Faction, the other the Exile of the Country or Common people;) so named from one Judas a Gaulonite, as Josephus calleth him, from the place of his birth; a Galilean, as Gamaliel calleth him, Act. 5. 37. from the place of his abode or habitation. By him the Jews were practised with to deny this tribute, telling them that it was a manifest token of their servitude, and that they ought to know no Lord; but the Lord of Heaven: drawing them finally on this ground into open arms, in which action he and his adherents perished, and were brought to nothing. Most of his followers were of Galilee, though he had some Disciples in Hierusalem and Samaritania also: and of these Galileans were those poor men, whose blood Pilate is said to mingle with their Sacrifices, Luk. 13. 1.

The Language of this people by them called the Hebrew, was naturally and originally the same which Abraham found in the Land of Canaan, at his coming thither: as hath been shewn before when we were in Phœnicia. Used by them conjointly till their subjugation by the Babylonians, when being led captive, Galilee.

Higher; Zabulun, and Issachar in the Lower: according to which distribution we will now describe them.

1 The Tribe of NAPHTHALI, was so called from NAPHTHALI the sixth son of Jacob, begotten on Bilhah the hand-maid of Rachel; of whom at their first muster were found 53,400 fighting men, and at the second 44,540 able to bear arms. The land allotted to them lay on the West side of the River Jordan, opposite unto the Northern parts of Issachar: where before we left: having the West, the Tribe of Aser, and that of Zabulun on the South. Within which tract were certain Cities which they never conquered; and one which appertained to the Tribe of Dan: the chief of those which were with-held by the Gentiles, being Chalcis, Avila, Heliopolis, Coes accounted of as belonging to Calo-Syria; where they have been spoken of already.

That which did appertain to the Tribe of DAN, lay on the North-east part hereof, confronting the most Northern parts of Issachar, as before was said; where the Danites held one Town of moment, beside many others of less note. And it seemed destined to this Tribe by some old presage; the Eastern fountains of Jordan (which hath its original in this Tract) being called Dan, at the time of the defeat which Araham gave to Chedorlaomer and his Associates, hundreds of years before this Tribe had ever a possession in it. Of which see Gen. 14. v. 14. The Town of moment first called Leshem, by some Writers Lash: afterwards subject or allied to the Kings of Sidon, and upon strength thereof made good against those of Naphthali; but taken by some adventurers of the Tribe of Dan. Of whom it is said Jos. 19. 47. That finding their own Country too little for them, they went up and fought against Leshem, which they took, and called DAN. Accompted after this exploit, the utmost bound Northward of the Land they took, the length thereof being measured from Dan in the North, unto Beer-sheba in the South: remarkable for one of the Golden Calves which was placed here by Jeroboam, and for the two spring-heads of Jordan, rising near unto it. When conquered by the Romans, it was called Panæa, from a fountain of adjoining of that name: which with the Territory about it, after the death of Zerodorus, who held it of the Roman Empire, as before is said, was given by Augustus Cæsar, unto Herod the Great: and by him at his decease to Philip his youngest Son, with the Tetrarchie of Issachar and Trachonitis. By him repaired and beautified, it was called Cæsarea Philippi, partly to curry favour with Tiberius Cæsar: partly to pre-serve the memory of his own name: and partly to distinguish it from another Cæsarea situate on the shore of the Mediterranean, and called Cæsarea Palestine: and being so repaired by him, it was made the Metropolis of that Tetrarchy. Mentioned by that name; Mat. 16. 13. when Saint Peter made that confession or acknowledgment of his Lord and Master, That he was CHRIST the Son of the living God. By King Agrippa, who succeeded him in his Estates, in honour of the Emperor Nero, it was called Neronia. But that, and the Adjunct of Philippi, were of no continuance: the Town being called Cæsarea Panæa in the time of Ptolemy; and simply Panæa, as before, in the time of Saint Hierom. Of this Cæsarea was that woman whom our Saviour cured of the bloody Flux, by touching the hem of his garment: who in a pious gratitude of so great a mercy, erected two Statues in this place, representing CHRIST, by whose command it was cast down, and a Statue of his own set up in the place of Jehoiakim the Apostate, by whose command it was cast down, and a Statue of his own set up in the place thereof, miraculously destroyed by a fire from Heaven. The City being at that time, and long time before, an Episcopal See. Of less note there were, 1 Haleb, and 2 Reccab, both situate in the confines of it. And not far off the strong Town and Castle of 3 Magdala, (the habitation as some say of Mary Magdalene) where the Pharisees desired a sign of our Saviour CHRIST, as is said Mat. 15. 39. 16. 1. the same, or some place near unto it, being by Saint Mark (reporting the same part of the Story) called Dalmanntha, chap. 8. 10, 11. But whether this Castle did anciently belong to these Danites, or to those of Naphthali, or to the Half Tribe of Manasses beyond the River, I am not able to determine.

Of those which were in the possession of the Tribe of NAPHTHALI, the Cities of most eminent observation were, 1 Hazor, or Azor, by Junius and Tremelius called Chatzar, the Regal City and Metropolis of all the Canaanites: memorable for the Rendezvous of 24 Canaanitish Kings in the War with Jos. 19. 47; by whom it was taken notwithstanding, and burnt to ashes. But being afterwards re-built, it became the Regal Seat of Jabin the King of the Canaanites, who so grievously for the space of 20 years, afflicted Israel: till vanquished by Deborah and Barak. Destroyed in that war, and repaired by Solomon, it continued in good estate in our Saviours time, that it was then one of the Cities of Decapolis; in being to still, but known by the name of Antiochia. 2 Capername, seated on the River Jordan, where it falleth into the Sea of Galilee; of which Country it was accounted the Metropolis, in the time of our Saviour, with whose presence and preaching often honoured, and one of the principal of the Decapolis. Some marks of its former greatness it retained when Saint Hierom lived, who confessed it to be a Town of some good capacity; but so decayed in the time of Breidenbeck and Bochardus, that it consisted but of six poor Fishermens Houses. 3 Hamath, so called from Hamathi the Son of Canaan, planted in these parts; a Town of such esteem in the elder times, that it was reckoned one of the Gates of the Land of Canaan; and therefore called in Scripture, introitus Hamath, or the entrance of Hamath; as Numbers 34. 8. Jos. 13. 5. Judg. 3. 3. &c. Mistaken by Saint Hierom for another of the same name in Syria, by the Greeks and Romans after them, called Epiphania. And in this I say he is mistaken; Epiphania being placed by Ptolemy two degrees more Eastward than Cæsarea Philippi, the most Eastern City of all Galilee; and two degrees more North than that, though the most Northern City of all Palestine. The ground of this millake we have seen before. Won by the Syrians of D. mascus, it was again recovered to the Crown of Israel, by Jerubbaas the second Son of Jos. 20. 7: and after called by the Romans (as were Scythopolis, Pella, Gadara, and some others of the Cities of this tract) unto Calo-Syria. 4 Kadesch, to difference it from others of the same name, called Kadesch-Naphthalim, high seated on the top of an Hill, as is said Jos. 20. 7. the King whereof being taken and slain by Jos. 20. 7, it was made one of the Cities of Refuge, and given to the Levites. Most memorable for the Birth of Barak, who discomfited Sisera, Lieutenant of the Host of Jabin before mentioned, in the infancy of the Jewish State; one of the ten Cities of Decapolis, in the time of the Romans; and an Episcopal See in the first ages of Christianity. 5 Riblah, watered with the Fountain of Daphnis, a little River, which hereabouts falleth into Jordan: to which City, as some say (but I think erroneously) Zedechias the unfortunate King of the Jews was brought Prisoner unto Nebuchadnezzar, who caused his Children to be slain before his face, and then put out his eyes. But this I look on as an Error in them that say it, the scene of this said Tragedy being by Josephus laid in Riblah (or Riblah) a City of Syria; the same which in succeeding times had the name of Antioch. And certainly Josephus, who for so long was Governor of both the Galilees, cannot be conceived to be so ignorant of the State of this Province, as to transfer that bloody Execution to a City of Syria, if it had been acted in this Country. Nor can I think that this Riblah, none of the greatest Towns in the Tribe of Naphthali, should be capable of the Court and Train of that mighty Monarch; especially for so long a time, as he is said to have attended in that place, the success of his forces then before Hierusalem, and the disposal of the State when the Town was taken. 6 Saphet, another of the Decapolis Cities, strongly if not impregnablely seated; one of the strongest Fortresses of the Western Christians, as it was after their expulsion, of the Turks and Sassanians; who from hence waited and subdued all the neighbouring Country, as far as to the very Sea. The only place, nor of this Country only, but of all the East, in which the Jews (who possessed a third part of this Town) have any shadow of a Common-wealth. 7 Beithanet, mentioned Jos. 19. 38. made tributary unto those of this Tribe; though otherwise possessed by the Canaanites who held out against them. 8 Carthani, or Kirinathaim situate near the Mountain which in following times was called Mount Christi, because much frequented by our Saviour; who here made choice of his Apostles, as is said Mark 3. 13. and where he made also that Divine Sermon, recorded in the 5. 6. & 7. Chapters of Saint Matthews Gospel. 9 Miscoloth, a place of great strength, but forced by Bacchides General of the Armies of the Kings of Syria, in the time of the Maccabees, to Sidone, a strong City, after called Gennesareth; whence the Lake or Sea of Tiberias, neighbouring near unto it; is sometimes called the Lake of Gennesareth, as Luke 5. 1.

2 The Tribe of ASER, was so called from Aser, the 8th. Son of Jacob, begotten on Zilphah the hand-maid of Leah: of whom at their first Muster when they came out of Egypt, were found 41,500 persons, able to bear Arms, all above 20 years of age; and at the second Muster when they entered the Land of Canaan, 53,400 fighting men of the new increase. The portion of the Land allotted for their habitation was plentiful in Wine, Oyl, and Wheat, with great store of Balsam; extending from the Coast of Sidon, to Ptolemais, 30 miles in length; and from the Mediterranean Eastward, to the Tribe of Naphthali, some twelve miles in breadth. And though they never were of power to reduce the maritime Cities of Ptolemais, Tyre, Sarepta, and Sidon, under their command: yet had they in this narrow compass many beautiful Cities, and Towns of note; which they were quietly possessed of, till their subjugation by the Kings of Affria.

The principal of those, and others which have since been founded, 1 Aphik, memorable for the great slaughter there made of the Syrians, when besieged by Benhadad: of whom 100,000 were slain by the Israelites under the leading of Ahab, and 27,000 killed by the fall of the Wall. 2 Gabala mentioned by Ptolemy amongst the mid-land Cities of Phœnicia; but belonging properly to this Tribe; one of those twenty which were offered by Solomon unto Hiram, and upon his refusal peopled by the Israelites. Fallen to decay, it was afterwards re-built and strongly fortified by Herod the Great. 3 Gisfalia, a Town of great strength and consequence; the birth-place of John or Jehocanan, one of the three Religious in Hierusalem when besieged by Titus, where he did more mischief than the Enemy. Attempting to betray this City to the power of the Romans, he gave the Tyrians an opportunity to be Masters of it, by whom it was burnt unto the ground. But being re-built by the Authority of Josephus, then Governor of Galile for the Jews, it was afterwards yielded to Titus upon compulsion. 4 Canas, for distinction sake called Canas Major, to difference it from another of that name in the Lower Galilee, affirmed for the dwelling of that woman, whose Daughter, Christ delivered of an evil Spirit: called by Saint Matthew a woman of Canaan, Chapter 15. a Syro-Phœnician by Saint Mark, Chap. 7: the Syro-Phœnician of this Tract; being originally of the race of Canaan, as was said before. 5 Heishlan, or Cethlan, the furthest City of the North; as 6 Messals, or Masfel, to the South, of the Tribe of Aser. Of later date there are 7 Thoron, a strong piece built by the Christians on the Hills near Tyre, to hinder the excursions of the Turks, when they held that City. Situate in a pleasant and fruitful Soil, of great importance in the wars of the Holy Land, and giving name to the noble family of the Lords of Thuron: one of which being Constable to King Baldwin the third, lieth buried in the Chapel adjoining to it; a curious piece of work-manship, and Dedicated by the name of the blessed Virgin. 8 Belfort, so named from the strength and beauty of it; seated on the high grounds near the River Naar: and memorable for the great repulse which Saladin the Victorious King of the Turks received before it; being forced to raise his siege with dishonor and loss, on the coming of the Christians Armies. Some of the Forts here are of the same erection, as 9 Montfort, and 10 Mount-Royal (or Castellum Regium) belonging to the Dutch Knights (of whom more hereafter) and by them valiantly defended against the Infidels.

3. The Tribe of ZABULON, was so called from Zabulon the tenth Son of Jacob by his Wife Leah: of whom there mulctured near Mount Sinai, 57400 able men; and 65000 at their second muster, when they came into Canaan. Their Territory lay on the South of Aser and Nephthali, and the North of Zabulon; extending from the Lake of Tiberias, to the Mediterranean.

Places of most observation in it, 1 Jokneham, the King whereof was slain by Josiah, and the City given unto the Levites. 2 Zabulon, or the City of men, a stately and magnificent City, till burnt to the ground by Cestius, a Roman President. 3 Cana-Minor, so called to difference it from the other in the Tribe of Aser, the birth-place of Nathaneel, and as some say of Simon Zelotes: memorable for the marriage, at which our Saviour wrought his first miracle, of turning water into wine: Called in St. John's Gospel Cana of Galilee. 4 Bersabe, standing in the border betwixt both Galilees, and therefore strongly fortified by Josephus against the Romans. 5 Dokhan, where Joseph found his brethren as they fed their flocks; and where the Prophet Elijah brook blind the Syrians, who besieged him in it. 6 Bethsaida, situate on the Sea of Galilee, one of the ten Cities of Decapolis, the birth-place of Peter, Andrew, and Philip; but most renowned for the miracles and preaching of our Lord and Saviour. 7 Nazareth, now a small village, seated in a vale betwixt two hills, not far from Pithul or Acon; upon one of which two hills it was formerly built; where still are to be seen the ruins of many Churches, here founded by the Christians; it being in the flourishing times of Christianity, an Arch-Bishop's See. Of great esteem, for being, if not the birth-place, yet the habitation of the Virgin Mary; who was her saluted with those joyful tidings by an Angel, as she sat in her Chamber. Of which Chamber it is said in the Popish Legends, that it was after the Virgins death had in great reverence by the Christians; and remained in this Town, till the Holy Land was subdued by the Turks and Saracens, Anno. 1291. Then most miraculously transported into Scheyronia; but that place being unworthy of the Virgins Divine presence, it was by the Angels carried over into the Sea-coast of Italy, Anno. 1294. That place also being infested with Theeves and Pyrats, the Angels removed it to the little Village of Loretto, where her miracles were quickly divulged: inasmuch that Paul the 2d. built a most stately Church over this Chamber, and Xistus the fifth made the Village a City. And thus we have the beginning of our famous Lady of Loretto. Here did our blessed Saviour spend a great part of his life before his Baptism; from whence both he and his Disciples had for many years, the name of Nazarenes. 8 Jotopata, strongly seated on the top of a Mountain, near the Lake of Gennesareth; fortified by Josephus in the war with the Romans, but after a long siege taken by Vespasian, and in it Josephus the Historian, chief Governor of the City, and of both the Galilees. 9 Tiberias, raised out of the ground by Herod the Tetrarch, and named thus in honour of Tiberius Caesar. Situate in a fruitful soil, on the edge of the Lake, which afterwards took the name of the Lake or Sea of Tiberias: this City being held to be the greatest of the Lower Galilee, and the Metropolis of the Decapolis Region. In this City it was that our Saviour CHRIST called Saint Matthias from the receipts of the Custom-house; and near unto it that he raised the Daughter of Jairus. 10 Bethulia, more within the Land, seated on an high Hill, and of very great strength, as appears by the story of Judith and Holofernes. 11 Japha, a place of like strength, but forced by Titus; who in the fury of the storm slew in it above 15000 persons, and carried away with him 2000 Prisoners. 12 Sephoris or Sippora, the habitation of Josachim and Anna, the Parents of the blessed Virgin; fortified with strong walls by Herod the Tetrarch, who made it his Regal Seat for the Lower Galilee. Before that time, it had been made by Gabinus, one of the five Juridical Resorts for the Palestinians: after that, not without great difficulty forced by Vespasian; and is nothing now but a Castle known by the name of Zaphet, or Soffet. The ordinary Residence, for the most part, of the Turkish Sanziak who hath the Government of this Province; and lately, if not still, of the Emirs of Sidon; Faccardine the late Emir having been made the Sanziak of it, before his falling off from the Turks. Not far off is Mount Tabor, famous for the transfiguration of our Saviour; for a sumptuous Chapel built on the top of the hill in memory of it, by the Empress Helen, Mother of Constantine the Great: and for the Fountain of the brook Chison, which presently divided into two Streams, runneth Eastward with the one to the Sea of Tiberias; and Westward with the other to the Mediterranean.

4. The Tribe of ISSACHAR is so called from Issachur the ninth Son of Jacob, by his wife Leah, of whom were found at the first Muster 54400 fighting men, and 64300 at the second Muster. Their lot, in the partition of the Land amongst the Tribes, fell betwixt Zabulon, and the Half Tribe of Manasse on this side Jordan, North and South; extending from that River to the Mid-land Sea. A Territory not so well replenished with strong and eminent Cities, as was that before; nor yielding so much matter of observation in the course of business.

Those of most note in it, 1 Tarichaa, on the side of the Lake, about eight miles from Tiberias, of great strength both by Art and Nature; as witnessed the notable resistance which Vespasian found when he besieged it, by whom taken with great difficulty and incredible slaughter. 2 Cision, a City of the Levites. 3 Remith, called also Jarmuth, an other City of the Levites; where the Hills of Galboa take beginning, beginning, and thence range as far as the Mediterranean Westward, and the City of Jezeel towards the East. 4 Em-badda, near which Saul being discomfited by the Philistines, slew himself for grief, or else for fear of falling into the hands of those merciless Enemies, against whom he had so often returned victorious. 5 Naim, on the Banks of the River Chison, where CHRIST failed to life the Widdows Son. 6 Hapharaim, or Aphraim, on the banks of the same River also. 7 Endor, of chief note for the Witch with whom Saul consulted; and the discomfiture of the Midianites by Gideon, who perished at Endor, and became as the Dung of the Earth, saith the Royal Psalmist. 8 Dabarath, one of the Cities of refuge. 9 Arthela, not far from the Cave of the two Thieves, which so greatly infested Galilee in the time of Herod. And 10, of a later date the Cattle of Spilgrims (Castellum Peregrinorum in Latin Writers;) built by Raymond, Earl of Toulouse, and after fortified by the Templers, for the security of such as travelled to the Holy Land; and for long time the Magazine or Store-house of the Western Christians: now called Tortosa. Situate on the shores of the Mediterranean near a spacious bay; on the North side whereof Mount Carmel, described already.

As for those Galileans which succeeded in the place of these Tribes, they were for the most part originally such as were sent thither by Salmanassar to inhabit there, when the Israelites were led away into Babylon (as we have seen) but intermixed with some Remains of the ten Tribes, as was said before. And yet as it they had been wholly of the same extraction, with the rest of the Samaritan Nations, they were as much despised by the Jews, (as witnesseth that scornful by-word, Can there any good come out of Galilee?) as the others were: though these as Orthodox in Religion as the Jews themselves; which so zealously affected, that neither threats nor force could make them offer sacrifice for the health of the Roman Emperors; whom they looked on as the enemies of their Law and liberty. Brought under the Command of the King of Jerry by the Maccabees; and with the rest of that Kingdom bestowed on Herod by the Romans. Left by him at his death to Herod surnamed Antipas, the second of his sons then living, with the Title of Tetrarch; which he enjoyed till the death of our Saviour; and on his deprivation (being banished to Lyons in France by the Emperor Caligula) bestowed upon Agrippa his Brothers son, the first King of the Jews so named. Under him and his son Agrippa the second, it continued till the general revolt of the Jewish Nation. Subjected by the sword of Vitus to the power of the Romans, it hath since followed the same fortune with the rest of Palestine.

4. SAMARIA.

SAMARIA is bounded on the East, with the River Jordan; on the West, with the Mediterranean Sea; on the North, with Galilee; and on the South, with Judea. So called from Samarit, the chief City of it, of which more hereafter.

The Country interchangeably composed of Fields and Mountains, excellent good for tillage, and full of trees, yielding variety of fruits: watered both with the dew of Heaven, and many fresh springs which the Earth affordeth it; occasioning thereby abundance of grass, and consequently of Milch exceeding plenty. Heretofore very wealthy; and no less populous, but now famed for neither.

The people for the most part, were originally the descendents of those Assyrians, whom Salmanassar sent thither to possess the dwellings of the Captive Israelites. Gentiles at first, till better instructed by the Lyons whom God sent amongst them, and after by the Priests sent thither by the Kings of Assyria; they entertained the five Books of Moses, and out of them learned the manner of the God of the Lands, 2 Kin. 17. Further than this they would not go, rejecting all the rest of the sacred Canon; and no strict observers of this neither. And though at first they so embraced the worship of God, as that they still adhered to the gods of the Nations, where before they dwelt, as Nergali, Ashimach, Nibh, Tartak; and the rest of that rabble, mentioned 2 Kings 17: yet they were soon taken off from those impieties, and became zealous in the worship of one only God; erroneous chiefly in the place which was destined to it. The wicked policy of Jezeboam the Son of Zechar, was as natural to them, as they could not have possessed his estates without it: and therefore would not suffer their people to go up to Hierusalem to worship, as the Law required. More pious in this than their Predecessors, that they erected no Golden Calves in Dan, and Bethel, or any other parts of their Dominions: though to divert the people from the Temple of God, they would have a Temple of their own. Mount Garizim, and the Temple there (of which more anon) as sacred unto them, as that of Solomon to the Jews. Disputatious enough in this, but not idolatrous and Schismatical too, as the others were; yet so conceited of themselves, and their own perfections; that they imagined themselves defiled by any company but their own. If therefore they had visited any of their neighbour Nations, at their return, they used to sprinkle themselves with urine: but if by negligence, or the necessity of business, they had touched any not of their own Sect, they drenched themselves, cloaths and all, in the next fountain. But in this the Jews cried quittance with them, not so much as eating or drinking with them, nor having with them any kind of commerce or dealing, as appeareth John 4. 9. but loading them, on the other side, with all the bitterness of reproach and hatred. There are two manner of people (saith the son of Sirach) which mine heart abhorreth, and the third is no people: they that sit on the Samaritan.

Mountains of Samaria, the Philistines, and the foolish people that dwell at Sichem. Ecclus. 30. And this continued to the times of our blessed Saviour; whom when the Jews endeavored to reproach with their heaviest calumnies, they could find out none to greater advantage than he: he was a Samaritan; and (which they thought came all to one) a man that had conversed with Devils and familiar spirits.

Of these there were some Seths, also as amongst the Jews; 1. The Dositheans, so called from Dositheus or Dosithai, supposed to be the first Priest who was sent thither by the King of Syria: agreeing with the Jews in Circumcision; and the Sabbath; and the doctrine of the Messiah (in which last they differed from the common Samaritans, who was a Saducee in that point) but differing from them in some points of as signal consequence. For they rejected the traditions of all the Prophets, as not divinely inspired by the holy Ghost; they ate of nothing that had life, like the Pythagoreans, abstained from marriage, like the Essenes; and in the point of Sabbath-keeping out-went the Pharisees; it being resolved upon amongst themselves that in what point soever a man was found on the Sabbath-day-morning, in the same he was to continue without intermission the whole day after. 2. The Sebvians, so called from Sebus or Sebviah one of the Complices of that Dositheai; who thought they kept all the public Festivals; as the Jews; and the other Samaritans did yet they kept them not at the same time: transferring the Paschever to August; the Pentecost to Autumnus; and the feast of Tabernacles to the time of the Paschever; not suffering for that cause to worship in the Temple of Garizim. 3. The Guribani, who kept the same Festivals, and observed the same times of those Solemnities, as the Law required; but kept only one of the seven days of those great Festivals, and laid by the rest, as days of ordinary labour. In other points not differing from the other Samaritans, who though at first possessed of all the land belonging to the Ten Tribes of Israel, were yet reduced at last to a narrower compass: shut up betwixt Galilee and Judea, within the ancient territories of the Tribe of Ephraim; and the other half Tribe of Manasse, on this side of the water.

1. The half Tribe of MANASSES on this side of Jordan, was situate betwixt Issachar on the North, and the Tribe of Ephraim on the South; extending from the Mediterranean, to the banks of that River. In which the places of most consequence and consideration, 1. Beth San; environed almost with the land of Issachar, situate near the banks of Jordan, where it beginneth again to streighten and be like it self, having been almost lost in the Sea of Galilee: first called Nisa, and so called by Bacchus or Liber Pater the founder of it, in memory of his Nurse there buried; but the children of Manasse not being able to expell the natives out of it, as in other places, gave it the name of Beth San, or the house of an Enemy. Afterwards when the Scythians invaded those parts of Asia, and compelled some of the Jews to serve them against the rest (whom notwithstanding their good service they put all to the sword) they new-built this City: called therefore by the Grecians, Scythopolis, or the City of Scythians; and by them reckoned as a City of Cela Syria. Memorable in the old Testament for the hanging of the dead bodies of Saul and his Sons on the walls hereof; by the barbarous Philistines; in the time of our Saviour, for being the greatest of all the Decapolis Region; as afterwards in the flourishing times of Christianity, for being the See of an Arch-bishop: now nothing but a desolate village, and a heap of rubbish; out of which many goodly Pillars, and other pieces of excellent Marble are often digged. 2. Terzab, used by the Kings of Israel for their Regal Seat; till the building of Samaria, and the Removal of it thither. 3. Acrabata, the Territory whereof called Acrabataena, was afterwards made one of the 120 Toparchies of Judea. 4. Tibebus, not far from Samaria, where the Bastard Abimelech was wounded with a Stone which a woman threw at him from the Wall, and perceiving his death to be drawing on, commanded his Page to slay him; that it might not be said he perished by the hands of a Woman. 5. Ephra or Hophra, in which Gideon dwelt; near whereunto there stood an Altar, consecrated to Baal, defaced by Gideon; and not far off, the fatal Stone on which Abimelech slew 70 of his Brethren. An heathenish cruelty; and at this day practised amongst the Turks. 6. Asophun, an ignoble Village, made famous only for the great and notable defeat which Prothomy Lathurus here gave to Alexander the King of the Jews: which victory he used with so great barbarity, that he slew all the Women as he passed along, and caused young Children to be sod in Caldrons. 7. Bezek, the City of the bloody Tyrant Adoni-Bezek; whose story (touch'd upon before) see at large in Judges Chap. 1. By Josephus it is called Bala; and seemeth to be the place in which Saul assembled the chief strength of the Ammonites. 8. Jezebel, the Royal City of Abah, and the Kings of his race, situate on the foot of the Mountains of Gilboa: So near unto the borders of Issachar, that some have placed in it that Tribe. Memorable in sacred story for the stoning of Ahab by the Procurement of Jezebel; and the breaking of Jezebel's neck, by command of Jezebel: A City which gave name to the plains adjoining, called the valley or Plains of Jezebel (but by the name of Campus Magnus in the Book of Maccabees, lib. 1. cap. 12.) extending from Scythopolis to the Mediterranean; famous for the great and many battles which have been fought in it, especially of Gideon against the Midianites, of Saul against the Philistines; of Abah against the Syrians, of Jezebel against Jezebel, and finally of the Christians against the Saracens. 9. Megiddo, unfortunately observable for the death of the good King Josiah, slain hereabouts in a battle against Pharab Neo King of Egypt; and before that, of Abaziah King of Judea, who received his death wound at Gaber, a Town adjoining, when pursued by Jezebel. 10. Dora, or Dors, as the Scripture calls it, on the Mediterranean not far from the Castle of Pilgrims in the Tribe of Issachar. A very strong and powerfull City and therefore chose by Tryphon for his City of Refuge, who having first treacherously taken; and barbarously murdered Jonathan the Maccabean, after he had received 200 talents for his Ranfome; and not less villainously slain Antiochus the six of Syria, his Lord and Master, whom he succeeded in his Throne: was by Antiochus the seventh, with an Army of 120000 foot, and 8000 horse, besieged in this City, and most deservedly put to death. 11. Cesarea, antiently called the Tower of Seraton, from Seraton a King of the Zidonians; new built by Herod; and by him not only beautified with a large Theatre and Amphitheatre, both of polished Marble, with a fair and capacious haven; which with incredible charge and pains he forced out of the Sea. And having in twelve years brought it to perfection, in honour of Drusus Caesar, Son-in-law of Augustus, he caused one of the chief Towers thereof to be called Drusus; the City it self to be called Cesarea Palestine. The stateliness and magnificence of which City (when first built by Herod) he that lists to see, may find the same described at large by Josephus the Jew, in the 15th Book of Antiqu. cap. 13. In this City was Cornelius baptized by St. Peter; Here did St. Paul plead in defence of Christianity before Festus then the Roman President; and finally, here Herod Agrippa was smitten by an Angel, and devoured by worms, after his rhetorical Oration, which his Parasites called the voice of God and not of man. The Metropolis of all Palestine, when one Province only; as afterwards of Palestina Prima, when by Constantine, or some of his Successors, cantoned into three: the first Bishop hereof being said to be that Cornelius, whom Saint Peter here initiated in the faith of CHRIST. 12. Antipatrius, another City of Herod's building, in the place where Kapharsalama, mentioned 1 Maccab. 7. 31. had sometimes stood; who in honour of his Father Antipater, gave it this new name. Near hereunto did Judas Maccabaeus overthrow a part of Nicanor's Army: and not far off, the Mountain where Abdia, the Steward of Abah, hid the hundred Prophets, whom he preserved against the fury of Jezebel: Finally to this City it was that Saint Paul was conveyed by the command of Lysias, to save him from the Jews, who lay in wait to destroy him.

2. The Tribe of EPHRAIM was so called from Ephraim, the second and youngest Son of Joseph; of Whom were mustered in the Deserts 45000 fighting men, and 25500 in the Land of Canaan: where their lot fell betwixt this half Tribe of Manasse, on the North; and the Tribes of Dan and Benjamin, upon the South; extending from the River Jordan to the Mediterranean.

Places of most consideration, 1. Saron, on the Mediterranean, to the South of Antipatrius, mentioned Acts 9. 35. and giving name unto that fruitful Valley, which reacheth from Cesarea Palestine, as far as Joppa. 2. Lydda, upon the same shores, where Saint Peter (virtute Christi; in sua) cured Aeneas of the Palsy. By the Gentiles it was called Diospolis, or the City of Jupiter; but by the Christians in the time of the holy wars, it had the name of Saint Georges; partly from a Magnificent Temple which the Emperor Justinian there erected to the honour of that blessed Martyr; but principally from an opinion which they had amongst them, that he suffered Martyrdom in that place. An opinion founded on mistakes, first of a Cenotaphium, or an empty Monument, erected in this City to preserve his memory, for the grave in which he was interred; the other, in taking the word Passio, used in the Martyrologies, for the place of his suffering which is meant only of the story or celebration. But howsoever they intulced it by the name of Saint Georges, as was said before, and made it on that account also an Episcopal See. 3. Ramatha, or Arama, a City of the Levites, supposed to be the dwelling of Joseph, who begged of Pilate the body of CHRIST. 4. Helon, or Ajalon, a City of the Levites also; by some placed, and perhaps more fitly in the Tribe of Dan, and there we shall hear further of it. 5. Thermath-Charet, given by the Israelites to Josuah, who enlarged the same, and made it a strong and goodly City; honoured with the Sepulchre of that brave commander, one of the nine Worthies of the World; and afterwards made one of the Presbyteries of Judea, by the name of Thamnatha. 6. Adasa, or Adarsa, where Judas Maccabaeus with 3000 Jews, overthrew the Army of Nicanor. 7. Jezebel, called otherwise Benaiab. 8. Silo, situate on the top of a lofty mountain; the receptacle of the Ark, till taken and carried thence by the Philistines. 9. Michmas, the habitation of Jonathan, one of the Maccabean Brethren, situate in the middle way from Samaria to Hierusalem, now called Byra. 10. Naiab, where Saul prophesied. 11. Berboron, a City of the Levites, beautified by Solomon; but made more famous by the great and notable overthrow, which Judas Maccabaeus here gave to Lysias. 12. Pirhatson, on the mountain Amalec, the City of Abdon the Judge of Israel. 13. Sichem, called also Sichor, the habitation in the old times, of Sichem the Father of that Hamor, who deflowered Dinah the daughter of Jacob; the City for that cause destroyed by Simcon and Levi; repaired again, and afterwards by Abimelech levelled with the ground; a third time re-edified by Jeroboam the Sonne of Nebat, and a third time ruined by the Kings of Damascus; yet notwithstanding these blowes it was of good esteem in the time of our Saviour, who abode in it two days, and converted many. Memorable for Jacobs Well which was very near it; more for its neighbourhood to Mount Garizim, where the blessings were to be read to the people (of which see Deut. 11. 27. and Jos. 8. 23.) and where afterwards was built a magnificent Temple for the use of the Samaritan Nation, at the cost and charge of Sanballat a great Prince amongst them. Who having married his Daughter to Manasse, brother of Jaddus the High Priest of the Jews, and fearing he would put of the strongest Towns they had; and by that means so weakened them, that they durst not stir all the time of David, nor a long while after. Beginning to be troublesome in the daies of Ozias King of Judah, they were warred on by him, their army overthrowne, Ita and America, two of their strong Forts, took and razed; and the Town of Gath again dismantled. In the time of the idolatrous Achaz, associating with the Edomites, (who evermore attended the destruction of Judah) they brake out again; took Bethsames, Ajalon, Tinnah, and some other Towns; carried away many Prisoners, and slew much people. But the good King Ezekiah made them pay dear for it, taking from them the greatest part of their Country, betwixt Gath and Gaza. Which notwithstanding, they recovered to so great esteem, that the whole Country had from them the name of Palestine. But broken by degrees by the Macedonians, they lost both their power and reputation, passing in common estimate as a part of Jewry; the fortunes of which is followed for the times succeeding.

2. The Tribe of DAN, is so called from Dan the fifth son of Jacob, by Bilhab the hand-maid of Rachel, of whom were muliered at Mount Sinai 62700 fighting men; and 66400 at the second muster, in the Land of Canaan: where their lot fell betwixt Epbraim, on the North; Simeon, on the South; the Tribe of Benjamin, on the East; and the Mediterranean on the West.

Places of most note in it, 1. Joppa (now called Jaffa) once a famous Mart-town, and the only Haven to Judea in foregoing times: the Town, where Jonah took ship to fly unto Tarshish; where Peter raised Dorcas from death to life; and where he lying in the house of one Simon a Tanner, was in vision taught the conversion of the Gentiles. This City they report to have been built before the Flood. And here they say reigned Cepheus, whose Daughter Andromeda was by Persus delivered from a sea-monster; some of whose bones the people used to shew to strangers, even to the flourishing of the Romans. Just as our Citizens of Coventry and Warwick, shew the bones of the Dun-Cow of Dunsmuir heath, and the bones of I know not what Giant, slain by Gay Earl of Warwick. In the time of the Maccabees it was garrisoned by the Syrians; who having in the Port a Fleet of good power and strength, invited 200 of the chief Citizens to go aboard with them, and there drowned them all: for which their Fleet was fired by Judas, and such as did escape the Fire fell upon his Sword. Twice taken by the Romans, and the second time burnt unto the ground: new walled, and fortified with Towers, by King Lewis of France, in the year 1250, the Holy Wars then drawing to their final end. Now nothing standing of it but two little Turrets where are certain Hargubuffs for defence of the Haven; none of the best; defended from the South and West winds with eminent Rocks, but exposed to the fury of the North; which makes it more unsafe than the open Seas, when engaged by Tempests. Not much frequented by the Merchants, who trade here but for Corrons only; and hold their Factory not far off in a Town called 2. Ramus, by the Moors called Ramula, situate in a sandy plain on the rising of a little Hill; built of free stone, but the streets thereof narrow, and the Houses contemptible. More beautiful in the ruins of some Christian Churches, and a Monastery built by Philip the Good of Burgundy, where the House of Nicodemus stood; than in any of the remaining edifices. 3. Jamnia, near Joppa, where Judas burnt the rest of the Syrian Fleet, the flame whereof was seen to Hierusalem, 240 furlongs off; mentioned by Ptolemy, and in the times of Christianity an Episcopal See; now not discernible in the ruins. 4. Cedar or Cedron, fortified against the Jews by Cendabau one of the Lieutenants of Antiochus, who hereabouts was overthrown by the Maccabees. 5. Modin, a small Town, but honored with the birth and sepulchre of those Maccabees; the Sepulchre being seven Marble Pillars of so great a height, that they served as a mark for Seamen. 6. Gibbethon, in the Country called Makass, a City of the Levites, but afterwards possessed by the Philistims, at the siege whereof Nadab, the son of Ieroboam King of Israel, was slain by Baasba, who succeeded; and Omri chosen King on the death of Zimri. 7. Caraiathairim, where the Ark of the Lord was kept for 20 years, in the house of Aminadab; that is to say, from the sending it home by the Philistims, till brought to Hierusalem by David. 8. Beth-semer, to which the Ark was brought by a yoke of Kine, turned loose by the Philistims: for irreverent looking into which there were slain by the immediate hand of God, no fewer than 50070 persons of this City. 9. Tsarab, near which is a fountain, called the fountain of Ethiopia; because Philip there laptized the Ethiopian Eunuch. 10. Caspin, taken with great slaughter by Judas Maccabaeus. 11. Lachis, remarkable for the death of Amaziah King of Judah. 12. Ajalun, a City of the Levites afterwards touched upon before in the Tribe of Ephraim, in the borders whereof we find it situate; and therefore by some Authors reckoned to the same Tribe, and by some to the other, in the valley whereof the Moon is said to have stood still at the prayers of Josuah, as the Sun did over the City of Gibeon: the motion of the Heavens being said, that he might have the more time for execution on the Kings of the Canaanites. To this Tribe also belonged the Town and Territory of Dan, or Lebrim; afterwards called Cesarea Philippi, in the Tribe of NEPHTHALIM; whereof we have there spoke already.

3. The Tribe of SIMEON was so called from Simeon the second Sonne of Jacob, by his first Wife Leah: of whom were found at the first multer 53000 able men; and but 22200 at the second multer, when they came into Canaan. Where they enjoyed but a small Territory to themselves, their lot falling amongst the Philistims, whom they were not able to expel: and therefore they were taken into the Tribe of Judah, where they were permitted to enjoy some Towns and Villages, intermixed with that more potent Tribe. Afterwards, in the reign of King Hesekiah, some

Some of them possessed themselves of Genahy belonging to the Children of Ham; and others passing Southwards into Iadumma more the Amalekites which inhabited in the mountains thereof, and were in the places by them conquered. But for all this, wanting room for themselves and their Children, many of them undertook the Office of Slaves or Scrimers; and dispersed themselves amongst the rest of the Arabes, teaching their children to write, and giving themselves to the employment of Publick Ministers: God herein verifying the curse which Isaac had denounced to Esau, that he should be divided and possessed in Israel. But for their fixed habitation Abraham left them by treaty 1732 to wit: Dan upon the North; and Iadumma on the South; the Tribe of Judah on the East; and the Philistines upon the West. Most of these he brought still to Jerusalem and sold as slaves amongst the Philistines, with whom Abraham and Isaac had to do; and probably of some other of their Kings and Princes, till subdued by the Israelites: Situate in the South border of Canaan, not far from the wilderness of Beersheba; but in a very healthfull air; called therefore Paradise Salernitana in the times succeeding; but Sidon, or Ziglah, belonging to the Philistines till the time of David, to whom given by Achish King of Gath for his place of retreat, when persecuted by Saul; from whom Isaac he lodged here all his goods and carriages; taken by the Amalekites, but the booty recovered from them speedily by the diligence and good fortune of David. 3. Haima: City of the Levites. 4. Canaan Sepher: that is to say, the City of Books; seated within the bounds of Simon, but belonging to Judah, which some hold to be the University or Academy of old Palestine. A City of the Levites also and at first possessed by the Sonnes of Anak; or men of a Gigantike stature; but taken by Othoniel, the sonne of Kehem, on the promise and encouragement which was given by Calib, that whose ever took it should have his Daughters Achish to Wife. Afterwards it was called Debir. Jude. 1. 1. known in the time of Saint Hierom by the name of Dathin. 5. Ghorba, conceived by some to be that place mentioned Numb. 14. 45. to which the Canaanites and Amalekites pursued those of Israel. Beersheba, or Pusom-juramenta; so called of the Well of Waters; and the Oath which was there sworn between Abraham and the Abimelechs; Gen. 21. 31. Memorable in the Scripture for the Grave which Abraham there planted; the wandering of Hagar thereabout, when she was cast out of Abraham's house with her young son Ismael; and the dwelling of Isaac for which cause called the City of Isaac. Situate in the extreme South border of the Land of Canaan, the length whereof is often measured in the Scripture from this Town to Dan; and for that cause well fortified by the Western Christians, when they were possessed of this Country; as standing on the borders of Iadumma, and the Deserts of Arabia, in the way from Egypt.

4. The Tribe of JUDAH was so called from Judah the fourth son of Jacob, by his wife Leah: of whom there were numbered at the first general muster taken near Mount Sinai, 76600 fighting men; and no fewer than 76500 at their entrance into the Land of Canaan. The greatest Tribe, and therefore answerably fitted with the largest Territory; bordering on the Dead Sea, East; upon Simcon West; the Tribe of Benjamin on the North; and the Idumeans on the South. Comparatively large, with reference to the other Tribes; but otherwise unable to contain or feed those infinite multitudes, without the extraordinary providence of Almighty God, which are recorded to be in it: King David mustering 470000 fighting men of this Tribe alone; which was more than half the number found in the rest of the Tribes. A Tribe which had a native Sovereignty over all the others; the Scoper, the Legislative power, and the Worlds Messiah being all premised upon this.

5. Places of most observation in it, 1. Arab, situate in the entrance of Judea, in the way from the Wilderness of Edom. 2. Hebron, one of the antientest Cities of Canaan: the Seat of the Giants, called Anakims, or the sons of Anak. This word Anak signifieth a chain worn for Ornament; and it seemeth that this Anak enriched with the spoils of his enemies, wore a chain of gold, leaving both the custom and name to his posterity. We read the like of Manlius Tergatus in the Roman Histories. This Town did Abraham buy for a burial-place for his dead; in which his Wife Sarah was first buried, and after her four of the Patriarchs. Adjoining to this Town is the plain of Mamre, where Abraham the Father of the faithfull, sitting in his Tent; was visited from Heaven by God in the shape of a man. Here David kept his Court before the winning of Hiernsalem; to this place came the Tribes to anoint him King over Israel; and thither came Abalon, under the pretence of paying his vows, to usurp the kingdom of his Father. 3. Tecoa, the City of Amos the Prophet; and also of that woman, who by the words which Joab put into her mouth, perswaded the King to call Abalon from exile, to the wilderness of this Tecoa, there assembled the Inhabitants of Moab, Ammon, and Mount Seir, to overthrow Juda. But the Lord being appeased by the publique Fast, proclaimed and kept by Jehoshaphat and the people, sowed dissensions amongst them: so that the children of Ammon and Moab stood up against the inhabitants of Mount Seir, asserty to slay and destroy them; and when they had made an end of the Inhabitants of Mount Seir, every one helped to destroye anothers 4. Cerich, or Carich, the birth-place of Judas, hence surnamed Elcariot (or the man of Carich) who betrayed our Saviour, 5. Jeiber, or Jatier, in the North border of this Tribe, towards Euthieropolis, a City antiently of the Levites, and called in St. Hieroms time Jeihira, and then altogether replenished with Christians, is now nothing but the name remaining. 6. Maresa, the native Soyl of the Prophet Micah, near whereunto first Aja King of Judah discomfited the vast Army of Terab the Arabian or Ethiopian, consisting of above a Million of men; and afterwards Gorgius was overthrown by Judas Maccabeus.

7. Emmaus (after called Nicopolis): memorable for the third overthrow which Judas gave to the said Gorgias; for our Redeemers shewing himself after his Resurrection to Cleophas and another of his Disciples; and for the bas Bathet heretofore, which gave the name of Sabaturn to this part of Palistina. The Sovereign virtue of which waters Socomen a Christian attributes to the washing of Christ; see in them, as he passed by at that time; but Josephus a Jew attributes (as it is most likely) unto natural causes. 8. Hafor, or Chafor; one of the frontier Towns towards Idumæa. 9. Odalla, or Haddalan, an ancient and magnificent City, taken and destroyed by Josiah; and lost after much enlarged and beautified by Jonathan, one of the Maccabees. 10. Erila, or Keila, where David sometimes hid himself when he fled from Saul; by him delivered afterwards from the assault of the Philistines. 11. Elontheropolis, or the Free City; not farre from Hebron: a City of later date than any of Judæa, mentioned by Strabo, and much remembered by St. Hieron. 12. Azecha, not far from Emmaus, to which Josiah followed Dabir the King of Eglon, and his four Associates, whom he discomfited in the cause, and quagmire of the Gibeonites, molested by them for submitting to their common Enemy. Seated in the Valley of Terebinth, and of very great strength; presuming upon which, it revolted from Joram King of Judæa, at the same time that Libna and the Edomites had revolted from him. 13. Beth-Sur, or Beth-Sora, that is to say, the house on the Rock, so-called from the situation on a rocky hill, one of the strongest places of Judæa: Fortified first by Roboam the sonnes of Solomon, after by Judas Maccabæus; and finally made impregnable by his brother Simon. 14. Adaram, bordering on the Dead Sea, beautified also by Roboam. 15. Zoar, in former times called Bela, but took its name from the words of Lot: "Alleging that it was but a little one, Gen. 19. 20. as the word Tibor doth import, in whose escape it was preserved, being otherwise one of the five Cities of the Region called Pentapolis, doomed unto destruction; the other four Sodom, Gomorrah, Adama, and Sebim being at the same time destroyed by fire and brimstone. 16. Masada, frequently mentioned by Josephus, as a place of great strength both by Art and Nature, and as it is by him described (in the 7 Book de Bello Jud. cap. 28.) to be thought impregnable; and therefore made by Herod (in the time of his troubles) the place of refuge, in which he disposed of Marianna his betrothed wife, her mother Alexandra, with divers honourable Ladies; and where they were preserved in safety against all his Enemies, till he came armed with power from Rome, to dislodge their forces, which was done accordingly. First built by Jonathan the brother of Judas Maccabæus, as a sure place of Refuge against the Syrians; and afterwards to esteemed by Herod for the reason above mentioned, that he not only much enlarged it with all the requisite additions of strength and beauty, but built within the verge thereof, a magnificent Palace. The whole environed with a wall of 7 furlongs compass, 12 cubites high, and 8 cubites broad, built of white stone, and situate on an high Mountain called Collis Achille, washed on the East-side by the Dead Sea, or Lacus Asphaltites, and by that secured; on the other sides fenced with such deep ditches; that it was a terror to any man to look down into them: besides which natural situation it was fortified by Herod with 27 Turrets; who left therein as in a place impregnable and inaccessible, a Magazine of Armes and all war like furniture, for an Army of 10000 men, all sorts of victuals to sustain them, and ground enough within the walls to yeeld corn sufficient, when time and a long siege should consume those victuals. A place of such strength and so great concernment, that it held out against the Romans (when Vespasian and his son Titus managed that great war) after all the rest of Judæa had been conquered by them. 17. Libna, a strong City seated in a Corner of Judæa, running between the Tribes of Dan and Benjamin. This City revolted from Joram King of Judæa, at the same time the Edomites did; and continued a free State, even as long as Judæa continued a Kingdom. 18. Zip, in the wilderness, wherein David hid himself from the fury of Saul: Hither, when Saul pursued him, David came into his Camp (the watch being all asleep) and took thence his spear, and a Cruse of oyl, and departed. Abishai indeed would fain have killed him: but David, though he knew that Samuel had by Gods command abdicated Saul from the Kingdom, and that himself was appointed in his stead, would not touch him; but left him to the judgement of the Lord, who appointed he was. 19. Bethlem, or (to distinguish it from another of this name of Zabulon so called) Bethlem-Judæa, where Christ was born; and the Innocents suffered for him, before he had suffered for them. In this general Massacre of young Children, a son of Herods, which was at nurse, was also slain; which being told unto Augustus, he replied he had rather be Herods Swine than his Sonne. His swine being safe in regard the Jews where forbidden hog-meat; but his sonnes frequently made away, upon fears and jealousies. A Town for this cause had in great respect by the Primitive Christians, beautified by Helen with a stately Temple, which yet standeth entire; by the Lady Paula (much extolled by Saint Hieron) with some goodly Monasteries, in one of which the body of that Father lieth; and by the Western Christians, with a Sea Episcopall. 20. On the frontier of this Country towards the Philistines, was that strong Castle which Herod repairing, called Herodion; seated on a hill, the ancient unto which was made with 200 steps of Marble, exceeding fair and large. In this Country also are the hills of Er-gaddi in a Cave of which David cut off the lap of Sauls garment; and all along the bottoms whereof were the Gardens of Balsamum or Ophobalsamum, the trees of which, were by Cleopatra (at such time as she governed M. Antony, and the East sent for to be replanted in Heliopolis of Egypt; and Herod, who durst not deny them, plucked them up by the roots, and sent them to her.

Judæa.

5. The Tribe of BENJAMIN took name from the twelfth and youngest son of Jacob, by Rachel his best beloved wife, who died in that Child-birth: of which at the first muster near unto Mount Sinai, were numbered 35000 able men; and at the second muster, when they entered the Promised Land, there were found of them fit for Armes, 45600 persons. A Tribe in great danger to have been utterly cut off, by the folly of the men of Gibeah, all Israel arming against it as one man: For besides those that perished in the former battels, there fell in one day 25000 men that drew the sword: the fury of the Conquerours after that great victory sparing neither man nor beast, nor anything that came to hand, and burning down all their Cities also which they came unto. So great an havoc was there made even of innocent Maidens, that when the edge of this displeasure was taken off, there were not Wives enough found for those young men which had escaped; The other Tribes having bound themselves by a solemn Oath, not to bestow their Daughters on them: inasmuch that they were faine to provide themselves of Wives of the Daughters of Jabesh-Gilead, a Town of the Manassites beyond Jordan, which they took by assault; and of the Daughters of Shilo, whom they took by Stratagem. The whole story see at large in the book of Judges, Chap. 19. 20, 21.

The Territories of this tribe lay betwixt those of Ephraim on the North, and Judæa on the South; having the Dead-Sea to the East, and the Tribe of Dan to the West-ward of them. The chief of their Towns and Cities were, 1. Michmas, the incamping place of Saul, 1 Sam. 13. 2. and the abiding place of Jonathan, one of the Maccabæan brethren, 1 Macc. 9. 73. 2. Mispah, famous in being the ordinary place of assembly, for the whole body of the people, in matters of War or Peace: as also in that standing in the midst of Canaan, it was (together with Gilgal) made the seat of Justice, to which Samuel went yearly, to give judgment to the people. 3. Gebah, the North border of the Kingdom of Judæa toward Israel. 4. Gibeah, the Country of Saul, the first king: where the abusing of the Levites wife by the young men of this Town, had almost rooted the Tribe of Benjamin out of the Garden of Israel. 5. Al, a great and strong City, in the siege of which the Israelites were first discomfited: but when by the death of Achan, who had stolen the accursed thing, the Camp was purged, Josiah by a warlike stratagem surprized it. 6. Gibeon, the mother City of the Gibeonites, who prelagging the unresistable victories of the Israelites, came to the Camp of Josiah, and by a wife obtained peace of him and the people: Employed by them in hewing wood, and drawing water for the use of the Tabernacle, after the fraud was made know unto them; called Nethinims, Ezr. 4.3. from Nathan, which signifies to give, because they were given to the service of the Tabernacle first; of the Temple after. Saul about four hundred years after, slew some of them, for which fast the Lord caused a Famine on the Land: which could not be taken away till seven of Sauls Sons were by David delivered unto the Gibeonites, and by them hanged. This famine did God send, because in killing those poor Gibeonites, the Oath was broken, which Josiah and the Princes swore concerning them. In defence of those Gibeonites it was that Josiah waged war against the Kings of the Canaanites; and stayed the motion of the Sun by his fervent prayers. 7. Jericho, destroyed by the found of Rams-Hornes, was not only levelled by Josiah to the ground; but a curse inflicted on him that should attempt the re-building of it. This curse notwithstanding, at the time when Ahab reigned in Israel (which was about five hundred years after the ruine of it) Hiel a Bethelites, delighted with the pleasantness of the place, re-edified it. But (as it was foretold by Josiah) as he laid the foundation of the walls, he lost his eldest Son; and when he had finished it, and was setting up the Gates thereof, he lost also the younger. It may be Hiel when he began this work, minded not the Prophecie; it may be he believed it not: peradventure he thought the words of Josiah, not so much to proceed from the spirit of Prophecy, as from an angry and vexed heart; they being spoken in way of wish, or execration. And it is possible, it may be, he chose rather to build the eternity of his name on so pleasant and beautiful a City, than on the uncertain lives and issues of two young men. 8. Anathoth, the birth-place of the Prophet Jeremy, and the patrimony of Aitnah the high Priest, sent hither by the command of Solomon, as to a place of his own, when deposed from his office by that King. 9. Nob, called, 1 Sam. 22. 19. the City of the Priests, destroyed by Saul, for the relief which Aimelech the high Priest had given to David; the Ark of the Lord then residing there. 10. Gilgal, upon the bank of Jordan, where Josiah did first eat of the fruits of the Land, and kept his first Paschever; where he circumcised such of the people, as were born during their wandering in the Wilderness; and nigh to which he set up twelve stones for a memorial to posterity, that the waters of Jordan did there divide themselves to give passage to the twelve Tribes of Israel. Here Agag, King of the Amalekites, was hewn in pieces by Samuel, and here Samuel once every year administered Justice to the people. For being seated in the midst of the Land of Israel betwixt North and South, and on the East-side of the Country near the banks of Jordan, it served very fitly for that purpose: as Mispah also did, which stood in the same distance, in regard of the length of the Land of Canaan, but situate towards the West Sea, near the Land of the Philistines: used therefore interchangeably for the ease of the people. 11. Bethel, at first called Luz, but took this new name in remembrance of the vision which Jacob saw here, at going towards Afopotamia, as is said Gen. 28. 19. It signified the house of God, and was therefore chosen by Jeroboam, for the setting up of one of his Golden Calves; though thereby, (as the Prophet saith) he made it to be Bethaven, the house of vanity, Osée 4. 15. and Jo. 5. For then it was a part of the Kingdom of the ten Tribes, and the Southern border of that Kingdom on the coasts of Ephraim: but taken from it by Aijah the King of Judæa, and after that accounted as a member of his Kingdom, till the destruction of it by the the Chaldeans. Called with the rest of those parts, in the time of the Maccabees by the name of Apherema, which signifieth a thing taken away; because taken away from the ten Tribes, to which once it belonged, 1 Maccab. 11. 34. where it is said, to have been taken from the Country of Saron, and added unto the borders of Judea. 12 Ramath, another place there mentioned, and said to have been added to the Realm of Judah, having been formerly the South border of the Kingdom of Israel; and therefore strongly fortified by Baasha, in the time of Ash King of Judah. 13 Chadid, or Hadid, one of the three Cities (the other two being 14 Lod, and 15 Ono) which were inhabited by the Benjamites after the Captivity. Destroyed in the wars with the Kings of Syria, and afterwards rebuilt by Simon the Maccabean.

But the chief glory of this Tribe, and of all the rest, and not so only, but of all the whole world besides, was the famous City of Hiernsalem; seated upon a rocky Mountain, every way to be ascended with steep and difficult ascents (except towards the North) environed on all other sides also with some neighbouring Mountains, as if placed in the midst of an Amphitheatre. It consisted in the time of its greatest flourish of four parts, separated by their several Walls, as if several Cities; we may call them the Upper City, the Lower City, the New City, and the City of Herod: all of them but the Lower City, seated upon their several Hills. Of these, that which we call the City of Herod, had formerly been beautified with the Houses of many of the Prophets, as in our Saviours time with that of Mary the Mother of John Mark, mentioned Acts 15. 37. converted to a Church by the Primitive Christians: the Western part whereof was wholly taken up by the Palace of Herod (a wicked, but magnificent Prince) for cohesiveness, and for strength invincible; containing Gardens, Groves, Fish-ponds, places devised for pleasures, besides those for exercise. Fortified with three Towers at the corners of it; that on the South-East of the Wall, 50 Cubits high, of excellent workmanship, called Adrian's Tower, in memory of his beloved but insolent Wife, rashly murdered by him. Opposite to which on the South-West corner, stood the Tower of Phasolus, so called by the name of his brother, 70 cubits high, and in form resembling that so much celebrated Egyptian Pharos: and on the North wall on an high Hill, the Tower of Hippiel, exceeding both the rest in height by 14 Cubits, and having on the top two Spires; in memory of the two Hippiel, his very dear Friends, slain in his service in the Wars.

2. On the South-side stood that part which was called the Old City, possessed if not built by the Jebusites, and therein both the Mountain and Fort of Sion: but after called the City of David, because taken by him; who thereon built a strong and magnificent Castle, the Royal Court and Manlion of the Kings succeeding. In the West part hereof stood the Tower of David; a double Palace built by Herod, the one part whereof he named Agrippa, and the other Cesar, composed of Marble, and every where entered laid with Gold; and not far off, the house of Annas and Caiaphas, to which the Conspirators led our Saviour to receive his Tryal.

3. That which was called the Lower City, because it had more in it of the Valley, was also called the Daughter of Sion, because built after it, and did in Majesty and greatness exceed the Mother. For therein upon Mount Moriah, stood the Temple of Solomon (whereof more anon) and betwixt it and Mount Sion, on another Hill, the Palace which he built for Wife his Daughter of Egypt; and that which he founded for himself, from which by an high Bridge he had a way unto the Temple. West hereof on a lofty rock over-looking the City, stood the Royal Palace of the Princes of the Maccabees, re-edified and dwelt in by King Agrippa (though of Herods race) and not far off the Theatre of Herods building, adorned with admiral Pictures, expressing the many Victories and Triumphs of Augustus Caesar. In this part also stood Mount Acra, and on that once a Citadel built by Antiochus King of Syria; but razed by Simon, one of the Maccabean Brothers, because it over-topped the Temple; the house of Helena Queen of Adiabene, who converted from Paganism to Judaism, had here her dwelling, and here died; and finally Herods Amphitheatre, capacious enough to contain 80000 people, whom he entertained sometimes with such shews and spectacles, as were in use amongst the Romans. And in this part also on an high and craggy Rock, not far from the Temple, stood the Tower of Baris, whereon the same Herod built a strong and impregnable Citadel, in honour of Marc. Antony, whose Creature he first was, called by the name of Antonias, having a fair and large Tower at every corner, two of them 50 Cubits high, and the other 70. afterwards garrisoned by the Romans, for fear the Jews presuming on the strength of the Temple, might take occasion to rebel.

4. As for the New City, which lay North to the City of Herod, it was once a Suburb only unto all the rest; inhabited by none but mechanical persons, and the meanest Tradesmen; but after encompassed with Agrippa with a Wall of 25 Cubits high, and fortified with ninety Towers. The whole City fenced with a wonderful circumvallation on all parts thereof; having a Ditch cut out of the same Rock, as Josephus an eye-witness writeth, sixty foot deep, and no less than two hundred and fifty foot in breadth. First built, say some, by Melchisedek the King of Salem; by the Jebusites themselves, say others: by whomsoever built, called at first Jebusalem, afterwards Ierusalem, with the change of one letter only: enlarged in time, when made the Royal Seat of the House of David, to the magnificence and greatness before described, till it attained unto the compass of sixty furlongs, or seven miles and an half. Unconquered for the first four hundred years after the entrance of the Children of Israel: and when David attempted it, the people presumed so much on the strength of the place, that they told him in the way of scorn, that the Blind and the Lame which they had amongst them (as the Text is generally expounded) should defend it against him. But as I think, the late learned Mr. Gregory of Christ Church in Oxon, hath found out a more likely meaning of the Text than this, who telleth us, that the Jebusites by the Blind and Lame (as they knew well what the Israelites called Blind and Lame) did understand those Tutelar Idols, on whose protection they relied (as the Trojans did on their Palladium) for defence thereof: and then the meaning must be this, those Gods whom you of Israel call blind and lame, shall defend our Walls. Why else should David say (had they meant it literally) that his soul hated the lame and the blind? 2 Sam. 5. 8. or why should the people of Israel be so uncharitable, as to say that the blind and lame should not come into the House (or the Temple of God): were it meant no otherwise? But notwithstanding these vain hopes, the Town was carried under the conduct of Josh, that fortunate and courageous Leader; and made the Royal seat of the Kings of Judah.

Proceed we now unto the Temple built by Solomon, in providing the materials whereof there were in Lebanon 30000 workmen, which wrought by ten thousand every month; 70000 Labourers, which carried burdens; 80000 Quarry men, that hewed stones in the Mountains; and of Officers and Overseers of the work, no less than 3300 men. The description of this stately Fabrick, we have in the first of Kings, cap. 6, 7. In the year of the World 2350 it was destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar at the taking of Hierusalem: rebuilt again after the return from the Captivity; but with such opposition of the Samaritans that the Workmen were fain to hold their Tools in one hand, and their swords in the other, to repulse, if need were, those malicious Enemies. But yet this Temple was not answerable to the magnificence of the former; so that the Prophet Haggi had good occasion to say to the people, cap. 1. ver. 3. Who is left amongst you that saw this House in her first glory? is it not in your eyes as nothing, in comparison of it? Nor fell it short thereof only in the outward structure, but some inward Additaments. For it wanted, 1 The Pot of Manna, which the Lord commanded Moses to lay up before the Testimony for a Memorial, Exod. 16. 32. 2 The Rod of Aaron, which only budded of all the Rods of the Princes of Israel, and was commanded to be kept before the Ark of the Testimony, for a token against Corah, Dathan, and Abiram, Num. 17. 10. 3 The Ark of the Covenant, the making whereof we have Exod. 25. 10. and the placing it in the Oracle, or Sanctum Sanctorum, 1 Kings 6. 19. 4 The two Tables of the Law, writ by Gods own finger, and by Moses laid up in the Ark of the Covenant, Exod. 40. 20. and Deut. 10. 5. And 5 The fire of Sacrifice, which came down from Heaven, mentioned Levit. 9. 24. 2 Chron. 17. 1. which by the Priest was to be kept continually burning, never to go out. This second Temple, partly because it was grown ruinous, partly because it seemed not magnificent enough, but principally to curry favour with the Jews, Herod the Ascalonite pulled down, and set up another in the place: making it not much inferior (if at all) unto that of Solomon, but far superiour to the other; immense & opulent Temple, as Tacitus most truly called it. And this was it to which our Saviour did sometimes vouchsafe his presence.

But here we are to understand, that by the Temple it is not meant the Fabrick only, or the house itself; but also all those several Courts with which encompassed, being four in number. That is to say, Atrium Sacerdotum, or the Priests Court, which was next unto the Temple; wherein stood the brazen Altar for the daily sacrifice, and the Laver for the washing of the Priests and the Sacrifice also: into which Court might none enter but the Priests alone. 2 Then there was Atrium populi, or the Peoples Court, separated from the other by a Wall of three Cubits height, to which the people did repair to perform their Sacrifices, to say their prayers, and to make payment of their vows. In the middle of this Court, did Solomon make a brazen Scaffold for the Kings his Successors, 2 Chron. 6. 13. and afterwards in imitation of his Porch built before the Temple, were many Porches built about it, for the people to repair into in rainy weather; which gave to this whole Court the name of Solomons Porch, whereof see John 10. 23. Acts 3. 11. Without that stood 3 Atrium Faminarum, or the Womens Court, divided from the other, as is collected out of 2 Chron. 20. 5. in the time of Jehoshaphat King of Judah; in which stood their Treasury, or poor-mans Box, mentioned in the one and twentieth Chapter of Saint Lukes Gospel: from whence this whole Court had sometimes the name of Treasury, as appeareth John 8. 20. where it is said, that these words spake JESUS in the Treasury, that is to say in the Womens Court; where the Treasury or Alm-Box stood: Betwixt these last was an ascent of 15 steps, on which the Levites used to sing those 15 Psalms, which do immediately follow the hundred nineteenth Psalm; upon each step one: from whence they had the name of Psalms Graduals, or Cantica Graduum, i. e. the Psalms or Songs of degrees. And so far all was counted Holy Ground, upon which none might tread but either natural Jews, or circumcised Proselytes, whom they called Proselytised, as before was said; or such of the other Sex (not natural Jews) who having received all outward initiations, had bound themselves unto the observation of the Law of Moses. 4 So was it not with the fourth and last Court, called Atrium Gentium, or the Court of the Gentiles; designed for the use of those Gentiles, whom they called Proselyti Portae, bound only unto the keeping of the Precepts given the Sons of Noah. For in that, as un sanctified ground (though counted part of the Temple also) did they permit a marker of sheep and oxen, the sale of Doves and Pigeons, and the Tables of money-changers, for the oblations of the people: stabling the poor Gentiles amongst their Cattel, and ranking them with the worst of them. And out of this Temple, or Court of the Temple, did CHRIST our Saviour cast the buyers and sellers, and overthrew the Tables of the money-changers; asserting it to its primitive and original use, which was to be a house of prayer for all the Nations. This last Court separate from the other by a wall of three Cubits height, adorned with certain pillars of equal distance, bearing this inscription, MA SEI ANTIQVVS SVIS F. AN. MDCCLXIII. I. E. Let no Alien (or one that is no Jew) enter into the holy place: And to this wall it is that the Apoitle alludeth, saying, He hath broken down the middle wall of partition between us (i. e. between the Jews and and Gentiles) making one of twain, Ephes. 2. 14, 15. interring hereupon, that the Gentiles are no more strangers and foreigners, but fellow-Citizens with the Saints, and of the household of God. v. 19.

But to go forwards with the Temple, having continued in the gloriost to which Herod brought it, not above 85 years, it was finally destroyed by Titus, the son of Vespasian, in the 69 year after Christ's nativity. At what time the Temple of Delphos was utterly overthrown by Earth-quakes, and Thunder-bolts from Heaven; neither of them ever since repaired, though much endeavoured. The concurrence both of which two miracles evidently sheweth, that the time was then come in which God would put an end both to the Jewish Ceremonies, and Heathen Idolatries; that so the Kingdom of his son might be all in all. For this destruction of the Temple of Hierusalem I may call a miracle, in regard it was done against the command of Titus; who was not only carefull to preserve it, before his Souldiers had put fire to it, but did all that possibly might be to quench it. His reason was, Josephus hath it, because the loss thereof would redound so highly to the prejudice of the Roman Empire, in being deprived of such a glorious and magnificent structure. But do he what he could with his utmost industry, there was no quenching of it till it was consumed. And it adds somewhat to the marvel, that this should happen on the tenth day of August, on which day the first Temple had been burnt by Nebuchadnezzar. And certainly it is worth the noting (I hope I shall not be accounted superstitious for this observation) to see how happy or unfortunate, one or the same day hath been found unto divers persons. In the wars betwixt the French and Spaniards for the Realm of Naples, Friday was observed to be very lucky to that great Captain Gonsalvo; he having on that day given the French many notable overthrowes. Wednesday is said to have been fortunate to Pope Sixtus the fifth, for on that day he was born, on the same made a Monk; on that day created General of his Order; on the same made a Cardinal, then chosen to be Pope, and finally on the same inaugurated. To Henry the seventh of England, Saturday was observed to be very fortunate in all his actions; as was the 24 of February unto Charles the fifth, on what day soever: for on that he came into the World, and in that he took King Francis Prisoner at the battel of Pavia, and on the same received the imperial Crown. But to return unto the Temple, we find that on the Sabbath, or Saturday it was taken by Pompey, on the same by Herod, and on that also by Titus.

But go we forwards to Hierusalem as now it standeth, it lay in rubbish and unbuild (after the destruction of it by Titus) till repaired by Adrian: and then the Temple not so much as thought of, till out of an ungodly policy, in the Reign of Julian that Politick Enemy of the Church, who to diminish the infinite number of Christians by the increase of the Jews, began again to build this Temple. But no sooner were the foundations laid, but a terrible Earth-quake caft them up again, and fire from Heaven consumed the Tools of the Workmen, together with the Stones, Timber, and other materials. As for the City it self, after the desolation in it which was made by Titus, it was re-edified by the Emperour Elms Adrianus, who named it Elms, drave thence the Jews, and gave it to the Christians. But this new City was not built in the place of the old. For within this Mount Calvary is comprehended, which was not in the old before. As on the other side, a great part of Mount Zion, part of the City of Herod, and the soyl where the New City stood, are left out of this: the ruins of the other still remaining visible, to shew the ancient greatness and magnificence of it. To look upon it then as it stands at present, it is now only famous for the Temple of the Sepulchre, built by Helena (whom most report to have been daughter to Cylus a British King) Mother to Constantine the Great. Much ado had the good Lady to find the place where the Lordsbody had been laid; for the Jews and Heathens had raised great hillocks on the place, and built there a Temple of Venus. This Temple being plucked down, and the earth digged away, she found the three Crosses, whereon our blessed Saviour, and the two Thieves had suffered. To know which of these was the right Cross, they were all carried to a woman, who had been long visited with sickness, and now lay at the point of death. The Crosses of the two Thieves did the weak woman no good, but as soon as they laid her on the Cross on which the Lord died, she leaped up and was restored to her former health: the occasion of the festival on the third of May by the Latins called Inventio sancta crucis: This Temple of the Sepulchre, even at the first building, was highly revered and esteemed, by the Christians of these parts. And even untill our daies, it is much resorted to, both by Pilgrims from all the parts of the Romish Church, who fondly and superstitiously hope to merit by their journey: and also by divers Gentlemen of the reformed Churches, who travel hitherwards, partly for curiosity, partly for love to the antiquity of the place, and partly because their generous spirits imitate the Heavenly and delight in motion. Whosoever is added to the sight of this Sepulchre, payeth nine Crowns to the Turkish Officers; so that this tribute only is worth to the Grand Signeur, eighty thousand Ducats to the Turkish Officers; so that this tribute only is worth to the Grand Signeur, eighty thousand Ducats to the Turkish Officers; so that this tribute only is worth to the Grand Signeur, eighty thousand Ducats to the Turkish Officers. The other building generally very mean and poor, if not contemptible. Built of flint stones, Low, and but one roof high; flat on the top for men to walk on, and fenced with battlements of a yard in height to preserve them from falling: the under-rooms no better than vaults, and where they repose themselves in the heat of the day. Some houses near the Temple of Solomon, in the Palace of Herod, adorned with Arches towards the Street, where Passenger may walke drye in a shewre of rain; but not many such: nor any thing but the ruins left of the ancient buildings. The whole circuit of it reduced to two or three miles; and yet to those that take a survey thereof from some Hills adjoining, where the ruins are not well discerned from the standing edifices, it affordeth to the eye no unpleasing prospect. And as the place is, such is the people, inhabited for the most most part by Artizans of the meanest quality, gathered together of the scum of divers Nations: the greatest part consisting of Moors, and Arabians; a few poor Christians, of all the Oriental Sects, which dwell there for devotion, and some Turks, who for the profit which they make of Christians, are content to stay in it. Inasmuch that when Robert Duke of Normandy, being then not cured of his wounds, was carried into this City on the backs of some of this rascal people; he called to a Gentleman of his, who was going for England, and bad him say, that he saw Duke Robert carried into Heaven on the backs of Devils.

Come we now to the Tribe of Levi, though indeed not reckoned for a Tribe, because not planted close together as the other were; nor had whole Provinces to themselves, but mingled and dispersed amongst the rest of the people; having forty eight Cities assigned them for their habitation, proportionably taken out of the other Tribes. So was it ordered by the Lord, partly that they being set apart for his service, might be at hand in every place to instruct the People; and partly to fulfill the Prophecy which he had spoken by Jacob, who had fore-signified to Levi at the time of his death, that he should be divided in Jacob, and scattered in Israel. The like fortune he had prophesied of Simeon also, of the accomplishment whereof, so far as it respected to him, and the dispersion of his Tribe, we have spoke before. Now to make up the number of the twelve Tribes, Joseph was divided into Ephraim and Manasse; and the Levites were reckoned to belong unto that Tribe, within whose Territory, that City which they dwelt in, stood. Their maintenance was from the tithes or tithes, the first fruits, offerings, and Sacrifices of the people: and as it is in the eighteenth of Joshua, v. the seventeenth, The Priesthood of the Lord was their Inheritance. There were of them four kinds. 1. Punes or Tirones, which from their childhood, till the five and twentieth year of their age, learned the duty of their offices. 2. Graduates, which having spent four years in the study of the Law, were able to answer and oppose in it; 3. Licenciates, who did actually exercise the Priestly function; And 4. Doctors (Rabbins they use to call them) who were the highest in degree. For maintenance of whom, they had (as before is said) the tithes, first fruits, and offerings of all the rest of the People; besides the 48 Cities assigned for their habitation: which last, with the several Territories appertaining to them, extending every way for the space of two thousand Cubits; seems to have been a greater proportion of it self, than any of the other Tribes (with reference to the small number of Levites) had in their possessions. Then for the Tithes, there was not only a full tenth set out of all kinds of increase; but such an imposition laid upon all sorts of grain, as came to more than a sixth part of the Crop it self. For first, out of six thousand bushels (and so accordingly in all after that proportion) a sixth part at least, (and that they termed the Terumah of the evil eye, or the niggards first fruits) was to be set forth as the first fruits of the threshing-floor; which was an hundred in the total. Out of the residue being five thousand and nine hundred bushels; the first Tithe paid unto the Levites, came to five hundred and ninety bushels; and of the residue, being five thousand three hundred and thirty bushels, five hundred thirty and one were paid for the second Tithe, unto the Priest, which ministered in the Holy Temple; yet so, that such as would decline the trouble of carrying it in kind unto Hierusalem, must pay the price thereof at the Priests own estimate. Laying which several sums together, it appears demonstrably, that of six thousand bushels (& sic de ceteris) there will accrew one thousand two hundred seventy and one bushels to the Priests and Levites; and but four thousand seven hundred seventy and nine to the Lord or Tenant; which is not fully a sixth part, as was said before. Then had they the first born of mankind and all unclean beasts, redeemed at a certain rate; the first fruits of Wine, Oyl, and Wool; the first fruits of the dough, and of the firstlings of clean Beasts (their blood being sprinkled on the Altar, and the fat offered for a burnt offering) the Flesh remained unto the Priest. They had also the meat-offerings, the sin-offerings, the trespass-offerings, the shake-offerings, the heave-offerings, and the Shew-bread: as also of all Eucharistical Sacrifices the breast and the shoulder; of Others the shoulder, the two cheeks, and the maw; and of the whole burnt-offering they received the Skin; besides the free gifts of the people, appearing thrice yearly before the Lord: and all this brought in unto them without charge or trouble. Which makes it evident, that they were far more liberally provided for, than the rest of the Tribes, though they had no whole Country allotted to them, as the others had. And so much for such parts of the Land of Palestine as were possessed in part, or wholly, by the Sons of Jacob; proceed we now to the Inheritance of the Sons of Esau.

6 IDUM EA

IDUMAE A, or the Land of EDOM, is bounded on the East and South, with Arabia Petraea; on the North with Judaa; on the West, with the Mediterranean Sea. So called from the Edomites, or Children of Esau, whose name is Edom, Gen. 36. 1. the Father of the Edomites, vers. 43; by whom it was planted and possessed: or as others say, from the Idumaei, a people of Arabia; who in a mutiny being forced for to forsake their Country, came and settled here. The first the more certain of the two, therefore I adhere to that.

therefore I adhere to that.

The Country towards the Sea side very fat and fruitful; but where it bendeth towards Arabia, exceeding mountainous and barren. Heretofore it afforded Balm, not now; but still it hath some store of Palmitres, for which much celebrated by some writers of ancient times; as Arbusto Palmarum divers of Idume, in the Poet Lucan. Sandy, and full of vast defars, for which, and for the want of water, it is thought unconquerable. For though they have many Wells there for the use of the natives, yet to them only are they known; and not obvious at all to the eyes of strangers; no not upon the strictest search that can be imagined. But all places are not so well furnished, as appeared by the sad condition which the Kings of Judah, Israel, and Edom were fallen into, when they led their Armies through the Defars of this Country, against the Moabites; finding herein no water for man or beast: insomuch that the King of Israel said, Alas, that the Lord hath called these three Kings together, to deliver them into the hand of Moab, 2 Kings 3. 10. Not otherwise delivered out of this perplexity: but by a miracle from Heaven: God sending them the next day an abundance of water, without wind or rain, or any other visible means, ver. 17, 20.

The people antiently rude and barbarous; greedy of change; in government, easily stirred to insurrections, and in love with tumults. Professed enemies to the Jews, till conquered by them; and when compelled by Hyrcanus to the Jewish Religion, they were at the best but false friends; and in the siege of Hierusalem by Titus, did them more mischief than all the Romans. At this time subject to the Turk, and differ not much in life and custom from the wild Arabians.

Rivers of note there can be none, where so little waters. One Lake it hath, though possibly it had been better, had they been without it, now small, and every day growing less; the passage being long since barred, which it had to the Sea. Antiently, though then narrow, it was two hundred furlongs, or five and twenty miles long; bordered on each side by hills of sand, which born by winds into the water did so thicken the fame, that it was not ealie to be discerned from the dry Island; insofmuch as whole Armies have been swallowed up in it. Thence called Barathrum by the Latines; The true name of it formerly was the Lake of Sydon. By the Italians it is now called Lago di Terefa, by the Natives Banyema; the utmost bound of Palestine, where it, joyneth on Egypt.

The chief Mountains of it, are, 1. Mount Seir, the first habitation of Eſau, after he left his dwelling in the Land of Canaan, to make room for Jacob, as is ſaid Gen. 36. 7. 8. Not called to unleſs by Anticipation (a thing not unſual in the Scriptures) till the coming of Eſau thither; the word Seir ſignifying hairy, or bristled, ſuch as Eſau is deſcribed to be, Gen. 27. 11. To this St. Hierom doth accord; deriving the name of Seir from Eſau, Sumpto ab autore nomine. His reaſon is, Seir quippe interpretatur hiſpidus & pilofus qualis Eſau fuit. So he in his Comment on Eſuiab, cap. 21. For the ſame cauſe, is the whole Countrey of Edom, ſometimes called Mount Seir in Scripture, by the name of this Mountain, as 2 Chron. 20. 10, 23. The ſecond hill of note is that called Caſſius, not far from the Lake of Sirbon, now nothing but an huge heap of ſand; formerly famous for a Temple, of Jupiter, and the Sepulchre of Pompey the Great; Who being baſely murdered here (after his defeat near Pharſalia by Julius Ceſar) by the command of Photomy the younger, King of Egypt, unto whom he fled (or rather by the command of Achilles who then governed his Counſells) by the piety of a private Souldier was here interred, in an obſcure and homely, but honeſt Sepulchre. The Sepulchre afterwards re-edified, and made more ſuitable to the man, by the Emperour Adrian. The piety of the Souldier not a whit the leſs for the coſt of the Emperour; in whoſe name Lucan had beſtowed this Epitaph, on that ſtill Monument.

Dicere Pompeii; quo condi maluit illum, Quam terra caruisse Socr.*

Which may be Englised to this purpose.

Here Magnus lies, Such, Fortune, is thy doom
That this vile earth should be great Pompeys Tomb.
In which even Cæsars self would rather have His Son-in-Law interred, than want a grave.

Places of most consideration in it, 1 Dinhabath, the City of Bela, the first King of Edom. 2 Anib, the City of Hadar, and 3 Pain, the City of Hadar, two others of the Kings hereof: which three are mentioned Gen. 36. 32. 35. 39. 4 Buzanna, placed here by Ptolomy, supposed to be the same with BeerSheba in the Tribe of Simoon, the utmost border South-wards of the Land of Canaan, of which more there. 5 Caparosa, 6 Gammariarts, and 7 Elasa, all of them mentioned by Ptolomy; which sheweth them to be of some consideration in those times, though now forgotten with the former. 8 Anthedon, on the South side of the River Bezor, opposite to Gaza in the Tribe of Sissian, which is situate on the Northern bank. A port Town, once of good repute, till desaced by Alexander King of the Jews: re-edified afterwards by Herod the Great, and named Agrippias, in honour of Agrippa the favourite and Son-in-law to Augustus Caesar. 9 Rosfa, a Fort of consequence, not far from Mafadad, before mentioned, when we were in Judea. 10 Raphia, taken by Herod in his way to relieve that Cattle. 11 Raphia, memorable for the great defeat which Ptolomy Philopater there gave unto Antiochus surnamed Magnus. 12 Rhinocurra, so called from a mishap which befell the inhabitants hereof, by mangling and desacing their nos. By Pliny and Strabo called Rhinocurula; and at this time Pharanica. Memorable for an old but ill-grounded tradition, that here the world was divided by lots, betwixt the posterity of Noah: and so considerable in the wars of the Holy Land, that it was strongly fortified by Baldin the first, to obstruct the passage of such forces as usually came out of Egypt, to aid the Turks. 13 Oftracene, now Stegioni, on the Sea-side beneath Anthedon, and that part of the Countrey which from Mount Cafius hath the name of Casotis: ascribed by Ptolomy to Egypt; but being they are both on the North of the Lake of Sirbon, more properly belonging to Palestina. But most of these being now buried in their ruins, there are left none but a few Castles and scattered Villages: the Villages inhabited for the most part by Arabians, the Castles Garrisoned by Turks. The chief of which lying on the Sea, in the road to Egypt, are 13 Hamones, a small Cattle not far from Gaza, used chiefly for a Toll-booth, to receive customs of such Merchants as pass that way. 14 Harifa, a small Cattle also, serving specially for the same use; but stronger, and of more importance because near the Sea, from which not above two miles distant; and for that cause garrisoned with an hundred Souldiers: environed with a few houses, by reason of the commodity of the water, which is sweet and wholesome; else little better than a Desert. 15 Catio, another Cattle, or rather Toll-booth, with a garrison of about 60 Souldiers in it: seated in a place so desert and unfruitfull, that nothing vegetable groweth in it, but a few starved Palm-trees. The water which they have there, so bad and brackish, though esteemed good enough for the common Souldiers; that all which the Captain drinketh is brought from 16 Tima, a Town upon the Sea-shore, about twelve miles distant, and the sail upon this Coast towards Egypt.

The first Inhabitants of this Country were the Horites, the Horites which dwelt in Mount Seir, as we read in Genesis cap. 14. vers. 6. that is to say, which dwelt in that hilly Country which afterwards was called Mount Seir. But whether it was so called from Esaus dwelling here, as is said before, or from Seir the Horite, mentioned Genesis 36. 20. as perhaps may probably be supposed; need not now come into dispute. Broken by Chedorlaomer, and his Associates, they were the more easily subdued by Esau. Who leaving the Land of Canaan to his Brother Jacob, Genesis 6. 7, 8. because those parts in which they dwelt did not afford them room enough for their several Cattel; came into this Country: and having destroyed the Horites from before them, succeeded in their habitations, and dwelt there in their stead even unto this day, Deut. 2. 22. This true, we find Esau in Mount Seir, before this remove: for it is said, that Jacob at his first coming out of Mesopotamia sent Messengers before him to Esau his Brother, unto the Land of Seir, the Country of Edom, Gen. 32. 3. And hence a question hath been moved, how Esau dwelling there before *Jacob*s coming, can be said to remove thither to make room for him. To this Sir Walter Raleigh and some others answer, that at the time when Jacob came out of Paddan Aram, Esaue dwelt in those parts of the Mountains which lye on the East of Jordan, called afterwards Galaad and Mount Hermon, by which Jacob must needs pass in his way to Canaan; which Mountains then were called by the name of Seir, and from thence Syrion by the Ziddiquis, or Phanicians in the ages following: from whence driven by the Amorites at such time as they vanquished those of Moab and Ammon, they were forced to fear themselves on the South of Canaan, where Moses found them. But with this I am by no means satisfied. For besides that it maketh Esau to carry a Mount Seir with him, wheresoever he went; it doth expressly differ from the plain words of Scripture, both in occasion, and the time of his settling there: the Victories which the Amorites had over the Ammonites and Moabites, being then fresh and newly gotten; when Moses with the children of Israel came into these parts; which was at the least 200 years after Esau did withdraw himself to the Land of Edom. And therefore I should rather think that Esaus finding himself distastied by his Father and Mother, in regard of his Canaanitishe marriages, and the hatred which he bore to Jacob, departed from them, and sojourned in the South parts amongst the Horites of Mount Seir; that thither Jacob sent his Messengers, to make peace between them, that the reconciliation being made, Esau returned unto the place where before he sojourned; and having brought thence his children, Cattel, and the rest of his substance, fixed himself again near the house of his Father: and finally, that on Isaacs death, finding his family increased, his herds and flocks augmented, and the rest of his substance also doubled by the death of his Father; he thought it fitt so to enlarge his dwelling and to remove once more to Edom. A thing not needfull to be done, had he dwelt in Galaad, Hermon, or any other part of that Mountainous Tract: considering the great distance betwixt those

- 2878 1 Saul, of the Tribe of Benjamin, the first King of the Hebrews, and an unlucky one to begin withall. 17.
 2890 2 David, the Son of Jesse, of the Tribe of Judah, the most Victorious King of the Hebrew Nation. 40.
 2930 3 Solomon, the Son of David, renowned for building of the Temple. The Kingdom afterward divided into Judah, and Israel.

The Kings of JUDAH.

- 2971 1 Rehoboam, the son of Solomon the first King of Judah. 17.
 2988 2 Abijah, the Son of Rehoboam. 3.
 2991 3 Asa, the son of Abijah, discomfited the numerous Army of Zerah, the Ethiopian or Arabian King.
 3031 4 Jehoshaphat, the Son of Asa, a great Reformer of the State, both Ecclesiastical and Civil. 35.
 3056 5 Jehoram, the son of Jehoshaphat. 8.
 3064 6 Ahaziah, the son of Jehoram by Athaliah his wife, the Sister of Ahab King of Israel. 1.
 3065 7 Athaliah, the Daughter of Omri, and Sister of Ahab, having destroyed the Regal race of the house of David, usurped the Kingdom for 7 years.
 3072 8 Josiah, the only surviving heir of the house of David, restored by Jehoiahah the Priest, to the Throne of his Ancestors. 40.
 3112 9 Amaziah, the son of Josiah, vanquished by Josiah King of Israel, and a breach forced throw the walls of Hierusalem. 29.

The Kings of ISRAEL.

A. M.

- 2971 1 Jeroboam, the Son of Nebat, of the Tribe of Ephraim, the first King of Israel. 22.
 2993 2 Nadab, the son of Jeroboam. 2.
 2995 3 Baasha, of the Tribe of Issachar, having slain Nadab, reigned in his stead. 24.
 3019 4 Ela, the son of Baasha. 2.
 3021 5 Zimri, a King of 7 days only, the murderer of Ela, and his own executioner.
 6 Omri, the Captain of the host, who removed the Regal seat from Tirzah to Samaria. 8.
 3029 7 Ahab, the son of Omri, and husband of Jezebel, a Phœnician Princess.
 3051 8 Ahaziah, the son of Ahab. 2.
 3053 9 Jehoram, the Brother of Ahaziah. 12.
 3065 10 Jehu, the Captain of the host, vanquished and slew Jehoram, reigning in his stead. 28.
 3093 11 Jehoahaz, the son of Jehu. 17.
 3110 12 Josiah, the son of Jehoahaz. 16.
 3126 13 Jeroboam II. the son of Josiah. 41.
 3178 14 Zachariah, the Son of Jeroboam the second, after an Interregnum of 11 years succeeded.

- 3141 10 Azariah, the son of Amaziah, called also Uzziah; smote with a Leprosie by the Lord. 52.
 3192 11 Iotham, the son of Uzziah, or Azariah. 16.
 3208 12 Ahaz, the son of Jotham, in whose time, and on whose occasion, the Kingdom of Damascus was ruined by Tiglath Pileser King of Assyria; and the Tribes on the farther side of Jordan led into captivity. 16.
 3224 13 Hezekiah, the Son of Ahaz, a religious Prince; in whose time the Kingdom of the ten Tribes was destroyed by the Assyrians; and that of Assyria, by the Babylonians.

- 3253 14 Manasseh, the wicked Son of the good King Hezekiah, restored Idolatry, and put to death the Prophet Esaiah, for opposing his irreligious courses. 55.
 3308 15 Amon, the son of Manasseh, and as bad as he; slain by a conspiracy of his Servants, when he had reigned but two years only.
 3310 16 Josiah, the son of Amon, a right godly King; unfortunately slain by Pharaoh Necho King of Egypt, at the battle of Megiddo. 31.
 3341 17 Jehoahaz, the son of Josiah, a King of three months only, deposed and sent Prisoner by Pharaoh Necho, to Riblah in the land of Hamath, since called Antiochia.
 18 Jehoiakim, the son of Josiah, and half Brother of Jehoahaz, advanced unto the Throne by Necho, who changed his name from Eliakim, by which he formerly was called, into that of Jehoiakim. 11.
 3351 19 Jehoiachin, or Iechoniah, the son of Jehoiakim, at the end of three months led captive unto Babylon, with his Wives and Mother, and the great Officers of the Realm by Nebuchadnezzar.
 20 Zedekiah, another of the sons of Josiah, and brother by the whole blood of Jehoahaz, made King by Nebuchadnezzar in the place of Jehoiachin, or Iechoniah; his name being changed from Mattaniah, by which called before. But rebelling against his Benefactor, contrary to the Counsel of the Prophet Jeremy, he was taken Prisoner in the 11th. year of his Reign, Hierusalem destroyed, the Temple ruined, and the People carried Captive to the Land of Babylon, A. M. 3362. where they lived in exile 70 years. Which time expired, Cyrus the King of the Persians, gave them leave to return to their Country, and to re-edifie their City and Temple. Which work being finished, by the encouragement of Ezra, Nehemiah, and Zorobabel; and the Nation again settled in some part of their old possessions; they were after governed by their High-Priests, and the Council of the Elders, which they called the Sanhedrim, the High-Priest bearing the chief stroke, and being looked on as a man of the greatest power. And therefore I will here subjoin the Catalogue of so many of them, as governed the affairs of this Countrey, from the Return of the People from the Captivity of Babylon, till the time of the Maccabees; who managed the estate hereof both as Priests and Princes, till their subjection by the Romans.

The High-Priests of the JEWS. after the Captivity.

A. M.

- 3427 1 Josuah, the High-Priest at the time of the Return, assistant to Zorobabel in re-building the Temple, which he lived not to finish; though continuing (as some say) in the Government 100 years. But I believe rather, that the names of his Successors being lost, the whole time is ascribed to him.
 3530 2 Jehoiakim, said to be the son of Josuah, in whose time, by the diligence of Ezra and Nehemiah, the Temple was finished, and the worship of God restored.
 3580 3 Jonathan, or Johanan. 30.
 3610 4 Jaddus, who entertained Alexander the Great, coming to Hierusalem (of whom more anon) the Brother of that Manasseh; for whose sake, and on whose occasion, the Temple on Mount Gurazim, was built by Sanballat, with the leave of Alexander. 20.
 3630 5 Onias succeeded Jaddus, as Jaddus had done Jonathan; not by birth (as formerly) but by the Election of the People.
 3641 6 Simon, surnamed Justus. 9.
 3660 7 Elenzer, the Brother of Simon. 32.

- 3692 8 Menelaus, the brother of Eleazer, and Simon.
 3718 9 Onias II. 14.
 3732 10 Simon II. 10.
 3742 11 Onias III. the son of Simon the 2d.
 3787 12 Isafon, the Brother of Onias the 3d.
 3789 13 Menelaus II. the Brother of Isafon, in whose time the Temple was profaned by the Syrians, at the command of Antiochus Epiphanes.
 3794 14 Alcimus, under whose Government the Maccabees began to appear in defence of their Countrey, and Religion, by whom succeeded in the office of High-Priest, after his decease. Among these none of greater note than Iaddus, High-Priest at such time as Alexander the Great having conquered Syria, marched towards Hierusalem, and was encountred by this Iaddus in his Priestly vestments; assuring him in the name of the most high God, and making it demonstrable from the Prophecy of Daniel, that he should prosper in his enterprize against the Persians. An hope which Alexander did embrace with the greater confidence, because (as he affirmed to Parmenio his chief Commander) he had once at Diu, a City of Macedonia, seen in a dream or vision such a person as Iaddus was, so habited, and professing the same one God; by whom he was encouraged to pursue the action which he had in hand, with assurance of Victory. And upon this the Jews were so much favoured by him, that he gave them leave to live according to their own Laws, and to enjoy with freedom their own Religion. But it held only for his own time. For shortly after his decease, they were on both sides plagued by the Kings of Egypt, and Syria, who ransacked their Cities, slaughtered their People, made havock of their goods, and compelled many of them both to eat of forbidden meats, and offer sacrifice unto Idols. At the last God raised up Mattathias, (descended from Asmonens a Priest of the rank of Jorab) and his five sons to resist these insolencies; who in the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes King of Syria, undertook the protection of the People, and gave unto the Syrians many notable overthrows; inasmuch that the Jews made choice of Judas surnamed Maccabaeus (the eldest of the five brethren) for their Prince or Governour.

The ASMONEAN Princes of JEWRY.

A. M.

- 3799 1 Judas Maccabaeus, the third son of Matthias above mentioned, one of the nine Worthies, vanquished three great and puissant Armies of the Syrians, conducted by Alcimus, Gorgias, and Lysias, men of great renown, being Commanders of the forces of Antiochus Epiphanes, before mentioned.
 3805 2 Jonathan, the Brother of Judas vanquished the forces of Bacchides and Alcimus, Captains of Demetrius King of Syria; and after many notable exploits and deeds of Arms, was treacherously murdered by Tryphon, aspiring at that time to the Syrian Diadem.
 3823 3 Simon, the elder Brother of Judas and Jonathan, subdued the Cities of Gaza, Joppa, and Iamnia, and cleared Judea of the Syrians; perfidiously slain in the course of his fortune, by his Son-in-law Ptolomy. 8.
 3831 4 Johannes Hyrcanus, the third son of Simon (his two other Brethren being in the power of Ptolomy) succeeded in the Government. He destroyed the Temple on Mount Garzim, conquered Idumaea, and subdued the Idumeans, compelling them to be Circumcised; transferred the war into Syria, and dying left the Sovereignty to his eldest son Aristobolus.

The ASMONEAN Kings of JUDAH.

- 3862 1 Aristobolus, caused himself to be Crowned, and was the first King of Judah after the Babylonian captivity; he starved his mother, and slew Antigonus his Brother.
 3863 2 Alexander, the Brother of Aristobolus, exceedingly enlarged the Kingdom of Jewry; by the conquest of Idumaea, and some parts of Syria; but was withal so great a Tyrant, that he causelessly slew of his own Subjects fifty thousand in battel; and commanded 800 of his principal enemies to be hanged before his face; he left behind him two sons: Hyrcanus who was at last slain by Herod after all his troubles, leaving no issue male behind him; and Aristobolus the father of Alexander, and of Antigonus, of whom more anon, of which two Alexander was the Father of another Aristobolus, the most beautiful Prince of all his time, and of Mariamne the Wife of Herod, by whose command they were most villainously murdered.
 3890 3 Alexandra, by some called Salome, the Wife of Alexander, following the counsel of her husband at the time of his death, committed her self and her Children into the hands of the Pharisees, then in great power and credit amongst the people; by means whereof she procured an honourable burial for her husband, obtained the Kingdom for her self, and finally left it to her Children, whose disagreements caused the ruine of this famous Family.

3899 4 Aristobolus,

Jewry.

- 3899 4 Aristobolus II. the younger Son of Alexander, an active Prince, and beloved of the Military Men, having presently after the death of his Mother possessed himself of the greatest part of the Forts and Castles by the forced consent of Hyrcanus his elder brother, succeeded in the Kingdom and High Priesthood also; both which he held with great trouble and opposition both from his brother and the Romans, whom most imprudently they call'd in to decide the Controversie. By Pompey sent Prisoner unto Rome (with Alexander and Antigonus his two Sons) he escaped thence and rais'd a new Army for the recovery of his Kingdom; but being forced to yield himself to Gabinius one of Pompey's Lieutenants, he was sent back again to Rome, where he dyed in Prison, having reigned three years and six months.
 3903 5 Hyrcanus II. a Prince of weak parts, and not fit for Government, was made High Priest in the first-year of his Mothers reign, but dispossessed of that dignity by Aristobolus his younger brother. Restored again by the favour of Pompey, he was again disturb'd in his possession by Alexander the eldest Son of Aristobolus, who escaping out of Rome, had raised some Forces, and began to dispute the Title with him, but was soon after discomfited by Gabinius afore-mentioned, and slain by Scipio, another of great Pompey's Captains. After the death of Aristobolus, which hapned in the year 3903. Hyrcanus was lookt on by the People, not only as their High Priest, but as their Prince and King, commonly called so by Josephus in the course of his History. His affairs managed for the most part by Antipater (an Idumean born, and the Father of Herod) his constant and most faithful friend in all his troubles, who govern'd the Estate with great care and prudence. But he being made away by poison, Antigonus the younger Son of Aristobolus, set on foot his Title to the Kingdom, and drew in an Army of the Parthians to make it good; by whose aid having treacherously inslaved Hyrcanus, he cut off his ears (to make him incapable of the Priesthood for the time to come) and sent him Prisoner to Babylon; taking upon himself the title of King, though never acknowledged for such by the Jewish Nation; but long he did not please himself with that title neither: For being besieged in Jerusalem by Herod, then newly created King of the Jews by the Roman Senate, and by him taken Prisoner in the sack of that City, he was sent in bonds to Mark Antony, and by him beheaded. As for Hyrcanus, the rightful Prince of this Countrey, he remained Prisoner for a time amongst the Parthians, till hearing of the death of Antigonus, he returned into Jewry, and lived contentedly under the Government of Herod, of whose greatness he had laid the first foundation, and was by him in fine most wickedly murdered.

The Idumean Kings and Princes of Jewry.

A. M.

- 3940 1 Herod the Ascalonite, surnamed the Great, son to Antipater the Idumean, was by the power of Mark Antony created, and by Augustus confirmed King of Jewry; under whom that Kingdom was more enlarged, and in greater splendour, than ever it had been in since the time of David. A Prince of great magnificence, but of greater vices. During his reign, the Scepter being now departed from Judah, the Lord CHRIST was born.
 6 2 Archelaus, eldest son of Herod at the time of his death, succeeded with the title of King but in truth and reality possessed only a Tetrarchie, or fourth part of the Kingdom, though the best and largest of the four, containing Judea, Samaria and Idumaea. The rest of Herods Kingdom was divided into three other Tetrarchies i. e. the Tetrarchie of Galilee and Perea, given Herod Antipas; Secondly that of Ituraea, given to Philip, another of the sons of Herod; And thirdly, That of Abilene, conferred on Lysanias. Banished into France, his Tetrarchie was made a Province of the Roman Empire; governed by Pontius Pilate, at our Saviours Passion.
 16 3 Herod II. surnamed Antipas, Tetrarch of Galilee and Perea, on the banishment of Archelaus, succeeded him, as chief of the Herodian family, but not in his Tetrarchie, and at last followed him in his banishment also. This is he who murdered John Baptist, and in whose time CHRIST suffered.
 40 4 Herod III. surnamed Agrippa, in honour of Agrippa the son in law, and most trusty favourite of Augustus Caesar Nephew to Herod the Great, by his son Aristobolus begotten on Mariamne of the race of the Asmonees was by Caligula first invested in the Tetrarchie of his Uncle Philip, with the title of King, and next in that of Antipas also; and finally by Claudius, in that also of Lysanias; some part of the Tetrarchie of Archelaus being added unto his Dominions. This was the man that murdered James, and imprisoned Peter; and in the end was stricken by an Angel, and devoured by Worms.
 47 5 Agrippa Minor, son of Herod Agrippa, was he before whom St. Paul pleaded in defence of the Gospel; and the last which had the title of King of the Jews: for in his time the City of Hierusalem was destroyed by Titus; and the whole Kingdom made a Province of the Roman Empire. Anno 73.

And here it is to be observed, that when Salmanassar had subdued and captivated the ten Tribes of Israel, he sent new Colonies of his own to plant this Countrey; that so fruitful and well-situate a part of his Empire might yield its just tribute, and not lye open to the fury of the next Invader. But the Romans not having (it seemeth) so much policy or providence, as those whom they accounted barbarous; having laid the Countrey desolate, left it unfurnished of new Colonies: whereby the Persians, next the Saracens, and and after them the Turks, entering the Roman Empire at this door, have successively driven the Romans out of the whole house. Now that we may the better perceive how the Romans had weakened, and almost utterly rooted out the Jewish Nation, we will relate some of their particular massacres: which were not more cruelly inflicted on them by the Enemy, than justly deserved by themselves; they wishing, though (I suppose) not desiring, that the innocent Blood of our Saviour should be on them and their children. First then the Inhabitants of Cesarea slew of the Jews in one day, about 20000, and such as fled were took and imprisoned by Florus the Roman Lieutenant of Judea. To revenge this slaughter, the Jews set upon the Syrians; in which skirmish 13000 of them were slain. The people of Alexandria put 50000 of them to the sword; they of Damascus, 10000; Antonius a Roman Captain, slew in Afalon 10000 of them; and Cestius another Captain, 8040 persons. Now to come to the wars here managed by Vespasian; This Vespasian in the siege of Aphaca, slew and took prisoners 17230 persons; In Samaria, 11600 persons; in Isotopata, 42200 persons: In Toppa, so many killed and drowned themselves, that the Sea threw up again 4200 dead bodies; and the rest so totally perished, that there remained none to carry tidings unto Hierusalem, of the loss of the Town. In the City of Tarichea, were slain, and made captives, 45000 persons, besides those which were given to the King Agrippa. In Gamala there perished 90000, and none left alive but only two women: In Gasfala 5000 men dyed by the sword; in the City of Gadera there were slain 32200, besides an infinite number which had drowned themselves. In Hierusalem it self, there died 1100000 of them, partly by the sword, and partly by the famine; the worse Enemy of the two; there were found 2000 in privies and sinks; and 9700 taken prisoners, inasmuch that 50 Jews were sold for a penny. So punctual was the Divine Justice in retaliating to this wretched people, according to the measure of their iniquities; that they who bought their Saviour for thirty pence, should be sold at thirty for a penny in the open market.

Now that Hierusalem was able to contain such a number of people, is evident, in that when Cestius was Lieutenant of Jerry, the High Priest did at his request, number the people which came thither to eat the Paschal Lamb; and found them to be two millions and seven hundred thousand living souls, all found and purified: For to Lepers, or men having a flux of seed, or women in their monthly terms, or to strangers, it was not lawful to eat of it. And when Titus laid siege to the City, it was in the feast of the Passover, when most of the people were there assembled; God (as it were) having thus imprisoned them. All these massacres, besides divers others which I have omitted, and infinite number which were slain in the fields and villages, which drowned themselves, and which were privately made away, amounting all to almost 2000000 of people, happened in the compass of four years; beginning at the 12 of Nero, and ending at the 2 of Vespasian; yet was not the whole Nation rooted out, till the year 136. For then this miserable people, having stirred two notable rebellions; the one under Trajan, and the last under Adrian the Emperors: were generally banished their native Country, and never again permitted to inhabit it, otherwise than as strangers. After this dissolution, the Jews were dispersed all over the world, and especially in Spain, where Adrian commanded many of them to dwell: yet they found everywhere so little favour, that having divers times been put to grievous murther and ransoms, they were at last thrust out of most of the Kingdoms of Europe also. They were banished out of England by Edward the first, Anno 1290. Out of France, by Philip the Fair, 1307. Out of Spain by Ferdinand and the Catholique, 1492. Out of Portugal by Emmanuel, 1497. Out of Naples, and Sicily, by Charles the fifth, 1539. Yet are they found in great numbers in the Romish parts of Germany and Poland, in most Cities of Italy, especially Rome it self, where are no less than 15000, or 20000 of them; and also in the Popes Country of Avignon. The reason why they are permitted to live thus under the Popes nose, is pretended to be an expectation of their conversion, which is a meer pretence indeed; the true reason being the benefit hence arising to his Holiness's Coffers: the hopes of their conversion being very small, and the means less. For besides the scandal, Idolatrie & acceptum, by the Papists fond worshipping of Images, so peremptorily contrary to the first Table of the Law: they are not permitted to see any Book of Christian Religion, nor so much as the New Testament. And (which worketh much upon men of their metal) because at their conversion they must quit all their goods unto the Church, as being ill gotten, and by consequence the works of the Devil, which in their Baptism they promise to renounce. They have also a Synagogue at Amsterdam, and are pretty thick spread over the Dominions of the Turks: who notwithstanding so hate them for crucifying of CHRIST, that they used to say in the dereliction of a thing, I would I might dye a Jew. Neither will they permit a Jew to turn Turk, unless he be first baptized. And though their multitudes be so great both in Theffalonica and Constantinople, that it is conceived they do amount to the number of 160000 persons; yet are they not only contemned and hated, but there, and in all other places of their habitation, upon every tumultuous assembly of the common people, and constantly every Easter, where so ever they be, in danger of death. Inasmuch that if a Jew do but stir out of doors betwixt Mandic Thursday at noon, and Easter Eve at night; the Christians of the East amongst whom they dwell (though far fewer in number) will be sure to stone them; because at that time, they battered, derided, and in fine crucified their Saviour. Hated in all the parts of the Turks Dominions, because employed as Publicans in gathering and enhancing the publick tributes, which they exact with all severity that may be, and improve unto the most. And no less hated in all parts of the Christian world, as Enemies to the Cross of CHRIST: so unreclaimably addicted to their ancient Judaism, and so abhorring from the conversation of other men; that it is not possible they should reap any other harvest, than contempt and scorn, from those amongst whom they dwell.

To give you their Character in brief; They are a people which know how to comply with the times, and the condition which they live in; especially if their profit be concerned in it: reviled like Dogs, and used like slaves, yet never shew so much as an angry countenance. A Nation which will thrive where so ever ever they come, but most by usury and brokerage; not lending any thing but on pawns, and those once forfeited, never more redeemable. The best of both Sexes said to have an unfavourable rankness, not incident (if not caused by stultifness) to other people: from whom as different in their habit, as in their Religion. And as for that, they retain still Circumcision, as the badge & cognizance of their Nation; but mingled with many ceremonies not prescribed by the Law, nor observed by the Antients: placing a void chair for the Prophet Elias, whom they believe to be present, though unseen at the solemnity. And upon this they are so besotted, that they conceive the female sex incapable of eternal life, because not capable of Circumcision; and therefore use to name them with no other ceremony, than at the six weeks end to have some young wenches lift up the Cradle with the child in it; which she that standeth at the head, giveth the name unto: Of their Sabbath too extremely doating, that they have added to the superstitions left them by the Pharisees: And herein they are so precise, that if a Jew travel on the Friday, and in the evening fall so short of his journey's end, that it amounts to more than to 2000 Cubits, or six Furlongs, which they account a Sabbath-days journey, there must he sit him down and keep his Sabbath, though in a wood, or field, or the high-way side, without fear of wind or weather, of Thieves or Robbers, and without taking order for meat or drink: periculo latronum praedantium, omni penuria item omni cibi potusq; neglectis, as Buxtorfius hath it. And so far have they gone in despite of Christ, as to declare it unlawful to lift the Ox or Ass out of a ditch; permitted in the strictest times of Pharisaical rigor. So pertinacious in retaining the difference of meats and drinks, that they will by no means sit at the same table with other men, and so precise in the dressing of it, that they will eat of no flesh but of their own killing only; and that too with such cautions and reservations, that if any of the entrails be corrupt or dislocated, they will sell the whole beast to the Christians for a very trifle; Beneficial in that only to the neighbouring Christians. Wine they forbear except it be of their own planting, not so much out of dislike of that liquor, for they are generally good fellows, and love their bellies; as for fear the wine should be baptized: a Ceremony much used in the Eastern parts. Of the coming of their Messiah so full of hopes, that their is no great Warrior stirring, but they look upon him as the man; till some sad tragedy or other, which they suffer under that persuasion, makes them see their error: promising to themselves whensoever he cometh, a restitution of their Kingdom; and such felicity therein, in the literal sense of some Texts of Scripture, which carry in them a more mystical and sacred meaning. That in good time (but Gods, not theirs) they shall be made partakers of the several blessings which those Texts do speak of, is both the hope and wish of all pious men; who cannot choose but grieve to behold the natural branches, so long dismembered and cut off from the tree of life. And this they neither hope nor wish for but on some fair grounds, presented to them by St. Paul: who said expressly, that when the fulness of the Gentiles is once come in, that then all Israel shall be saved; Rom. 11. 25, 26. The words are to plainly positive that they need no commentary. Or if they did, we have the general consent of the Antients, besides the constant current of most modern Writers; who cherish the glad hopes of their conversion to the Gospel, which the Apostle doth there aim at. Origen, Athanasius, Hierome, Augustine, Chrysostome, for the primitive times; Beda and Hugo Cardinalis, in the times succeeding; Gorran, and Thomas Aquinas, for those of Rome; Calvin, Beza, Balinger, and Peter Martyr for the Reformed Churches; besides divers others of great note, so expound that Text. Nor want there other Texts of Scripture to affirm as much; which he that doth desire to see, may find them with the explications of most Christian Writers, in a Book writ by Doctor Wilket, entituled De generali & novissima Judaeorum vocatione; and thither I refer the more curious Reader. Out of all I shall take these words of Peter Martyr, written on that passage of St. Paul to the Romans, viz. Non ita Judaei perierunt ut nulla de illorum salute spes supersit: The Jews (saith he) are not so wholly fallen from the favour of God, but that there still remain some hopes of their salvation. Of their Salvation then by the Gospel of Christ, when the fulness of the Gentiles is once come in, we conceive good hopes; but whether there be any of their restitution to their temporal Kingdom, is a further question; and not so clearly evidenced in the Book of God, though there be somewhat in that Book which may seem to intimate it. That the opinion of being restored by the Messiah to that temporal power which was taken from them by the Romans, was prevalent as well amongst Christ's Disciples, as the rest of the Jews; is, as I take it, clear enough in the holy Gospel. In such a Kingdom and no other, did the two sons of Zebedee desire to sit on both hands of their Master; and the same was it and no other, which all of them expected, as appeareth by the words of Cleophas, Luke 24. 21. that Christ should have restored unto them. We thought said he, that this would have proved the man, that should have redeemed Israel. Redeemed Israel? from what? from sin and Satan, or the curse and bondage of the Law? Nor so, ἀπὸ τοῦ ἰσχυροῦ δουλείας; but from the yoke of vassalage, which the Romans had so lately imposed on them, say the Fathers rightly. Touching the same it was that they moved him saying, Lord, wilt thou at this time, restore again the Kingdom of Israel? Act. 1. 6. In answer whereunto our Saviour makes them no denial, as unto the thing, nor tells them that they never must expect such a restoration; but only puts them off as unto the time, and bids them rest themselves on the pleasure of God the Father, in whose hands the disposing of all Kingdoms was. It is not for you (saith he) to know the times and seasons, which the Father hath in his own power, ver. 7. By which answer (as it seems to me) there is a possibility of restoring them to their Kingdom also; though not in the ad vñ, at that very instant when they were most desirous to have it done, or at any other time fit for them to know; that being a secret, which the Father hath reserved to himself alone.

But leaving these speculations of a restitution of the Throne of Israel, and the great power and privileges it may then enjoy; let us look back on the estate in which it flourished in the former times, when the forces and Revenue of it were at the highest. And first for the Revenues, they amounted in the time of Solomon (as is said 2 Chron. 9. 13.) to 666 Talents of Gold, besides the benefits of his Customs and Impositions; which cometh to two Millions, and nine hundred ninety and seven thousand pounds; of yearly income; income. A vast sum for such a little Kingdom. Nor can we reckon them at less, if they were not greater in the time of David: of whom it is affirmed, 1 Chron. 22. 14. that he left to Solomon an hundred thousand Talents of Gold, and ten hundred thousand Talents of Silver, towards the building of the Temple; besides three thousand Talents of Gold, and seven thousand Talents of Silver, formerly deposited for that purpose, as is said 1 Chron. 29. 4. Which if it be computed at the ordinary rate of a Jew's Talent, reckoning a Talent of Gold at four thousand and five hundred pound; and a Talent of Silver, at three hundred seventy five pound; will amount in our money to eight hundred and forty millions, and one hundred and twenty five thousand pounds. So vast a sum, that it had been sufficient to have built a Temple of pure Gold and Silver, far greater than the Temple of Solomon, without other materials. I conceive therefore with our learned and industrious Brerewood, that by the Talent in those places we are to understand a far lesser sum than the ordinary Hebrew Talents: which whether it doth there signify a Sicle only, which is half a Crown of English money, as Enopemus, cited by Eusebius, was of opinion; or that every Talent of Gold, came to three Golden Crowns of Athens, which maketh forty five shillings of English money, as Julius Pollux hath it in his Onomasticon; I am not able to determine. But measuring it by the last estimate, which I more approve of, it will amount to two millions and two hundred ninety and five thousand pounds: a vast sum for a King to leave in ready money, which was always exercised in war. And though I do not find expressly what the Revenues of Judah might amount unto, after the division: yet by one circumstance I find them to be very great. For it is written, 2 King. 18. 14. that the yearly tribute imposed upon Hzechiah, by the King of Assyria, was three hundred Talents of Silver, and thirty Talents of Gold; amounting (according to the ordinary Hebrew Talent,) which questionless is there intended) to two hundred forty seven thousand and five hundred pounds of English money: and therefore probably his ordinary Revenue must be thrice as much above that tribute; Else the Assyrian had not left him a subsistence for a King to live on. Nor can I think that the Revenues of this Crown were less to Herod, than formerly to Solomon, or David: considering his vast expences, the many and magnificent Structures which he brought to perfection, the immeasurable donatives bestowed upon Augustus, Livia, and the Court of Rome, together with the large Legacies he gave at the time of his death; not paralleled by any King before or since, though of a larger and more ample Territory than he stood possessed of.

What forces the Kings of the Hebrews were able to bring into the field, may best be estimated by the muster which David made, when he numbered the People: the enrolment of such as were able to bear arm, and fit for service, coming in all to five hundred thousand fighting men, in Judah only, and eight hundred thousand men, in the Tribes of Israel. 'Tis true, that David never brought into the field so vast a multitude; but when the Kingdoms were divided, and war denounced betwixt Jeroboam and Abijah, we find almost the whole number brought into the field: that is to say, eight hundred thousand on the side of Jeroboam, the King of Israel; and four hundred thousand by Abijah, the King of Judah. After this, out of that small Kingdom, Asa the Son of Abijah, being invaded by Zarah the Arabian or Ethiopian, advanced an Army of five hundred and eighty thousand men which was more then the enrolment made in the time of David. An infinite proportion for so small a Kingdom; and were it not avouched in the holy Scriptures, far above belief: had not that God who said to Abraham, that his seed should be as the stars of Heaven for multitude, been able to have made it good.

As to the story and affairs of this Country since the time of Adrian, the Jews being all expelled their native Soil, and Christianity in fine prevailing over all those parts; it was inhabited as the rest of the Empire was, by men of that Religion only: in this Country so advanced and countenanced, that Hilena the Mother of Constantine, is reported to have built in it no less than two hundred Temples and Monasteries, in places of most note for the miracles of Christ our Saviour, or the dwelling of some of his Disciples. In the year 615. the Persians, under the conduct of Chosroes their King, became Masters of it; and possessed themselves of Hierusalem also: expelled thence by the valour and good fortune of the Emperor Heraclius, who recovering the Cross on which Christ suffered, out of the hands of the Pagans, carried it with as great a triumph into Constantinople, as David once did the Ark into Hierusalem; occasioning thereby the annual Festival on the 4th of September, called Holy-Cross-day, or Exaltatio Sancte Crucis. But this glory and rejoicing did not long continue: For within twenty years after the recovery of this City from the power of the Persians, it was again conquered and subdued by Homar, or Aumar, Caliph of the Saracens, An. 637. Under this yoke the captivated Christians had long suffered, when they changed the Tyrant, but not the tyranny: the Turks about the year 1079. overcoming the Saracens, and domineering in their stead. Twenty years did the Christians languish under this oppression, when one Peter an Hermit, travelling for devotion to the Holy Land, and being an eye-witness of the miseries under which they groaned; at his return, made his addresses to Pope Urban the second, acquainting him with the sad condition of the poor Christians in those Countries. A Council thereupon is called at Clermont in France, where the Pope (willing to employ the Christian Princes farther off, that he might the better play his game at home;) did so effectually advance and endear the business, that no fewer than three hundred thousand fighting men, under several Leaders, undertook the service. And it prospered so well with them in the first beginning, that having beaten the Turks out of Asia Minor, taken the great City of Antioch, and most of the strong Towns of Syria; they incamped before Hierusalem, and in short time took it, An. 1099. after it had been four hundred years and upwards, in the power of the Infidels. The City being thus gained, was offered with the title of King, to Robert Duke of Normandy, Son of William the Conquerour: but he upon the hopes of the Kingdom of England, refused that honour, never prospering, as it was observed, after that refusal. Godfrey of Bouillon, Duke of Lorraine, had the next offer of it, which with a religious joy he accepted of, though on the day of his inauguration he refused the Crown: affirming that it was not fit for a Christian Prince, to wear in that City of a Crown of Gold, where the Redeemer of the World wore a Crown of Thorns. The

The Kings of Hierusalem.

- 1099 1 Godfrey of Bouillon, Duke of Lorraine.
- 1100 2 Baldwin of Lorraine, brother of Godfrey, won Ptolemais, and many other Cities of Syria.
- 1118 3 Baldwin II. surnamed of Bruges, Cousin of Godfrey, and Baldwin, the Former Kings; overcame the Sultan of Damascus, and enlarged his Kingdom by the addition of Tyre.
- 1131 4 Fulk, Earl of Anjou, having married Milliscent the daughter of Baldwin the 2. succeeded after his decease; unfortunately killed with a fall from his Horse.
- 1142 5 Baldwin III. Son of Fulk and Milliscent, fortified Gaza against the Caliph of Egypt; and recovered Panade from the King of Damascus.
- 1164 6 Almericus, the Brother of Baldwin the 3d. so distressed the great Caliph of Egypt, that he was forced to call in the Turks to aid him; by whom slain, and his Kingdom transferred on Sarracon, the Turkish General.
- 1174 7 Baldwin IV. Son of Almericus, overthrew Saladine the victorious King of the Turks in a fight near Ascalon, and valiantly defended his Dominions.
- 1185 8 Baldwin V. Son of Sibyll the Sister of Baldwin the 4th. by William Marquess of Montferrat; unnaturally poisoned by his own mother, having reigned only five months, to make way for her second husband, called
- 1185 9 Guy of Lusignan, the last King of Hierusalem, that had the possession of the City, during whose time Saladine the Sultan of Egypt won that Kingdom, Anno 1187. which his Successors defended against all invasions, till the year 1517. in which Selim the first, Emperor of the Turks, added the Holy Land, together with Egypt, to his Empire. When Hierusalem was taken by the Christians, it is said that the German Emperours name was Fredericus; the Popes; Urbanus; the Hierosolymitan Patriarch, Heraclius; and that so also were they called, when the Christians again lost it. This is the conceit of Roger Hoveden, in the life of Henry the second; but how it can agree with Chronology, I do not see.

After the taking of Hierusalem by Sultan Saladine, the Christians retired their forces into some of the other Towns of the Holy-land; which they made good against the Enemy: and defended them under the government of these three Kings following, viz.

- 10 Conrade Marquess of Montferrat, husband of Isabel, the daughter of Almericus King of Hierusalem.
- 11 Henry Earl of Campaigne, second husband of Isabel.
- 12 John di Brenne, husband of Mary, or Toland as some call her, daughter of Conrade and Isabel, the last Christian King that ever had possession in Syria or Palestine: inhabited ever since by *Moor*s and Arabians; few Christians, and not many Turks but such as be in garrisons only. Toland the daughter of this John di Brenne, was wife to Frederick King of Naples, who in her right intitled himself King of Hierusalem: and so now do the Kings of Spain, as heirs unto, and possessors of the Kingdom of Naples. Concerning which title it would not be amiss to insert this story. When the wars in Queen Elizabeth's time, were hot between England and Spain, there were Commissioners of both sides appointed to treat of peace. They met at a Town of the French Kings, and first it was debated in what tongue the negotiation should be handled. A Spaniard thinking to give the English Commissioners a shrewd gird, proposed the French tongue as most fit: it being a language which the Spaniards were well skilled in; and for these Gentlemen of England, I suppose (saith he) that they cannot be ignorant of the language of their fellow-subjects; their Queen is Queen of France, as well as of England. Nay in faith my Masters, replied Doctor Dale, (a Civil Lawyer, and one of the Masters of Requests) the French tongue is too vulgar for a business of this secrecy and importance, especially in a French Town. We will therefore rather treat in Hebrew, the language of Hierusalem, whereof your Master is King; and I suppose you are therein as well skilled, as we in the French. And thus much for this title.

The Arms of the Christian Kings in Hierusalem was Luna, a cross crossed, Sol; which was commonly called the Hierusalem Cross. But for their forces and Revenues, I cannot see how any estimate may be made hereof, in regard they subsisted not by their own proper strength, but by the Purfes and the Forces of the Western Christians; more or less active in that service, as zeal, or emulation, or desire of glory, were predominant in them.

Chief Orders of Knighthood in this Kingdom after the recovery thereof from the power of the Turks, were

1. Of the Sepulchre, said to be instituted originally by Queen Helena, the Mother of Constantine the Great, by whom the Temple of the Sepulchre was indeed first built: but more truly by Philip King of France, An. 1099. at such time as that Temple was regained from the Turks. Their Arms the same with that of the Kings before blazoned, representing the five wounds of our Saviour CHRIST. At the first conferred on none but Gentlemen of blood and fortunes; now saleable to any that will buy it the Patron-Guardian, who with a Convent of Franciscans doth reside near that Temple.
2. Of Saint John of Hierusalem, begun by one Gerrard, Anno 1114. and confirmed by Pope Paschalis the second. Their badge or Cognizance, is a White-Cross of eight points. Their duty to defend the Holy Land, relieve Pilgrims, and succour Christian Princes against the Infidels. They were to be of noble parentage and extraction: and grew in time to such infinite riches, especially after the suppression of the Templars (most of whose lands were after given unto this Order) that they had at one time in the several parts of Christendom, no fewer than 20000. Mannours; and of such reputation in all Christian Kingdoms, Kingdoms, that in England the Lord Prior of this Order, was accepted the Prince Baron in the Realm. But now their Revenue is not a little diminished, by the withdrawing of the Kings of England, and other Protestant Princes, from the Church of Rome: who on that change, seized on all the Lands of this Order in their several Countries, and either kept them to themselves, or disposed them to others as they pleased. Of these we shall speak more when we are in Malta, where they now reside: advertising only at the present, that their first Great Master was that Gerrard by whom they were founded; the last that had his residence in the Holy-Land, one John de Villiers, in whose time being driven out of Palestine, they removed into Cyprus, and in the time of Fulk de Villaret, Anno 1309. to the Isle of Rhodes; Out of which by Solyman the Magnificent, Anno 1522. they removed from one place to another, till at last by the magnificence of Charles the fifth, Anno 1530. they were settled in Malta: and there we shall speak farther of them.

3. Of the Templars, instituted by Hugh of Payennes, Anno 1113, and confirmed by Pope Eugenius. Their ensign was a Red Cross, in token that they should shed their blood to defend Christ's Temple. They were buried Cross-legged, and wore on their backs the figure of the Cross; for which they were by the common people called Cross-backs or Crouch-backs, and by corruption, Crook-backs. Edmund Earl of Lancaster, second son to our Henry the third, being of this Order, was vulgarly called Edmund Crook-back; which gave Henry the fourth a foolish occasion to feign, that this Edmund (from whom he was descended) was indeed the eldest son of King Henry the third, but for his crookedness and deformity, his younger brother was preferred to the Crown before him. These Knights had in all Provinces of Europe their subordinate Governours, in which they possessed no less than 16000 Lordships: the greatness of which Revenue was not the least cause of dissolving the Order. For Philip the fair, King of France, had a plot to invest one of his Sons with the Title of King of Jerusalem, and hoped to procure of the Pope the revenue of this order to be laid unto that Kingdom, for support of the Title: which he thought he might the better do, because Clement the fifth then Pope, for the love he bare to France, had transferred his seat from Rome to Avignon. But herein his hopes deceived him; for this Order being dissolved, the lands thereto belonging were given to the Knights Hospitallers, or of St. John. The crimes objected against this Order were, first, their revolt from their professed obedience unto the Patriarch of Jerusalem, who was their Visitor: Secondly, their unspeakable pride; and thirdly their sins against nature. The house of our Law-students in London, called the Temple, was the chief house of the Knights of this order in England: and was by the Knights of St. John, whose principal mansion was in Smithfield, sold unto the Students of the Laws, for the yearly rent of 10 l. about the middle of the reign of Edward the third.

These three orders Mr. Selden (and deservedly) putteth not in his Titles of Honour, in that they were prohibited to kiss a woman; honourary Knight-hood, and the love of Ladies, going together like virtue and reward.

Thus much for Palestine.

ARABIA hath on the East, Chaldea, and the Bay or Gulf of Persia; on the West, Palestine, some part of Egypt, and the whole course of the Red-Sea; on the North, the River Euphrates, with some parts of Syria and Palestine; and on the South, the main Southern Ocean. But at some times the name extended somewhat further; Pliny enlargeth it as far as to Comagena, the North part of Syria; in regard that many Arabian Colonies had been there planted by Tigranes; and Xenophon comprehended in it the greatest part also of Mesopotamia; because situate on the West of the River Tigris, and consequently the Western part of the Assyrian Empire, as the word Ereb doth import; from whence some derive the Ety-mology, and name hereof. Which notwithstanding, in the general esteem of Authors, it is bounded only as before.

As for the name, there be some that derive it from Arabus, a supposed Son of Apollo and Babylonia; others from three supposititious Sons of Jannus Pater, one of the pretended Grand Sons of Cham; who is fabled to have sent his Son Arabus into Arabia Deserta; Petreus into Arabia Petraea; and Sabus into Arabia Felix, the dwelling place of the Sabeans. And for this vain conceit, we are beholding to the Berosus of Erie Annianus. More probable is their conjecture, who derive the name from the Hebrew, Arab, signifying black; by reason of the swarth or tawny complexion of the inhabitants, who are inter nigrum & fulvum, as Vertomannus an eye-witness hath informed us of them; on the same reason as one of the Provinces of Africa, is commonly entituled the Land of Negroes. But the most likely origination of it, as I conceive, is from Harabi, which signifieth in the Hebrew, a Thief or Robber, such as the Arabians in all ages have been known to be. According unto that of the Prophet Jeremy, In the way thou hast sate for them, as an Arabian in the wilderness, as our English reads it; Tanquam Latro insidians in solitudine, saith the Vulgar Latine, Ier. 32. St. Hierome, though he render it quasi Latro, as the Vulgar doth, yet in his Commentary he informs us, that the word doth also signify an Arabian, qua gens latrociniiis dedita usq; hodie incurat Palestina fines, &c. which people being addicted to theft and robbery, do to this day (saith he) infest the coasts of Palestine which border neer them; and lay in wait for those which had any occasion to travel thither. Agreeable hereunto is the observation of Martin del Rio; Ad eo latrociniiis infames sunt, ut Hebraei Arabes latrones denotat, sicut Chanaanus Mercatorem, Chaldeus Mathematicum; i.e. So infamous were they for their theft and frequent robberies, that it was a familiar with the Jews to call a thief by the name Arabian, as by Chanaanite to signify a Merchant, or to use the word Chaldean for a Mathematician. In the same sense they came in the succeeding times to be called Saracens, from Sarak or Saraka, an Arabian word, which signifieth to steal; whereof more anon: No otherwife then one of the American Islands had the name of Ladrones, or Insula latronum, given by Magellanus, from the thievishness of the Inhabitants, who had stoll his Cock-boat.

I have staid the longer on the name, because it doth express so much of the Character of the people also; living for the most part upon spoil and robbery, as all that travel that way know by sad experience. Of mean stature, raw-boned, tawny or swart complexioned, having feminine voyces; of swift, but noiseless gait, and upon you ere you are aware. Of no set-dwellings (except only in Arabia Felix) living in tents, which they remove like walking Cities, for the benefit of pasture, and hope of booty: for this last cause hanging about the skirts of more habitable Countreys, and having robbed, retire with a marvelous speed; Mounted on Dromedaries for that purpose, a beast of most incredible swiftness, furnished with little food, though without water to it, and will easily carry a man a hundred miles a day, without any refreshing. Nor are such Horses as they have, though but poor and lean, of less speed, or less patient of travel: whom they feed twice a day with the milk of Camels, and think them not worth keeping, if not able to outgo an Ostrich. As now, so formerly, all Horsemen, and but ill appointed; fitter to rob and spoil than to deal with Souldiers; as riding stark naked, and trusting rather to the swiftness of their Horses than any other resistance, where they were opposed.

Their language is the Arabick, so called from this Countrey, but not proper to this Countrey only; Spoken in all places where Mahometanism hath got any footing: The Alcoran being written in it, the publick Offices of their Religion performed in it, and the tongue taught in Schools as generally, as with us the Latine: but made the natural language in Mesopotamia, Syria, Palestine, the three Arabia's, Egypt, and all Barbary, except the Kingdom of Morocco. A great extent, but short of that which some give to it, who will have it spoken in two parts of the whole habitable world.

The Christian faith was first here planted by St. Paul, of whose being in Arabia, after his conversion, he telleth us, Gal. 1. 17. to which the coming in of the Saracens gave a great increase, in the time of Mavia, their Queen, during the Empire of Valentinian the first; Moses a man of exemplary piety, and famed for many miracles, being created their first Bishop; after more generally propagated over all the Countrey, by by their King Alamandarus; Anastafius then reigning in the East. But long it had not been received, when supplanted by Mahometanism, which had its first beginning here; and hath so universally overspread the whole face hereof, that now there are no Christians left in all the Countrey, except only in Eltor, a Port Town in the Bay of Arabia Felix; in Arabia Petraea, the chief City of Arabia Petraea, and in two small Monasteries about Mount Sinai.

It is in circuit about 4000 miles, but of so unequal and heterogeneous composition, that no general Character can be given of it: and therefore we must look upon it, as it stands divided into Arabia Deserta, 2 Arabia Petraea; 3 Arabia Felix, and 4 the Arabick Islands.

1 ARABIA DESERTA.

A R A B I A D E S E R T A (called Berara by the Turks) is bounded on the East, with Babylonia, on the West, with parts of Palestine, and Arabia Petraea; on the North, with Palmyrene and Mesopotamia, from which last it is parted by Euphrates; and on the South, by some parts of Petraea, and Arabia Felix.

It hath the name of Deserta, from the vast Deserts which are in it, and the un-inhabitedness thereof; called also by Aristides, Aspera, from the roughness; by Servius, Inferior, or the Lower, in regard of the situation of it more towards the River; by Lucian, from the frequent bottoms and valleys in it, Arabia Cava; and finally, by the Jews it was called Kedar, from the blackness or swarthiness of the People, the word in Hebrew, signifying as much as Sun-burnt; whence the people are by some writers called Kedarani, and by Pliny Cedrei.

But the common and most usual name of it, is Arabia Deserta, agreeable to the nature of it, being generally a sandy Countrey full of vast Deserts; in which all such as travel use to carry their Provisions with them, and to guide themselves in their journey by the course of the Stars, though in some parts which lie near Euphrates, and the Mountains of Arabia Felix, it have some few Towns, and those resorted to by Merchants. But this is only in those parts, the residue of the Countrey being so desolate and waste, that one who had travelled in it, doth describe it to be so wilde a place, Ut nec homines nec bestiae viderantur, nec Aves; imo nec arbores nec germen aliquod, sed non nisi montes saxosi, altissimi, asperrimi, A Countrey, saith Guilandinus Melchior, where are found neither men nor beasts, nor so much as birds or trees, nor grass, nor pasture, but only stony, high and most craggy Mountains.

The people for the most part, used to dwell in Tents, alluded to by David, Psal. 120. v. 5. which they removed from place to place, as the pasture for their cattle failed them: taking no other care for houses than the boughs of Palm-trees, to keep them from the heat of the Sun, and other extremities of weather. Hence by the Ancients called Scenites, or men dwelling in Tents (in which respect the Jews call the Tartarians Kedarim, from the like course of life which these Kedareni or Arabians lived:) but the name reaching into the other parts of Arabia also, where they use the same kinde of living: of whom more anon.

Yet notwithstanding most memorable is this Countrey in sacred story, both for the dwelling place of Job, and the habitation of those Wife-men, who came out of the East unto Hierusalem, to worship Christ, the new-born King of the Jews. That Job was an inhabitant here, appeareth by the situation of his dwelling, being in the East, as is said in the story of him, chap. 1. v. 3. that is to say, the Countrey lying East to the Land of Canaan, as this part of it doth; and therefore called simply by the name of the East, as Judg. 6. 3 where by the Children of the East, are meant expressly the inhabitants of Arabia the Desert, who together with the Midianites and Amalekites oppressed those of Israel. Secondly, by the ill neighborhood which he found from the Sabeans, who inhabited in this part also; and of the Chaldeans mentioned, v. 17. the next borderers to it: and Thirdly, by the inconsequences which needs must follow, if we place him, as some do, in the land of Uz, near unto Damascus. For how improbable must it be for the Sabeans of the Red-Sea, or the Persian-Gulf, or the Chaldeans, dwelling on the banks of the River Euphrates, to fall upon Job's Cattel grazing near Damascus, the Countreys being dis-joynted by such vast Deserts, and huge Mountains, that it is impossible for any strangers to pass them, especially with any numbers of Cattel, in respect of those large Mountains, deep Sands, and the extreme want of water in all that passage? and how impossible must we think it, that the pen-man of the story of Job, who certainly was guided in it by the Holy Ghost, should be so mistaken, as to place Job's dwelling in the East, if the Land of Uz, wherein he dwelt bordered on Damascus, which lay not on the East, but the North of Canaan? A City called Uz, or Uz, there was, situate near Damascus, so called from Uz, the son of Aram, Gen. 10. 23. A Land of Uz also amongst the Edumites, spoken of in the Lamentations of the Prophet Jeremy, chap. 4. v. 21. so called from Uz, one of the posterity of Esau, mentioned Gen. 36. 28. And finally, a Land of Uz or Uz, so called from Huz the son of Nachor, the brother of Abraham, mentioned Gen. 22. 21. which is that situate in this Tract, the habitation and possession of that righteous man: the Countrey hereabouts being called Ausitis, and the people Ausiti, though by mistaking in the transcripts, we finde them named Aams, or Astis, in the fifth of Pliny. The like I say also of the Wife-men, or Magi, who came to Hierusalem from the East, that they dwell in this Countrey, where the said Pliny placeth the City Saba; according unto that fore-signified by the Royal Psalmist, that the Kings of Arabia and Saba should bring their gifts, Psal. 72. 10. Confirmed herein by the situation of the Countrey lying East of Canaan; the authority of those Fathers who lived nearest to the time of our Saviours birth, Iustin Martyr, Tertullian, Cyprian; and by the testimony of Guilandinus Melchior above-mentioned, affirming on the credible report of the people hereof, that they came neither out of Mesopotamia, or Arabia Felix, as many wife-

Arabia

men do believe, but out of Saba in Arabia the Desert, which City (saith he) when my self was there, was, as I judged, called Semiscasac.

Cities of note, in a Countrey so desert and uninhabited, we must look for few; yet some there are, inhabited by a more civil sort of people, whom they call by the name of Moors, giving that of Arabian to those only, who live roving and robbing up and down. Pliny gives the names of forty Cities and Villages in it (civitates & vicus, saith the Latine) the memory of most of which is now utterly perished. Those of most observation, 1 Saba, or Saba, the habitation of those Sabeans who pillaged Job; so called from Sheba, the grand-son of Abraham by Keurah, mentioned Gen. 25. 3. Of whom, and of the rest of that line, it is said, in the sixt verse of that chapter, that Abraham gave them gifts, and sent them away from Isaac East-ward, unto the East Countrey: now called Semiscasac, as is thought by Melchior. 2 Theman, which possibly may be the Countrey of Eliphaz the Themanite, one of the visitants of Job. As 3 Shuah, on the North hereof, was probably of Bilad, another of them, hence firnamed the Shuhite. 4 Tharfacus, by Pliny called Aphipolis. 5 Zagmas, near the Persian Gulf, in the Countrey of the Ranbeni, supposed to be descended from Mishma the fourth son of Ismael. 6 Phuntion the 36th. 7 Oloth the 37th. mansion of the Children of Israel. 8 Rheganna, another of those named by Pliny, in the Greek Copies called Beganna. Of any Town of note now being more then Semiscasac, before named, I finde nothing certain.

The first Inhabitants of this Countrey, of whom there is any certain Constat, were the posterity of Huz, the son of Nachor, and the sons of Abraham by Keurah; of whose being settled in these parts, we had before good testimony from the Book of God: and intermixt with them lived some of the descendants of Ismael also. For if the Adubeni, whom Pliny calleth the Agubeni, fetch their original from Adheel the third, and the Ranbeni from Mishmai the fifth son of Ismael, as some lay as they do, I see no reason but the whole Countrey might be called Kedar, from Kedar the second son, as well as from the tawny complexions of the people of it. From them descended the Tribes or Nations spoken of by Pliny, that is to say, the Orcheni. Chaucabeni, Ausiti, Mafoni, Materni, and Agrei, besides the Adubeni, and Ranbeni, already specified. But being a dis-joynted people, not under any settled form of Government, nor possessed of any thing worth looking after, they were either held not worth the conquering, in regard of their penury; or else unconquerable, in respect of their Countrey, impassable for great Armies, by reason of the rolling sands, and want of all things. Yet I conceive, that lying so near to the Chaldeans, they followed the fortunes of that mighty Monarchy; subjects unto it whilst it stood, and after Tributaries unto those who successively possessed themselves of the Supreme power. Not looked at by the Romans, or regarded by them, who aimed at wealth as honor, in their expedition: nor otherwise subject to the Turks at this present time, then as they make use of him and his protection in their frequent robberies: but counted of as a part of the Turkish Empire, because the more civil Arabians are indeed his subjects.

2 ARABIA PETREA.

A R A B I A P E T R E A (now called Baraab, Baraab, and Barthalaba) hath on the East, Arabia Deserta, and part of Sinai Persicus, or the Bay of Persia; on the West, the Isthmus, which joyneth Africa to Asia, and part of the Red Sea, or Gulf of Persia; on the North, Palestine; and on the South, a long ridge of Mountains, which divide it from Arabia Felix.

It had this name either from the rockiness of the soil hereof, or more properly from Petra, the chief City of it, called also by Ethiops, Sicaria, but I know not why: by the Hebrews, Chus, generally translated Ethiopia; by William of Tyre, Arabia Secunda, Felix being reckoned for the first. By Strabo, Pliny, and Pliny, it is called Nabathaea, which name it had from Nabaioth, the eldest of the twelve sons of Ismael, though properly that name belonged only to those parts of it, which lay next Judaea: fruitful, though joyning to the Deserts: and thus remembered by the Poet, as an Eastern Countrey;

Eurus ad Anroram, Nabathaeque regna recessit.

Eurus unto the East did flie,
Where fruitful Nabathe doth lie.

The Countrey much of the same nature with the other, but in some parts thereof more fertile if well manured: and in the time of Marcellinus, affirmed to be a rich land, flourishing with variety of trade and traffick. But for the most part, full of untravellable Deserts, except to those which carry their provisions with them for fear of starving, and go in great companies, or Caravans for fear of robbing: and yet much travelled by Merchants who traffick into Egypt, and Babylonia; the commodities whereof they lay on Camels, which are the ships of Arabia, as their Seas; the Deserts. For upon one of these Camels, they will lay ordinarily 600. and sometimes 1000. pound weight: yet not afford him water above once in four days, not often in fourteen, if there be occasion. So that the Camel carrying so great a burden, and seldom fewer then 500. going in one voyage; the Merchant, if he scape it robbing, makes a rich return. Of these Deserts, the most memorable are those of Sin and Pharan, in which the Israelites so long wandred: not beset with water nor adorned with Trees, the Palm only excepted; nor furnished with water, but by rain or miracle.

The people of it for the most part, descended of the sons of Chus, and Ismael, intermixed with the Midianites, descending from Abraham by Keurah, and the Amalekites, descended probably from Amalek, the grand-son of Esau, mentioned Gen. 3. 6. but all united at the last in the name of Saraceni. This name derived, as some think, from Sarra, signifying a Desert, and saken which signifieth to inhabit, because they live for the most part in these desert places: as other say, from Sarak, signifying a Thief or Robber, agreeable to that of Arabia, before delivered: This last most suitable to their nature, and best liked by Scaliger. Saraceni à vicinis dicuntur ab Elsarak; i. e. aspirant yoadiaol, quod rapinis videntur. So he, in his second Book de Emend. Temp. A people not reckoned in the former times, till made remarkable by their conquest of a great part of the world; but always counted wilkie and Martial men. Of whom take this Character out of Macrobinus, 'The Saraceni (saith he) whom we are neither to wish for our friends, or enemies, are a Martial people, half naked, clad as far as the groin with painted Cassocks, ranging up and down on Camels, and swift Horses as well in peace as troublesome times. Not used unto the Plough, to plant Trees, or get their living by tillage; they wander from one place to another, without house or home, or any constant dwelling place, or the use of Laws; nor can they long endure the same either Air or Soil, the manner of their lives being always flitting, like ravenous Kites; which if they chance to spy a prey, snatch it up in their flight, or if they chance to fasten on it at it lyeth on the ground, they make no long stay. Their food is chiefly upon Venison, and store of milk, herbs which they gather from the ground, and birds which they get by fowling; but altogether ignorant of Corn and Wine. Their wives they hire only for a time, though for a shew of Matrimony they present their husbands with a Spear and a Tent, as in way of dowry; but they part with them when they please. Both Sexes most extremely given to carnal lusts; the women as rambling as the men, married in one place, and brought to bed in another; leaving their children where they fall, without more care of them. So far, and to this purpose he.

Rivers of note here are not many. The principal are, 1 That called Trajanus amnis, or the River of Trajan, which passing through this Country endeth his course in the Red Sea. 2 Rhinocorura, called in Scripture the torrent of Egypt, which rising in this Country, and passing by the borders of Idumaea, hath its fall in the lake of Sirbon; and together with the waters thereof, loseth it self at last in the Mediterranean.

With Mountains it is better stored, and those of eminent observation, as 1 Mount Sinai, famous in all ages, for the promulgation of the Law; and of late times, for a Monastery of Maronites on the top thereof. The hill so high, that both shores of the Red Sea may be thence seen; but easie of ascent, by reason of steps cut out of the rock: which notwithstanding, he that beginneth to go up it at the break of day, will hardly overcome the top of it till the afternoon. The Monastery made an Episcopal See, and formerly very well endowed, as appeareth by the letters of Eugenius Bishop thereof to the Arch Duke Charles, An. 1569. complaining that the Turk had sold all their lands, and that himself and the Monks were fain to pawn their holy Vessels, and take up money on usury. Here is also a Mesque, or Mosque of Turks, who resort in pilgrimage to this hill, as well as the Christian. 2 Mount Horeb, where the Israelites worshipped the Molten Calf, about a mile and a half distant from Mount Sinai, but not so high on the top of which is a Church also; and a Monastery of Coloires, or Greek Monks, at the bottom, exceeding hospitable to strangers, whom they entertain at free cost, and cheerfully shew them all the places worth observation, which the Scripture mentioneth in that tract. Both hills by Phelomy called Melani, or the Black Mountains; the last now called Orel. 3 Mount Hor, bordering on Idumaea; and memorable for the death of Aaron.

Places of most observation, 1 Petra, the name given to this part, at first called Rekem, and at that time belonging to Midian: afterwards called Selah, when pertaining to the Idumaeans. But falling under the power of the Arabians, it is now called Crab. Best known in holy Scriptures by the name of Selah, beforementioned, which signifies the same with the Latine Petra. A City of great note and strength in all times foregoing, taken by Amaziah the King of Judah, 2 King. 14. 7. and by him called Jock-bell, but in vain besieged by Scarnius, a Roman General, who finding the place to be impregnable, was content by the persuasion of Antipater, to take a sum of money and raise his siege. Nor did the Emperor Trajan speed much better at it, his Souldiers being still beat off in all their assaults, the very next man to him slain with a dart, and himself forced to cast away his Imperial habit, and flee for his life; the heavens themselves, if Dion (who is never sparing of the like prodigies) may be believed, fighting against the Romans with thunder, lightning, whirlwinds, and tempests, as often as they made any approaches to it. But in the end subdued with the rest of the Country. In such esteem, by reason of the strength of it, by the Soldans of Egypt, that they kept here their choicest treasures, and in the course of the Holy War, much aimed at by the Turks and Christians, as the Key that opened the Gates of Palestine; on the South border whereof, not far from Mount Hor beforementioned, the Town is situate. The Metropolis of the Province when first under the Romans; and made the Seat of a Latine Bishop, when the Christians of the West were the Lords thereof. 2 Bostra, said to have been built by Augustus Caesar, because by him repaired, when decayed and ruined; afterwards by Alexander Severus made a Colony of the Romans. This last most certain, and for such testified by this ancient inscription, in an ancient coyn, COL. BOSTRAN. T. R. ALEXANDRIANAE? Memorable also for the birth of Philip the Emperor, one of that Alexanders next Successors; by whom it was caused for a time to be called Philippus; for the Metropolitan dignity removed thither from Petra, somewhat before the time of Justinian; but by whom I find not; and for being the Episcopal See of Titus (hence surnamed) Bostranus, a Reverend Father of the Church in the time of Julian the Apostate. A City of as great antiquity as the most that be, mentioned Gen. 36. 33. though there accounted of as a City of Edom, to which at that time it did belong; and is still remaining, and well known by the name of Busfereth. 3 Elama, on a bay of the Red Sea, called hence Sinus E. usiticus. 4 Pharis, reckoned by Phelomy for a chief Town of this Tract, from whence the Wilderness of Paran seems to take its name. 5 Berenice, so called called from some of the Queens of Egypt, but better known by the name of Esion g. ber, one of the Stations or Incampings of the Children of Israel; and made by Solomon the ordinary harbour for his Ships, which sailed to Ophir in the East-Indies. 6 Sur, the chief City of the Amalekites, giving name to the Wilderness or Desert of Sur, coming close up to it: remarkable for the first incamping of the Tribes of Israel after their miraculous passage over the Red Sea; and the defeat which Saul gave to the Amalekites, whom he smote from Havilah to this place. 7 Havilah, so called from Havilah the son of Chus, being the furthest border of these Amalekites, and Israelites, on the Gulf of Perfis, as Sur was on the Red Sea, or Gulf of Arabia. 8 Madian, so called of Madian, the son of Abraham by Keturah, situate towards the Red Sea also; the City of Jethro, whose daughter Zipporah was the wife of Moses: who flying from the Court of Pharaoh King of Egypt, was by Gods secret providence directed hither; that keeping the flocks of Jethro in the Deserts adjoining, he might acquaint himself with the ways and passages, through which he after was to lead the house of Israel. 9 Rephaim, the incamping place of Moses, where he discomfited the Amalekites: and to which the said Jethro came to him with his wife and children, advising him to ease himself of some part of that burden, which the government of so great a people would else bring upon him. 10 Kadesh-barnea, the station of the Tribes, when the spies which were sent to discover the Land of Canaan, returned back unto them; memorable for the death of Miriam the Prophetess. And 11 Thura, no less memorable for the mutiny and punishment of Corah, Dathan, and Abiram, the place remembered Numb. 33. 27. But others will have 12 Makeloth, mentioned v. 25. of that Chapter, to be the stage of that action; the Scriptures being silent in this particular. The rest of their encamping places, being most of them in this part of Arabia, I omit of purpose, as obvious in the Scripture unto every Reader: as I do also some of the Cities of Moab and Ammon, accounted of by Phelomy, as Cities of this Province; but spoken of already in our Description of Palestine, to which more properly belonging.

The old Inhabitants of this Country, were the Midianites, the Israelites, the Amalekites, and the Children of Chus; who dwelling promiscuously together, are sometimes used for one another: the Merchants which bought Joseph of his Brethren, being indifferently called Midianites, and Israelites, Gen. 37. 28. and Zipporah the wife of Moses, who questionless was a daughter of Madian, being by Miriam, and Aaron, called an Ethiopian or Chusite, as in way of reproach, Numb. 12. 1. But being they were different Nations, and such as had some special engagement with or against the Children of Israel; we will consider them by themselves, till we have brought them into one body, by the name of Chusites, Ethiopians, or Arabians, which are all the same.

And first, the MADIANITES were such of the posterity of Madian, the son of Abraham by Keturah, who preserving the knowledge of the true God, withdrew themselves from all communion with the idolatrous Canaanites, at such time as the rest of their brethren did associate with them; and settled themselves more towards the banks of the Red Sea, where they did all good offices to the children of Israel, as they passed through their Country. Of these the Kenites were a branch, as appeareth Judges 1. 16. where Jethro the Prince or Priest of Madian, is called a Kenite: some of which turned Proselytes, and dwelt with the Israelites in Canaan; of which race Heber the Kenite, the husband of Jael, who slew Sisera, was undoubtedly one. The rest, continuing mingled with the Amalekites, till the time of Saul, were by him warned (in memory of former courtesies) to withdraw themselves from them; lest they should perish with them in the same destruction. Afterwards we hear little of either people, losing their name in the greater Nation of the Israelites, with whom intermingled; or passing with them into the same common notion of Arabians, Chusites, or Ethiopian.

Secondly, Nor were the AMALEKITES, though a greater and more powerful Nation, of much more continuance; descended, as it is conceived, from Amalek, the Grand-son of Esau (though I deny not but there are some reasons to be urged against that opinion) and planted on the back of the Edomites, as their Guard or Out-work. A people mischievously bent against those of Israel, as if they had inherited the hatred which Esau their fore-father did bear to Jacob, whom they violently set on at Rephidim, when they supposed them spent and wearied with their flight from Egypt. And though discomfited in that battle, yet they continued in their malice against the Tribes, joining first with the Canaanites against them when they were in their March; and after with the Midianites, when not well settled in their new possession. A provocation to ill taken by the Lord of Hosts, because unnatural, and ill grounded, that he declared his resolution from the time of the Battle of Rephidim, to put out the remembrance of Amalek from under Heaven, Exod. 17. 14. Accordingly, when the Children of Israel were provided for it, he commanded Saul to set upon them, and to slay both man and woman, infant and suckling, yea, their sheep and cattel. But some of them escaped this slaughter, and fell not long after upon Ziglag, the retiring place of David, which they took and ransacked; but being by him followed on the first intelligence, they were easily overthrown, and the prey recovered. Their malice yet survived their power; and what they could not do by their forces, they endeavoured to effect by joining with the Ammonites, Moabites, and other Enemies of David, in their wars against him. And this was ultimum conatum, one of the last flashes of their dying light: nothing done by them worth remembrance of the times succeeding, most of the Nation being worn out, and those few which were left, retiring to the Mountains of Edom, but thereof also dispossessed by the Simeonites, during the reign of Hezekiah.

Thirdly, The ISMAELITES, descended from Ismael, the son of Abraham by Hagar, branched into twelve great Nations, and grown wondrous populous, spread themselves over a great part of

Arabia

of these three Arabia's: all of them either Theives or Merchants; trading to Egypt in (spicery, and balm, and myrrhe, or robbing those which traded in the like commodities. Called also Hagarens in the Scripture, as 1 Chron. 5. 10. Psalms 83. 6, &c. and by that name well known to many of the ancient Writers. A people for the most part of a vagabond and roguish life, more given to spoil, than any honest course of living, which made every Traveller and Merchant to be armed against them; so verifying the prediction which was given of Ismael, that he should be a wilde man, having his hand against every man, and every mans hand against him. Saint Hierome so conceives that Prophecy to have been accomplished. More fitly verified perhaps, when in and under the name of Saracens (by which, and by the name of Scenites, they were most generally known to the Greeks and Romans) they made such foul havoc in the world, and were esteemed the common Enemies of all Civil Nations. Never so governable in their best and most orderly times, as to acknowledge King or Law, till made one body with the Chusites, and the rest of those Nations: and then no further, then it stood with their lust or liking.

Fourthly, As for the Chusites, though they permitted the Nations above specified, to inhabit in those Deserts and waste places, which themselves either could not people, or cared not for; yet were they always of most power, and gave name to that whole tract of ground, containing now all Petraea, the South part of Deserta, and the Mountains which divide Petraea from Arabia Felix; which from them was called Chus, or the Land of Chus. Rendered in all places of the Old Testament, by the name of Ethiopia, first by the Septuagint, and afterwards by all the Fathers Greek and Latine, the Vulgar Translation of the Bible, and almost all the other Translations at this day extant. And rendered right enough at first, as in all times since, though by some mistaken: who having never heard of any other Ethiopia then that in Affrick, have transferred thither all those actions and Texts of Scripture, which are meant of this. The Septuagint, no doubt, were not so ignorant of the affairs of their next neighbouring Nation, as not to know by what name they were called by the Greeks, their then Lords and Masters. And he that looks into the History of Herodotus, who lived 150 years before that Translation; will finde, that by the Grecians they were called Ethiopiens; and called so questionless from the self same reason; that is to say, the swarthiness, or Sun-burntnefs of their complexion, as the Ethiops of Affrick were; that name being framed of the Greek word Αἴθω, signifying to burn; and ὄψ, a countenance; by reason of their tawny and Sun-burnt Countenances. For speaking of the huge Army of Xerxes against the Greeks, he doth thus proceed, Αἰθίοποι δὲ καὶ Ἀγυρῆσι καὶ Ἰνδοῖσι καὶ Ἰβηρίσι, &c. Arrianus, (saith he) was Captain of the Arabians, (he meaneth the Troglodytes) and Ethiopiens, which are beyond Egypt: but the Eastern Ethiopiens were ranked with the Indians, nothing differing from the other in the structure of their bodies, but their hair and voyce only; the Eastern Ethiopiens wearing their hair smooth, those of Lybia curled. The Ethiops of Asia were armed like the Indians, but the Ethiops of Affrica were arrayed with the skins of beasts. Here then we have an Asian Ethiopia in the time of Herodotus; the same acknowledged by Pausanias an old Greek writer, and by Philostratus after him, though they look for it in the wrong place: the first amongst the Seres, in the North of Asia; the other on the River Ganges, too much in the East. Nor doth Ethiops, one of the old Cosmographers, published by Simlerus, shoot more near the mark, who speaking of the River Tigris, saith that it burieth it self, and runneth under the ground in Ethiopia: Which though Simler doth interpret of these parts of Arabia, yet questionless that Authour meaneth it of the Countreys about Mount Taurus; where that River doth indeed run under ground, and having passed under those vast Mountains, riseth up again.

But what need further search be made to finde out the situation of this Ethiopia, when it is bounded out so plainly in the holy Scriptures? For when it is said Zipporah the wife of Moses, that she was an Ethiopian woman, Numb. 12. 1. who is well known to have been a native of this Countrey; and when it is said in 2 Chron. 21. 16. that the Lord stirred up against Jehoram the spirit of the Philistims, and of the Arabians that were near the Ethiopiens: it must needs be that the Ethiopia there spoken of, must be common to the rest of Arabia, and be intended of that Countrey wherein Madian was. So where God threatneth by the mouth of the Prophet Ezekiel, that he would lay waste the land of Egypt, from the Tower of Syene, even unto the borders of Ethiopia, chap. 29. 10. that is to say, from one end thereof unto the other: it followeth necessarily, that Ethiopia there meant, must be this part of Arabia, or the Land of Chus, as the bound of Egypt most remote from the Tower of Syene, which all Geographers acknowledge to be in the extrem South parts thereof, towards the Cataracts of Nilus. For to expound it as some do, of Ethiopia in Affrick, on the borders whereof Syene stood; and stood so indifferently betwixt it and Egypt, that Stephanus an ancient Writer makes it very doubtful to which of the two it did belong, were to make the Scripture speak plain non-sense: as plain as if a man should say, that the French conquered all the Netherlands from Graveling to Flanders; or that the Sword hath ranged over all England, from Berwick to Scotland. As then we have found this Ethiopia of the Old Testament, to be near the Philistims on the one side, and the Land of Egypt on the other; so may we finde it to be bounded also on the East, with Babylonia or Chaldea: the River Gihon, which is said to compass the whole Land of Ethiopia, (or the Land of Chus) Gen. 2. 13. being no other then a branch of the River Euphrates, which falleth into the Lakes of Chaldea. So that the translation of the Septuagint in reading Chusites, or the Land of Chus, by Ethiopiens, needs no such alteration or emendation as some men suppose. The mistakes (whereof there have been many) which arise from hence, not being to be charged on them or on their Translation, but on the ignorance of the Reader, or error of such Expositors, who dreaming of no other Ethiopia then of that in Affrick, have made the Scriptures speak such things as it never meant, and carried these Chusites into the African Ethiopia, where they never were. And yet perhaps it may be be said, that the posterity of Chus, being streightened in their own possessions, or willing to seek new adventures, might have crossed over the Red Sea, or Gulf of Arabia (being but seven miles broad where Yan to them, or receive it from them.

Now to go forwards with the story, the first great action attributed to these Chusites, or Arabian Ethiops, incorporated with the rest of those mingled Nations, is the expedition of Zerch, the King of Israhel, against Asa King of Judah, drawing after him an Army of a million, and three hundred Chariots of War (the greatest Army ever read of in unquestioned story) but for all that, discomfited by the Lord of Hosts, on the prayers of Asa, and all the spoil of that huge Army carried to Hierusalem. After this Tirrahah, another of these Ethiopian Kings, finding how dangerous the great growth of the Affrian Kingdom might prove to him, prepared a puissant Army against Senacherib, then besieging Libna, threatening the conquest of all Judah, and invading Egypt: upon the news of whose approach, Senacherib's forces which were even upon the gaining of Pelusium, the gate of Egypt, were faine to dislodge and provide for their safety. For though Herodotus call Senacherib King of Arabia, and Affria; yet was he Master only of those parts of Petraea, bordering next unto them: or perhaps called so only in respect of those parts of Syria, and Mesopotamia, which were sometimes comprehended under the name of Arabia, as before is said. What hard to say. For besides that the same reasons of State obliging them to side with the Egyptians, were still in force; their giving Necho leave to pass through their Countrey with his Army to invade the Babylonians on the banks of Euphrates, make that plain enough. Now that both Tirrahah and Zerah were Kings of Egypt would never suffer such huge Armies to pass thorow the whole length of their Dominions; but principally because it is said in the holy Scriptures, that Asa having overthrown that vast Army of Zerah, smote all the Cities about Gerar, which formerly had belonged unto the Philistines; but were then possessed by these Chusites and their Associates. After this, either as Confederates or Subjects, we find them aiding unto Xerxes, in his War on Greece: and like enough it was, that in Alexanders march from Egypt towards Perfia, they submitted to him, as did all the other Countreys thorow which he passed. He being dead, Antigonus, one of his great Commanders, sent Athenani with an Army to bring them in, who being trained into an ambush was discomfited by them; D. meirius the son of Antigonus, thinking that he had done enough in revenge of that overthrow, by compelling them to sue for peace. In the time of the Seleucian race in Syria, we find them governed by Kings of their own, most of them called by the name of Arctas, of which one was of special note in the declining fortunes of the Seleucians, for Bidding very fair for the Crown of that Countrey; and being a great stickler in the Wars of Jerry, in the time of Hircanus the fourth King, of the race of the Maccabees, to whom at the request of Antipater the Father of good importance, which Alexander the Father of Hircanus had regained from the Syrians, and laid unto the Crown of Jerry, to which as parts of Iudaea, and anciently possessed by the Tribes of Israhel, he might make some claim. Another there was of the same name, and of no less power, whom we find to have been warred upon by Herod, about the time of the battel of Altium, and for the most part vanquished by him; and finally a third of more power than either, mentioned by St. Paul, 2 Cor. 11. 32. as Lord of Damascus. In the flourishing of the Roman fortunes, the Kings hereof having first aided Mithridates and Tygranes, in the war against them, submitted themselves unto Lucullus, being then no nearer to them then Armenia Major. The like they did to Pompey also, being then in Judea. First vanquished by Athm Gallus in the time of Augustus; but the victory not improved to an absolute conquest, till the time of Trajan, when partly by his personal presence, and partly by the valour and good fortune of Palmas, that they had Kings of their own (Vassals and Feudatories of the Empire) as in former times; continuing that condition till the rise of Mahomet. Of which more hereafter.

3 ARABIA FELIX.

ARABIA FELIX is bounded on the East, with the Persian; on the West, with the Arabian Gulf; on the North, with a long ridge of Mountains, which part it from Deserta and Petraea; and on the South, with the boundless Ocean. Environed on three parts with the Sea, on the fourth with rough, impassable Mountains; in situation and figure much resembling Italy.

It had the name of Arabia Felix from the fertility and happy condition of it, being esteemed the most fruitful and pleasant Countrey in all Asia, abounding with Myrrhe, Balsamum, Frankincense, Guld, and Precious Stones: by Curtius called Odorata fertilitate nobilis Regio, from the abundance of Frankincense, wherewith enriched beyond all others. Concerning which there goeth a story, that when Alexander in his Adolescence or Boyage, was sacrificing to the Gods, and cast into the fire with both hands great store of Frankincense and Myrrhe, Leonidas his Governour, bid him be more sparing of those precious and dear commodities, till he was Master of the Countrey in which they grew. Which Alexander remembering, when he had brought almost all the East under his obedience, he sent unto Leonidas a ship laden with Frankincense, bidding him from thenceforth serve the gods more liberally. But aswell for the reason of this adjunct, as a more perfect character and description of it, take along this of Ammianus Marcellinus, who describes it thus. 'On the east and south hereof (saith he) are the happy Arabians, so called because so rich in corn; as well as plenteous in cattel, vines; and odoriferous spices of all kinds; shut up betwixt the Red Sea, and the Persian Gulf, and so acquainted with all blessings, which either element can afford: T c c well Emperours of the common opinion of those men, whom in the first he whistled off with the infamous appellation of the Saracens.

But to proceed, It hapned much about this time, that the Saracens revolting from Heraclius the Eastern Emperour, joyned themselves unto him. They had long been displeased with their condition, and now hoped to mend it. Exasperated by Julian the Apostate, when they served in his wars against the Persians, for telling them when they demanded their pay, that he had more store of steel than gold: but that they wanted a fit head to resort unto. Now serving Heraclius in the same War, they were used by his Officers in the same ill manner. Asking their pay, the Treasurer of the Army made them this church answer, that there was scarce money enough to pay the Roman and Grecian Soldiers; and must those Dogs be so importunate for their wages? Provoked herewith, and hearing the fame of Mahomet, they betook themselves to him: who strengthened by their forces, and the coming in of the rest of their Country men soon brought the three Arabias under his subjection. To which, having defeated the Emperour's Forces sent against him, he added some parts of Syria and Egypt; and returning to Mecca, there died a violent and distempered, in the 70th. year of his Age, and three and twentieth of his impostures: in expectation of a resurrection, which he promised to perform at the end of three; grown full of stench and putrefaction, was carried to Medina, and there interred: his Successors out of wicked and worldly policy, keeping up the reputation of that Religion after his decease, which they derided in his life; and calling themselves Caliphs, or Vicars General, to him, their Prophet, to the Catalogue of life; made intricate, nor more by their own confusions, than by the difference of those which we hasten; made intricate, nor more by their own confusions, than by the difference of those names by which they are presented to us by several Writers; according to the Times and Languages in which they writ.

The Caliphs or Emperours of the Saracens.

A.C.	A.H.
622	5	1 Mahomet the Impostor, of whom before.
632	15	2 Ebubezer , or Uqubar , Mahomet's Father-in-law, and one of his Great Captains, supplant- ed Ali , to whom the Empire was designed by the will of Mahomet ; and took unto himself the name of Caliph .
634	17	3 Hannar , the second of Mahomet's Great Captains, having the Command of the Army under Ebubezer , succeeded him in the Estate; and added to it Persia , Egypt , Pala- stine , with great part of Syria and Mesopotamia .
947	30	4 Osman , the third of Mahomet's Great Captains, Husband of Zeineb , his second daugh- ter; succeeded under that pretence, and added all Barbary to his Empire. Distres- sed by the faction of Hali , and besieged in his own house, he slew himself, in the eigh- ty seventh year of his Age, and the tenth of his Reign.
657	40	5 Hali , the Kinsman and next heir of Mahomet , and the husband of Fatime his eldest daughter, succeeded on the death of Osman : murdered by the procurement of Mu- hawias , near Cusa , in Arabia Felix .
660	43	6 Muhawias , having murdered Hali , his Son Hafsem , or Ofsan , and eleven of the Sons of that Hafsem , the twelfth only escaping with life (from whom descended the Fami- ly of the Alavici , and the Persian Sophies) assumed the Government as rightful Suc- cessor to Osman , whose Widow, the daughter of Mahomet , he had took to wife. He conquered Rhodes , Cyprus , and a great part of Asia Minor , and was the Founder of the Family of Aben Humeyn .
681	64	7 Gizid , the son of Muhawias , more skilled in Poetry than in Arms. 8 Habdalla and Marwan , Competitors for the Supreme Dignity; but carried at last by Marwan .
685	68	9 Abimelech , the son of Marwan , established the begun conquests of Armenia , and Meso- potamia .
707	90	10 Uldor Ulit , under whom the Saracens or Moors first conquered Spain .
716	99	11 Zulcimin , Brother to Ulit , whose Captain Mulsumas besieged Constantinople , till his Ships were burnt and his men consumed with the Plague.
719	102	12 Hannar , or Hannar II. Son of Uldor Ulit .
721	104	13 Ixit , or Gizid II. the brother of Hannar , with whom during his life he was joyned Ca- liphs , and after his decease enjoyed it wholly to himself.
725	107	14 Evelid , by some called Ischam , in whose time Charles Martel made such havock of the Moors in France , Anno 734. their General then named Abderamen .
743	125	15 Gizid III. the son of Gizid the second.
744	126	16 Hyces , by some called Ibrahim , the brother of Gizid the third, slain by Marwan .
745	127	17 Marwan II. the last of the house of Benhumeyn , slain by Abdalla , of the house of Fatime and Hali .
752	134	18 Abdalla , of the house of Alavici , or Alabeci , descended from Hali , and Fatime , the eldest daughter of Mahomet : called also the Family of Abas , because of their descent from Abas the Uncle of Mahomet , and perhaps Father unto Hali .
756	138	19 Abdalla II. 20 Mahomet II. surnamed Bugiafer , or Abugefer , who built the City of Bagdat , made from that time the constant seat of his Successors till their fatal period.

777	156	21	Mahadi .	9
786	168	22	Musa , or Mosfer .	1
787	169	23	Aban , or Arachid , who compelled Irene Emperess of Constantinople , to pay him tri- bute.	23
810	193	24	Mahammad , or Adahomet III.
825	198	25	Abdalla III. who took and spoiled Crete , and overthrew the Greeks ; he also spoiled Sicilia , Sardinia , and Corfica .	17
832	215	26	Mahomet IV. wasted Italy , burnt the Suburbs of Rome , and harassed the fore-named Islands.	40

Others reckon these Caliphs to have succeeded Mahomet the 24.

815	198	25	Mamon .	13
827	210	26	Mutezam .	8
835	218	27	Wack .	4
839	222	28	Mathucal .	12
851	234	29	Montacer .	1
852	235	30	Abul Hamut .	6
858	241	31	Almatex .	4
863	245	32	Mocadi Bila .	7

After whose death, the Egyptians withdrew themselves from their obedience due to the Babylonian Caliph, and chose one of their own, to whom all the Arabians, and those of the Mahometan Religion, in Africa and Europe, submitted themselves. Of the Egyptian Caliphs, when we come into that Country: take now with you the names only of the Syri- an and Babylonian Caliphs; for story of them I find little or none: the power being totally in the hands of the Sultans of the several Provinces, and nothing left unto the Caliphs but an airy title, the shadow of that mighty Tree, which formerly had spread it self over most parts of the World.

					20 Mustenatzer .
			1255	638	21 Mustazem , the last Caliph , or High Priest of the Saracens of Bagdet , or Babylon , living in the account of a Prince or Emperour; or looked on as the Supreme Lord of the Saracen Empire: starved in his Castle of Bagdet , and his whole posterity rooted out by Allan , or Haulon the Tartar , in the first year of his reign. Yet there is still remaining a carcass of the old body, one whom they call Caliph , at whose hands the neighbour Princes use to receive their Diadems and Regalities : for so we find that Solyman the magnificent, after his Conquest of Chaldea , Mesopotamia , and Assyria , to have been by one of these poor titular Caliphs , Crowned King of Babylon , Anno 1513.

This unwieldy body of the Saracen Empire, having thus two heads, began apparently to decline: losing to the Kings of Castile and Navarre, a great part of Spain; to the Genoese, Sardinia, and Corfica; to the Norman, Naples, and Sicily; and finally most of their Empire, with their very names, to the Turks and Tartars. For Allan, or Haulon, a Tartarian Captain, starved Mustazem the Babylonian Caliph, in his Tower of Bagdet, and rooted out all his posterity, (as before was said:) and Sarracen the first Turkish King of Egypt, brained the last Egyptian Caliph with his Horseman's Mace; leaving not one of his issue or Kindred surviving: The office of the Caliphs (as to matters which concern their irreligion, and the supreme determination of the doubts and controversies which occur therein) being now executed in the Turk Dominion, by the Mufti, or Chief Priest of the Turkish Mahometans.

As Mars shewed himself a friend unto those Saracens, in their wars and triumphs; so also did Phaë- pore down no less Celestial influence, on such as addicted themselves to Scholarship. Bagdet in Chal- dea, Cairo, Fes, Morocco, in Barbary, and Corduba in Spain, were their Universities: out of which came the Philosophers, Avicenn, and Averroes; the Physicians, Rhasis, and Mesue; the Geographers, Leo and Abulfada; and almost all the Extraneous and profound Writers (as Hali, Agazet, Albunazar, &c.) in Astronomy; from whom a great part of our Astronomical and Astrological terms are borrowed.

There is now no Kingdom, Island, or Province which acknowledgeth the Empire of the Saracens, but the Kingdom of Fes and Morocco only: Arabia it self, the very first seat of their Power, acknowledging a subjection to the Turkish Empire. For first Peiras, and Deserta, being subdued by the Turks, when they conquered

The Babylonian Caliph. conquered Persia, or otherwise following the fortunes of the present Victor, were afterwards accounted of as subject unto the Mamalukes of Egypt, who out of that Country and all Syria, had by degrees dis- seized the Selzuccian Family. And as the Vassals of that Crown, though but Subjects at will, they more molested Selimus in his march towards Egypt, by falling on his Rear, and terrifying him with their night- Alarms, than all the forces of the Mamalukes, in the field against him. But Egypt being subdued, and the Mamalukes utterly destroyed, some of their Chiefs being gained by money, and the rest by promise of preferment; the whole Nation of these wild Arabs swore allegiance to him: continuing in accom- pany as Subjects, unto his Successors, but in effect doing what they list; governed as formerly by the Chiefs of their several Clanners, and in their Robberies taking no more notice of the Turk than they do of the Christians. And as for Felix, it continued also in a free condition, in respect of any foreign power; till of late times the Turks and Portugals entrenched upon them. For in the year 1538. Solymán Bassa, Ad- miral of the Turkish Fleet against the Portugals, who had diverted the Trade of the Red Sea, and other- wise given offence to Solymán the Magnificent, by aiding the Persians, went with a strong Army to take Diu, a Town and Island of East India, then in their possession. But being unable to effect it, at his coming back he called in at Aden, one of the best traded Ports of Arabia Felix; invited the King there- of aboard, most treacherously hanged him, and surprized the City. The like he also did to the King of Zibit, the Port Town to Mecca: and by that means got possession of all the Coasts of this Country, bordering on the Red Sea, or Gulf of Arabia; of which the Turks still continue Masters. But in the Inland parts, and towards the Persian Gulf, of no power at all; nor suffered to travel up and down without a Pass, from some of the Arabian Chiefs; or if they do, in danger to be set upon by the Na- tives, who brook them not. Some parts hereof which lie next unto the Isle of Ormus, made one King- dom with it; but the Kings originally of this Country, by whom the City of Ormus was first builded; and so continued till the taking of Ormus by the Portugals, Anno 1622. who since the taking of that Isle by the King of Persia, hold Mukshat, and some other pieces upon this Continent. Theretofore of the Country cantoned amongst a company of petty Princes, as in former times; before ambition taught them to devour one another.

And so much for ARABIA.

6 CHALDEA. 7 ASSYRIA. 8 MESOPOTAMIA.

These Provinces, which properly and originally constituted the Assyrian Empire, I have joyned together in the Title, because united in the Story and Affairs thereof; though severally to be considered in the Description and Chorogra- phy of them.

6 CHALDEA.

CHALDEA is bounded on the East, with Susiana, a Province of Persia; on the West, with Arabia Deserta; on the North, with Mesopotamia; and on the South, with the Persian Bay, and the rest of Deserta. Originally called Chasdim, from Chesed the fourth son of Nachor, the brother of Abraham. Chesed quogue quarus est, à quo Chasdim, id est Chaldæi postea vocati sunt, as St. Hierome hath it. But why the Chaldeans should derive their name from Chesed, being a People long before Chesed's birth, I am not able to determine: unless he taught them the first Principles of the Art of Astronomy; or was the Author of some signal benefit unto them, which we know not of. It was called afterwards Babylonia, from Babylon the chief City of it; and at this day by Belonius, Acania; by the Arabians, Keldan; by the Turks, Curdistân.

But the name of Chaldeans sometimes went beyond those bounds, taking in some part also of Mesopota- mia, as appeareth by that passage of St. Stephen, saying, Acts 7. v. 2, 3, 4. That the God of glory appear- ed to our father Abraham, when he was in Mesopotamia, before he dwelt in Charran; and said unto him, Get thee out of this Country, and from thy Kindred, and come into the Land which I shall shew thee. Then came he out of the Land of the Chaldees, and dwelt in Charran, &c. Where clearly that part of Mesopo- tamia which lay next unto Assyria, where then Abraham was, is included under the name of Chaldea, or the Land of the Chaldees. Which I desire the Reader to take notice of, because I must make use of this observation in another place.

The Country by Heroditus said to be so fruitful, that it yielded ordinarily two hundred, and in some places three hundred-fold; the blades of wheat and barley being (as he affirmeth) four fingers broad. By Pliny it is said of the Babylonians, that they mowed their Corn twice, and seeded it a third time, or else it would be nothing but blades: and yet so, that the worst of their Land yielded fifty, and their best an hundred-fold increase. Nor is the nature of the soil so altered in long tract of time, but that (as late Tra- vellers have observed) it would in all likelihood attain to its first fertility, if it were ordered with like care and diligence, as in former times. But what need more be said as to the natural fruitfulness and de- lights of this Country, then that it pleased God Almighty to make choice of some part hereoff for the ter- restrial Paradise or Garden of Eden, in which he placed our Father Adam, at his first Creation. For here that Paradise, by men both skilled in Divinity and Geography, is affirmed to have stood. Yet amongst all sorts of Writers we find different opinions. Some make Paradise to be a place of pleasure, and the four Rivers to be the four Cardinal Vertues; but these allegories on the Scripture are warrantable. Others place it in the air, under the circle of the Moon; and tell us that the four Rivers in the Scriptures mentioned, fall down from thence, and running all under the Ocean, rise up again in those places where they are now found: but this is so vain a foppery, that I will not honour it with a confutation. Such as make Paradise local, are divided also into three ranks (for I omit the rest) whereof some place it under the Equator; but this agreeth not with the bounds prescribed by the Holy Ghost. Some conceive the four Rivers to be Tigris, Euphrates, Nilus, and Ganges; and that Paradise was the whole world; but this cannot be: for then when Adam was driven out of Paradise, it must also follow that he was driven out of the world, which were most absurd. Those of the soundest judgments place it here, in an Island which is made by the Rivers Tigris and Euphrates, and some branches running from them both: the uppermost of which is called Pison, (falsly rendred Ganges) which watereth the land of Havilah, or that part of the land of Havilah, which is now called Chusestân, or Susiana, a Province of Persia; and the lowermost is named Gibon (improperly by some translated Nilus) which compasseth the East parts of Arabia Petraea, by the Septuagint for the reasons above mentioned, rendred Ethiopia. And this agreeth both with the position position of this Country, and the course of those Rivers. For that Tigris and Euphrates (which the Hebrew Text called Hiddkel, and Perab) do here joyn their Streams, is confessed on all sides. Then as for Pison, it is no other than that River by Ptolomy called Baslinus, or Regius; by Curtius more nearly Piso-Tigris, or Pasi-Tigris; Pervent ad fluvium; Pestigerin incolae vocant, as his own words are. A little stream, which watering the Land of Havilah, or the Country of the Chavelsi, or Chaulafei, or Chaulalai (for by these several names they are called amongst the Ancients, who place them betwixt the Babylonians, and the Nabatheans an Arabian people) poureth it self into the Tigris, and falls together with it into the Gulf of Persia. And finally for Gihon, by Ptolomy called Maarsaris, and by others Maarsyrus, it is no other then a branch of Euphrates, which watering the Land of Chin, or Ethiopia Affrica, take which name you will, loseth it self at last in the Lakes of Chaldea.

But though in general the Country was extremely fruitful, yet in some places was it covered with a slimy matter, which the overflowing of the waters, and the nature of the soil together, did bring forth abundantly. Used by them in their buildings, in stead of Mortar, than which more durable and binding; and therefore chosen for the cement of the Tower of Babel, Gen. 11. 3. Some also tell of a cliff, which opening sendeth out such a stink, that it killeth Birds as they flie over it; and others of a like open place near a Town called Air, which continually throweth out boiling pitch (named therefore Hell-moun by the Moors) filling therewith the adjoining fields; and that herewith the people use to pitch their Boats. But this in some places only, the Country generally being both healthy and delightful, as before was said.

The people anciently were much addicted unto Sooth-saying and Divinations, and no less noted for being Authors of the first Idolatry that was ever practised in the World. Induced unto the last perhaps by the power of their Kings, who would needs confer divine honours upon some of their Ancestors. But to the first inclined by their own disposition, and the situation of their Country, yielding a fair sensible Horizon (for the Rational is alike in all places both in hills and valleys) and consequently profitable to the observation of the rising and setting of the Stars, whether Heliacal, Acronical, Matutine, or Vesperine, as the Aristi phrase it. Whereunto may be added the length of life in those elder times, furnishing them with the greater measure of experience, concerning the distinct motions of each several Orb, and the full period of the courses of each several Planer. Certain it is, that they grew so noted in this Art, that at the last every Astrologaster, or Figure-flinger, was called a Chaldean: Genis nomine ad eos homines translati, qui sese illius sapientie specie venditabant, as Beza hath observed in his Annotations. For giving too much credit to them, the people thus flouted by the Satyrists;

Dixerit Astrologum, credent a fonte relatum Ammonis, &c.*

That is to say,

*Joves Oracles no greater credit have;
Then Sooth-sayings of a Chaldee cozening knave.*

The language which was spoken here, had the name of the Chaldee, or Chaldean tongue; of great antiquity; and sanctified by the Holy Ghost, some Chapters of the prophesie of Daniel being written in it. So different from the Hebrew in its primitive purity, that the Jews did not understand it, as appeareth by the words of the Officers of Hozekiah, 2 Kings 18. 26. desiring *Rabseke*th to speak to them in the Chaldee tongue, that the common people of the Jews might not hear his blasphemies. A further proof may be, that a man may have some knowledge in the Hebrew, and yet be ignorant of the Chaldee; as many are no doubt, at this present day. But whatsoever it was in its primitive purity, it altered afterwards when the Jews came to live amongst them, during the Captivity: out of whose long commerce with them, both Nations lost their proper Languages, and fell upon a third, made out of both, which was called the Syriack. Of this we spake before when we were in Syria and Palestine. And this is now the natural language of this Country, and its neighbour Affrica, but with a little mixture of the Greek and Arabic; not vulgarly spoken elsewhere, for ought I can find, but used by many others, in their sacred offices, by whom not commonly understood. For in this language, all the Sects of the Eastern Christians do officiate their publick Liturgies; that is to say, the Nestorians, Jacobites, Maronites, (for I reckon not the Melchites, who use the Greek Liturgy, amongst the Sectaries.) The like do also the Indians or Christians of Saint Thomas, the Coptics or Christians of Egypt, and the poor remainder of the Christians in the Isle of Zocatar, an Island on the coast of Affrick. Used to those Liturgies, when the Language was more understood amongst them; though now worn out of Vulgar knowledge by the over-spreading of the Arabic, Tartarian, and Turkish Conquests. In which the Prelates of these Churches have fallen into the great error of the Church of Rome: and without taking notice of the alterations, hapning in the Vulgar tongues of those several Nations, which are united under them into one opinion, keep up a language in their Liturgies which they understand not: as if the capacities of the people could be sooner raised, to the understanding of an unknown language, than the publick Liturgies be fitted unto their capacities. The ancient piety of the Church, and the Modern Languages of Gods people, are not inconsistent; though out of private ends some have taught us otherwise. But I fear this error (as some others) will not be so easily remedied, as reprehended. From the tongue in which they celebrate the Divine Offices of their Religion, pass we to the Religion it self, whose Sacred Offices are so celebrated.

The Christian Faith was first preached in this Country by St. Peter, of whose being in Babylon (the chief chief City hereof) himself assureth us in the last words almost of his first Epistle: and other business he had none here, but to preach the Gospel. Much persecuted by the Persians, (who were then possessed of all these parts) it prevailed at last, Christianity growing up the faster for the cutting down. The Patriarchal See, originally planted in Seleucia, successor unto Babylon in repute and greatness, if not also in name: the Bishop whereof, by order of the Nicene Council, had the Ecclesiasticall jurisdiction of these parts with the name of Catholique; and the next place in Sessions at all publick assemblies of the Church, next after the Patriarch of Hierusalem. And besides this the Indians or Christians of Saint Thomas acknowledge him for their Primate or Metropolitan; as they did afterwards in his right, the Patriarch of Musal. At this present there are some remainders of Christianity, part of them Jacobites, but the most Nestorians; of whom more anon.

Of the chief Rivers hereof we have spoken already; and Mountains there are none to hinder us in our passage forwards; So that without more delay we may take a view of their principal places. And in the first place we meet with Babel, (in the Hebrew signifying confusion) famous for confusion of languages which here happened. For immediately after the Universal deluge, Nimrod the Son of Chus, the Son of Sham, perwaded the people to secure themselves from the like after-claps, by building some stupendous edifice, which might resist the fury of a second deluge. This Council was generally embraced, Hebr only and his Family, (as tradition goeth) contradicting such an unwise attempt. The major part prevailing, the Tower began to rear a head of Majesty, 5146 paces from the grounds: having its basis and circumference equal to the height. The passage to go up, went winding about the outside, and was of an exceeding great breadth; there being not only room for horses, carts, and the like means of carriage, to meet and turn; but lodging for man and beast, and (as Vespegan reporteth) grass and corn-fields for their nourishment. But God beholding from on high this fond attempt, sent amongst them (who before were of one language) a confusion of tongues: which hindred the proceeding of this building, one being not able to understand what his fellow called for.

Babylon, on the Bank of Euphrate, the antientest City in the World, on this side of the flood, first built by Nimrod, in the place destinated to the raising of the Tower of Babel, and by him made the Seat of his Kingdom: afterwards beautified and enlarged by Simiramis, the wife of Ninus, one of his Successors; and finally much increased both in bulk and beauty by Neluchadnezzar, who therefore arrogated to himself the whole glory of it, laying in his pride, is not this the great Babel that I have builded? Dan. 4. 30. A City of great fame and state, accomped one of the worlds nine wonders, and deservedly too.

The compass of the walls 365 furlongs, (or 46 miles) according to the number of the dayes in the year; in height 50 Cubits, and of so great breadth that carts and carriages might meet on the top of them; finished in one year by the hands of 200000 workmen, employed daily in it. Situate on both sides of Euphrate, over which there was a sumptuous bridge, and at each end of that bridge a magnificent Palace: beautified also with the Temple of the Idol Bel, and famous for the Pensile Gardens, made with great charge, and born up with most lately Arches. In a word, so great and vast it was, that Aristotle saith, that it ought rather to be called a Countrey, than a City: adding withall, that when the Town was taken, it was three dayes before the furthest parts of the Town could take notice of it. Which taking of the Town must be understood of the surprize hereof by the Medes and Persians; and not of the taking of it by the Macedonians, as Pet. Ramus (as great a Clerk as he was) in his marginal notes upon the Polliticks of that Author, hath most vainly told us. Which, whether it were that there were Gates at the end of every street, which made it be so long in taking; or that the Babylonians were not wakened from their drunken feast, in the time whereof it was surprized, I determine not. Revolting in the time of Semiramis, the news came to her as she was ordering her hair: whereupon, leaving her head half-dressed she went and belieged it; never ordering the rest of her hair, till she had recovered it. How it fell into the hands of Cyrus, we learn out of Xenophons Cyri-paideia, which was in this manner. The River Euphrate ran quite thorow the Town, round about whose banks, the politick Prince cut many and deep channels: into which when the Babylonians were securely merry at a general feast, he suddenly drained and emptied the River, conveying his own forces into the Town all along the dry and yielding Channel; and in a little time made himself master of it. From the Persians it revolved in the reign of Darius Hystaspes: and that sustenance might not be wanting to the men of warre, they strangled the most part of the women, being thought in actions of this quality, not so much as necessary evils. When they had for twenty months so obstinately defended the Town, that the Persians had less hope than ever of prevailing; Zopyrus, one of Darius Captains, mangling his body, and disfiguring his face by cutting off his nose and ears, fled to the Babylonians, complaining of the tyranny of his King. They crediting his words, and knowing his prowess, committed the charge of the whole army unto him, as a man, to whom such barbarous usage had made the King irreconcilable. But he taking the best opportunity, delivered both the Town and Souldiers into the hands of his Sovereign. Which made Darius often say, that he had rather have one Zopyrus, than twenty Babylons. Here died Alexander the Great, after whose death the Grecian Captains regarded rather of their own ambitions, than the common loyalty, divided the Empire among themselves; leaving the body of the King 8 dayes unburied. A wonderful change of fortune, that he who living, thought the world too small for his valour, being dead should find no place big enough for his body. After this taking of it by the Macedonians, the glories and magnificence hereof began to decline, lessened unto a fourth part in the time of Qu. Curtius the historian; in solitude hereof reduced to desolation in the dayes of Pliny; and being turned into a Park, in which the Kings of Persia did use to hunt, in the time of Saint Hierome. That wondrous change occasioned partly by the injury of time, partly by the neglect of the Macedonians, who removed the Seat Royal of their Empire more towards Greece; but principally principally by Seleucus Nicanor, who offended with the Babylonians built the City of Seleucia.

3 Seleucia, the second City of note in all this Country, situate in a place more commodious and healthy, near the meeting of Tigris and Euphrates, and about 48 miles more North than Babylon; out of which he drew 50000 persons for the peopling of it. Nor did this new City rob the old only of its power and greatness, but also of its very name; being called Babylon in some of the ancient Authors; Βαβυλων πρωτη της Μεσοποταμιας, Βαβυλων κατα μακρον, as (for one) by Stephanus. In the primitive times of Christianity, the Bishop of this See was accounted for the Primate of the Chaldeans; with a superintendency over the Christians of India also, as before was said. But this Supplanter was in time brought to ruin also. And

4 Bagdad, a new City raised from the ruins of it: built near the foundations of Seleucia by Bagisfer the twentieth Caliph of the Mahometans, at the expence (as some write) of eighteen Millions of Crowns; which because of the many Gardens contained in it had the name of Bagdad, the word so signifying in the Arabick tongue. First built upon the Western bank of the River Tigris, near to its confluence with Euphrates; but in the year 1095. removed to the other side of the River, by Mussetaber, the 45 Caliph of the Saracens; because less subject to the inundations of that furious River. But it was reckoned still for the same City, as if built by Bagisfer; By whom being made the seat of his Royall Residence (whose Successors were from hence called the Caliphs of Babylon) it flourished in great pride and splendour: till taken and sacked by Allan, or Haalon a Tartarian Captain, who here starved Mussetaber, the last Caliph of it, and rooted out his whole posterity: as if the Caliphate and the City were to end together. But the Town revived again, though the Caliph could not; continuing to this day a City of great wealth and traffick, but nothing comparable unto what it was for beauty and bigness; being not above seven miles in compass, and having nothing in the buildings to be justly bragged of. Taken by Solyman the Magnificent with the rest of the Country, it became subject to the Turks; from them recovered by Abas the King of Persia, Anno 1625. and again recovered by the Turks, about the year 1640. In which changes it can be no marvel that she hath lost much of her former splendour. Maintained especially at the present by the trade of Aleppo, to which, besides such goods as go up the water, there pass yearly many Caravans, or troops of Merchants, each of them having in it some hundreds (if not thousands) of Camels laden with commodities. For whose safe lodging, as they pass the waies being generally ill provided for Travellers, in these Eastern Countreys; there are some houses of receipt built at the publick charge, or by some special Benefactor, to preserve his memory: most of them strong, and many very fair and lovely, which in the dominions of the Persians they call Caravane Rahes; in the Turkish Canes. And for communicating the success of their buisness unto the place from whence they came, they make use of Pigeons, which is done in this manner. When the Hen-Pigeon siteth, or hath any young, they take the Cock, and set him in an open Cage: whom, when they have travelled a daies journey, they let go at liberty, and he strait flieth home to his Mate. When they have trained them thus from one place to another, and that there be occasion to send any advertisement, they tie a letter about one of their necks, which at their return home is taken off by some of the house, advertised thereby of the estate of the Caravan. The like is also used betwixt Ormus, and Balsora. But of this enough.

5 Ctesiphon, on the River Tigris, not far from Seleucia, by whose fall it rose; occasioning the decay thereof, as that did of Babylon. So Pliny, speaking of the fall of Babylon, by the building of Seleucia to neer unto it; then adding, invicem ad hanc exhaurientiam, Ctesiphontem juxta tertium ab ea Lapidem condidit Persis. First built, saith Marcellinus, by Vardanes, afterwards beautified and walled by Pacorus, a Parthian King; and by him made the Seat-Royal of the Persian Kingdom. Many times besieged and assaulted by the Roman Emperours; but most commonly without success; and amongst others, by Julian the Apostate, that bitter enemy of the Gospel, who here breathed out his soul to Satan, in these dying words, Viciisti tandem Galilæe. But Vardanes (whosoever he was) cannot of right be called the first founder of it, who raised it rather from the rubbish of an old foundation: this City being the same with that which Moses calleth Calne; and Ezekiel, Caneb, Gen. 11. and Ezek. 27. 23. and therefore rightly said by Pliny to be built in Chalantide, or the Region of Chalne.

6 Sipparum, remarkable for the great Trench made neer it, to receive the overflowings of Euphrates, which otherwise might have annoyed the City of Babylon: in compass 1280 furlongs or 160 miles; in depth 20 fathoms. A vast and expencefull work; but that nothing was to be admired, when Babylon it self was up and in full prosperity.

7 Apamia, a City of Seleucus foundation also, situate at the fall of Pison into the River of Tigris.

8 Vologesia, placed by Polomy amongst the Cities of Chaldeæ, but by Marcellinus in Assyria; built or repaired by one of the Vologeser, Kings of Persia, and from him denominated.

9 Borsippa, by Polomy called Barsisa, memorable for the great Victory, which Cyrus the first Persian Monarch, obtained here against Nabonidus the King of Babylon, by Scaliger called Darius Medus, (of which more anon): whom having vanquished, he pardoned him (as he saith) his life, and gave him the government of Carmania.

10 Balsora, a Port Town to Babylon, situate at the fall of Euphrates into Sinus Persicus, and consequently of great wealth and trading: the riches of Arabis, Persia, and some part of India, being landed here, and so carryed to BABYLON, and thence up the water to Aleppo. Supposed to be the City of Theredon, mentioned by Polomy; built or repaired by Nebuchadnezzar, and not long since taken from the Turks by Abas, the Persian.

ASSYRIA is bound on the East, with Media, from which parted by the mountain called Cothras; on the West, with Mesopotamia, from which divided by the River Tigris; on the South with Sassania; and on the North, with some part of Turcomania, so called from Assur the Son of Sem; by whom first inhabited. But having long since lost that name, as to vulgar speech, it is by Niger called Adrinfa; by Mercator, Sarb; by the Turks, Azerum.

The Country very plain, and level, exceeding fruitfull, and abounding in Rivers. For besides Tigris which washeth one whole side thereof, Protoplus assigneth to this Country the Rivers of 2 Lycus, 3 Cyprus and 4 Gorgos; all of good note, and all of them increasing, with their tributary Streams, the greatness of Tigris.

The people were antiently great warriors, and together with the Babylonians or Chaldeans, commanded a great part of the East; extending their dominion from the Mediterranean Sea, to the River Indus; insomuch that not the people of this Province only, but of all the Provinces almost of this spacious Empire, had the name of Assyrians. The men for all this exceeding formal in their habit, wearing long robes which trailed on the very ground, their hair long, their hats or Caps Pyramidal like the Persian Miters; not stirring out of doors but perfumed with Musk, rings on their fingers, and a Scepter in their hands; and very frequent in their washings, especiall after copulation. As for their women, it was an ancient custome with them, to expose the fairest unto sale in the open Market; and the money given for those, to put off such as were deformed and not so amiable. And hence perhaps the Fathers of our times have learnt this lesson, of giving less portions with such daughters as will sell themselves; but greasing the fat sow (as the saying is) with the addition of some hundreds: which made the merry fellow say, That the money were a good match if the wench were away.

The Christians faith was first here planted by Saint Jude, and took such deep root in that plantation, that it could never be pulled up; notwithstanding the cruel persecutions raised against it, by the Kings of Persia: who when they saw there was no means to destroy it by violence, attempted in the next place to corrupt it with heresie. And to that end, as also to revenge himself upon the Emperour Heracletus, a great Champion of the Orthodox belief against Nestorianism, Chosroes the great King of Persia enforced all the Christians of his Empire unto those opinions, which he knew that Emperour condemned; permitting none who were counted Catholicks within his Dominions. By means whereof, and afterwards for want of Preachers to instruct them otherwise, (the Saracens having conquered the Persian Empire) Nestorianism prevailed so far, that it extended over all the Countreys East of Tigris, as far as India; and Northwards too amongst the Tartars, of which more hereafter. Governed by their own Patriarch, who resideth at Mosul, now the chief City of this Country; and honoured by his people with the Title of Jacelich, mistaken or pronounced amiss for Catholique: an attribute given antiently to all Orthodox Prelates.

The Opinions held by them as Nestorians, were, 1 That there were two persons in our Saviour, as well as two natures; but yet confessing that CHRIST from the first instant of his conception, was both God and man. 2 That the blessed Virgin ought not to be called Queen or the Mother of God; but yet acknowledging her to be the Mother of God the Son. 3 That Nestorius condemned for these opinions in the third and fourth General Councils, was an holy man; for whose sake they condemn Saint Cyril his professed Antagonist, and all those Councils wherein any censure was laid upon him. In other points, though differing from the Church of Rome, they are right enough, (their rejecting Episcopal infirmation excepted only.) As 1 in celebrating the Sacraments of the Lords Supper with leavened bread; 2 communicating in both kinds; 3 enjoying no necessity of auricular Confession; 4 contracting marriages in the second degree of Consanguinity; 5 permitting second and third marriages unto men in Orders, after the death of their first wives; 6 not praying before the Cross, nor giving religious worship to the Crucifix, or other Images. So much for these Nestorian Sectaries, if so named aright, considering the qualifications added unto their opinions; now (but corruptly) called Nestorians: the greatest Sect of Christians in all the East.

The solemnities which these Christians use in contracting marriage, because not very usual, I will here relate. Their wives they never see till the day of their marriage, but hearing a good report of the young Woman, negotiate with her parents for her. Agreed upon the business, they meet in the Chancel of the Church, wherein there is a partition with an hole in it: the Bridegroom and his friends standing on the one side; the Bride and her kindred, on the other. When there, the Coffice or Church-man biddeth the Bridegroom to put his hand thorow the hole in the Partition, and take his Bride by the hand, which he doth accordingly: the mother of the Bride, with a sharp-pointed instrument, made of purpose, pricking the *Bridegroom*s hand all over, with sufficient eagerness. If when he feeleth the smart, he lets go her hand, they take it for a sign that he will not love her; but if he hold her fast, and wring her hand till she cry again, they take it for a very good Omen, and are glad they have so well bestowed her. After the marriage is consummate, if a male child be born unto them, the Father loseth his own name, and is called by the name of his eldest Son: so as if the Fathers name be Moses, and his Sons name Joseph; the Father is no more called Moses, but Abu-Joseph, or the Father of Joseph. So highly do they reverence marriage, and the fruit thereof, posterity.

It was antiently divided into these six parts, 1 Arraphschitis, bordering on Armenia Major; so called for Arphaxaditis, or the plantation of Arphaxad, the Son of Sem. 2 Alidene, bordering on Mesopotamia, so called, quasi Adidat, or inaccessible, because fenced with such unfordable Rivers, Christians under his obedience, computed formerly at 160000 Families, reduced since unto 50000. That which they hold as Jacobites, distinct from all other Christians is 1 The acknowledgement but of one nature, one will, and one operation (as there is but one person) in Christ our Saviour. 2 y. In signing their Children before Baptism, in the Face or Arm, with the sign of the Cross, imprinted with a burning Iron. 3 Retaining Circumcision, and using it in both Sexes. 4 Affirming the Angels to consist of two natures, Fire, and Light; and 5 Honouring the memory of Dioscorus (of Alexandria) and Jacobus Syntactes, condemned by the ancient Councils. The points wherein they differ from the Church of Rome, are,

1 Not enjoying the People the necessity of Confession to a Priest, before they admit them to communicate.

2 Not admitting Purgatory, nor Prayers for the Dead.

3 Administering the Sacrament of the Eucharist in both kinds.

4 Allowing the marriage of Priests; And

5 Teaching that the souls of men deceased, are not admitted presently to the Vision of God, but remain somewhere in the Earth, to expect Christs coming. In which last, (setting aside the determination of the place) as they have many of the Fathers concurring with them; so to the first (touching the unity of natures in our Saviour Christ) they have of late added such qualifications, as possibly may make it capable of an Orthodox sense.

Chief Rivers of this Countreys (besides Tigris and Euphrates, of which more hereafter,) 1 Chaboras, which rising in Mount Mafus, passing directly South, falleth into Euphrates; also doth 2 Syngarus, by Pliny; called Musca, arising out of the Mountain Syngarus; which is but the more Western part of the said Mount Mafus. Which names of Musca, Mafus, and the Mafeni (being the name of a People dwelling thereabouts) shew plainly that they go upon very good grounds who place Masch, or Mefsch, one of the sons of Aram, in these parts of the Countrey.

It was divided anciently into, 1 Anthemafus, 2 Chalcitis. 3 Caulanitis. 4 Accabene. 5 Ancorabilis and 6 Ingine: each part containing several Cities or Towns of name. These six when conquered by the Romans, reduced unto two Provinces only, viz. 1 Mesopotamia, lying on the South of Mount Mafus, or the head of Chaboras; and 2 Ofshoene on the North: this last so named from one Ofshoes, the Prince or Governour of these parts in the time of the Persians, as Procopius telleth us.

Chief places of the whole, 1 Edessa, the Metropolis of Ofshoene, situate on the River Scirtas, which runneth thorow the middle of it, not far from the fall thereof into Euphrates. Memorable for the Story of Agbarus before related, amongst Church-Historians: and in the Roman Histories, for the death of the Emperour Caracalla, slain here by the appointment of Macrinus, Captain of his guard. The occasion of this. The Emperour conscious to himself of his own unworthiness, employed one Maternianus to enquire amongst the Magicians in the Empire, who was most likely to succeed him: by whom accordingly advertised that Macrinus was to be the man; The letters being brought unto Caracalla, as he was in his Chariot, were by him delivered with the rest of the Packets, to the hands of Macrinus, (whoby his office was to be attendant on the Emperours person) that he might open them, and signifie unto him the contents thereof at his better leisure. Finding by this the danger in which he stood, he resolved to strike the first blow; and to that end entrusted Martialis, one of his Centurions, with the execution; by whom the Emperour was here killed, as he withdrew himself, Levanda vesica gratia, as my Author hath it. So impossible a thing it is to avoid ones Destiny; so vain a thing for any Prince to think of destroying his Successor: and therefore it was very well said to Nero in the times of his tyranny, Omnis licet occideris, Successorem tuum occidere non potes, that though he caused all the men of eminence to be forthwith murdered; yet his Successor would survive him, and escape the blow. But to return unto Edessa, in following times it was made one of the four Tetrarchies of the Western Christians, when they first conquered Syria, and the Holy Land; the two first Governours or Tetrarches, successively succeeding Godfrey of Bouillon in the Kingdom of Hiernsalem. But in the year 1142. it was again recovered by Sanguin the Turk, Father of Noradin Sultan of Damascus, and by the loss thereof, no fewer than three Arch-Bishopricks withdrawn from the obedience of the See of Antioch.

2 Cologenbar, another strong peece adjoining, besieged on the taking of Edessa, by the same Sanguin, who was here stabbed in a drunken quarrell by one of his familiar friends; and the Fort saved for that time.

3 Nisibis, situate somewhat to the East of Mount Mafus, called also Antiochia Mygdonie, from the River Mygdonius, which runneth thorow it; and afterwards Constantia, from Constantius the Son of Constantine. A City of great note in those elder times, a Roman Colony, and the Metropolis of the Province of Mesopotamia, properly and specially so called: which being besieged by Sapor the King of Persia, (Constantius ruling in the East) and in no small danger to be lost, was gallantly defended by James the then Bishop of it, whom Theodo calls not only, Episcopus Civitatis, sed Principem & Ducem, not the Bishop only of the City, but the Prince and Captain of it, lib. 2. cap. 31. So little inconsistency was there found in those early daies, betwix the Episcopall function and civil business, that the Bishops were not interdicted from the Acts of war, when the necessities of the State did invite them to it. The City not long after most unworthily delivered to the said Sapores, by the Emperour Jovinian; which drew along with it, in short time, the loss of the Province.

4 Ur, seated on the East of Nisibis, betwixt it and Tigris; and so placed by Ammianns who had travelled this Countrey. Conceived to be the Birth-place of Abraham, and called Ur of the Chaldees, Gen. 11. 28. either because the Chaldees were in those daies possessed of the place; or because the name of Chaldean did comprehend aliothose parts of this Countrey which lay towards Tigris, as was shewn before.

before. For that the place from which Terah the Father of Abraham did return to Haran in Mesopotamia, was rather situate in this coast where Ur is placed by Ammianns, then betwix the Lakes of Childea and the Persian Gulf, where most Writers place it, may appear probable for the reasons which are here subjoined. 1 Because it is said by Jalkna, chap. 24. ver. 12. That Terah the Father of Abraham, and the Father of Nachor, dwelt on the other side of the Flood; that is to say, on the further side of the River Euphrates, and that too ante agum, as the Septuagint; ab initio, as the Vulgar Latine; in the first beginning. Which cannot be understood of any Ur, placed on or near the Lakes of Chaldea, those being on this side of that River. 2 Because all the rest of Abrahams Ancestors from Phaleg downward, were seated in the Northern parts of Assyria, and Mesopotamia: and it were strange that Terah should be planted so far from the rest of his kindred. 3 Because from Ur in Mesopotamia, near the banks of Tigris, the way to Canaan (to which Terah did intend to go) was directly by Haran: whereas if he had dwelt (as some say he did) by the Lakes of Chaldea, his way had been directly West thorow Arabia Deserta, and not to have travelled, with his family, so far North as Haran; and then to have fallen back as much Southward, as he had gone Northward, crossing Euphrates twice with his herds and cattel. 4 Haran, the place to which Terah did remove, when he went from Ur, and from which Abraham did remove, when he went towards Canaan so named in memory of Haran the son of Terah: but called afterwards by the name of Carræ, and by that name well known to the Roman Writers for the death of Crassus, that wealthy Roman. Whose estate (besides the tenth which he offered to Herules, and three moneths corn distributed amongst the poor) amounted to 7100 Talents, which comes in our money, to one Million, 331250 l. But all his wealth could not preserve him from the slaughter, slain near this City, with the routing of his Army also, by Herodes King of Parthia: of which briefly Lucan, miserando funere Crassus

Which may be Englished to this purpose,

By a defeat lamented Crassus stains

With Roman blood the Assyrian Carras Plains.

Called the Assyrian Carræ by Poetical licence, because the Assyrians formerly had been Lords thereof. And no less memorable was it in the times foregoing, for a famous temple of the Moon, worshipped here (but in no place else) under both Sexes: some honouring it as a female Deity, then called Dea Luna; and others in the shape and dress of a man, and called Deus Lunus. But with this fortune and success, as saith Spartianus, qui Lunam femineo nomine putabat nuncupandam, is mulierilus semper inferviat; that they who worshipped it in the form of a Woman, should be always subject to their wives (I trow there were but few of that Religion) qui vero Marem deum crederet, is uxori dominetur; but he that worshipped it as a man, should preserve the mastery. 6 Amida, near the River Tigris, the Metropolis of Mesopotamia, when one Province only, and before it fell into the hands of the Romans; much beautified by Constantius the son of Constantine, by whom named Constantias. But that new name dying with him, the old revived: of great strength, as a frontire Town against the Persians, and by them much aimed at. Honoured of late times with the Residence of the Patriarch of the Jacobite Christians, as the chief City of this Province; for this cause also made the dwelling of the Pseudo-Patriarch of the Nestorians (or Nosstrans) of the Popes erection; and the chief Seat also of the Bassi or other Officer, governing this Countrey for the Turks; by whom called Caramit, or Kara Amida, that is to say, Amida the black, because it was walled with black stone. 7 Phalga, or Phaliga, at the meeting of Chaboras with Euphrates not far from Carræ; mentioned by Stephanus, and Arrianus, and by Ptolomy mistakingly called Pharga: the seat or first plantation of Phaleg, one of Abrahams Ancestors: Serug, another of them giving name to 8 Sarug, about a dayes journey off from Haran, spoken of by some later Writers. 9 Singara, on the River so named, a fortified City in the time of Ammianns, by whom mentioned, lib. 20. 10 Bezabde, mentioned by the same Author, by whom said to have been a very strong Fort, seated on a pretty high hill, and bending towards the banks of Tygris, before whose times it had anciently been called Phanicha. 11 Virta, supposed to have been the work of Alexander the Great, circled with Walls, environed with Half-moons and Bulwarks, and made unaccessible: in vain besieged by Sapores the Persian King, after the taking of Bezabde. The same perhaps with the Birtha of Ptolomy. 12 Merdin, not far from which in the Monastery of Saphran, is the Patriarchal See of the Jacobite Se-tharics.

The first Inhabitants of these Countreys, though united from the first beginning under the same Principles and form of Government, came from several Families: all the three sons of Noah concurring as it were in this Plantation. From Nimrod, Havilah, and others of the posterity of Chus the son of Ham, came the Babylonians: with whom Chesed the son of Nachor, of the house of Sem, intermingling families; or being the Author of their language, or of some other signal benefit; gave to them the name of Chaldæans, where came that of Chaldeans. From Assur, Arphaxad, and those of Arphaxads posterity, intermingled with the sons of Mash, the son of Aram, came the Mesopotamians, and Assyrians. And that Japhet also and his children may put in for a part, the neighbourhood of the Medes, and Albanes, descended from him, makes it somewhat probable.

But whatsoever Parents they descended from, Nimrod the son of Chus, made so bold with them, as to bring them under his command: planting in Chaldea, the Cities of Babylon, and Calne; in Assyria, Nimive, Rhesem, and Caluch; and finally Rebbooth (if that were Birtha, as some think it was)

was) in Mesopotamia. By these strong Forts he curbed the native, and assured his power; being the first that altered the Paternal form of Government, and drew unto himself the Government of several Nations, not having any dependance upon one another. The foundation thus laid by him, his Successors soon raised the building to a wondrous height; advancing the Assyrian Empire, from the Mediterranean Sea, to the River Indus: and that too in a shorter time than could be imagined, but that the world was then divided into petty States, not cemented together with the ligaments of power and policy: For though there be little found of Belus the Son of Nimrod, but that he spent most of his time in draining the marshes, and making firm ground of those vast fennes which lay near to Babylon, which were works of peace: yet by those and the like works of peace, he so settled his affairs at home, that he gave his son Ninus the better opportunity to look abroad: who mightily improved his Empire, and was the greatest and most powerful of all that line; extending his dominions from the River Indus, to the Mediterranean; and from the Caspian Sea, to the Southern Ocean. His Successors we shall find in the following Catalogue of

The Assyrian Monarchs.

- A. M.*
 1798 1 Nimrod, called by some Saturnus Babylonius, the son of Chus, and Nephew of Cham, was the first who altered the Paternal Government, and usurped dominion over others; making Babylon his Imperial City. 47.
 1845 2 Belus, or Jupiter Babylonicus, the son of Nimrod, whose Image was worshipped by the old Idolaters under the names of Bel, and Baal. 62.
 1907 3 Ninus, the son of Belus, conquered Armenia, Syria, Media, Babylonia, and the Persian Provinces; and removed the imperial Seat to Ninive, by him much beautified and enlarged. 52.
 1959 4 Semiramis, the wife of Ninus subdued the Arabians; but invading the Indians also, she was vanquished and slain by their King Siamrobes. Of this great Lady it is said, that she was born in Acalon, a Town of Syria, and exposed to the fury of wilde beasts. But being born not to die so ingloriously, she was brought up by shepherds, and at full age presented to the Syrian Vice-roy, who gave her in marriage to his only Son. Going with him to the wars, she fell in acquaintance with Ninus, who liking her person and spirit, took her to his bed. This bred in him a greater affection towards her, so that he granted her at her request, the command of the Empire for five daies; making a Decree, that her will in all things should be punctually performed: which boon being gotten, she put on the Royall Robes, and (as some Writers do report) commanded the King to be slain. Having thus gotten the Empire, she exceedingly enlarged it, leading with her an Army consisting of one hundred thousand Chariots of war, three millions of Foot, and half a million of Horse. A woman in whom there was nothing not to be honoured or applauded, but her insatiable lust: in which if the Greek writers say true (as we have no reason to believe it of so gallant a woman) she was very guilty.

 being 38 in all, there is scarce any thing remaining but the very names; registered in this order by Berosus, or rather by Eriar Annus a Monk of Viturbum in Tuscany, who hath thrust upon the world, the fancies of his own brain, under the name of that ancient Historian. The chief Kings of note after Semiramis, were,
 1 Ninus, or Zameis her Son; who by his Deputies and Lieutenants subdued the Arrians, Babrians, and Cassians; but was otherwise a man of effeminate and unkingly carriage. And therefore is conceived to be the elder Bucchois, so much celebrated amongst the Grecians.
 2 Belus the second, who recovered that Countrey which afterwards was called Jndaa, to the Assyrian Empire, from which it had revolted in the time of his Predecessor, (on the defeat of Amraphel, one of his Lieutenants, by the sword of Abraham;) and subdued many other Nations.

3 Belochus

3. Belochus Priscus, the tenth King, who by some Writers is said to be the Author of Divination by the flying of Birds, called Aspicium. For of Sooth-saying there were in all four kinds.

1. This Aspicium, quasi Avispicium, taken from the flight of Birds, either on the right hand, or on the left; (and hence the Proverb cometh, avi sinistra, good luck, because in giving, the right hand is opposite to the receivers left) or from the number of the Birds, whence Romulus had promised to him the Empire, before his Brother, because he had seen the double number of Vultures: or lastly, from the nature of them, whence the same Romulus, seeing the Vultures, was (saith Florus) speci plenius urbem bellatricem fore, ita illi sanguini & praeda assuetæ aves pollicebantur.

2. Aruspicium, ab Aras inspiciendo, in which the Sooth-sayers observed whether the Beast to be sacrificed came to the Altars willingly, or not: whether the entrails were of natural colour, exulcerate, &c. or whether any part were wanting. All Histories afford variety of examples in this kind; I need give no particular instance. A kind of Divination said to be practised first by the Tuscan, or Iturians; instructed in the knowledge thereof by one called Tages, who appearing to certain Plough-men out of a Furrow, taught them this mystery, and so vanished.

3. Tripudium, so called quasi Terripudium, and Terripavium, from the trembling or shaking of the Earth, was a conjecture of future successes, by the rebounding of crumbs cast unto Chickens. We have an instance of this in the life of Tiberius Gracchus, who being feditiously busy in promoting the Law Agaria, was fore-warned by the keeper of his Chickens to desist from that enterprize; because when he had thrown the crumbs to the Coop, there came out but one of the Chickens only, and the same without eating went back again; which was taken for a sign of ill luck, as the greedy devouring of them had been of good. But Tiberius slighting the advertisement, and pursuing his design, was the same day slain.

4. Augurium, so called ab avium garritu, was a prediction from the chirping or chattering of birds; as also from the sounds and voyces heard they knew not whence, nor on what occasion. In which latter kind the death of Cesar was divined from the clattering of Armour in his house; and the poisoning of Germanicus by the founding of a Trumpet of its one accord: In the former, an Owl screeching in the Senate-house, was deemed ominous to Augustus; and a company of Crows following Sejanus to his house, with great noise and clamor, was judged to be fatal to that great Favorite: and so it proved.

4. Manitus, the thirteenth King; who revived again the ancient Discipline, corrupted by the sloathfulness and effeminacy of his Predecessors; and by the terrour of his name awed the Egyptians.

5. Afcadates, the eighteenth King, more absolute in Syria and the Western parts, than any of the Kings before him.

6. Sardanapalus, the last King of this Race, who being wondrous effeminate, and utterly unable to govern so great an Empire, gave opportunity to Arbaces, his Lieutenant in Media, to conspire against him. By whom, associated with Belochus Governor of Babylon, he was besieged in his City of Ninive: and there reduced unto such extremities, that gathering his treasures all together, he burnt himself and them in one funeral Pile; eo solum facto virum imitatus, as is said by Justine. The treasure which he is said to have burnt with him, amounted to one hundred Millions of Talents of Gold, and a thousand Millions of pounds of Silver: which in our English money comes to twenty thousand and five hundred Millions of pounds. A mass of money, which as it must be long in gathering, so probably it had not seen the Sun in many years, and therefore grown rusty, might require a fire to purge it. This Sardanapalus afforded it, it may be, to end his life with that, in which he placed his Summum Bonum: It may be in spite unto his enemies, and it is possible it might be in policy, that so great a treasure not falling to the possession of his foes, might so much the more dislike them from making resistance against, or detaining the Empire from his next rightful Successors. For it is of all things most foolish, both to lose our Treasure, and with it to enrich our Adversaries. On which consideration the Spaniards fired their Indian Fleet at Gades; and the Genoese theirs at Tripolis, that their lading might not come into the possession of their enemies, the English and Mahometans. After the death of this Sardanapalus, Arbaces took Medea, and Persia with the adjoining Provinces; Belochus strengthened himself in Assyria, Chaldea, and the adjacent Regions, his Kingdom being called the new Kingdom of Assyria.

3304. 8. Nabopolassar, who vanquished Pharaoh Necho King of Egypt. 25.
3339. 9. Nabuchodonosor the great, by some called the Hercules of the East, who conquered Egypt in the life of his father; with whom he reigned for a time, and mightily enlarged the City of Babylon. He joyned also with Assyages King of Medes, in subverting the proud City of Nimve; and in the eighteenth year of his reign destroyed Jerusalem, and carried the people captive unto Babylon. But in the last seven years of his reign he was so distracted, that he lived not much unlike the Beasts of the field; according to the word of God spoken by Daniel, Chap. 4. during which time his son Evilmerodach, his daughter Nicocris, with Niglissas her husband, and Labaradach their son, governed his Empires as Protectors; and therefore are by some reckoned as Kings. Finally, Nabuchadnezzar having recovered his senses, was again restored unto the Throne; and dyed, when he had reigned in all 44. years.
3383. 10. Evilmerodach, the son Nabuchadnezzar, slain by Assyages, King of the Medes. 26.
3409. 11. Balthassar, son of Evilmerodach (the Nabonidus of Berosus) a Prince of a dissolute and cruel nature, was in the latter end of his reign assailed by Cyaxares the son of Assyages (whom the Scriptures call Darius Medus) and by Cyrus the Persian: by whom he was slain in the seventeenth year of his reign, and the Empire of the Babylonians was transferred to the Medes and Persians. A. M. 3426.

That this was the end of Balthassar, is the common opinion. But Josephus Scaliger in his learned and industrious work, De emendatione temporum, maketh him to be slain in a tumult by his own people: who elected into the Empire a Nobleman of the Medes, called in prophane stories, Nabonidus; in divine, Darius Medus; who after a 17. years reign was slain by Cyrus King of the Persians. But by the leave of so worthy a man, this cannot hold good. For the Lord by his Prophet Jeremy, had pronounced (Chap. 27.) That all Nations should serve Nabuchadnezzar, and his son, and his sons son; whereas Nabonidus was a Prince of strange blood, and so the Nations were not to serve him; and in Balthassar, the sons son of Nabuchadnezzar, was this word accomplished. But let us examine his argument, and withal the scoffs, which very prodigally he bestoweth on such as maintain the contrary opinion: Natio Chronologorum, the whole rout of Chronologers; boni & diligentes viri, good simple meaning men; & addunt alia nihil veriora, are his first Compliments. Ut igitur, quod Chronologorum est, omnes respiciant, &c. therefore that they may repent their ever being Chronologers, he bringeth in Berosus, cited by Josephus, in his first book against Apion. But Berosus there maketh Nabonidus (to whom he saith the Kingdom of Balthassar was by the people delivered) to be a Babylonian, and not as Scaliger would have him say, a Nobleman of the Medes; neither can the authority of Berosus countervail that of Daniel, who in Chap. 6. telleth Balthassar, that his Kingdom should be divided among the Medes and Persians. His second argument is drawn from the nature of the word, αβασιλειας, & βασις & βασις αβασιλειας τω ερωτω, as it is in the same Chapter, and Darius the Mede took the Empire: by which word took is implied (saith he) not a forcible invasion, but a willing acceptance of the Empire offered. To this we answer, that Darius indeed took the Empire quietly and willingly, being offered unto him by Cyrus, and his army consisting of Medes and Persians, who according to the word of God, had taken it from Balthassar, Darius being then absent. Quid si prolatvero (saith he) cum cognominatum fuisse Medum? he hath yet one trick more than all these; and Medus must not be the national name, but the surname of Darius, which he proveth out of a fragment of Megasthenes, cited by Eusebius, in his worke De Preparatione Evangelicæ, where he is called Μήδης (ουαλις & ισαυ Μήδης) &c. an argument of all others the most slight and trivial. For besides that Μήδης may there as well be the name of his Nation, as of his Family; and besides that, it thwarteth the places of Jeremy and Daniel, already quoted; it is diametrically opposite to another place of the same Daniel, in his ninth Chapter; where he is called Darius, of the seed of the Medes. Of this Darius more anon when we come into Media. As for Nabonidus, quæst. onlets he was the same with Balthassar. For besides that Josephus, and Berosus, attribute to either of them the reign of 17 years, the same Josephus (who might best know the truth in this case) telleth us that Balthassar was by the Babylonians called Nabonidel, a name not so great a stranger to Nabonidus, as Scaliger's Darius, or Herodotus his Labinitus. But in this we must pardon Joseph. Scorn and contradiction was a part of his essence. For had he not been in some things singular, in all peremptory, he had neither been a Scaliger, nor the son of Julius.

But leaving Joseph to the singularity of his own conceits, we find nothing done by the Assyrians or Chaldeans after this subjection, which might denote them to have been once the Lords of so great an Empire. Successively invaded by the Medes, Persians, and Macedonians; then by the Persians again, afterwards by the Saracens, next by the Turks, a third time by the Persians, once again by the Turks of the Ottoman Family, unto whom now subject: never endeavouring to assert in the way of war, or opposition, either their ancient reputation, or their native liberties; but suffering themselves to be won, lost, fought for, and again recovered by their quarrellsome Masters, as if they had not title to their own Country, but were born to follow the fortunes of all pretenders. The reason of which is principally to be ascribed to the form of Government used amongst the Persians, which was so Despotic and absolute, if not tyrannical, that they held all the people conquered by them in the nature of slaves; not suffering any to grow great in a state of inheritance, or to enjoy any place of power and profit under them in the conquered Provinces, but at the pleasure of the Prince; as it is now used amongst the Turks of the Ottoman Empire. By means whereof, the great men having no alliances amongst themselves, and as few dependants amongst the people, were never able to make head against the Conqueror; but in the fall of the present Prince fell together with him: it being a good rule of Machiavel, that where the ancient Nobility is in good regard, linked in alliances with themselves, and well respected by the common and inferior people, people; there it is difficult for the Invader, though a Conqueror, to win a Country, and harder to keep it being conquered. But on the other side, where Nobility is quite worn out, and the Prince doth hold his Subjects in the nature of slaves, there both the conquest will be easie, and soon assured. For to what purpose should the Subjects resist the Conqueror, or stand any longer to their King, then he stands to himself, when they are sure the Conqueror can lay upon them no heavier burdens, then they were accustomed to before, and have withall a flattering hope, that their new Masters may be gentler to them, then their former were? It fares with them no otherwise then with Egypt's Asi, which refused to take the opportunity of an escape from the hands of the enemy, by which he was taken, because he knew it was not possible they should lay more load upon his back, then his old Master made him bear. To which condition the Chaldeans and Assyrians being brought by the Persians, and never accustomed to the taste of a better fortune, have followed the same successes as the Persians did, falling together with them from one hand to another; the particular account of whose estate we shall finde in Persia, taking this only for the close, that when Solymann the Magnificent had discomfited Tamas King of Persia, and taken the great City of Bagdat; Caramit, Merdin, and the rest both in Assyria, Chaldaa, and Mesopotamia, submitted to him without any resistance, and received his Garrisons. And for a confirmation of his estate, he received at the hand of the Caliph of Babylon (who by an old Prerogative had the nomination or confirmation, at the least, of the Kings of Assyria, and the Sultans of Egypt) the Royal Ornaments and Ensigns, Anno 1534. incorporating by that means those Regions into his estates, and making them Provinces of his Empire; in which he left a Beglerbeg at Bagdat to command in chief, and divers Sanziacks in their severall and respective Provinces. And though the Persian Kings have since taken, & are still possessed of some places of importance in them; yet I account them in regard of the said investiture, and the long possession following on it, for Provinces of the Turkish Empire: as I do Media of the Persian, though Tauris and some other pieces of it be possessed by the Turks.

MOUNT TAURUS.

MOUNT-TAURUS is a constant and continual ridge of hills, which extend from the Mediterranean to the Indian Seas; running thorow the whole length of Asia from West to East, and dividing it, as the Equator doth the Globe, into North and South. It was called Taurus from the word Tur or Tamr, which in the Syriac and Chaldean signifieth a Mountain; the common name of all high mountains being made peculiar unto this, by reason of its greatness and continued length: yet so, that it had other names also in some parts thereof, according to the Regions and Nations by which it passed, and on which it bordered. The course whereof is thus set down by Sir Walter Raleigh: premising only, that it beginneth in the Province of Lycia, a Region of Asia Minor, neer the Mediterranean. These Mountains (saith he) which sunder Cilicia from the rest of Asia the less, on the North thereof are called Taurus; and where they part it from Comagena a Province of Syria, they are called Amannus. On the East side of the River Euphrates (which forceth it self a way thorow it) it sometimes resumeth the name of Taurus, as in Ptolemies three first Tables of Asia, and sometimes taketh the name of Niphates, as in the fourth: retaining that uncertain appellation, so long as they bound Armenia from Mesopotamia. After the River Tigris hath also cut them asunder, they continue the name of Niphates altogether, untill they separate Assyria and Media, but then they call themselves Coatras: although between the upper and lower Media, they appear not always, but are seen discontinued, and broke in pieces; such parts of it as are found in the middle of that Country being called Orantes; those which lie more towards the East being named Coronus; out of the Southern parts whereof issueth the River of Bagradus, which divideth the antient Persia from Carmania. Continuing further Eastward by the name of Coronus, they give unto the Parthians and Hyrcanians, their proper Countreys: and afterwards change themselves into the Mountains of Seriphi, out of which riseth the River Manargus. And now beginning to draw towards the end of their course, they first make themselves the South border of Bactria, and are then known by the name of Parapanisus: and after take unto themselves the name of Caucasus, where the famous Rivers Indus, Hyaspis, and Zaradrus, have their first beginnings. In this point do they hold their heads exceeding high; to equal the Mountains of Imanus, whom they encounter within the 35, 36, and 37. Degrees of Latitude, and the 140 Degree of Longitude: known by no other name then this, till finally they terminate their course in the Indian Seas. So far, and to this purpose, that noble Gentleman. It may be added hereunto, that though the antient Writers could trace the course of this Mountain, no further then the meeting of it with Imanus; yet later observations follow it to the wall of China: the parts beyond Caucasus being now known by the names of Delanguer, and Nangroco. But this is to be understood only of the main body of these Mountains, which hold on in an even course from West to East; nor of those spurs and branches of it, which shoot either to the North, or South; such as are the Anti-Taurus in some parts of the lesser Asia; the Gordiean Hills, and the Montes Moschici, with those which Pliny calleth Pariadri, others Pariadri, in Armenia Major; and that of Caboras, which sheweth it self on the North East of Assyria, with divers others.

In such a continual course of Mountains it must needs be that many fierce Nations did inhabit in former times, not easily subdued, nor so soon reduced unto civility, as such who were possessed of places less defensible, and fitter for commerce and traffick with the rest of mankind. And they continued in these late times, the last which were brought under by the Turk and Persians, the mightiest Monarchs of those parts; though bordering on, or totally environed with their dominions. Two Kingdoms they afforded of long continuance: one towards the West where it closeth with the Mountains of Anti-Taurus, and divideth Syria Comagena from Armenia Major; the other towards the East, separating Media from Hyrcania. For want of other names to describe them by, we will call the first the Kingdom of Aladenles, and the last the Kingdom of Bahaman; according to the names of the two last Kings.

The Kingdom of AL ADEULES contained that part of this Mountainous tract, which beginning in or about Anti-Taurus, extended it self as far towards the East, as to the banks of the River Tigris, where they part Mesopotamia from Armenia Major. Inhabited by a people naturally very fierce & warlike, more famous for nothing then their want of all things; who as men dwelling in a rough and barren Country, could little profit themselves by husbandry, and therefore gave themselves to grazing; breeding on their pastures some store of horse and camels, which they sold to others, but especially maintaining themselves and their families by hunting and stealing. Supposed to come originally from the Cappadocians, and Armenians of the lesser Asia, which by long and continual wars in the former Ages, were forced to forsake their dwellings, and for safety of their lives to fly to these unpeopled & desolate Mountains.

Mountains. Where searching every hill and dale, and following the opportunity of Springs and Rivers, but chiefly the mildest Temperature of the Air, and most chearfull aspect of the Sun: they built in many places poor Villages, and afterwards some better Towns. The principal of which is named Manna, so called as it is conceived from the River Marfus, which rising out of the Mountain Calene, passeth by the same, and not far off falleth into the River Euphrates.

When it was made a Kingdom first, it is hard to say, the Kings hereof being mean and inconsiderable in the eye of the world; nor worth the conquering, and wanting power to conquer others and enlarge their territories: nor indeed worthy any King but one of their own, who could content himself with reigning over Rocks and Mountains. The last was Aladenles, so much spoken of in the Turkish Histories, and by them called the Mountain King. Conceived by some writers to have been the Author of such a Paradise, as we shall find described when we come to Drangian, a Province of Persia; and by that means grown formidable to his neighbouring Princes. But that which made him most really and truly known, in the stories of the former times; was the stout opposition which he made against the Turks, in their wars with Persia: He had before given no small check to the proceedings of Bajazet, the second, in his conquest of the Caramanian Kingdom; and no less troubled Selimus the Son of Bajazet, in his Persian wars, impeaching what he could the greatness of the Ottoman Family. Fought with by Selimus, he made good his ground with a great deal of courage, till betrayed by Alis Big, General of his horse, and seeing his Army terrified by the shot of the Turks, he was fain to flee. But being at last taken, and put to death by the command of Selimus, his Kingdom was converted to a Turkish Province, Anno 1515. and so continueth to this day.

The Kingdom of BAHAMAN was situate more towards the East, amongst the Mountains which divide Media from Hyrcania, as before was said. The Mountains in those parts so high, that Travellers at the end of a two days journey, may discern the middle Region of the Air to be beneath them: exceeding troublesome to ascend, about 50 miles in height when once got to the top; but more dangerous by reason of the Rocks and Precipices, in the going down: full of inhospitable streights, and so cold and barren, that were not Sovereignty a temptation above all resistance, no man would take upon him the command of so poor a Kingdom. And yet in this extremity of height and cold, there is great quantity of Sulphur, which makes it sparkle in the night, like the hill Vesuvius, in Italy; by means whereof here are many Hot-Baths, three of them walled about, two open; to which resort unsound and decrepit people, in very great multitudes. The chief Town of it Lary-Joon, in the ordinary road or pass betwixt Omial the last Town of Hyrcania, and Dumoon the first of Media. But the Kings Seat was in a Village called Rynas, where he had a Castle so built upon the best advantages of art and nature, that it seemed invincible: adorned, above, with gardens, flowers, and most pleasant fruits; and furnished beneath with a Rivulet of purest water, which pleasantly passing thorow the Castle, fell into the Valleys. A Castle of so large a circuit, that besides the Kings Family or Court, it was able to admit a garrison of 10000 men. The last King hereof was the forefaid Bahaman, derived from a line, descent of Royal Ancestors, comparing for antiquity with the Persian Sophies: who though ill-neighbourred on both sides, by the Tartarian on the one, and the Kings of Persia on the other; yet had they with great fortune, policy, and valour, maintained their Royalties against all pretenders. But Alas the late Persian Sophy, having either conquered or reduced Hyrcania, picked a quarrel with Bahaman: pretending that by the opportunity of his situation he might rob his Caravans, hinder his progress towards the Hyrcanian Sea, and run into other Channels all the Streams or Rivers, which rising from Mount Taurus watered and enriched his Persian Territories. And though Bahaman never had attempted any of the things objected; yet it was cause enough of quarrel that he might do so: and therefore is besieged in his Castle of Rynas, with an Army of 30000 men. Finding no possibility to prevail by force, the General of the Persians proceeds by treachery: invites the old King into his Camp under colour of parley, and by his means drew his two Sons out of the Castle to the parley also. Whom having got into his power, he first caused their heads to be cut off; and after making use of their seals and signers, obtains a surrender of the place; and with it the possession of this mountainous Kingdom, Anno 1601. or thereabouts, united ever since to the Crown of Persia.

Armenia

to a discernible and super-eminent height above all the mountains of those parts: became not the resting place of the Ark, till after a further course towards the East, they were grown to their fullest height; which is in those parts of it betwixt Scythia, and Persia, which are called Mount Caucasus: not that Mount Caucasus which lieth on the North of Colchis, and Iberia, out of which the River Cyrus is said to rise; but that which lieth on the East-side of the Caspian Sea, where Mount Taurus and Imanus do cross each other. But of this elsewhere.

It was divided heretofore into many Provinces, the principal whereof had (I grant) its name from the Gordian Mountains, called in some writers, Cordice, from whence the Province had the name of Gordienae, but most commonly called Cordene, bordering on Affria. The Kingdom once of Zarbius, who liiding with Lucullus against Tigranes King of Armenia, was by Tigranes murdered with his wife and Children; but honoured by Lucullus with a stately and magnificent funeral. 2 The 2d Province of note is called Cotene; near the Montes Moschici. 3 Tosren; bordering on the River Cyrus. 4 Colthene on the banks of Araxes. 5 Sophene; near the turnings of the River Euphrates; mistook by some industrious and knowing men, to be the Syria Soba of the Holy Scriptures. 6 Bassine, on the North-Welt, near the springs of that River. But what Cities did belong to each, I find no where specified.

Those of most consequence in the whole, 1 Artaxata, by Florus called Caput Gentis: of most esteem in those times, and the Seat-royal of the Kings of Armenia from its first foundation. Built by Artaxerxes, one of the Progenitors of Tigranes, at the perswasion of Anibal, whilst he abode in this Countrey: who liking the situation of the place, drew on it the model of a strong and gallant City, according to which Plat-form it was presently built. Taken and sacked by the Romans, as a daughter of Carthage, by Caribulo in the time of Nero; it never could revive again to its former splendour: in the middle ages called Efeschia, and at this day Coy, or Coim; if not built rather out of the ruins of it. A City memorable for two great batels near unto it; the first between Lucullus on the one side, against Mithridates and Tigranes on the other; wherein the Romans were victors: the second between Selimus Emperour of the Turks, and Hysmael the Persian Sophy; wherein the Turks were conquerors, Anno 1514. A victory which he bought with the loss of 30000 of his best men, and such a terror to the whole Army, that the Turks to this day call it the only day of doom. The fields adjoining to the Town wherein this cruel batel was fought, called the Chalderan fields. 2 Sebastia, now Snuflia, seated on Euphrates, where it meeteth with the Mountain Taurus; the residence of the Patriarch of the Armenians, at their first separation from the See of Constantinople; the Metropolis at that time of all Armenia: so named in honour of Augustus, whom the Greeks call Sebastos. But of late divested of that dignity, the Patriarchal See, by reason of the fierce wars raging in this Countrey, betwixt the Persians and the Turks, being removed to the Monastery of Eomeazin, near the City of Eruan in Persia; in the dominions of which King these Armenian Christians live in great abundance, by the name of Jephelins. 3 Tigranocerta, beautified and enlarged, if not first founded, by Tigranes above-mentioned, by whom replenished with people of several Nations, whose Countreys he had taken from them, and enriched in a manner with the wealth of all his Kingdom: there being no Armenian, either Prince or Pailant, who sent not somewhat towards the adorning of it. But taken by Lucullus without great resistance, those several Nations not agreeing amongst themselves: and therein besides other Treasure, no less than 8000 Talents in ready money. The City situate near a River, which Tacitus calleth Niceforinus. 4 Arsamosata, by Pliny called Arsmote, on the banks of Euphrates. 5 Cholna, so called in memory of Hul, or Chul the Son of Aram, one of the first Planters of this Countrey. 6 Baraza, by the Emperour Leo much enlarged and beautified; dignified with the new name of Leontopolis, and for a while made the Metropolis of the Province. 7 Arasarata, by Strabo called Arxata. 8 Theodosopolis, built on the foundation of some of the more ancient Cities, by the Emperour Theodosius, and of him thus named. 9 Colonia, the strongest and most defensible City hereof, when possessed by the Romans. 10 Clamassum, a strong Town on the banks of Euphrates, taken by Selimus the first in his way towards Persia, and therewith livery and seisin of the rest of this Countrey, since wholly conquered by his Successors. 12 Charis, not far from the same River also, supposed to be the Chorisa of Ptolemy, of which not long since the ruins only; but in three weeks so repaired and fortified by the Turks, Anno 1579. that it is thought to be impregnable. 13 Thespia, giving name of old to the Lake Thespiis, and to the Region called Thespiis; but now not in being. 14 Aramis, now of greatest name, and esteemed the Metropolis of this Countrey: situate in that part of the Lake of Paslan (the Martiana palus of the ancient Writers) which lieth next to this Countrey; and by that well fortified: the only City of Armenia possessed by the Persians, who are the Lords of all that Lake, of which more hereafter. 15 Fan, both for natural situation, and the works of art, accounted by the Turks for their strongest Bulwark in these parts against the Persians; and for that cause well garrisoned, and as well munitioned.

This Countrey was first planted by Hul or Chul the Son of Aram, and by Mesech one of the Sons of Japhet, who with their families or Colonies possessed the same: the one leaving the remainder of his name in the Montes Moschici; the other in the Town called Cholna, and the Region called Colthene by Ptolemy, Cholobate by Stephanus. Advanced to the honour of a Kingdom as soon as any, that of Babel excepted: Nimrod the third from Nimrod finding Bazanes King hereof, whom he forced to acknowledge his superiority, and to aid him in his wars against Zoroaster the King of Bactria. Kings of most note in times succeeding, (for we have no constant Catalogue of them) were 1 Araxes, who being warred on by the Persians, was promised victory by the Oracles, on the sacrifice of his two fair daughters. Willing to satisfy the Gods, and yet spare his children, he sacrificed two of the daughters of Misalsus, a noble man of this Countrey: by whom in revenge hereof his own daughters were slain, and himself so solely followed, that swimming the River then called Helmus, he was therein drowned, and thereby gave unto that River the name of Araxes. 2 Artaxa, the founder of the great City Artaxata; spoken of before. 3 Tigranes, the most mighty King that ever reigned in Armenia, to which he added by his prowess, Galatia, and a great part of Cilicia, in Asia Minor, the whole Countreys of Media, Syria, and Phenicia. But tiding with Mithridates, whose daughter he had married, against the Romans, he was by Lucullus overthrow in two great batels, and oured of the greatest part of his dominions. Hearing that Pompey had succeeded Lucullus in command of the Army, and trusting more unto his goodness than a wife man would, he put himself into his power: by whom condemned in a great sum of money for the charge of the war, and stripped of all the rest of his Estates, he was suffered to enjoy Armenia Major, Syria being made a Province, Sophene given to Ariobarzanes King of Cappadocia, Media left unto itself, and the lesser Armenia conferred on one of his Sons, who being found guilty of some practice with the King of Parthia, was carried Prisoner unto Rome, and his Countrey brought into the form of a Province. 4 Artavasdes, circumvented by Mar. Antony, who led him Prisoner to Rome, but (certainly, ne quid honori ejus decisset, aureis, as the Historian tells us of him) it was in Chains of Gold for his greater honour; giving Armenia to one of the Sons of Cleopatra. And though, 5 Artaxias recovered his Fathers Kingdom, yet he and his Successors held it but as Vassals of the Roman Empire: the Senate after that confirming, and sometimes nominating the Armenian Kings. Continuing in this Estate till the time of Trajan, it was by him reduced to the form of a Province (made after that a part of the Pontick Diocesis) who adding Mesopotamia also unto his Dominions, made Tigris the Eastern border of his Empire, which Augustus thought fit to limit with the banks of Euphrates. But long it held not in that form, being governed by its own Kings, as it was before Trajan's time, in the reign of Constantinus, Julian, and the Emperours following; whom they acknowledged and revered as their Lords in chief, till the time of Justinian the second (he began his Empire, Anno 687.) when subdued by the Saracens. Recovered by that Emperour, but soon lost again, it continued subject to the Saracens, till the breaking in of the Turks, Anno 844. of whom more anon. The greatest part of the Turks emptying themselves into Persia, and other Countreys which they took from the Eastern Emperours; the Christians of Armenia began to take heart again, and to have Kings of their own, by whom governed, till again subdued by Ottoman, or Hoccat the Son of Cingis, the first Cham of the Tartars. Nor did the Tartars make so absolute a conquest of it, as to extinguish either Christianity, or the race of the Kings: Haiton, surnamed Armenius, reigning after this, and going in person to Mongo, the great Cham of Tartary, 1257. And in our own Chronicles, in the reign of King Richard the second, we find mention of one Leon an Armenian King, who came hither to sue for aid against the Turks; by whom then dispossessed of his Estates. By Ussan-Cassanes, one of the Princes of this Countrey, (of whom more hereafter) who had the fortune to obtain the Crown of Persia, Anno 1472. it was made a Province of that Kingdom: and so continued till the year 1515. when conquered by Selimus the first, and by him made a part of the Turkish Empire; more fully settled and assured in the reign of Amurath the third, who by causing many Forts and Garrisons to be planted in it, made the conquest absolute.

The Arms of this Kingdom, when a Kingdom, governed by Princes of its own of the Christian faith, were Gules, 3 heads of a Buck Argent, Crowned Or.

2. COLCHIS.

COLCHIS is bounded on the East, with Iberia; on the West, with the Euxine Sea, and part of the Tartars Precopenses; on the North, with Tartary, from which parted by those vast hills, which the Romans called Caucasus; and on the South, with Armenia Major, from which separated by the Montes Moschici.

The reason of the name I find not. Nor can yield unto Bochartus, who fetcheth the original of the name and Nation, from Castubim, one of the Sons of Mizraim, the Son of Cham: the Etymology of the name being too much wreited, and Egypt too far off to give a being to Colchis in those early dayes: though possibly in times succeeding, the Egyptians hearing by the Greeks, of the wealth of the Countrey, might send Colonies of their people thither, as to other places. It is now called Mengrelia.

The Countrey said to be very fruitful, if the care of the husbandman were not wanting. The vines they plant at the feet of great trees, which twining about the arms thereof lade them full of Grapes: with which, and other fruits rising from the Earth, they used of late times to furnish the Store-houses of their Kings, for want of ready money to fill his Coffers; their tributes being paid in such commodities. Formerly of great fame for abundance of Gold, found in the sands of their Rivers issuing from the Caucasian Mountains. The thing affirmed by Appianus in his Mithridatica; χρυσον οὐκ ἐν τῷ καυκασῶν ὄρει, ἀλλὰ ἐν τῇ γῇ καὶ ἐν τοῖς ποταμοῖς. Many of their Springs, saith he, which come out of Caucasus, carry veins of Gold. The like saith Strabo also, and some other Ancients. With which, and out of their rich Mines both of Gold and Silver, the Kings hereof were so well furnished with those Metals, that the furniture of their Chambers were all of Gold, and the beams of their Lodgings were made of Silver. But now so destitute of both, that the people for want of money to buy and sell with, are enforced to barter their commodities, and change one for another.

The people at the present very rude and barbarous; so inhumane and void of natural affection, that they sell their children to the Turks. The better sort of them much given to belly-cheer, dancing, and singing loose sonnets of love and dalliance, using much wine in their entertainments, which the more their guests drink, the better welcome; inflamed wherewith they offer them for a cooler their wives or Sisters, with charge to yield them all content, esteeming it no small credit to them if it be accepted. Nor are the women much averse from the entertainment, whether to please themselves, or obey their husbands, let them tell that can.

The Christian faith was first here planted in the time of the Emperour Justinus, by whose persuasion Taurus Prince of the Colchis, then at the Court in Constantinople, became a Christian; and being baptized, was returned back into his Countrey, with the title of King. But Cabades the King of Persia much offended at it, proclaimed war against him: which hindered the further progress of the Gospel, till the year 860. About which time Methodius and Cyril, two reverend men, were by the Patriarch of Constantinople employed in this service; which they successfully effected: in that regard they hold to the communion of the Church of Greece, and belong to the jurisdiction of that Patriarch. To whom conform in most dogmatical points of their Religion, and in many practical. And though they have a distinct language of their own, which hath no affinity with the Greek, yet do they celebrate Divine Offices in the Greek tongue, and follow the Rituals of that Church; which few of them understand any better, than the Vulgar Papists of France, Spain, or Germany, do the Latine Service. Whether it be that they have no learned men amongst them either to translate their old Liturgy, or to compose a new, or that they hold all alterations in Religion to be matters of danger; or that ignorance is the best mother of devotion (as is thought by others) I am not able to determine.

The chief Rivers of this Countrey, are 1 Hippus, 2 Cyanus, 3 Charisus, all rising out of the Caucasian Mountains, and falling into the Euxine. 4 Phasis, the principal of all, rising out of the Montes Moschici, or Armenian Mountains, and there called Bom. Navigable with smaller Vessels a great way up into the Countrey, and with great ships, 18 miles from the Sea. Memorable amongst the Ancients for the landing of the Argonauts, in the mouth thereof; and those delicate Fowl called from hence Phasides, or Phasiini (Phasians) which they brought with them into Europe.

As for this expedition of the Argonauts, being the most remarkable action in those elder ages of the world, when Piracy and depredations were accounted for Heroical virtues; it was no other than the adventure of some noble Gracians, for the gold of Colchus. The age wherein it hapned, was about the 11 year of Gideon, the Judge of Israel. The chief Adventurers, Jason, Orpheus the famous Poet, Cassor and Pollux the sons of Tindarus, Telamon and Peleus, the Sons of Æacus, and Fathers of Ajax and Achilles, Læertes the Father of Ulysses, Amphiarus the South-sayer, Hercules, Theseus, Meleager, with many others of like note. These moved with the great noyse of the wealth of Colchus, and the riches of King Ætes, then therein reigning, resolved upon a voyage thither, embarked in a ship called Argo, (whence the name of Argonauts) whereof one Typhis was chief Pilot. Passing the Hellspoint, Propontick and Thracian Bosphorus, they came into the Euxine Sea: and after many difficulties and strange Adventures (which such Knights Errants could not choose but encounter with) they landed in the River Phasis, and came to the Kings Court, and there were kindly entertained. But finding the Kings Treasures to be too well guarded to be took by force (said by the Poets to be kept by a Dragon always waking) they practised with Medea, the daughter of Ætes, to assist them in robbing her Father. Who being in love with Jason, on promise of marriage with him, assented to it: By whose Artifices (which the Poets call Magicall Charms) the Guardians being circumvented, and the treasure gotten, they all, together with Medea, embarked again, and after a long and dangerous voyage returned into Greece. This is the substance of the Story; which being the greatest and most notable voyage which the Gracians in those early days had undertaken, occasioned the Poets to advance it to the highest pitch, and to disguise it with many fictions, and ingenious fancies: But not without some ground entituled to the Golden Fleece (which they make the end of the design). For the Rivers, as before was said, having Golden sands, which fell down from the Mountains (as in many other parts of the world they are found to have:) it was the custom of the people to lay many Fleeces of wool in the descent of those Rivers, in which the grains of Gold remained, though the water passed through; which Strabo witnesseth to be true.

But leaving these Adventurers to pursue their fortunes, let us go forward to survey the Colchian Cities; the principal whereof, 1 Dioscurias, a Town of great wealth and trade, founded by Amphitus, and Telchius, two Spartans, the Charioters of Cassor and Pollux, and so named in honour of their Masters, whom the Greeks call Aibovvgs: which two Spartans passing further East, were afterwards the founders of the Nation from them called Heniochi, or the Chariot-drivers. A Town of such resort by Merchants from most parts of the world, that here were spoken 300 different Languages; inasmuch that the Romans (as Pliny saith) were fain to maintain here 130 Interpreters for dispatch of business, and negotiating with those Merchants. 2 Sybaris, the Seat-Royal of the Colchian Kings, about nine miles from which was the Temple of Mars, to which Medea is reported to have brought the Argonauts. 3 Siganus, near the mouth of the River Cyanus: as is also, 4 Æa, by Ptolemy called Æapolis, an Egyptian Colony, planted here by Sesoftris (in the time of Rehobom the Son of Solomon) at what time he attempted, but without success, the conquest of Colchis. 5 Neapolis, so called from the newness or late foundation of it when that name was given. 6 Phasis, so called from the River upon which it is situate, retaining both the site and name to this very day: the ordinary residence of the Turkish Beglerbeg, by whom called Phasum. 7 Alvati, a well fortified place. More in the Land are placed by Ptolemy, 8 Meclitus, 9 Sirace, 10 Zadris, 11 Surium, &c. not much observable in old Story, nor now known at all.

The first Inhabitants of this Countrey, most probably, came out of the neighbouring Armenia, and therefore the Posterity of Eul or Chul, from whence perhaps the name of Colchis; to whom in tract of time, time, some Colonies out of Egypt (a seafaring people) moved with the great fame of the riches and wealth hereof, did adjoin themselves; the Colchians on that ground, (or from some part of his Army left there by Sesoftris) being said by Ammianus Marcellinus, to be the ancient off-spring of the Egyptians. The most ancient of their Kings was Ætes, spoken of before: who entertaining Phryxus flying out of Greece from the fury of his stepdame Ino, with great store of treasure; occasioned the Argonauts, as well in way of revenge, as in hope of booty, to make that famous expedition for the Gold of Colchus, disguised under the fiction of the Golden Fleece. Of most note after him, Selances, and Eshbors, who first discovered the rich mines of Gold and Silver; of which metals they made all their Itensils, even the beams of their Chambers. The fame whereof drew thither Sesoftris, the great King of Egypt; who being vanquished in the field was fain to lay aside all those hopes which he brought with him thither, and return back to Egypt in worse state than he came; but that he left behind him an Egyptian Colony in the City of Æa; which after occasioned others of that Countrey to repair hither also. Living in peace and unmolested from this time forwards, they were unhappily ingaged by Tigranes of Armenia, to side with him against the Romans, and in his overthrow gave such advantage to the Victor, that Orodes the King of Colchis was fain to submit himself to Pompey, to dismiss his forces, leave his fainness, and finally to redeem his peace, by sending to him a Bedstead of purest Gold, and many other rich presents. After this, the Romans had here their Agents, and received hence some annual profits, but never brought it to the form of a Province. Distressed between the Persians and Constantinopolitans, they had much ado to stand upright; though betwixt both they kept themselves in a kind of liberty: as of late times, betwixt the Persians, Turks, and Tartars, their too potent Neighbours. But at the last, Anno 1579. Amurath the third, to make the safer passage for his forces into Georgia, sent Muzales his Admiral, with a great Fleet into the Euxine Sea: who coming up the River Phasis took the City of Fassum, fortified it; and laid so certain a foundation of a future conquest; that though the Mengrelians did not long after demolish some of his fortifications, yet they were afterwards repaired, and Fassum made the seat of a Turkish Beglerbeg, as it still continueth.

3. IBERIA.

IBERIA is bounded on the East, with Albania; on the West, with Colchus; on the North, with the Caucasian Mountains; and on the South, with the Montes Moschici; by the first mountains parted from Sarmatia Asiatica, and by the last from Armenia Major.

It was so called from the River Iberus, which running thorow it, falleth at last into the more noted River Cyrus. But is now called Georgia, and that as some say from Saint George the Cappadocian Martyr, whom here they have in very great reverence, as their tutelary Saint and Patron: as others say, from George a Cappadocian Bishop, by whose preaching they were brought unto Christianity; and some again will have them called properly Gordians, and corruptly Georgians, from their near neighbourhood to those mountains. But the most probable opinion is, as I conceive, that they took this name from the Georgi, whom Pliny reckoneth amongst other of the Caspian nations. Though to say truth, the name of Georgia extendeth somewhat further than that of Iberia, as comprehending also that part also of Armenia Major which lies next to Media, and the whole Countrey of Albania, if I guess aright.

The Countrey for the greatest part, is covered with Mountains, Woods, and Thickets, and in that regard unconquerable for the difficulty of the mountainous passages; yet notwithstanding it is very fruitful in many places, having many fertile Plains, and wealthy Vallies; well watered, and of great increase to the husbandman, if he be not wanting to himself in care and industry.

Of the old Iberians it is written; that they were a very warlike nation, and used to set as many Pillars about the grave of a dead man, as he had slain Enemies in his life: as also that those of the same Tribe or Family had all things common; he being the Ruler, which was eldest: and that some of them did derive themselves from the Children of David begotten on the wife of Uriah, for that cause never marrying out of their own kindred. The present Georgians very warlike, strong of body, and valorous in fight; for a long time defended themselves and Countrey from the Turks and Persians, with great prudence making use of the one against the other. But overpowered by the vast multitude of Turks breaking in upon them, they have lost many of their best Forts, and much of their liberty.

The Christian faith was first here planted in the time of Constantine the Great, by means of a Christian captive woman (such extraordinary wayes doth God find out to promote his Gospel): who being of a most devout life, and exemplary piety, had by her Prayers to CHRIST restored a young child to health which was thought past cure; and healed the Queen hereof of a desperate malady, when no help of Physick would prevail. Whereupon the King sent Ambassadors to Constantine, desiring Ministers and Preachers to be sent to Iberia, to instruct the people in the faith; which was done accordingly. Since that time Christianity hath flourished in this Countrey without interruption; though by Mahometans, and Pagans, on all sides encompassed: agreeable in doctrinal points to the Church of Greece, whose Rituals also the People do to this day follow. Not subject for all that to the Patriarch of Constantinople, (though of his Communion) but to their own Metropolitans only; who hath under him about 18 Bishops; and resideth for the most part, in Saint Katharines Monastery on Mount Sinai. By means of which remote dwelling of their principal Pastor, Mahometanism hath got some footing, and Jesuitism began to creep in amongst them. The occasion of which last was this.

About the year 1614. the Persians making an inroad into this Countrey, took the City of Cremet, and therein Cetana, the mother of Prince Teimurazes; whom, leading her captive into Persia, and not able to prevail with her to turn Mahometan, they most cruelly murdered. Some of the Jesuits then travelling in those those Countreys, and willing out of that sad accident to advance the fame of their Society, together with the Catholique cause, cut off the head of a dead man whom they found in the way, anointed it with oyl and odours, brought it into Georgia, and signified unto the Prince, that they had with them the head of the blessed Martyr Cetaba: desiring leave to live in some Monastery, and have the keeping of the holy Relique committed to them. This easily believed, and granted, the head was placed with great honour in the Church of Saint George, at Alerdall: much resort to it from all parts by diseased persons: whom if past cure, the Jesuites sent home again, prescribing them in the way of preparation a long time of repentance; if curable by outward means which they applied, the cure was presently ascribed to the holy Relique. Grown famous by this means, they gained many Proselytes to themselves; and had no small hope of prevailing on Prince Teimurazes to submit himself to the Pope, as the Vicar of CHRIST. When in the heat of all their glories, a letter cometh from Macla, a Lady attendant on the Prince; (but then living in Persia, as a slave or bond-maid) signifying that her Matter by her perswasion, had got into his power the body of his mother Cetaba; which he might ransom if he pleased: two Travellers withall, who came out of Persia with the Jesuites, reporting what they see them do with the dead mans head. By which means the Imposture being discovered, the body of the Queen was sent for, the false Relique was cast out of the Church, and the false Jesuites into Prison, and next out of the Country.

Rivers of note I find not any, either in Ptolomy or any of our modern Writers, but what are touched upon before, except only the River of Iberia spoken of already from which the Country is thus named. The whole in general so destitute of waters, that Pompey in his march this way against the Albanians, was fain to carry 10000 bladders filled with water, for the use of his Army.

Places of most antiquity and importance in it, 1 Artaxissa, 2 Vasada, 3 Luhinn, 4 Armistia, all named by Ptolomy; this last by Pliny called Harmisus. 5 Cremen, the chief City now possessed by the Georgians. 6 Cachete, honoured with a fair Church, the most beautifull of all the Country, dedicated by the name of Saint George. 7 Triala, where are to be seen the ruins of a large City, and many Churches; by what name anciently called, I find not. 8 Alinnacala, or the Golden Castle, a strong Fortrefs, and the ordinary residence of the Georgian Princes, since the time of the wars betwixt the Persians and the Turks. 9 Archibelech, a strong Castle taken by Solyman the Magnificent in his wars against Tamas King of Persia, and ever since holden by the Turks. 10 Teflis, a large and capacious Town, forsaken by the Georgians at the coming of Musapha, General of Amurath the third against the Persians: who liking the situation of it, caused it to be repaired and fortified, planted thereon an hundred pieces of Ordinance, and left therein a Garrison of 6000 Souldiers. 11 Lori, distant from Teflis about two days journey of a Carriers pace, strengthened with a lofty Castle, environed with deep ditches, and a thick wall, amounting to a mile in compass. Seized on by Ferat Bassa, the Successor of Musapha, who repaired the walls, planted thereon 200 small pieces of Ordinance, and garrisoned it with 7000 Turks for defence thereof. 12 Tomanis, a short days march from Lori, the Country lying betwixt both full of rich fields and pastures, abounding with corn, fruit, and cattel. Nigh unto which the said Ferat raised a new Fortrefs, for the better command of the Streights and passages, leading from thence to Lori, and so to Teflis (the Key of Media or Sirvan) the wall whereof being 1700 yards in compass, he caused to be planted with 200 pieces of Artillery and with incredible diligence cut down a thick wood which lay before it, which otherwise would have been a receptacle of Thieves, or Enemies. 13 Glicia, 14 Bafcapan, possessed and fortified by the Turks, to make good their footing in this Country. But possibly most of these strong holds now possessed by the Turks may be within the bounds of Armenia Major, and Albania, though within the Country of the Georgians; that name not being limited to Iberia, as was said before.

The first Inhabitants hereof were such who were brought hither by Tubal, the Son of Japhet, from whom this people at the first, as Josephus hath it, had the name of Thobeli. But that name growing out of knowledge, the nations in it of most note were the Tibureni, Messynaci, Chalybes; and of less esteem the Biseri, Sapiri, Macroni, &c. united at the last in the name of Ileri, from the River Ileri, of which Pliny speaketh, the principal of all this Country. Too fruitfull of increase for so narrow a dwelling, some of them put themselves to seek their fortunes; when after long wandering they fell upon the Coast of Spain next the Pyrenes, where they staid themselves; giving the name of Ileri to the chief River there, and of Iberia to the Country; Of which more before. Such of them as remained behind continued an unconquered people, under the government of their own Kings, till the time of Tigranes King of Armenia. By whom invited to his aid against the Romans, they came in accordingly: and in his fall discomfited by Lucullus in three several battels, were fain to stand upon their guard as well as they could: first holding fair with Pompey who succeeded Lucullus in his charge; But breaking out again on a new temptation, they were encountered by him. In which battel 9000 of their men being slain, and 1000 taken, they were constrained to sue for peace; not otherwise to be obtained till Artaxes the King of these Iberians, gave his Sons for Pledges. After this Feudatories to the Roman, and Gracian Emperours, till the fatal inundation of the Saracens had so weakened that Empire, that the Kings hereof acknowledged no more subjection to those of Constantinople, till Constantinople itself became the Imperial seat of the Ottoman Family; in whose quarrels with the Persian Sophies, this Country began to suffer a new invasion; some Towns and Forts of it being taken by Solyman, in his march or passage against Tamas. Afterwards in the time of Amurath the third, who set his mind most eagerly on the war with Persia, a great part of it was subdued by Musapha the Turkish General: who inviting the widow Prince and her two Sons to come to his tent, sent the young Princes to Constantinople; and by that means had opportunity to assure his purchases. And though the Persians did their best to assist the Georgians, yet proved they but a kind of miserable comforters; as much punishing or plaguing this poor Country with their aids, as the Turks by their armies. So that now it stands divided betwixt the Grand Signior, and its natural Princes: the Georgian Princes holding the greatest part; but the Turks being in possession of the strongest holds; kept by them under colour of securing their way to Persia, for which this Country is indeed but unhappily seated.

Albania.

ALBANIA is bounded on the East, with the Caspian Sea; on the West, with Iberia; on the North, with the Caucasian Mountains; on the South, with the Meschi: So named from the Albani, who did once inhabit it; and of late called Swiria; but reckoned in these last ages as a part of Georgia.

The Country of so rich a soil, that without the least labour of the husbandman, the Earth doth naturally and liberally afford her store; and where it is but once sown, will yield two or three reapings. But being ill husbands on it in former times, they occasioned Strabo to give them this note for a remembrance, That they needed not the use of the Sea, who knew no better how to make use of the Land. The people anciently so simple, that they could not reckon above an hundred; ignorant of weights, measures, and the use of money. Old age they had in high esteem, but held it utterly unlawful to make speech of the dead. And of these Pliny doth report, that they were gray-headed from their very youth, and could see as well by night as by day; the verity of which last may be somewhat questionable. But withall they are affirmed to have been a stout and courageous people, strong bodies, patient of toil and labour, as they are at this day. And well the men may be courageous and stout, where the women are so truly masculine. Of whom it is affirmed by Authors of undoubted credit, that they were exercised in Arms and Martial feats, as if descended lineally from the ancient Amazons; whom Plutarch placeth in this tract; reporting some of them to be aiding to these Albanians, in their war with Pompey: which possibly might be no other, than some the more noble Albanian Dames.

Principal Rivers of this Country, 1 Soana, giving name to the Soani, one of the nations of these parts mentioned by Pliny. 2 Cafius, 3 Gerrus, 4 Albanus, whence perhaps the name of Albani came unto this people. 5 Cyrus, (by Plutarch called Cyrus) spoken of in Armenia Major, but more properly belonging to this Country; because herein it hath its spring, and the greatest part of its course also. For rising out of the Mountain Caucasus, which shuts up this Province on the North, it passeth thence towards the middle of it, till it come to the borders of Armenia; where it beginneth to bend more towards the East: and having received into its Channel all the former Rivers, besides many others of less note, falleth with twelve mouths into the Caspian, or Hyrcanian Sea. Mountains of note here are not any, but what are common unto them with other Nations: the Montes Meschi on the South; and Caucasus upon the North, being rather common boundaries betwixt several Nations, than peculiar unto any one; though Cities and Towns I find many in it, but little of them more than their very names. 1 Chabata, by Pliny called Cabalaca, and honoured with the Character of Insignor Albania urbs, the most noted City of this Country. 2 Albana, so called from the River Albanus, upon which it was seated. 3 Teleba, 4 Namechia, 5 Thelba, 6 Getarra, near unto the influx of the River Cyrus. How these are called, or whether any thing be remaining of them, I am not able to say. The chief now being, and worthy to be so accounted, is the City of Derbent, situate near the Caspian Sea; from which to Teflis a City spoken of before, remain the foundations of a high and thick wall; affirmed to have been built by Alexander the Great, to defend these parts, against the irruptions of the Northern unconquered nations. The Town environed with two walls, and so defended by difficult and narrow passages of the rocks, that it is not easily accessible: but taken for all that by Musapha the Turkish General, Anno 1587. and made the ordinary residence of a Turkish Bassa. Conceived to be the Caucasia Porta of the Ancients, which Pliny honoureth with the title of ingeni naturæ miraculum: by Egesippus, for the strength of it called Porta Ferrea; with reference to which, by the Turks called Demir-can, the word signifying in their language, a gate of Iron. The other places of this tract are either of no account and estimation, or else are specified before amongst the Cities and good Towns of the Georgians, of whose Country this is now a part: yet we may add 2 Salvan, upon the borders of Media. 3 Sancta Maria, north of Derbent; both of them on, or near the banks of the Caspian Sea.

The first Inhabitants of this Country, seem to have been of the plantation of Gether the Son of Aram, and Nephew of Japhet, whose memory was long preserved in the City of Getarra before mentioned; So called by him, or some of his Posterity, in remembrance of him. The People living somewhat out of the common road, were little troubled with Invaders from foreign parts; neither the Persians, nor Macedonians, looking so far North. Nor possibly had the Romans taken notice of them, had they not engaged themselves with Tigranes first, and afterwards with Mithridates. Falling on Pompey with an Army of 40000, and well beaten by him, they were content to sue for peace. But finding that the Iberians also had took up Arms, they engaged again; leaving an Army of 12000 horse and 90000 foot, in which Orexes their King, with his brother Cass, were in person present. And though they had made good the banks of the River Cyrus; yet being ill armed, and for the most part only with skins of beasts, they made but small resistance against the Romans: notwithstanding the gallant charge of Cass, who assaulted Pompey, and had the honour to be slain by him in the place. After this overthrow, and their giving pledges unto Pompey for their good behaviour; we find little mention of them in the Stories of the Roman Empire, till the time of Trajan: Who having conquered, and reduced Armenia Major to the form of a Province, resolved to shew his power to these neighbouring nations: and to that end imposed a King on the Albani, of his own appointment, and made the Kings of Colchis, and Iberia, do their homage to him, in times succeeding no news of them; either because remote from the stage of Action, or serving under the

the command of some greater nation, where their name occurs not. Conquered: by Occidan, or Hæcæta the Chans of Tartary, together with Iberia, and Armenia, they were a while subject to that Empire: and passing in succeeding times by the name of Georgians, did partake of the same fortunes with them. Now at the mercy of the Turks, who by reason of the strong footing which he hath gotten amongst them, is become a dreadful neighbour to them; if not acknowledged by them for their Lord in chief.

Thus having taken a survey of all the Provinces of the Turkish Empire, both in Europe, and Asia, and touched upon the means by which they are possessed of Egypt, whereunto all the rest of their hold in Africa, serves but for an accessory: we will now look upon the story of this people; their first original, the great success of their affairs, the Princes under whose command they have made these conquests. Which having done, we will proceed to a Description of the Persons, Manners, and Conditions of the Turks, themselves, their power and policy; with other things considerable in so great an Empire.

And first for the original of the Turkish Nation, they were most probably the Descendants of those Turca, whom Pliny and Pamponius place about the Fennes of Maotis. Of whom thus Mela, speaking of the Gelani, a Scythian people; Juxta Thyrasageta, Turcæque, vastæque sylvas occupant, alunturque venando, &c. Next unto them (saith he) live the Thyrasageta, and the Turca, possessed of vast woods, and maintained by hunting; and then a rough and desert Country with continual rocks; as far as to the Armenians. And Pliny mustering up the barbarous nations of those parts, joyns the Turcæ (or Thyrasageta) with the Turks, and places them next the Armenians, as Mela doth; visque ad solitudines salubres, vallibus asperis, spreading themselves unto the rough deserts, and woody vallies. Not known by action (though by name) till the time of Tiberius, the second, who began his Empire Anno 577. when pressing hard on the Avares, a neighbouring Nation, they compelled them to forsake their seats and pass into Europe; where they made themselves masters of Pannonia, now called Hungary. In the time of Heraclius, we find them with other barbarous Nations, at the siege of Constantinople, but under the command of the Persians. After which they began to set up for themselves, and in the year 763. made a road into those Countreys which we last described; and loading themselves with prey and booty, returned home again. But liking better of these parts than their own poor dwellings, in the year 844. they brake once more thorow the Caspian Streights, and passing through Uria, seized on Armenia Major, and there fixed themselves, giving it the name of Turcomania. In which wide and spacious Countrey they roamed up and down, without any certain habitation, removing their herds and families from one place to another, as they had formerly been used to do in the fennes of Maotis; and as the Tartars and wild Arabs do untill this day. And so they lived, a poor and contemptible nation, till Mahomet the Sultan of Persia, rebelling against his Lord and Master the Caliph of Babylon, called in these Turks unto his aid; and by their help obtained a signal victory. The victory obtained, the Turks desire their wages, and a fair dismissal; but could speed in neither: the Sultan being loth to part with such a necessary mischief, till his affairs were better settled; and therefore shutting up the passages of the River Araxes, which he before had opened for them. Provoked wherewith, under the conduct of Tangrolipix, their principal Leader, they began to spoil and waste the Countrey; a multitude of needy people, and some of the discontented Soldiers, coming daily to them. Assailed by the Persians, in the first battel they not only got a notable victory, but such store of Armour, Horses, and other necessities, as made them able to encounter with the Sultan himself, whom having overthrown and slain in the second fight, Tangrolipix is by both Armies proclaimed Sultan or King of Persia, in the year one thousand and thirty, or thereabouts.

There were at this time amongst the Turks, two most noted Tribes; the Selucian, and the Oguzian. Of the Selucian, Tangrolipix, Culm Muses, Melch, and Ducat were the heads: of which, Tangrolipix as the chief of that Clan or Family, was settled in the throne of Persia: Culm Muses furnished with an Army against the Christians, possessed himself of a great part of Asia Minor: Melch and Ducat, by the like favour of their Cousin the Persian Sultan, were vested into the Cities of Aleppo and Damascus, with their several Territories. But the line of Tangrolipix and the rest being all worn out, as hath been shewn in our descriptions of Syria, and Anatolia; the man of most nobility amongst the Turks, was Ottoman, the chief of the Oguzian Family; Nephew of Solyman Prince of Machan, a small territory in the Realm of Persia. Which Solyman, flying the fury of the Tartars when they conquered Persia, was drowned in crossing the River Euphrates, as he passed with his few Subjects towards Asia Minor, the best place of refuge for his Nation; leaving the chief-ship of his Tribe to Ethrogul his Son: who obtained of the last Aladin of the Selucian Family, the Village of Sagunt in Bithynia, for himself and his small handfull of people. To him succeeded his Son Ottoman, in the year 1280. who to revenge some injuries done unto his people by the improvident Christians, took from them Cattle after Cattle; and in the end possessed himself of the City of Nice, not long before the Imperial Seat of the Græcian Emperors. Emboldened with such great successes, and hearing of the death of Aladin the second, whom he acknowledged for his Lord, he took unto himself the Title of Sultan, Anno 1300. from which before he had obtained. To this time, and these small beginnings, we must reduce the first foundation of the Ottoman Empire; increased unto its present greatness, by the courage and good fortune of these Princes following.

The Kings of the Turks of the Oguzian, or Ottoman Family.

- 1300 1 Ottoman, or Osman the Son of Ethrogul, the first Turkish Sultan of this line, added to his small territory the greatest part of Phrygia, Bithynia, and some part of Pontus. 28.

- 1328 2 Orchanes, took the City Prusa, and made it his residence; and was the first that had footing in Europe, where he got Gallipoli, and other pieces. The Ottoman Emperors.
- 1350 3 Amurath, won the Thracian Chersonese, the strong City of Adrianople, with the Countreys of Servia, and Bulgaria; where he was slain by a common Soldier in the fields of Cosova. 23.
- 1373 4 Bajazet, made himself master of a great part of Thrace, Macedon, and Achidia. He was taken Prisoner by Tamerlane, and brained himself in an Iron Cage, in which the insolent Conquerour used to carry him. 26.
- 1399 5 Solyman the eldest Son of Bajazet succeeded in the peaceable possession of the Turkish Provinces in Europe; but passing with an Army into Asia, for the recovery of those parts, thereof usurped by Machmet his youngest Brother, he was forced again into Europe, to make head against Musa Bajazet his third Son (employed by Machmet in that diversion); who having there vanquished and slain him, Anno 1406. succeeded for a time in the Throne at Adrianople.
- 1404 6 Machmet the youngest Son of Bajazet, a vigilant and active Prince, first wrested from his brother Isha (Bajazet second Son then living) the City of Prusa with the dominions thereunto belonging, thereupon taking to himself the Title of King or Sultan, by degrees recovered all which his Father had lost unto the Tartars; afterwards making use of Musa, for the supplanting of Solyman, he followed him presently into Europe, where he fought with him, vanquished and slew him about the year 1416. Thereby uniting in his own person the whole Turkish Kingdom, which he enlarged with the more absolute conquest of Dacia, part of Slavonia, and the rest of Macedon. 17.
- 1416 7 Amurath II. subdued the Constantinopolitan Empire, all Achidia, Thessaly, Epirus; he shook the State of Hungary, and dyed before the Walls of Croy. 34.

The Ottoman Emperours.

- 1450 8 Machmet II. surnamed the Great, and first Emperor of the Turks, conquered the two Empires of Constantinople, and Trabesond, twelve Kingdoms, and two hundred Cities. 31.
- 1481 9 Bajazet II. subdued the Caramanian Kingdom, and part of Armenia; and drove the Venetians from Morea, and their part of Dalmatia. 31.
- 1512 10 Selimus, having poisoned his Father, subverted the Mamelucks of Egypt; bringing it together with Palestine, Syria, and Arabia, under the yoke of the Turks. 7.
- 1519 11 Solyman II. surnamed the Magnificent, surprised Rhodes, Belgrad, Buda; with a great part of Hungary, Babylon, Affrya, Mesopotamia. 48.
- 1567 12 Selimus II. an idle and effeminate Emperour, by his Deputies took from the Venetians, the Isle of Cyprus; and from the Moors, the Kingdom of Tunis, and Algiers. 8.
- 1575 13 Amurath III. took from the disaffected Persian, Armenia, Media, and the City Tanrus; and the Fort Gavarino from the Hungarians. 20.
- 1595 14 Machmet III. took Agria in Hungary; which Kingdom in all likelihood had been lost, if he had pursued his victory at the battel of Kereskura. Never but then in any battel, and then so frightened that he durst never see the face of an Army afterwards.
- 1603 15 Achmat, who the better to enjoy his pleasures, made peace with the German Emperour, and added nothing to his Empire. 15.
- 1618 16 Mustapha, brother to Achmat, succeeded, which was a novelty, never before heard of in this Kingdom; it being the Grand Signeurs common policy to strangle all the younger brothers: howsoever this Mustapha was preserved, either because Achmat being once a younger brother, took pity on him; or because he had no issue of his own body, and so was not permitted to kill him.
- 1618 17 Osman, or Ottoman II. succeeded his Uncle Mustapha; and being unsuccessful in his war against Poland, was by the Janizaries slain in an uproar, and Mustapha again restored: yet long enjoyed he not his throne; for the same hand that raised him, plucked him down again, and seated young Amurath in the place.
- 1623 18 Morat (or Amurath the IV.) Brother of Osman, of the age of 13 years, succeeded on the second depolition of his Uncle Mustapha, who proved a stout and masculine Prince, and bent himself to the reviving of the ancient discipline. To the great good of Christendom, he spent his stomach on the Persians, from whom he recovered Babylon.
- 19 Ibrahim, the brother of Morat, preserved by the Sultans his mother in his brothers life; and by her power depolished again for interdicting her the Court. He spent a great part of his reign in the war of Crete, against the Venetians; but without any great success.
- 1648 20 Machmet IV. Son of Ibrahim, now reigning: Lord of all this vast Empire, containing all Dacia, and Greece, the greatest part of Slavonia and Hungary, the Isles of the Ægean Sea, and a great part of the Taurican Chersonese in Europe; of all the Isles, and Provinces, which we have hitherto described, in Asia; and in Africa of all Egypt, the Kingdoms of Tunis and Algiers, with the Ports of Suachem, and Eracco. Nor is their title inferior to so vast an Empire, Solyman thus styling himself in his Letter to Villerius, great Master of the Rhodes, at such time as he intended to invade that Island: i.e. Solyman King of Kings, Lord of Lords, most high Emperour of Constantinople and Trabesond, the most mighty King of Perlia, Syria, Arabia, and the Holy Land; Lord of Europe, Asia, and Africa; Prince of Meccha, and Aleppo, Ruler of Hierusalem, and Sovereign Lord of all the Seas and Isles thereof.

As

As for the persons of the Turks, they are generally well-complexioned, of good stature, proportionably compacted, no idle talkers, nor doers of things superfluous; hot and venerous, servile to their Prince, and zealous in their Religion. They nourish no hair upon their heads, except it be a Tuft on the top of their Crowns; by which they think that Mahomet will snatch them up into Paradise at the day of judgement. For which reason they keep on of all lides, though never so poor, accounting it an opprobrious thing to see any men uncover their heads; saying when they dislike of any thing which they see, or hear I had as lief thou hadst shewn me thy bare skull. In their familiar salutation they lay their hands on their bosoms, and a little incline their bodies; but when they accost a person of rank, they bow almost to the ground, and kiss the hem of his garment. Walking up and down they never use, and much wonder at the often walking of Christians. Biddulph relateth, that being at his ambulatory exercise with his companion; a Turk demanded them whether they were out of their way or their wits? If your way (quoth the Turk) lay toward the upper end of the Cloister, why come you downwards? If to the nether end, why go you back again? Shooting is their chief recreation, which they also follow with much laziness; sitting on Carpets in the shadow, and sending some of their slaves to fetch their arrows. They prefer, as they pass the streets, the left hand before the right, as being thereby made master of his sword with whom they walk. As they shave their heads, so they wear their beards long, as a sign of freedom; but their slaves keep theirs shaven and close cut.

The women are of small stature, for the most part ruddy, clear, and smooth as the polished Ivory; as neither afflicted with the weather, and often frequenting the baths: of a very good complexion, seldom going abroad, and then masked; lascivious within doors, pleading in matters of incontinency, and they are accounted most beautiful, which have the greatest eyes, and are of the blackest hue. Every Turk is permitted to have four wives, and as many slaves as he is able to keep; yet are they to meddle with none but their own, the offending women being drowned, and the man dismembered. These women live in great awe and respect of their husband, never sitting with him at the Table, but waiting till he hath done, and then withdrawing into some room. If their husband hath been abroad, as his coming in they all rise from their stools whereon they fate, kiss his hand, and make an obeysance, and stand as long as he is in presence. The children which they have, they carry not in their arms as we do, but straddle on their shoulders; they live immured from the sight of the world: and permit not any male children, no not their own sons, to come among them, after they are twelve years old. From their husbands they cannot be divorced, but on special occasion: but the husbands may put away their wives, or give them to their slaves, when and as often as they list. Far better is it with the sisters or the daughter of the Sultan; to whom when her father or brother bestoweth her on one of the Bassas, he giveth her a dagger, saying, I give thee this man to be thy slave or bedfellow; if he be not loving, obedient, and dutiful unto thee, I give thee here this Canzharre or dagger, to cut off his head. When they are married, their husbands come not to bed unto them, till they are sent for, and then also they creep in at the beds feet. That every any of their Ladies make use of their daggers, I could never read. Only I find, that Luizia Bassa, the chief man of the Empire next the Sultan himself, and of him very much beloved; having given his wife, which was sister to Solymann the Magnificent, a box on the ear, was upon complaint by her made, thrust from all his honours, banished into Macedon, and had doublets been slain, if the Emperours love and his own merits had not pleaded for him. And this is all the Prerogative of the Sultans daughter; her Sons being accounted as meer and ordinary Turks only, and never being preferred above the rank of a common Captain, for fear they should be apt to harbour some aspiring thoughts.

The better sort of the Turks use the Slavonian Tongue, the vulgar speak the Turkish language; which being originally the Tartarian, borrowed from the Persians their words of State; from the Arabick, their words of Religion; from the Gracians, their words or terms of war; and from the Italians, their terms of navigation.

They were formerly Idolatrous Pagans, and were first initiated in Mohometanism, when they got the Sovereignty of the Persian Scepter. The degrees in their Religion are, 1. The Saffi or Novices; 2. The Calif, or Readers; 3. The Hogi, or writers of books, for printing they use not; 4. The Napi, or young Doctors; 5. The Caddi, whereof there is at least one in every City, to judge of offences; 6. The Mudressi, who use to oversee the Caddis; 7. The Mudlis, or principal Church Governours under the Musli. 8. The Cadelescas, whereof there are only three, one of Greece, the other for Anatolia, the third for Egypt and Syria; and these sit with the Bassas in the Divano, to determine of temporal suits. 9. The Musli, whose sentence in law and religion is uncontrollable. He abaseth not himself to sit in the Divano, nor affordeth more reverence to the Emperour, than he doth to him.

His forces are either for the Sea, or the Land. His Sea forces are great in regard of his spacious sea-coasts, vast woods, and number of Subjects. He never suffered but one memorable defeat, which was that at Lepanto; yet the next year he shewed his Navy whole and entire. Gallies are his only vessels, which being unable to cope with ships of any bigness, were not only the occasion of that overthrow, but also have heartned the Florentine, with six great ships of war only, to swagger in the Seas; so that for more safety, the tribute of Egypt is of late sent to Constantinople by land. The Captain Bassa, or Admiral, notwithstanding with a Navy of 60 Sail, makes a yearly progress about the Seas, and Sea Towns, to annoy the enemy, suppress Pyrates, collect the tributes, and to redress the abuses committed in the maritime Towns, belonging to the Admiralty: which annual circuit is begun in May, and ended in October.

Their land forces are either horse or foot. They which served on horseback, are the Spahi, or Aspi: these latter serving to weary the enemies, and dull their swords with their multitudes; of whose bodies the Janizaries use to make mounts, whereon to assault the wall of a besieged Town; and are by them them so contemned, that a Janizary once sold two of them for a sheeps-head. As for the Spahi, they till they are enrolled into pay, are of the same original and education with the Janizaries; and called by the same name, Azamogians. Their pay is ten Aspers a day. The Turk is able and doth maintain 150000 Horse at little or no cost, which no other Prince can do with 14. millions of Gold. For whereforever any Parcel of Land is conquered, it is divided into divers parts, and committed to the manuring of divers men; whom they call Timariots. These are to pay unto the Emperour certain rents, and at their own charges, to fend to his wars so many Horse, excellently appointed for the field: and which is the chief point of their service, to keep in awe the subjects, in all parts of his Empire. For being, as they are, dispersed in all quarters of his Dominions; the people can no sooner stir, but these will be assembled and fall upon them. These Timariots are in all accounted 719000 fighting men, whereof 257000 have their abode in Europe; and 402000 in Asia, and Africa. Were it not for these Timariots as the Turks saying is, no Grass would grow, where the Grand Signeurs Horse hath once set his hoof: for if the care of manuring the ground were committed to Pailants, and not to military men; the greatest part of this Empire would grow waste and desolate. These Timariots were instituted by Ottomon, the first Turkish King of this Family, and a curse by him laid on them that should annihilate the institution. The name is derived from the Turkish word Timay, signifying a stipend.

But the Nerves and Sinews of this warlike Body, are the Janizaries; who by original being Christians, are chosen by the Turkish Officers, every five years, out of his Europæan dominions: and so distributed abroad to learn the language, customs, and Religion of the Turks; afterward according to their strength, will, or disposition, placed in divers chambers. They of the first chamber are preferred, some to be Chanciers, such as go on Embassies, and execute judgments, others to Sanziacks, or Governours of Cities; some to be Bassas, or Commanders of Horsemen; and others to be Beglerbegs, (id est, Lord of Lords) to command the rest in general. They of the other chambers, are the Janizaries, or Pretorian Souldiers of the Guard; to whose faith and trust the care of the Emperours Person is committed. The tithing of these young springals is as we have said, every fifth year; and often sometimes, as occasions serve. By which means he not only disarmeth his own subjects, and keepeth them from attempting any stir or innovation in his Empire: but spoileth all the Provinces he most feareth, of the Flower, Sinews and strength of their People; choice being made of the strongest youths only, and fittest for war. These, before they are enrolled in pay, are called Azamogians, and behave themselves with much submissiveness towards their Seniors and Governours: but when once they are honored with the title of Janizaries, they grow by degrees into an intolerable pride, and haughtiness; till of late they were not permitted to marry, neither now can any of their sons be accounted, any other than a natural Turk, (whom of all the rest they account the basest) the eldest only excepted: to whom this privilege was granted by Amurath the third, when he came to the Crown. They are in number 40000, of which 16000 are always resident in Constantinople. In this City they are diversly employed, being as Constables, to see the peace kept; as Clerks of the Market, to see to the weights and measures; as Officers, to arrest common offenders; as Warders, to look to the gates, to guard the houses of Embassadors, and to travel with strangers for their more safety; in which charge they are very faithful. Their pay is but five Aspers a day, and two gowns yearly; neither are their hopes great, the command of 10, 20, and 100 men being their greatest preferment: yet are they very obsequious to their Captain or Agâ, who is in place inferior to the meanest Bassâ, though in power perhaps above the chiefest. For the crafty Turks joyn not power and authority, and if they observe the Janizaries to love and respect their Agâ, they quickly deprive him of life and office. The Founder of this Order was Amurath the first, An. 1365. their greatest establishment Amurath the second: the name signifieth young Souldiers. Now concerning these Janizaries, we will farther consider the sway they bear in designing the Successour; 2. Their insolency towards the Emperour, and his Officers: 3. Their behaviour in the vacancy of the Throne: and 4. Their punishments.

1. Concerning the first, I never find any particular sway the Janizaries carryed, in the designation of their Emperour, till the death of Mahomet the Great: when the Bassas having chosen Cortus the Son of Bajazet, were over-ruled by the Agâ and his Janizaries; who more inclined to Bajazet his Father, and Son to Mahomet. Though I am not ignorant, that when this Mahomet succeeded in the Throne, the joyful acclamations made by the Souldiers, was accounted the chiefest sign of his secure and perpetuated establishment. But the chief instance of their power herein, was the intronizing of Selimus the first, who being but the seventh Son of this Bajazet, was not only preferred by them before his brethren in his Fathers life time; but by their aids also he severally mattered them, and in the end poisoned his Father. To omit other examples, even of late Anno 1622. they slew the young Emperour Ofmen, drew his Uncle Musapha out of Prison, and established him in the Royalty.

2. As for the next, the first example in which I find them peccant toward their Prince, was at the beginning of the reign of the above mentioned Bajazet: when hearing of the intended death of Achmet Bassâ whom they loved, they broke open the Court Gates, and told the Emperour, They would teach him like a drunkard, a beast, and a rascal as he was, to use his great place and calling with more sobriety and discretion. Not long after, conceiving further displeasure against the said Bajazet, they shook their weapons against him, and refused to take him into the midst amongst them; and were not, without great and vile submission on his part, appeased. Against Selimus the first they also mutined, when being resolved to winter in Armenia, for the better pursuit of his victories against the Persian; he was by them forced to turn home unto Constantinople. Against Solymann they mutined so violently, that they compelled him to displace Rustan his chief Bassâ or favorite. Against Amurath the 3d. for placing over them a new Aga, they so strongly opposed themselves, that first they set fire to Conf-antiochia, and burnt therein, besides shops and ware-houses, twenty five great Inns, seven Temples, and 15000 houses : and in the end contrained him to give them money, and to yield all into their hands two of his chief Confessors, by them supposed to be their adversaries ; whom they drew about the Streets. Finally, (to omit the tumult, 1622. above-named) in the year 1600. they grew so discontented with Mahomet the 3d. that they not only threatened to destroy the Principal Officers of the Court, and the banishment of the Sultans his Mother, but the deposing of himself also.

his Mother, but the depoling of himself also.

3, Now for the third, I find it to have been the custom of these Janizaries, between the deaths of an old Emperor, and the beginning of a new, to commit divers insolencies; as the rifling of the houses of the Jews and Christians, among whom they dwell; the murdering of the Bassas, and principal men about the Court, whom they suspected not to have favoured them; and a number of the like outrageous mischiefs. Of these we find frequent mention, as after the death of Amarath the 2d. and Mahomet the Great: at which last time the Merchants of Constantinople, being natural Turks, escaped not their ravenous hands; neither could Mahomet-Bassa avoid the fury of their Swords. This Spoil they took for to certain a due, that if they were disappointed of it, they would presently raise commotions both in Court, Field, and City; unless some present satisfaction were made them. To this end, Ackmat distributed among them, two millions and an half of Ducats; Selimus the first, two millions; others made an increase of their daily pay. But Selimus the 2d. distributing among them 100000 Sultanies only, was by them prohibited to enter into his Seraglio, till he had enlarged his bounty: & the great Bassas were rapped about the pate with their callivers, for perfwading them to quietness. Now to prevent the dangerous and factious liberty, which in the vacancy of the Empire was usually committed; the death of the old Emperour was with all secrecy concealed, till the arrival of the new. To omit others, I will instance in the deaths of Mahomet the first, and Solyman only. This Solyman died at the siege of Siegh in Hungary, which was fo Mahomet the first, and Solyman only. This Solyman died at the siege of Siegh in Hungary, which was fo cunningly concealed by Mahomet-Bassa the space of twenty days; that before the Janizaries knew of it, his Son Selimus had possessed himself of Constantinople, and came also to the Army then in retreat homewards. For this Mahomet privately strangled the Physicians and Apothecaries, which knew of his death, commanded the Souldiers to go on in their siege; and divers times shewed them the Emperour sitting in his Horse-litter, as (being troubled with the Gout) he used to do: and when the City was taken, marched home with his dead body, sitting still in the same manner. So after the death of Mahomet the first, the Bassas of the Court called their Divanos, as formerly they used, gave order for the levying of an Army, as if some war were intended; and the Kings Physicians went up and down with their Potions, as if they had him to cure. But the Pensioners and Janizaries misjoyning the matter, with all eagerness desired to see him; which when the Bassas durst not deny, they appointed the next day for their visit. The next day the body was apparelled in royal large Robes, placed in a chair, at the end of a long gallery; and a little boy cunningly set behind him to move the Kings hand to his head, as if he should stroke his beard, as his manner was: which signs of life and strength the Souldiers seeing, held themselves contented, and so was his death concealed the space of 41 days.

4. As for the last, These insolent and unufferable pranks committed so commonly by these masterful slaves, so exceedingly stomachd Bijazes the 2^d. that he secretly purposed with himself, for curing so dangerous a disease, to use a desperate remedy ; which was to kill and destroy suddenly all the Janisaries. It is like that this Bijazes being a Scholar, had read how Constantine the Great had call'd the Prætorian Souldiers, and destroy'd their camp, as men that were the causes of all the stir in his Empire, and whose pride was come to an intolerable height ; and having the same cause to destroy his Janisaries, and whose pride was come to an intolerable height ; and having the same cause to destroy his Janisaries, hoped to have done it with as much ease and safety as the other did. But they having notice of the plot, for the time continued so united and linked together, that he durst not then attempt it ; and afterward siding with his Son Selimus, cast him out of his Throne into his grave. Since which time the Emperors never durst punish them openly ; but when any of them prove delinquent, he is sent privately in the night time to Pera over against Constantinople ; where, by the way he is drowned, and a piece of Ordinance shot off, to signify the performing of the Sultans command.

Now for the Emperors themselves, we will consider them in matters of pleasure, in matters of ceremony, and in matters of State; the last being considerable in three main points, which are the murdering of their brethren, the removing of their Sons, their revenue, and therein a touch of their government. To these we will add, what apparent symptomes may be observed to prognosticate the standing, decreasing, and increasing of this puffed Monarchy.

1. For the first, he hath not so few as 500. (sometimes 1000) choice Virgins kept in a Seraglio by themselves, all slaves born of Christian Parents, and indeed the rarest beauties of his Empire. When he is disposed to take his pleasure with any of them, they are all ranked in a gallery; and the is by the Agas the women prepared for his bed, to whom he giveth his handkercher. She that beareth him the first Son, is honoured with the title of Sultane's (Queen Mother we may call her) neither can he make any of them free, unless he marry them. When the Sultan dieth, all his women are carried into another Seraglio, where they are strictly looked too, and liberally provided for, and not seldom times are belov'd by the succeeding Sultan, on his great Baſſes, and such as he chiefly favoureth, which is a principal honour. They are attended on by women, and Eunuchs; theſe being not gelded only, but deprived of all their genitals, and supplying the uſes of nature with a silver quill: which inhumane cuſtom was brought in among them by Selimus the second, because had seen a Gelding cover a Mare.

2. These ceremonies are either performed by them, which is for the most part the building of a Mosche only to help to the salvation of their souls; or towards them by others, which are most apparent in the entertainment of Embassadors. For when such come to his presence, they are led between two of his Courtiers, Courtiers, and coming before the Throne (on both sides whereof the Bassas sit with admirable silence, resembling rather Statues than men;) they bow themselves to the ground with all humility: laying their hands on their breast, but never uncovering their heads, which (as we before noted) is counted an undecency. When they are to depart, they go all backwards; it being accounted very irreverent to turn their back-parts towards a Prince so glorious. The reason why they are thus brought in between two, is said to be for their greater honour: but is indeed a fear they have left the Grand Signieur, under the pretence of a Salutation, or the delivery of an Embassie, should be stabbed. Which wariness they have used, ever since the time that Miles Coblitz, a Servian, scrambling from among the slain at the battel of Caffova, and being admitted to the speech of Amurath the first, the Author of that overthrow, stabbed him into the belly with his dagger.

3. Amongst all the jarres and discontents that be, none have been with more unkindness begun, or more earnestly prosecuted, than those of brothers; and that not only in private families, but in the Stems of Princes: the multitude of Pretendants, being the original of most civil wars. To prevent these public emotions, the Emperors of Habassia use to immure up all their younger children, in the hill Amassa; the Persians do put out the eyes of their younger brothers, and the Turks do murder them: strange and horrid courses, whereby to avoid the fear of a war in the State, they stir up a war in their own bowels. The first amongst the Turks that began this barbarous cruelty, was Bajazet the first, on his brother Jasup; whom immediately after his Fathers death, he strangled with a Bow-string: this being the only instrument of their Fratricide, because thereby none of the blood-royal of Ottoman is spilt on the ground. After him, Mahomet the Great, caused his young brother then at nurse, to die the death; and was not without much ado perfwaded from being the executioner himself. Amurath the third, caused his five brethren to be at once strangled before his face; and Mahomet, his Son, no fewer than nineteen in one day. By this course they imagine their own estate to be infinitely secured, as knowing that Musapha a younger Son, stirred a rebellion against Amurath; and Zemes, against Bajazet; both the second of those names: that Solyman, Musfa, and Isa, severally afflicted Mahomet the first; and Cocant, Selmus, the first of these names also. But yet they will not know, that nothing sooner putteth their younger Brothers into these acts of hostility, than an inevitable certainty of a violent and unnatural death: whereas were they but sure of life, and a liberal and Princely maintenance, it is more than probable, they would rest content, as in other Kingdoms the younger Princes do. And notwithstanding their barbarous policy, they are not quite free from fear, as knowing the counterfeits have heretofore much disturbed the quiet of their Predecessours: for thus we find Amurath the second to have been vexed by one, that took upon him the name of Musapha, elder brother to Mahomet, then late deceased; who was much furthered and aided by the Greek Princes. This hath been one of the vulgar policies of Princes to kindle flames of fedition in their neighbours Countries. In the infancy of the Roman Empire, we find a counterfeit Agrippa, after that a counterfeit Nero; and before them, two counterfeit Alexanders in Syria. But never was Realm so often troubled with these Mock-kings, as England; a counterfeit Richard the 2d. being made in the time of Henry the 4th. a counterfeit Mortimer, in the time of Henry the 6th. a counterfeit Duke of York, a counterfeit Earl of Warwick, under Henry the 7th. and a counterfeit Edward the 6th. under Q. Mary. To prevent these walking spirits, Mahomet the third, laid out the dead bodies of his Father and nineteen brethren, as a common spectacle for all that passed by, or would come to behold them. Of late indeed the Grand Signieur Musapha, miraculously escaped the Bow-string twice; 1. when his brother Achmat, and 2ly. when Osmen his young Nephew were made Sultans; and was the first in this Empire that ever did succeed in the collateral line, as Ibrahim the late Sultan was the second, on the death of Morat or Amurath the fourth, his elder brother.

4. The removing of the young Princes is done for three reasons: 1. to wean them from the pleasures of the Court; 2. to train them up in arms, and inure them to hardships; 3. y. and principally to avoid the danger of a Competitor, whereof old Princes are especially jealous. The common places destined to this Princely exile, are Amasia, in Cappadocia; Magnesia, in Lydia; and such like Towns of Natalia. Neither do the old Sultans by such a great distance think themselves secure altogether; but carry a vigilant eye over their Sons actions, and have intelligence of almost every particular thought: the least suspicion being cause sufficient to destroy them. So we find Mustapha, Son to Solyman, the hopefulllest branch that ever sprang from the Ottoman tree, to have been shamefully strangled by the command of his father; upon a rumour only of a marriage, which he was said to have negotiated with the Perfians Kings Daughter. When these Princes are once settled in their government, it is a crime meriting no less punishment than death, to depart thence and come unto Constantinople, before their Fathers death; or unless they are by their Fathers sent for. Of this we have a Tragical example in Mahomet, a Prince of great hope, Son to Bajazet the second: who desiring to see the fashion of his Fathers Court, left Magnesia to which he was by his Father confined; and attended by two or three Gentlemen, came in the habit of a seafaring man to Constantinople, and having obtained his desire, he returned to his charge. This strange action being quickly divulged abroad, and by divers variously interpreted; stirred such jealousies in the suspicious head of his old Father, that he took order not long after to have him secretly poisoned.

5. As for the ordinary revenue, it consisteth either in money received, or in money saved. The money saved, is first by the Tartars, of whom he commands continually 60000 to attend him in his wars, without any pay but the spoil of the Enemy. And secondly by the Timariots, who nourish and bring into the Field more Horſe, than any Prince in Chriſtendom can keep (as we have already ſaid) for 34 millions of Gold. The money received (according to Boterus) is only 15 millions of Sultanies, which is nothing in reſpect of ſo great an Empire: the chief reaſon whereof is the Tyrannical government of the Turk, which deters men from tillage, merchandize, and other improvements of their eſtates; as knowing all their

MEDIA and PERSIA.

Here I have joyned together also, because the affairs thereof have been so united, in making up the second of the four great Monarchies, and running the same fortunes ever since; that they are hardly to be parted in course of story, though each must have unto it self a distinct Chorographie. First then, we begin with MEDIA.

MEDIA is bounded on the East, with Parthia, and some parts of Hyrcania, Provinces of the Persian Empire, on the West, with Armenia Major, and some part of Assyria; on the North, with the Caspian Sea, and those parts of Armenia Major, which now pass in the account of Georgia; and on the South, with Persia. So called from Madai the Son of Japhet, by whom first planted and possessed, after that general dispersion made at Babel. Known by this name amongst the ancients, both Greeks and Romans; but at this time Sheirvan by the Turks and Persians: the word signifying in the language of this Country, a Milkie-Plain.

The Country of a large extent, and of so different nature, as one would think it not the same. The North parts lying betwixt Mount Taurus and the Hyrcanian Sea, very cold and comfortable: so barren, that for the most part they make their bread of dried Almonds, and their drink of the juice of certain herbs. Fruit-trees they have but few, and those but of Apples; nor any droves of tame cattle, as in other places, their food being generally on Venison, or the flesh of wild beasts took in hunting. But on the South-side of the Taurus, the soil is very rich, and the Country pleasant, plentiful both of corn and wine, and all things necessary; full of fat pastures, some of them so large in compass, that 50000 Horses do graze upon them.

The people anciently great warriors, as those who ruined the great Empire of the Babylonians; and laid upon themselves and their own vertue, the foundation of the second Monarchy. But being not long after incorporated into the same Empire with the Persians, have not only ever since followed the same fortunes with them, but participate of their nature also: and therefore we shall hear more of their Character, when we come to Persia. Polygamie anciently amongst them, so far from being esteemed a sin or an inconvenience, that it was a punishment for the common Villager to have less than seven wives; or the woman, if of noble birth, fewer than five husbands. In their wars they use commonly to envenom their Arrows with an oyl or liquor, made of a bituminous water called Naphtia; whereof there is great plenty both here, in Persia, and Assyria. The Oyl called Oleum Mediaceum, from this people only, because their invention, and by them most mischievously used. The Arrow which was anointed with it, being shot from a slacker bow (for a swift and strong motion took away its vertue) did burn the flesh wherein it fastned with so great a violence, that nothing but dust could mitigate the fury of it; water increasing rather than diminishing that malignant flame.

The Christian Religion was first here planted by S. Thomas, but never had the happiness to be so universally embraced, as in other places, alwayes opposed and suppressed, either by Paganism in the time of the old Persian Kings; or by Mahometanism, since the first conquest of this Country by the power of the Saracens. Some Christians yet there be amongst them either of the Armenian, or Nestorian Sects, (as in all other parts of the Persian Empire) the specialties of whose Religion have been elsewhere spoke of. Here live also very many Jews, indulged the free exercise of their Religion: many of which are Descendants of those Tribes, which were transplanted hither by Salmanassar. But the Religion generally embraced and countenanced, is that of Mahomet, according to the Sophian or Persian Sects; the Language of which Nation they do also speak, though they had a language of their own, different from that of the Parthian, Elamite, or Persian, as appeareth, Ait. 2. v. 9. where they are reckoned as distinct.

Mountains of chief note, 1 Orontes, 2 Coronus, 3 Chaboras, the boundary betwixt Media and Assyria, 4 Pasonium, 5 Lagoas; all of them (except Chaboras only) the disjointed branches of Mount Taurus: which is here more broken and divided, than in any part of his course besides.

One of these flow their principal Rivers, 1 Amandus, 2 Strate, and 3 Carindus; of greatest eminence in this Country, in the time of Ptolomy, but otherwise of no great account or observation. 4 Canac, the Divider of this Province from Armenia Major, but whether any of the former under this new name, I am not able to affirm. Add hereunto the great Lake, now called Argis (by the Persians Vashlan) but by Strabo named Marianna Palus, situate in the confines of Assyria, Media, and Armenia; of the fish whereof dried by the Sun and wind, and sold into divers other Countreys, the people of these parts raise a great commodity.

In former times it was divided into many Provinces, the principal of which 1 Tropatene, 2 Charomithrene, 3 Darites, 4 Marciane, 5 Amariace, and 6 Syro-Media: these and the rest reduced to two in the latter reckonings, viz. Atropatia, and 2 Media Major.

1. ATRO-

Asroptia.

1. ATROPATIA is that part hereof, which lieth betwixt Mount Taurus and the Caspian Sea. So called from that Atropatus, Governor of these parts in the time of Darius, the last Persian Monarch; who so valiantly held out against the Macedonians. The Tropatene, (as I take it) of the ancient Writers. A barren, cold, and inhospitable Country, as before described: and for that cause allotted for the dwelling of many of the captive Israelites, brought hither by Salmanassar when he conquered that Kingdom: their numbers being found so great in this Northern Region, that Benjamin the Jew, reckoned no fewer than 50000. of them in one City only, which he calleth by the name of Madai. And that great numbers of them were transplanted hither, appeareth by that passage, 2 Kin. 17. 6. where it is said, that they were placed in Halah and Habor by the River of Gozan, and in the Cities of the Medes. Now Halah or Chalah seems most probably to be that Region of Assyria which Ptolomy calleth Chalateni, in the North of that Country, towards Media, Habor, or Chabor, to be that Mount Chaburus, which pertaineth this Country from Assyria, in which Mountainous tract there was in those times a City of the same name also. Betwixt which City and the banks of the Caspian Sea, I find in Ptolomy the City Ganzania; in the 40th. and 40 minutes of the Northern Latitude: in which there are apparent footsteps of the name of the River Gozan, upon whose banks it was most likely to be seated.

Places of most observation in it, 1 Hamadum by Benjamin the Jew called Madai, replenished in his time with families of the captive Israelites. 2 Ganzania, another dwelling of those Tribes, spoken of before. 3 Mandagorsis, of which nothing extant but the name. 4 Gelan, inhabited by Gela of the ancients, whom the Greeks call Cadusis. 5 Bochu, more towards the Caspian Sea, hence called Mare de Bochu. 6 Eres, a place of great richness, but possessed by the Turks, and made the residence of some of their principal Officers: taken by Mustapha General of the Turkish forces in the time of Amurath the 3d. and by him fortified as the Gate and entrance of this Country. 7 Samachia, or Shamaki, betwixt Eres and Derbent, taken by Osman Bassa, at the same time, Anno 1578. and made the residence of a Beglerbeg, Anno 1583. Conceived to be the Cyropolis of Ptolomy, by the Persians called Cyrechbata; bearing the name of Cyrus the great Persian Monarch, by whom built or beautified. Remarkable at the present for a Pillar of flint-stones, inter-woven with the heads of many of the Persian Nobility, most barbarously slain by one of the late Sultans, and this Pillar here erected for a terror to others.

2. MAJOR MEDIA, or MEDIA specially so called, is that part hereof; which lieth on the South of the Mountain Taurus. Commended by the Ancients, for one of the goodliest countries in all Asia: the fields (saith Ammianus) yielding abundance of Corn and Wine, for their fatness and fertility very rich, and no less pleasant for fresh Springs and cleer veins of water: where one may see plenty of green Meadows; and in them a breed of generous Horses, which they call Nisai, mounted by as valiant and generous Riders, who with great jollity use to go unto the wars, and charge furiously upon the Enemy. The men commended by Polybius (κατὰ δύναμιν ἀνδρῶν, &c.) as well as the Country.

Cities of most note in it, 1 Ecbatana of as great antiquity as Babylon; for we find that Semiramis the wife of Nimus in a war made against the Medes, who had then rebelled, taking an affection to the place, caused water-courses to be made to it from the further side of the Mountain Orontes, digging a passage through the hills, with great charge and labour. Destroyed by the injury of time, it was re-edified by Daces the sixth King of the Medes; and afterwards much beautified and enlarged by Seleucus Nicanor, Successor unto Alexander in his Asian Conquests. For beauty and magnificence little inferior to Babylon, or Ninive, before described. In compass 180 or 200 Furlongs, which make about 24 Italian miles. The walls thereof affirmed in the Book of Judith, to be 700 Cubits high, 50 Cubits broad, and the Towers upon the Gates 100 Cubits higher; all built of hewn and polished stone, each stone being six Cubits in length, and three in breadth. But this is to be understood only of the innermost wall, there being seven in all about it; each of them higher than the other, and each distinguished by the colour of their several Pinnacles; which gave unto the eye a most gallant Prospect. From which variety of colours, it is thought to have the name of Agbatba, or Agbathana. In former times, the ordinary residence of the Monarchs of the Medes and Persians, in the heats of the Summer; as Susa (the chief City of Susiana) in the cold of Winter. The Royal Palace being about a mile in compass, was built with all the cost and cunning that a stately mansion did require: some of the beams thereof of silver, and the rest of Cedar; but those of Cedar strengthened with Plates of Gold. Said by Josephus to be built by the Prophet Daniel. Which must be understood no otherwise in the truth of Story, than that he over-saw the Workmen, or contrived the Model; appointed to that office by Darius Medus, to whom the building of the same is ascribed by others. Neglected by the Kings of the Parthian race, it became a ruin. 2 Tauris, situate in or near the place of Ecbatana, out of whose rubbish it was built. Distant 150 miles from the Caspian Sea, under the shadow of Orontes, now called Barutia; but opening Southwards, towards a large and spacious Campagne, in compass about six miles, and beautified on the South-west within a large and pleasant Garden, the work of Sultan Tamas, who resided here often; the buildings for the most part of brick, with flat Roofs (as generally in all the East) well peopled, as containing 200000 persons of all sorts and Sexes. Of great trading, till subdued by the Turks, by whom it was thrice taken within very few years, viz. by Selimus the first, Anno 1514. by Solymann the Magnificent, Anno 1530, and by Osman Bassa, general of Amurath the 3d. Anno 1585. But this last finding it too chargeable to be always garrisoned, and not otherwise tenable but by force, pulled down the walls, and build a large and capacious Citadel: both Town and Citadel recovered by Emir-Hamze Mirza, Prince of Persia, and father of Sultan Soffy, Anno 1614. after it had been for an hundred years a continual prey unto the Turks. 3 Arfacia, so named by Ptolomy, and by the same conjectured to be built by some of the Parthian race. Ruined long since, but more beautifully revived than ever in the present. 4 Cabbin, raised from the ruins of that Town. Situate in a fair and open place on the banks of a little River, which serveth it for household uses, but not for traffick.

Exceedingly

Exceedingly enriched by the removal of the Court from Tauris hither, in the time of Tamus; partly invited thereunto by the richness of the soil, and the commodiousness of the place; but chiefly that he might without danger attend the Turks, who began to encroach on his Dominions. In compass about seven miles, beautified with a large market-place, many stately Mosques, and the Sultans Palace: this last adjoining to the first, convenient enough, but neither of great state nor beauty. 5 Rages, or Raga, mentioned in the book of Tobit, so called from Rem or Ragas the son of Phaleg, the founder of it: situate near the spacious Plain, so memorable for the great breed of Horses spoken of before; and therefore in that Book called the Plain of Rages. Repaired afterwards by the Greeks, it was named Europus, and so stands in Ptolomy. 6 Nassivan, supposed by some to be the Artasata, more probably the Naswana, of the Ancient Writers: a place much aimed at by the Turks in their Persian wars. 7 Araville, on or near the banks of the great lake Argis, spoken of before: the birth-place and chief Seat of Guine, and Ader, the first Authors of the Sophian Sect; and the burial place of Sultan Hysmael the first Persian Sultan of that line. 8 Sultania, about six dayes journey from Tauris, environed with high Mountains; the tops of which continually covered with Snow, may be seen farre off: founded by Alyaptus, the 8th. King of the Sixt or Tartarian Dynasty; and by him made the Royal Seat of the Persian Sultans, whence it had the name. But ruined by the Tartars, it retaineth nothing now of its former splendour, but the Mosques, or Temples (one of them, the fairest in the East) which the Tartars spared. 9 Troyan, in the Territory of Sultania, situate in a large Plain, but not far from the Mountains; beautified with a fair Market-place, many pleasant Gardens of private men; and one belonging to the King, environed with a wall of greater Circuit than the City. 10 Tarcoman, in the middle way betwixt Tauris and Cashin. 11 Damoon, at the foot of Taurus, a Town of 300 houses, nor here considerable but for the signification of the name; which is said to signifie a Second Plantation: and being situate at the foot of so high a Mountain, occasioneth some of the Jews to think, that the Ark rested not far off, as perhaps it did. 12 Marant, in the Extremity of the Countrey, but of of lesser note.

The first Inhabitants hereof were the posterity of Madai, as before was said; Ragan the Son of Phaleg taking up those parts, which lay next Affria. Divided in long tract of time into several Tribes, as the Cadusi, Amariacle, Margasi, Sagarti, Debrices, Tapyri; and some others. Governed by Kings immediately from the first Plantation; for we find that Pharnus King hereof, was overthrown and slain by Ninus the grand-son of Nimrod. After this made subject to the Affrians, their Kings were only titular, as the best but Homagers, perhaps no better than Provincial Governours, under that great Monarchy. Of most esteem amongst them was that Arseus, who with an Army of 800000. men (if the number be not mistaken) incountre. Cadusi, by whom discomfited and slain. But the Cadusi so broken, that they were fain to put themselves under the power of the Persians; and so continued till the time of Arbaces, the last of these Provincials, and the first Monarch of the Medes. He living in the time of Sardanapalus, had the chance to see his Lord and Master in a womans dress, spinning among his Concubines; and otherwise behaving himself in a brutish manner; which so moved him, that he resolved to be no longer subject to so vile a Monster. Communicating his thought unto Belochus, Governour of Babylon, and well seen in Astrology, he was encouraged to proceed; and sped so well, that having made themselves Masters of Ninive, the Imperial City (though Sardanapalus for a time put them shrewdly to it) they divided betwixt them his Estates. To Belochus fell Affria, and Babylonia, with the Provinces on the West of Tigris: to Arbaces, Media and the rest, which now make up the Kingdom of Persia. But being a mild Prince, and desirous by fair and gentle means to assure his Empire, he confirmed the Persian Satrapas in their former Governments; reserving nothing to himself but a titular Sovereignty. Of whom and his Successors more, when we have taken in the rest of the Provinces.

PERSIA.

PERSIA is bounded on the East, with India; on the West, with Media, Affria, and Chaldea; on the North, with Tartary; on the South, with the main Ocean. So called from Persis the predominant Province of it, that which gave law to all the rest: as that is said to do from Perseus, the son of Jupiter and Dane; affirmed by the Gracians to have conquered these Eastern Countries, and to have left his name to this. Of which thus Isidore, Petrus populi à Persio Rege sunt vocati, qui à Græcia in Asiam transiens illi barbaras gentes gravi diuturnoque bello perdomuit, et vltimò nomen subactæ Gentis imposuit. In the Scripture it is constantly called Elam, till the time of Daniel the Prophet, from Elam, the son of Sem, who was planted there. But after that the Medes and Persians had subdued Babylon, and transferred the supreme Monarchy to themselves; we find this people called by the name of Paras, (whence the name of Persian seems to come) the word Paras, (or Pharas) signifying as much as Horsemen. Given therefore to this Nation, as it is supposed, from an Edict of Cyrus, who not only taught them the art of horsemanship, but set forth a law, that it should be a reproach to any man to go on foot; five milium sine parum itinere: esset conficiendum, whether the journey that he had to go were long or little. Called sometimes also Achemenides, from Achemenides the Son of Perses, one of the first known Kings hereof; and by that name, (Non tot Achemenies armanth Sula Sagittis) they occur in the second of Propertius. Where by Achemenia Sagitta, he means Persian Arrows.

It is of very great extent, stretched out in length from the 82. degree of Longitude, to the 120. being 38 degrees in all; and in breadth from the 23. degree of Northern Latitude, to the 43. being 20 more. According unto which position, with reference to the heavenly bodies, we shall find it seated under the third, fourth, fifth, and sixth, Climates: the longest summers day in the Southern parts, being thirteen hours almost three quarters; and fifteen hours one quarter in the parts most Northwards.

The

The Countrey not alike in all places, as it is impossible it should in so great a compass. But generally it is of a pure and wholesom air, the high hills shading it on the one side from the heat of the Clim under which it lieth; and the warmth of the Sea, wherewith encompassed, cherishing a great part thereof. And so it is affirmed to be by Quintus Curtius; Regio non alia in tota Asia salubrior habetur; temperatum caelum, hinc perpetuum jugum opacum & umbrosum, quod assuulat; illinc mare adjunctum, quod modice tepore terra fovet. Then for the Earth, it is by reason of the great heat of the Sun, very dry and sandy; in many places destitute of water; in the South parts thereof few Rivers, and not many Lakes; by consequence neither well peopled, nor manured, for the greatness of it: men loving to inhabit (and I cannot blame them) where they may have the use of water. Which notwithstanding, it is furnished with all necessaries both for life and pleasure; one part affording that which the other wanteth, as shall be shewed in the description of the several Provinces.

The people antiently were trained up to the wars, but chiefly unto Archery from their very childhood: indulged the liberty of having as many wives as they pleased; they never saw the children begotten of them, until five years old. At that age sent unto their Fathers, they were taught presently to handle the Bow and Arrows. Upon this ground we find the Bow of Elam mentioned by the Prophet Jeremy, Chap. 4. and the Quiver of Elam by the Prophet Isaiah, Chap. 22. v. 6. as the Arms peculiar to that Nation, or most used amongst them. They were good horsemen also, and well skilled at their Dart and Slings, till wealth and ease, and the pride of so great an Empire, made them wholly feminine: depriving them of those abilities both of mind and body, wherein they did excel most Nations in their harder times. In all their fortunes very obsequious, if not fervile, to their Kings and Princes; in whose presence it was a crime to spit: but to deny obedience unto his commands an offence so heinous, as was not to be punished with less than the loss of life, and want of burial. In this observance of their Kings followed, if not outstripped, by the modern Persian. A race of men, affirmed to be cantiorum hominum tenuissimi, the most meek or patient of the world, especially compared with those of the same Religion, the Turks and Tartars. Not haters of learning, as the Turks; but studious, many of them in Physick and Astrology; most of the better sort much delighted in Poetry, which they give their minds to. For the most part addicted to hospitality, magnificent in expence, Lordly in their complements, fantastical in their Apparel, maintainers of Nobility, and desirous of peace. Such as apply themselves to Trades, and Mechanick Arts, prove excellent in the making of Silks, and Cloth of Gold: those which begate themselves to war, proving very good Souldiers, as the Turks have found unto their cost, who by their long wars against them have got nothing but blows. The women said to be neat and cleanly, truly loving, gorgeous in Attire, and delightful in the sequestrations of pleasure.

Their Religion at the first was Paganism, wherein directed principally, by their Priests or Magi; men of a strict austere life, forbidding outward ornaments, and the use of gold; making the ground their bed, and the herbs their food; their whole time spent in offering to the Gods the Prayers and Sacrifices of the people, as if they only might be heard; or else in divinations, and foretelling of things to come, from whence the names of Magick and Magician are derived unto us. Studious in the knowledge of God and Nature, and therefore called by Suidas, not only Philosophi, lovers of wisdom; but Philoseli, the lovers of God. Of such esteem, that as Cicero telleth us, the Persian Kings were not admitted to the Throne, till they were trained up in the discipline of the Magi: and of such power and intimacy in the Royal Court, that one of those Magi, on the death of Cambyses, possessed himself of the Persian Monarchy. In a word, such as the Druides were to the Galls and Britains, the Gymnosophists or Brachmans to the ancient Indians, and the Chaldeans in the Empire of Babylon; the same, if not of greater sway in affairs of moment, were the Persian Magi. And Persians they must be if Magi; none but the Natives of that Countrey being to be admitted of that Society: though by a Metaphor, applied to the Professors of the same Arts, though of other Countries, as those which came from the East to worship Christ, are by St. Matthew called Magi. (Mat. 2. 1.) though they came from Arabia.

The people then were Gentiles as to their Religion; and besides other Gods which the Gentiles worshipped, they were great Idolaters of the Fire: which they offered Sacrifice unto in time of peace, and carried it with them as their Tutelar Diet, in the time of war. At what time (especially if the King were there in person) it was born in the very front of their Army, attended on by their Priests, and followed by a train of boyes all clothed in Scarlet, to the number of 365. according to the number of the dayes of the year. In this equipage, with a great deal of pomp belides, did Darius set forwards to fight with Alexander; at the battel of Issus in Cilicia. A superstition derived from them to the Medes, and Affrians, their next neighbouring Nations, and not extinguished to this day in some parts of this Countrey; in which many of these Fire-worshippers are still remaining. But from a God, it grew in time to be a Gentleman, Usher, and to attend on Kings and persons of greatest eminence: used to be born before the Emperors of Rome, as a point of State. Inasmuch that Commodus though fallen out with his Sister Lucilla, permitted her notwithstanding to enjoy her Seat in the publique Theatre, & non compulsi autem aut, a fire to be born before her, as in former times, as we are told by Herodian.

The Christian faith was first planted in the Provinces of the Persian Kingdom, by Saint Thomas the Apostle, and held in all points answerable to those of the Catholic Church; till Sapor to despight the Emperor Heraclius, a right Orthodox Prince, commanded that all the Christians in his Dominions should conform themselves to the opinions and tendries of the Nestorian Sect, by that means universally spread over all these Provinces. With whom here live now intermingled some Armenian Christians, who with their Patriarch removed hither; when their own Countrey was made the seat of a long and miserable war betwixt the Persian and the Turk; but found not here to safe a dwelling as they did expect: 1200 of them being slain by Alas the late Persian Sultan, on a suspicion that they went about to reconcile themselves to the Pope of Rome (whom he held to be more inclinable to the Turk than to him) in the year 1609. Which notwithstanding (so miserable a condition do these Christians live in) he suffered two Convents of Augustine and Carmelite Friars, to be settled at the same time, even in Span-hav it self; and many Jesuits to live peaceably up and down the Countrey, which serve for little else than to give intelligence. Here are also many Jews dispersed over all the Provinces of this Empire; allowed their Synagogues, and Publique Places of Assembly. But the Religion publicly authorized and countenanced, is that of Mahomet, imposed on this Countrey by the Saracens, when by them subdued: differing in some points from the Turks, especially about the true Successor of that false Seducer (of whom more anon;) the cause of the long wars betwixt those Nations.

As for the Persian Language, it is very antient, supposed to be as old as the Confusion at Babel: some words whereof, by Daniel and Ezra which lived in the Persian Court, have been made use of in some parts of the holy Scripture. A tongue which still hath left some remainders of it, in the Language of the modern Persian (as those of judgement in this tongue have delivered to us;) notwithstanding so long tract of time, and the conquest of this Countrey by the Greeks, Arabians, Turks and Tartars. Not spoken only in this Countrey, nor limited within the Provinces of the Persian Empire; but used also in the Court and Camp of the Great Mongul, and some parts of Zagathay; and where not vulgar unto all, studied and understood by persons of more eminent fort, as the Latine by the Gentry of these Western parts. Inasmuch as he that hath this Language, may travel over all the East without an Interpreter.

Rivers in the South parts there are but few, as before was said, and those few not navigable; by consequence of little note or estimation. The principal of those that be, are 1 Eulens, the chief River of Susiana, emptying it self into Sinu Persicus: a River of so pure a stream, that the great Persian Kings would drink of no other water. The Northern parts more plentifully stored with that commodity, as having in it the famous Rivers of 2 Ochus in Bactria, a River of the greater note amongst the Antients, because it was navigable; opening with a fair Channel into the Caspian Sea, to which it hasteneth from Mount Taurus: and so doth also, 3 Oxus in Margiana, a fatal bound to these great neighbours. A River which the Persians have seldom passed to enlarge their Dominions, but they received some notable overthrow at the hand of the Scythians; and when the Tartars made over it under the conduct of Saba the Chem of Zagathay, for the invasion of Persia; they were shamefully beat back again by Hysmael Sophie. Nor is it less memorable in old stories, for the famous passage of Alexander over it, in pursuit of the murderers of Darius. For having followed Bessus to the banks of this River, and not knowing how to pass over his men, there being neither Stairs upon it, nor timber near at hand to build them, he caused a great number of bags and bladders to be stuffed with Straw, and so in three days transported his Army. So that I may truly say with his own Historian, Nummius Confilius quod necessitas subiecerat, initit; necessity is the best Author of fine inventions. 4 Ziobris in Hyrcania, which rising out of the same mountainous tract (as the two last mentioned) after a long course above ground in the open light, hideth himself again for the space of 38 miles, and then breaketh out at a new fountain, and falleth into 5 Rhadaga, another chief River of those parts. And this Alexander the Great found to be true; by casting two Oxen into the River Ziobris, which by the current of the stream were carried under the ground, and brought to light where the River had its rise again. 6 Hidero, by what name known unto the Antients I am not able to say, but of great note amongst modern Travellers, for the fall thereof into the Sea: so steep and strong, that the people are said to sacrifice or banquet under the fall thereof, the stream so violently shooting over their heads, that it never wetech them.

Mountains of most note, are those which pass by the name of Taurus, which having left Media on the West, passeth through the Northern Provinces of the Persian Empire; dividing Parthia from Hyrcania, and Paropamisus from Bactria, and Aria from Margiana. Known by the names of Coronus, the Scythian hills, Paropamisus, Caucasus; whereof more as occasion serveth in their proper places.

It is divided into the particular Provinces of 1 Susiana, 2 Persis, 3 Ormuz, 4 Carmania, 5 Gedrasia, 6 Drangiana, 7 Arachosia, 8 Paropamisus, 9 Aria, 10 Dartbia, 11 Hyrcania, 12 Margiana, 13 Bactria. Which we will severally survey in the Chorography and story, till we have joynted them altogether in the Persian Monarchy; and then pursue the History as conjunct and fashioned into the body of one Empire.

1. S U S I A N A.

SU S I A N A is bounded on the East, with Persis; on the West, with Babylonia, or Chaldea; on the North, with Affrya; on the South, with a branch of the River Tygris, and some part of the Gulf of Persia.

It was so called quasi Cusiana, or the Land of the Chusites, from Chus the eldest Son of Ham, and the Grand-son of Noah; by whose Son Havilah, it was first peopled; and therefore called in Scripture the land of Havilah: this being that land of Havilah, which the River Pison is said to compass, in the Book of Genesis. The difference betwixt them is, that that land of Havilah lay on both sides of the River Euphrates (which the Country of Susiana doth not) and was the Eastern bound of the Ismaelites, Amalekites, and other Nations intermingled in those parts of Arabia. For whereas Saul is said in the first of Sam. chap. 15. ver. 7. to have smitten the Amalekites from Sur to Havilah, that is to say from the Red Sea to the gulf of Persia: it must be understood of Havilah in the first extent; but neither of Havilah in the East Indies (so called from a Son of Jockan) or of that part of Havilah which lay on the East side of

of Euphrates, and is that Susiana, in which now we are: it being nowhere found that Sau was so great a Traveller as to see the Indies; or of such puissance as to force a passage through the Countries of the Chaldeans and Babylonians. But the name of Havilah being lost, that of Cusiana or Susiana did still remain; preferred to this day in that of Chusestan, by which now called.

The Countrey memorable in the Scriptures for G. Id. Bd. liam, and the Onyx-stone; which doth abundantly set forth the richness and commodities of it: Bdellium being a Tree (for of the other two nothing need be said) about the bigness of an Oliver, yielding a certain Gum very sweet to smell to, but bitter of taste; which in time hardeneth to a Pearl, as Engubinus and Beroaldus have delivered to us.

Divided antiently into many particular Regions, or at least known by several names in its several quarters. For where it bordered upon Tigris, it was called Melitene; Cabandone, where it touched upon Persis; where it confined on the Elymeans, it had the name of Cissia, and near the Wall or Ditch called Kallinus Pafni, it was called Characene. Watered belides Eu'ans, and Tigris before spoken of; with the Rivers Orontes, and Masæus; with that branch of the River Tigris which Ptolemy called Basium; Caritis, Pasi-Tigris; and the Scriptures, Pison.

Chief Cities hereof, 1 Aracca, spoken of by Ptolemy, the same which the Scriptures call Erech, and one of the four which Nimrod built in the first beginning of his Empire, Gen. 11. Rememored by Tibullus for the Fountains of Naphta (of which the Medians made their Oyl spoken of before) a bituminous liquor, easily taking fire, but not easily quenched. Of which thus the Poet;

Arct. Areccæis aut unda perhospita Campis.

Where by unda perhospita, he meaneth that bituminous liquor called Naphta, issuing from the fields of Erech, as the learned Salmasius hath observed in his notes on Solinus. 2 Susa, the Susian of the Book of Hester, and Nehemiah; honoured with the residence of the Persian Monarchs in winter, as Ecbatana in Summer. Situate on the River Eulens, by the Prophet Daniel called Blai. Built, as some say, by Memon the Son of Ithobus, slain by the Thessalians in the Trojan wars: the walls whereof as Cassiodorus hath reported, cemented with Gold. But nowsoever, it was doubtless a magnificent City and of infinite wealth: Alexander finding in it 50000 Talents of Gold uncoined, belides Silver wedges, and Jewels of inestimable value. Memorable for the great feast here made by Abusurnus, of 183 days continuance, for his Lords and Princes: imitated by the Persian Sultans to this very day; who with a Royal Feast of the like continuance, do annually entertain their Nobles. Now nothing but a ruin, and perhaps not that. 3 Elymais, the chief City of the Elymei, by Ptolemy (unless his Copies be corrupted) mistakingly called Eldimeis. Situate on the banks of Eulens also, near the border of Persis (the Nation of the Elamites or Elymei taking part of both Provinces.) Of great note antiently for a sumptuous Temple of Diana sacrilegiously ranfacked by Antiochus, of which see 1 Mac. 6.2 and of such wealth, by reason of the concourse of Pilgrims thither, that Sextus Sulpitius calleth it Oppidum opulentissimum, a most opulent City. 4 Sela, on the banks of Eulens also; reckoned by Ammianus amongst the most eminent of this Province: so named from Selah, the Son of Arphaxad, who first planted there. To whom the building of the City of Sela is ascribed by Eusebius, in his Hexameron, Σαλὰ ὁπ' Ἐσαῶνος, are that Authors words; perhaps more truly than to Memon: and unto whom the Original of the Cossai, whom Ptolemy placeth in this tract, is referred by Eusebius. 5 Tarfiana, another of the Cities mentioned by Ammianus (who takes notice only of the chiefest), the same no doubt which Ptolemy calls Tariana, and joyns next to Sela. 6 Agra, upon the banks of Tigris, not far from Erech. But there is little left of these, but what is to be found in the antient Writers; now hardly visible in their Ruins. The Towns of most note now remaining, being 7 Jasroone, inhabited for the most part by Jews, of which here are no fewer than a thousand Families; supposed to be the descendants of those whom Salmanassar transplanted out of the Kingdom of Israel. 8 Sann, 9 Casta, of which little memorable.

The first Inhabitants hereof were the Chusites of the house of Havilah, the Son of Chus; an evident footstep of whose name we have in the Chavilai, whom Pliny placeth in this tract, by other Writers called the Chaulotai & Chaulasiti, as before was noted, with whom were joyn'd in the first plantings of this Countrey, the Cossai and the Susiani, descended from Sala the Son of Arphaxad; and the Elymei, the posterity of Elam the Son of Sem. Betwixt the two last Nations long and frequent wars, till the Kings of Babylon or Affrya composed the differences, by making both subject to their Empire. After this, nothing memorable in the story of it; till the transplanting of the ten Tribes into the Regions of Affrya, and the Cities of Media. At which time, as many of the Israelites were removed thither; so many of this Nation were sent out (with others) to possess themselves of the void places of those Tribes. Called Cusheans by the Jews, because the most considerable number of them came from this Province, called in the Scriptures Cush, by Josuephus Cutha; and by him reckoned for a Region of Persia, as indeed it was, the time where he lived considered; different only in the Dialect or form of speech; that Countrey which the Hebrews called Chus; being named Cush by the Chaldeans; by the Persians, Chusestan: that name continuing to this day.

2. P E R S I S.

PE R S I S hath on the East, Carmania; on the West, Susiana; on the North, Mediana; and on the South, some part of the Persian Bay or Sinu Persicus, which took name from hence. The reason of the name we have had before; this being the predominant Province which in fine gave both name and Law to the rest of this Empire. It had antiently been called Cephene; but now most commonly by the name of Fars, or Pharsistan; more near to Pharus, the old name of it, both in the Arabick and Hebrew.

Such

Such parts hereof as lie towards the North are cold and hilly, nor apt to bear either fruit or corn, in any plenty. Some Emeralds they find there, but not very clear. Those parts which lie towards the Persian Gulf, of as bad a nature, though of different quality; sandy, and hot, and beareth little fruit but Datt, and few trees but Palm. But betwixt both there lyeth a rich and pleasant Country, abounding with Corn, Fruit, and Cattel; great store of Roses, of Rose-water consequently: wherewith and with those skins which we call commonly by the name of Cordovans from another occasion, they use to furnish all the adjoining Provinces. And to make up the Character of a happy Country, to which nothing wanteth, it is well stored with Lakes and Rivers; the chief wherof are 1 Bagradas, which divideth this Province from Carmania. 2 Rhodomanes, by some called Araxes, now Bindimir, on whose banks flood the renowned Persepolis. 3 Orontes, dividing Perfis from Susiana, where it falls into the Bay. 4 Brisoana, ending its course in the same Sea also.

Mountains of note I find not any, but those which part this Region from Susiana. Not known by any special name (for ought I can find;) but of sufficient note for the difficult passages out of one Country into the other, called Pyla Persidis; defended by Ariobarzanes, a Noble Persian, against Alexander the Great, who was here very handsomly beaten, and forced to save himself by a close retreat. And though Alexander was shewed a By-path afterwards, whereby he fell on Ariobarzanes ere he was aware: yet he was taught by this hard lesson, that if those who kept the straits of Cilicia, and the banks of Tigris and Euphrates, had made like resistance; he had not bought the Persian Monarchy in so cheap a Market.

It was divided antiently into Paraticine, bordering on Media. 2 Mardiene, joyning on the Gulf or Bay of Persia. 3 Misilia, lying betwixt both. Each of which, with the several Nations intermingled here as in other places, had their several Cities. The chief wherof 1 Asinza, seated on the Bay betwixt the mouths of Bagradas and Brisoana. 2 Jonacapolis, on the same Bay also, near the influx of Rhodomanes, or Araxes. 3 Asima, more within the land, now called Lanbila. 4 Marrasium. 5 Otroatis, or Orebat, as some Copies have it. 6 Pasarracha, in the Greek text of Ptolemy called Pasagada, and Pasagrada by Qu. Curtius. Memorable for the Sepulchre of Cyrus the first Persian Monarch, which was violated by a Souldier of Alexanders, in hope of finding some rich booty, he met with nothing but this modest inscription, Cyrus ego sum qui Perlicum regnum constitui: quicunque ades mortalium, ne mihi tantillum telluris invidias, qua corpus meum obtegatur. The Sacrilegious Souldier though a Macedonian, put to death by Alexander. 7 Persepolis, the chief City of this Province, and of all the East, called therefore Regia Orientis by Qu. Curtius; situate near the banks of the River Araxes, and built for the most part of Cypress wood; the walls of the houses being made of Marble, digged out of an adjoining Mountain. Affirmed by Diodorus Siculus, who at large describes it, to be the richest and goodliest City in all the world. And well we may believe him for the richness of it, Alexander finding here 120000 Talents in ready money for his own share, after the Souldiers had made what spoil they listed of Coin, Plate, Bullion, Images of Gold and Silver, and Jewels of unspeakable value. But the chief beauty of it was the Royal Palace, built on an Hill, environed with a treble Wall, the first of 16 Cubits height, the second of thirty, and third of sixty, all of them of black polished Marble, with stately Battlements, and in the Circuit of the whole Palace an hundred Turrets; which gave to the beholders far and near a most goodly Prospect. Nor was the inside of less beauty, than the out-side of Majesty: the Roof thereof shining with Ivory, Silver, Gold, and Amber; and the Kings Throne being wholly composed of Gold, and the richest Pearls. But rich and stately though it were, and one of the greatest Ornaments of the Eastern world; it was by Alexander in a drunken fit consumed with fire, at the instigation of Lais that infamous strumpet; as in revenge for so many Cities of the Greeks, which the Persians formerly had burnt in the Grecian wars. And though Alexander in his sober sense did repent him of it, and gave order that it should be re-edified; yet did it never rise to its former height: the Conqueror dying shortly after, and that purpose with him. So ruined in the age of Qu. Curtius, (who lived in the time of Claudius Caesar;) that he professeth vestigium ejus non inveniri nisi Araxes amnis ostenderet, that no footsteps of it had been found, if not shewn and pointed out by the River Araxes, on whose banks it stood. But by the fall thereof rose 8 Shiras, now the chief City of this Province, situate in a fair large Plain hemmed about with Mountains, under one of which it is pleasantly seated; in compass about nine miles, well built and beautified with fair Gardens and magnificent Mosques: two of which larger than the rest, are made more eminent by the addition of two Spires or Steeples covered with a painting of Gold and Azure; the fabricks for the most part of Mosaic work, as light also by night as day, by reason of a thousand Lamps burning nightly in them. A City (as is said by a modern Traveller) which for good wine, pretty women, pleasant fruits, and a gallant People, may hold comparison with the best in Persia. 9 Miyown, on the North-east of Shiras, delightfully situate amongst the woods and fruitful pastures, and blessed not only with good Wine, but wholefome waters; of which last, few parts of Persia have much cause to brag. 10 Bannarum, on the South-west of Shiras towards Carmania, chiefly remarkable for the ruins of an ancient Castle, situate on the top of a lofty Mountain. 11 Goyanm, a Town of a thousand houses. 12 Berry, of no great bigness; but of most esteem, by reason of a fair Mosque, a School for the Arabick tongue, and the Sepulchre of one of their false Prophets; of which the Persians, besides Mahomet, and Mortis-Ali, do acknowledge many.

The first Inhabitants here were of the posterity of Elam the Son of Sem, and such who under his conduct were settled here; called from hence Elamites in the usual stile of holy Scriptures by the Greeks and Latines, Elymæi: who spreading themselves into Susiana, and by degrees also into other Provinces, became so considerable, that the name of Elamite and Elam were of great renown: having a language to themselves distinct from that of the Medes and Parthians, as is apparent Alg. 2. and comprehending under that appellation, the adjoining Regions, as appears plainly in the eighth of the Prophet Daniel, where where Susa is said to be in the Province of Elam. How the name was changed into that of Persia, hath been shewn before. Such as continued in this Province, divided into the Tribes of the Masabata, Rapsi, Hippophagi, Suzai, Megores, and Stabei, were at first under the command of their own Princes only: amongst which Cherdorlamer is of greatest fame, who having the conduct of some Assyrian Troops: and by the name of the Kings of Elam and Assyria invaded Palestine, subdued the City of Sodom, took Lot prisoner, and in the end were overthrowen by the forces of Abraham. Of no note after this expedition, till the time of Perse the Father of Achamenes, who being Provincial Governour of these Countries under Sardanapalus, joyined with Arhaes and Belochus in the War against him: and by the victory got for himself the dominion over those estates, which he had formerly ruled for the Assyrians; with reference to the Kings of Media as the Supreme Lords. Whose Successors, till the time of Cyrus, take in order thus:

The KINGS of PERSIS.

- 1 Perse, from whom perhaps the name of Persis may be more properly derived, than either from Perseus the son of Danae; or the son of Perseus by Andromeda.
- 2 Achamenes, from whom the Persians had the name of Achamenii, and the succeeding Kings were called Achamenides.
- 3 Cambyses, in some places of Herodotus called also Darius.
- 4 Cyrus, from whose second son named Teispes, descended that Darius, the son of Hystaspis, one of the seven Persian Princes, who got the Kingdom on the expiration of the present Line, and the extirpation of the Magi; of which more hereafter.
- 5 Cambyses II. the son of Cyrus.
- 6 Cyrus II. surnamed the Great, son of Cambyses, and of Mandane the daughter of Astages King of Media: who joyning with Cyaxares, or Darius Medus, overthrowen the Babylonian Empire; and translated thereby the Supreme power to the Medes and Persians. Of which more hereafter.

3 C A R M A N I A.

C A R M A N I A is bounded on the East, with Gedrosia, and some part of Aria; on the West, with part of Persis, and the Gulf of Persia, from hence called also by the name of Sinus Carmanicus; on the North, with Parthia; and on the South, with the main Indian Ocean. So called from the Carmanic chief people of it: but the reason of that name I find not. It is now generally called Chyrmian; those parts of it which lie next to Parthia, which Ptolemy calleth Carmania Deserta, being now named Alsinia, and by some Dulcinda.

The Country for the most part barren, and but ill inhabited. That part which Ptolemy calleth Carmania Deserta, being truly such; a Wilderness or very Desart, having in it neither Town nor Village, but some scattered houses, and those but ill provided of food and necessities; full of unprofitable Sands; destitute of Water, and of a very hot and unhealthy Air. And though the other part hereof which lieth towards the Ocean, hath a Sea-coast of above 200 leagues in length, and many Rivers emptying themselves into it, yet are they not the Richer by it; the shores being full of Rocks, and the Rivers small; so that they neither have good Port, nor safe coming to it. The best Commodities hereof (besides their Manufactures) are Dates, Myrrhe, Arsenic, some few Mines of Silver, more of Brass and Iron, and good store of Alabaster. In which regard, the Inhabitants hereof were antiently called Ichthyophagi, because they lived wholly upon Fish, the Country yielding little else for the life of man. Carmania sine veste ac fruge, sine pacore ac sedibus, piscium carne vescuntur, carne vescuntur, prater capita toto corpore hirsuti. The Carmanis (saith Pomponius Mela) have neither fruits, nor raiment, nor house, nor cattel; but cloath themselves with the skins, and feed themselves with the flesh of Fishes; hairy not only on their heads; but over all their bodies also. Where by the way, Ammianus (Marcellinus) must be out in his informations, who telleth us of these very Carmanis, that their Country though far less than that of Arabia Felix; and far more obscure; was as well replenished with Rivers, and for fertility of soil not inferior to it. But we must understand the one of the best parts of Carmania; the other of Deserta only.

Amongst the Rivers which he reckoneth of greater name than the rest, he mentioneth, 1 Saganis, 2 Sagarus, and 3 Hydracrus. Of which Saganis only is named by Ptolemy, the other Rivers, or the same under divers names, being 1 Dara, 2 Andaninus, 3 Catharapsis, 4 Achindanus, 5 Salarus, (the Sagarus, as I take it of Ammianus) 6 Caudriacus, 7 Zorambis, and 8 Samidace, most of them falling into the Gulf of Persia, few Navigable, or of any use in the way of Trading.

Mountains of most note 1 that called Senuramis, from some exploit of that great Lady. 2 Strongis, so named from the roundness of it; and 3 a continued ridge of Hills, dividing this Country from Gedrosia.

Places of most observation in it, 1 Cantharis, 2 Agris, 3 Tisa, honoured by Ptolemy with the names of Cities. 4 Cyrza, and 5 Gocharta, two Port-Towns. 6 Alexandria, bearing the name of that great Conquerour, who hereabouts kept his Bacchanalia, whereof more anon. 7 Portuspana, by Ammianus called Oryspana, and by him reckoned amongst the fairest and richest of all the Country. 8 Armuzia, (or Armuzium as Pliny calleth it,) on the shore of the Gulf, giving name to a Promontory near adjoining, and to the noble Isle of Ormuz, of which more anon. 9 Gumbrois, not long since a poor Village; but since the fall of Ormuz (from which not above nine miles distant) grown a populous Town, consisting at the least of a thousand houses. 10 Fasques, at the opening of the Persian Gulf into which it looketh, whence the Promontory of it called Carpella, is of late named Caput Persicum. 11 Carmania, the Metropolis or mother City of the Province, in former times of good esteem; Fasques. 12 Carmania, the Metropolis or mother City of the Province, in former times of good esteem; and now of passing good repute both for Cloth of Gold, and the making of the best Scymitars. A weapon (wherefoever made) of such value amongst the Mahometans; and so esteemed of by the Turks, that upon (wherefoever made) of such value amongst the Mahometans; and so esteemed of by the Turks, that upon the overthrow of the Navy at the battle of Corfu, Anno 1574. most of them who were taken Prisoners, threw their Scymitars into the Sea, for fear the Christians should be masters of such excellent weapons. It is now called Chirman, by the name of the Province, as in former times; with very little difference from the ancient name. 12 Lar, more within the Land towards Persia, seated in a barren and inhospitable Country, full of huge heaps of sands, both loose and dangerous, moved and removed as the wind steth into Plains and Mountains: without Grass, Water, Herbs, or any other necessary for the use of Travellers; the City being served with rain water only, entertained with great joy when it falleth, and kept in Cisterns. The City notwithstanding large, and of good capacity, containing not long since to the number of 5000 houses: of which the greatest part, in the year 1590. were thrown down by an Earthquake: now most remarkable for a fair Market-place of about 180 paces square; a goodly Mosque, adorned with Mosack work, and a strong Castle seated on the top of an hill, furnished with great plenty of Ordnance brought hither from Ormuz. This once a Kingdom of it self, or the head City of a Kingdom, acknowledging no subjection to the Persian Sophies: still conquered to that Crown by Emangoli, Chawn Duke of Shiras, who sent hence as much treasure as was said to load 700 Camels; and put to death the poor King with his whole posterity, Anno 1604. or thereabouts. 13 Tecan, or Dea-chow, a Town of the jurisdiction of Lar, not far from which is a huge wall cut out of the solid rock by incredible labour, which served formerly both for the boundary and defence of that sandy Kingdom against the Persians.

The ancient Inhabitants hereof, were the posterity of Salta, the son of Chiu, who wanting room on the Coast of Arabia Felix, where they were first planted; passed over into Sophia (from them so named) an Island of the Persian Gulf; and afterwards into the main land of Carmania, where they built and gave name unto the City of Sabis, which we find in Ptolemy. Divided in some tract of time into the several Nations of the Sazote, Ara, Charadre, Chelonophagi, Cabadine, and Pasagarde.

Neither the People nor the Country memorable in the way of story; but by Accident only: it being here that Alexander being returned out of India, kept his Bacchanalia, in imitation of Bacchus, who first conquered that Nation. Night and day he was continually feasting with his friends, on a scaffold drawn with eight horses; his Companions following in their Chariots: some adorned with Purple and Silk, others with Flowers and Green Boughs; themselves wearing Garlands on their heads, and carrying their carowling Cups in their hands. In this Army there was neither Helmet, Sword, Arrow, or Buckler seen: all their Armour, was Cups, Barrells, and Flaggons; their Skirmishing Eating, Drinking, Laughing, and Singing. Attended they were by Mintrells, playing on their Flutes; by Women Dancing, Boyes shouting, all playing the drunken Fools most naturally. Thus march they through the Country of Carmania, in as great dissoluteness as if BACCHUS himself had indeed been there, and led the Mummery; and for seven whole dayes this sottishness continued. So that Curtius well observeth, Si quid virtus saltem adversus comessantes animi fuisset, mille hercule viri, modo & sobrii, septem dierum crapula graves in suo triumpho capere potuerunt: a thousand Persians, sober and well provided, had their hearts been answerable to so good an opportunity, might have destroyed this drunken Army, and redeemed at once the honour of their Country, and their own liberty.

4 O R M U Z.

ORMUZ, not so much memorable for the greatness, as the wealth, and the conveniency of the situation of it, is an Island situate in the entrance of the Persian Gulf: commanding not long since, over some part of the Continent of Carmania, and some few Towns of Arabia Felix, and most of the Islands of the Bay. And therefore before we come to speak of the Isle it self, we must take a brief survey of the Sea or Bay called Sinus Persicus, according to our method in other places.

SINUS PERSICUS, the Gulf or Bay of Persia, so famous, so full of Islands, and so much frequented (I use the words of Ammianus Marcellinus) beginneth at Harmozonta, (the same which Ptolemy calls Amuza) a Cape or Promontory of Carmania: from which unto a Cape or Foreland of Arabia Felix, which the Inhabitants call Maces, the passage is so strait and narrow, that one may very easily see to the opposite shore. The Strait once passed, the Bay beginneth to open and enlarge it self, as far as the City of Teredon (now called Balsora) where Euphrates after many downfalls is lost in the Sea. The whole Gulf measured by the shores, of Orbicular form, in compass 20000 Furlongs, (or 2500 Italian miles) in all the Coasts and sides whereof the Villages and Towns stand exceeding thick, affording frequent passage to and fro for shipping. So far, and to this purpose lie. To which description of his, so exact and punctual, our late Navigations have not added much, but the change of names: the whole Bay being now called Mare Elkarisse, and the entrances thereunto the Straits of Balsora; these last so called because they opened the way to the Town of Balsora, the most noted Empory of those parts in the times foregoing.

Chief Isles hereof, besides those on the Arabian shore, of which we have already spoken, are 1 Taxiana

Gedrosia.

1 Taxiana, on the Coast of Susiana. 2 Tabinia. 3 Sophtha, and 4 Alexandria, or the Isle of Alexander, on the shores of Persia. Of which that which is called Sophtha, seems to take name from Sabia the son of Chiu, planted upon the opposite shore of Arabia Felix; and therein giving name to the City of Sabis, which we find in Ptolemy: And finally joining to Carmania, there are the Islands called, 5 Sagdana, the chief Town whereof was anciently named Milua; and 6 Porachtha, situate at the very mouth of the Straits; now called ORMUS, by the name of the Town and Promontory of Amuza, in Carmania, near adjoining to it, and unto which it did in former times belong.

This Island situate as is said at the mouth of the Gulf or Bay of Persia, is in compass about 20 miles long, and full of Rocks, in a manner barren of all necessities except salt, wherewith their very rocks are covered, and of salt-stones many houses built. So destitute of all things fitting for the life of man, that the Inhabitants had all their victuals, even the very water which they drank, from some of the adjoining Countries: The air so hot in time of Summer, that the people rest themselves in Caves covered over with wood, where they stand or sit in water up to the chin; and have loop-holes in the tops of their houses to let in the wind. Which notwithstanding, in regard of the situation, it was of late one of the richest Empories in all the world; the wealth of Persia and East-India being brought hither, and conveyed hence up by water to the River Euphrates, and so by Boats, or on Camels backs, to Aleppo, Alexandretta, Trisopolis; from whence dispersed into all the Countries on the Mediterranean, and to some beyond.

The people hereof in their persons, habit, and Religion, participate somewhat of the Arabians, but most of the Persians. Mahometans for the most part, of the Sophian Sect: the rest, but few in number, of the Christian; to which converted by the preaching of Father Gasper, a Portugal Jesuite, since the falling of that Nation there.

The chief and only City was of the same name with the Island, founded some seven hundred years ago by one Mahomet Dranku, descended from the Kings of Saba in Arabia Felix: who with many families of the Sabaans, passed over the Straits into Carmania, and the Isles adjoining, and liking the situation of this Island, built this City in it; which he called Ormuz, or Amuizium, according to the name of the Town and Promontory, upon which it lieth. The City seated at one end of the Isle, about two miles in compass; well built, and adorned with a fair Market-place, some Churches, and a well fortified Castle furnished with all necessities to maintain a Siege. By reason of its wealth and resort of Merchants, grown to such esteem, that it gave occasion to this Distich;

That is to say,

Were all the World a Ring, this Isle alone
Might of that Ring be thought to be the Stone.

It was first under its own King, whose dominion extended also into some part of the Continent on either side, and over all the rest of the Islands within the Gulf. His Revenue of no great yearly value till the coming of the Portugals hither, by whom it was discovered under the conduct of Albuquerque, Anno 1506. Who having fortified some part of it for their own defence, and made it the Staple of their Trade for the Indian Merchandise, so enriched the same, that the Revenues of those Kings (though Vassals and Tributaries to the Portugals) amounted to 140000 Seriffs yearly. In this flourishing state it stood till the year 1622. when Abas the Sultan of Persia, having received some affront at the hands of the Portuguese; or desirous to remove the trade of Ormuz, to some Port of his own; gave order to Emangoly Chawn, the Duke of Shiras, to lay siege unto it, with an Army of 15000 men. Who seeing no hopes of mastering it by his land-forces only, furnished himself with the Ships and Cannon of some English Merchants to whom he promised many things which he never performed. For being once master of the City, he destroyed it utterly, removing the Ordnance to Lar, the wealth thereof to his own treasure of Shiras, the materials of the houses to Gombroon spoken of before: the Portuguese and Christian natives passing over unto Maukhabat, in Arabia Felix. Since which time though the English Captains that ventured in it, were disappointed of the spoil which they did expect; yet so much honour hath been given by the King of Persia, to the English Nation; that their Agent who resideth at Gombroon, takes custom of all strangers which do traffick thither.

5 G E D R O S I A.

GEDROSIA is bounded on the West, with Carmania; on the East, with Cambaja or Guzarat, a Province of India; on the South, with the main Indian Ocean; on the North, with Drangiana, and Arachosia. The reason of the name I find not. Now by Mercentor, called Gest; by Castaldus, Circan.

The Country desolate and barren; like the worst part of Carmania, much destitute of fresh water, and covered over with loose sands, dangerous to the native and stranger both. Some rain they have, but not sufficient to allay the heat and drought which they suffer under; and yet by reason of that heat it affordeth in some places Nard and Myrrhe, with some other spices. Some Brooks here are, or rather Torrents, which falling from the hills do somewhat qualifie the indispotion of the soil, and make it habitable: The chief of which was called Arbius anciently; the chief Mountain, Batim.

Towns of most name in it, 1 Rhagiana, honoured by Ptolemy with the name of a City; and 2 a Port or Harbour called Malierum portus, or the Haven of Women. 3 Arbis, upon the banks of the River stole from heaven) he made the highest part of Mount Caucasus his study: where the inward care he had to accomplish his desire, might justly have been compared to a Vulture gnawing on his entrails; and of this opinion is Saint Augustine. But far more memorable is it made for being the resting place of the Ark of Noah, whereof we have already spoken in our General Preface.

Places of most consideration in it, 1. Namibia, and 2. Ortoffpana, both named by Ptolemy, and reckoned by Ammianus for the most famous of this Country. But in what their fame consisted I cannot find. 3. Parsiana, 4. Gazaca, 5. Doroacana, 6. Bagarda; all named by Ptolemy; but not else observable. 7. Candahor, now the Metropolis of the Country, a Town of great Trade, by reason of the situation of it on the borders of India; in that respect giving to the whole Country the name of Candahor. By which name it is reckoned for a Kingdom, and used amongst the many titles in the Stile Imperiali. Nothing considerable of it in the course of Story, but that being once brought under by the Persian Monarchs, it followed the fortune of the rest till these later times; when the Persians being over-laid by the Tartars, it became subject to some Kings of the race of Tamerlane, reigning in this Province, till brought under by the same subject to some Kings of the same extraction. Finding those Kings intent on the Conquest of India, they freed themselves from all subjection to that Crown, and had Kings of their own, till the year 1600. or thereabouts; when the last King, unable to defend himself against Abdaxa, King of the Usbeques (a Tartarian people, but subject in some sort to the Crown of Persia) surrendered his Kingdom to Echobar the Great Mongul (descended from the old Kings of Cabul) whose dominions border close upon it. Recovered to the Persian Crown by Mirza the son of Abas, and the Father of Soffie the now Sultan; a Prince of much gallantry, but of more misfortunes: the Persian Sophies, since that conquest, using the title of Kings of Candahor, in the Regal style.

9 ARIA.

ARIA is bounded on the East, with Paropamisus; on the West, with Parthia; on the North, with Margiana; and on the South, with Drangiana; from which last parted by the Mountain Bagom. A name in old times given to the Province of Media, especially by the Greeks; till changed (as they say) into Media, on the coming thither of Medea. For so Pausanias, amongst others, Παισιππίαν τῆς ἡμετέρας λέγουσιν ὡς ἔστιν ἡμετέρας, i. e. coming into the Country then called Aria, she caused it after her own name to be called Media. But the name of Aria was not lost though it were removed; remaining proper to this Country till these later ages; now changed with little alteration, into that of Eri.

The Country much subject unto heats, environed with Deserts, Heaths, and Forests; yet near the Mountains which defend them from the heat of the Sun, they have some fruitful Champaigns; bearing very good fruits, and amongst others, a strong wine, and of long continuance; keeping both taste and colour above 80 years. They have also here a Drug somewhat like to Syrrhe, and a kind of Saphyr, but not right.

Rivers of note I meet with none but that which Ptolemy calleth Arius, by the name of the Province, making a Lake of the same name. The Fountain of which River he maketh to be in Paropamisus, and the fall thereof in the said Lake: the waters of it first increased by a nameless Stream, falling from the Mountains called Seriphi, being that part of Taurus which divideth this Country from Margiana.

Anciently it was populous and well-inhabited, containing above 30 Towns of name and note. Those of most consequence, 1. Aria, on the banks of the River Arius, the seat of the Arii, whom Pliny speaketh of in this Tract: but whether they received this name from the Province, or bestowed their own name upon it, I determine not: 2. Bataxa, 3. Sotera, 4. Orbitana, 5. Sarmagana, 6. Artacanda, by Strabo called Artacana, 7. Nisibis, mentioned both by Ptolemy and Ammianus, 8. Alexandria, bearing the name of the Great Conquerour, by whom planted and made a Colony of his Macedonians, for the better awing of the Country, which by some former rebellions had been troublesome to him. But these, and most of those remembered by Ptolemy, being grown out of knowledge, there remain now of special note, 9. Heri, or Eri, seated not far from the place of the ancient Aria, but much superiour to it in strength and greatness. Said by Maginus to be in compass thirteen miles, and so plentifully stored with Roses, that the inhabitants of the Country call it the City of Roses. Naturally of a strong situation, compassed about with a very good Wall, and watered with deep Channels, conveyed unto it by Tamerlane, that most puissant Tartar, by whom either founded or repaired. 10. Sasnar, a place of good importance, and the second in esteem next to Heri it self.

The old Inhabitants were the Mastarami, Nisai, Astareni, the Cassirota, Obares, Drachma, Borgi, Paranti, &c. united together in the name of Arians, by that name subject to the Persians, and subdued by Alexander. Against whom when they had rebelled and were worked by him, they were compelled to betake themselves to the strength of a Cave, seated upon the top of an inaccessible Rock, and with small force easily defended. But to Alexander nothing was impossible. For piling up a great mass of Timber equal unto the mouth of the Cave, when the wind served, he put fire unto it; and by that means so filled the Cave with fire and smoke, that ved opportunely, he put fire unto it; and by that means so filled the Cave with fire and smoke, that some of them were stifled, some half burnt, and the rest forced to yield to the Victors mercy. Nor was this the only action of note during that Rebellion, though it was the greatest. The common Soldier also had this honour in it. Sarlibarzan, a Persian, whom Alexander had trusted with the Command of this Province, had drawn them unto this Revolt, and became their Head. Who to the express his courage in the sight of the Arians, challenged the proudest He of the Macedonians, to a single combat. The challenge cheerfully accepted by one Erignis, one of the most aged in the Army:

Parthia.

Army: and saying aloud, ostendam quales milites Alexander habet, he valiantly charged upon the Rebel; and at the second venew slew him. The Arians after this trial of their disabilities, remained in quiet, taking the same fortunes as the rest of the Persians did, in their change of Masters. Of late, by Mahomet Codubanda, it was aliened for a time from the Crown of Persia, and given to Sultan Abas, his second son; who took unto himself in his Fathers life time the title of the King of Heri. But coming to the Crown by the murder of his elder Brother, and the death of his Father, he united Heri once again to the Regal Diadem; but kept it as a distinct title in the Royal style.

10 PARTHIA.

PARTHIA is bounded on the East, with Aria; on the West, with Media; on the North, with Hyrcania; and on the South, with that part of Carmania, which by Ptolemy and others of the Ancients, was called Deserta. The reason of the name we shall see anon. But that name being laid aside, it is now called Arach.

The Country walled as it were round with Mountains, and in most parts overgrown with Woods; by which defended by those heats to which otherwise it would be subject, it produceth many things of necessary use for the life of the people; but nothing for riot and excess. In other places where the shade of the Wood is wanting, the whole Country is in a manner but a sandy Desert, dangerous to Travellers, and impassable even with the help of Guides; the sands continually driven from one place to another, taking away all tracts of a beaten way. For which cause there be certain Castles at each three miles end, built at the Kings charge, as well for the direction as the reception of Passengers; and Causeys of many miles in length, in some other places, for their better travelling; the sands of each side of them so loose and light, that if a man should fall aside, he were lost remediless.

The people anciently were very courageous and stout, as commonly they are in all barren Countries, and were withal of a Schythian extract and original. Exceeding spare of diet, and good reason for it, the Country not affording any superfluities; but otherwise much given to pleasures, allowing themselves plurality of Wives and Concubines. Good horsemen, and to that so used, that they consulted of all business both private and publick, when they were on horse-back. Such lovers of the wars, that they accounted no man happy after his decease, but who died in battle; esteeming of all others but as fools or Cowards. Their Souldiers for the most part Slaves, whom they trained up unto their weapons, and to manage horses: inasmuch as of 50000 Horse which the Parthian King had in the field against Marcus Antonius, there were not above 800 Free-men. But their greatest fame consisted in the handling of their Bow and Arrows, esteemed the best Archers in the World, and not undeservedly; having the Art of shooting backwards, and making their Retreat or Flight more terrible than their charge or onset. Whence that of Seneca;

The Parthians flight
Doth most affright.*

Which, with the manner of their fight, more copiously described by Lucan thus:

*Pugna levis, bellumque fugax, turmaque fugaces,
Et melior cessasse loco quam pellere miles.
Illita terra dolis, nec Martem cominus unquam
Ausu pati virtus, sed longè tendere nervos.*

Which I find thus Englished to my hand:

Light skirmish, fleeing war, and scattered bands,
And better Souldiers when they run away,
Than to cut off an Enemy that stands.
Their crafty Galk-thraps on the ground they lay,
Nor dares their courage come to down-right blows;
But fight best farthest off, most trusting to their bows.

From hence it was that M. Crassus, in his expedition against them, being told by an Astrologer, that his enterprise would prove unprosperous, by reason of some ill aspect which he had found in Scorpio; Tushman (said he) I fear not Scorpio, but Sagittarius. And to these warlike exercises of Horse and Archery, the temper of the air and soil, gave no small advantages; the dry air seasoning their Bow-strings, and their large fields affording them sufficient room to train their horses. Calum enim quod siccum est, nervos intentos facit; Regio tota plana est, & ob eam rem equis accommodata, as it is in Dion. But this is to be understood not of Parthia only, but the whole Country of Persia; subject at that time to the power of the Parthian Kings. Next to these Parthians, the English have been looked on formerly, as the ablest Bow-men; having gotten by their Bow and Arrows as many notable victories over the French, as the Parthians ever did obtain upon the Romans. But at this time Archery both here, and elsewhere, is quite laid aside, the Gun silencing all offensive weapons; how justly I determine not. The point hath been long since debated betwixt Sir John Smith and Sir Roger Williams; many great wits appearing upon either side; and the sum of their several Arguments drawn up together by Sir Clement Edmunds, in his judicious observations upon Cæsars Commentaries, to which the Reader may repair for his satisfaction. Master. In all times since, they have been looked upon as Members of the Persian Empire, till the conquest of it by the Tartars; in the distractions of whose great Empire after Tamerlane's death, it fell to some Princes of his house, who governed here under the vassalage and protection of the Tartars of Zagathay. Recovered not long since to their old obedience, by Sultan Alas: who for the better settling the affairs hereof, removed the Seat Royal from Spanhawn, to which before he had transferred it from the City of Cashin, to Asnaraffe; then a small Town, now the chief of this Country.

12 M A R G I A N A.

MA R G I A N A is bounded on the West, with Hyrcania; on the East, with Bactria; on the North, with part of Tartary, from which severed by the River Oxus; on the South, with Aria; divided from it by the Mountains. So called from the River Margus, which runs thorow the Country: but is now named Tremigen.

The Country environed with Mountains, and in most places of it full of sandy Deserts. But where it is watered with the Rivers, Arias and Margus, it is very fruitful, stretching it self into a large and spacious Plain, containing in the circuit near 200 miles. The Plain once compassed with a wall by Antiochus Soter, King of Syria: more memorable for the huge stocks of Vines which are said to be in it, as big in bulk as two men can fathom, and sometimes bearing branches of Grapes two Cubits long. The more to be admired, in regard there is no other place near unto it, where the Vine will grow. And if the Ark rested on the top of Mount Caucasus, as it is most probable it did; why may not this be some of the remainder of that first Vineyard which was planted by Noah, when he descended from these Mountains; as is affirmed by the constant tradition of the people which inhabit here?

The people mixt of Scythian and Persian breed, partaking of the fierceness of the one, and the behaviour of the other. Conform unto the Persians in Religion, Language, and Apparel; distinguished from them in the colour of their Turbants only, which are commonly Green: and therefore by the Persians called Jeslbas, or Green-caps; the Turbants of the Persians being always red.

Chief Rivers of this Country are, 1 Margus, the peculiar River of it, which rising out of the foot of the Mountains, and passing thorow the midst of the Province, receiveth into its channel the River, 2 Arias, hastning out of Aria; and so together lose themselves in 3 Oxus, dividing the Margians from the Tartars. Out of the joint streams of which several Rivers, is made a large Lake now called Sabacambes, but anciently Palus Oxiana, from the principal River.

Places of most observation in it. 1 Alexandria, or Alexandria Margiana, for distinction sake; one of the six towns built by Alexander for defence of this Country: called afterwards Seleucia from Seleucus, next Antiochia from Antiochus Soter King of Syria, by whom fortified with a very strong wall. It is now called Indion, and esteemed for the chief of the Country. 2 Jesinium, seated on the confluence of Margus with a nameless River issuing from the Seriphian Mountains. 3 Nigean, as the printed Books of Ptolomy call it, but mistook for Nisaa, or Nysaa. 4 Argadina. 5 Rhea, of which nothing memorable. 6 Maran, near to which Ismael the first of the Sophian race, discomfited the forces of Saba the Cham of Zagathay.

The old Inhabitants hereof were the Massagetes, and the Parni, taking up the mid-lands; the Derbicce bordering upon Oxus; and the Tapyri, dwelling towards the East. United by the name of Margians, they were subdued by the Kings of Persia, from whom won by Alexander to his Empire: who to assure himself hereof built six Cities in it, two towards the South, and four towards the East; all situate on the tops of hills, and built at such convenient nearness that they might afford succour to each other, as occasion served. After this nothing singular in the story of them; involved in the same fortunes with the rest of Persia, till Persia was conquered by the Tartars. Since which time, though the rest of the Persian Provinces were freed from the Tartarian yoke by Gempas, the Soldan of Parthia, and King of Persia for a time; yet part of this Province, and of Bactria, are still subject to them.

13 B A C T R I A.

BA C T R I A or BACTRIANA, is bounded on the West, with Margiana; on the East and North, with the River Oxus, dividing it from Sogdiana; on the South, with Paropamisus, from which parted by the Hills so named, and the Mountain Caucasus. It took this name from Bactri, the chief City of it; and is now called Chorassan, but by some named Bactra.

The Country towards the River Oxus, is for the most part well manured, and affordeth plenty of Wheat, and all sorts of fruits excepting Olives; rich metals, and some precious stone, as Emeralds, Chrysolites, and Jacinthes. Plenty of pastures there be also, well stored with Cattel, and those of bigger bulk then in other places. But the greatest part hereof to the South and West, is nothing but a sandy Desert; and by reason that the sands are driven up and down by contrary winds, no tract or beaten way is to be discerned: inasmuch as Travellers rest all day, and take their journey in the night, that they may guide themselves by the course of the Stars, as upon the Sea; not without great danger of being lost or buried, whilst alive, in that sandy Ocean.

The people heretofore a puissant and warlike Nation, not without great difficulty conquered by the Assyrians, nor with less by the Persians; always in arms, cruel, and resembling the Scythians, whose near neighbours they were, and (which may very well pass for their greatest virtue) multum à Persarum luxu alienantes, abhorring naturally from the Persian luxuries. But withal unnatural to their Parents, whom when old they cast unto their dogs, kept for that purpose, and called Cane Sepulchrides, or burial dogs. The women gorgeous in apparel, and proud of gesture, but prodigal of their bodies to their meanest slaves.

Bactria.

The men to this day do retain their ancient stoutness; but hard beset betwixt the Persians and the Tartars, who severally pretend a dominion over them.

No Province of the Persian Empire hath so many Rivers. The principal of which are 1 Artamis, and 2 Zariaspe, mingling streams together; as do also 3 Ochus, and 4 Orgomanes; all four contributing their waters to the River Oxus. Of Oxus, being rather a boundary betwixt the Persian and the Tartar, than rightly proper unto either, we have spoke already.

Towns of most observation in it, 1 Bactria, the Metropolis or the chief City of it, situate at the foot of the Mountains Sogdii, giving the name of Bactria unto all the Province. It is now called Behchor, and still keeps the dignity of the Metropolis: the seat of the Chief Priest or Bishop of the Mahometans of Zagathay (to which this City, and great part of the Country also doth now belong) having here his residence, in power and reputation equal to the King himself. Well fortified, and stored with all military provisions: the birth-place (as Magimus saith) in these later Ages of Avicenna, that learned Philosopher and Physician; and in the first Ages, of Zoroaster the more learned Astrologer. 2 Ebusimi, once the Regal seat, and therefore honoured by Ptolomy with the name of Regia. 3 Zariaspe, or Charispe, the chief City of the Charispe, a great Tribe of this Country. 4 Charracharta, mentioned by Ptolomy and Amianus: these two, upon the River Oxus. 5 Encratidia, built or repaired by the Macedonians; as the name, being merely Greek, doth seem to intimate. 6 Alicodra, as ancient as the rest, but of no great note in the course of business. 7 Isfigia, of a later date, but of greater beauty than any of those before spoken of: superiour to Behchor in elegancie, state and greatness, though not in dignity; and held by some to be the pleasantest of the East.

This Country was as soon peopled as any since the general Deluge. It had not else been possible that Zoroaster King hereof in the time of Ninus, and by him assaulted, should bring into the field an Army of 400000 men of this, and perhaps some other of the neighbouring Provinces, as most credible Writers say he did. Encountering Ninus with this Army he prevailed at first, and slew of the Assyrians near an hundred thousand. But Ninus having better opportunities of recruiting his forces, invaded him a second time with an Army of 1700000 Foot, and 20000 Horse (the greatest on record in all Ages since that time, except that of Semiramis;) with which he overcame Zoroaster, slew him in the field, and united Bactria to his Empire. Unto this Zoroaster is ascribed the invention of Astronomy, but on no good ground; that Art or Science being studied before the flood, (if Seth's Pillars mentioned by Josephus be of any credit;) and therefore probably no otherwise to be ascribed to Zoroaster, than as to the Reviver of it; or because he first committed that unto writing, which he had received by tradition; or because he brought those confused notions which he had received from others, into rule and method. He being slain, and Bactria his chief City taken by the wit of Semiramis, then the wife of Menon (but on the merit of that service made the wife of Ninus) the Bactrians became subject unto the Assyrian Kings, after to the Monarchs of the Medes and Persians. In the expiring of which great Monarchy, Bessus a tall and cruel Traitor, did command this Province: and having villainously slain Darius, his Lord and Master, assumed unto himself the title of King of Persia, under the name of Artaxerxes. But being betrayed by Spitamenes one of his Confederates, by him delivered unto Alexander, and by Alexander put to a cruel death: the Bactrians became subject to the Macedonians, and in that right unto Seleucus and the Kings of Syria. But long it held not in that State; one Throdatus, who formerly had the Government of it for the Syrian Kings, taking unto himself the title of King, and the possession of the Country, about the same time that Asaces and the Parthians made the like revolt. Wrested from his posterity by one Euthydemus, the recovery of it was attempted by Antiochus Magnus: and the whole cause put to the trial of a battle. In which, though Antiochus had the better, and shewed more personal valour in it than any time after: yet he was glad to come to a composition, and left to Euthydemus, both the Crown and the Country. Made not long after an accession to the Parthian Kingdom, it continued part thereof whilst that Kingdom stood; and in the time of Ptolomy (as long time before) had for the chief tribes or nations of it, the Sattarae, and Zariaspe towards the North; the Comani, or Coamani (as Pliny calleth them) dwelling in the South, the middle parts being taken up by the Thucari, said to be gens magna; the Scorda, Savadii, Morice, Tamlyzi, Amarispe, and others of as little note. In the often changes and alterations of the Persian State, one of the last Nations which submitted to the new Pretenders: and at this time so neutral betwixt the Persians, and the Cham of Tartary, that it is not wholly under the power of either. More averse from the Persian Government, since the alteration of Religion made there by Hysmael, and the rest of the Sect of Mortis Hali: these Bactrians being of the old race of Mahometans, which adhered to Hummar, Osmen, and Abubeker, as the true Successors of their false Prophet; and therefore ill-affected to the Sophian faction, whom they call commonly Cuphers, or Hereticks, for the innovations by them made in the Law of Mahomet.

Thus having taken a survey of those several Provinces, which constitute the Persian Empire, and shewn by what means they were first united into one estate: we must next look upon the names and actions of those mighty Monarchs, who have successively, and from time to time enjoyed the Sovereignty. By what good chance Arbeses from a Deputy or Lieutenant of Media, obtained the Diadem for himself, we have shewn before: and we have shewn how liberally he enfeoffed the *Vice-Roy*s of the several Provinces (which in the division made betwixt him and Belochus, fell unto his share) in the propriety and command of those Countries, which before they held. Nothing reserved unto himself, and his posterity, but the title only; and perhaps some acknowledgments made to them, as the Lords in chief. Nor left he less liberty to his own Medians, than to the rest of the Provinces; which turning to licentiousness was so hurtful to them, that they were glad at last of that wholesome severity, which Dioce, a more Lordly King, began to exercise: who taking to himself a guard, building the Royal City of Ecbatana, found in the Treasury of Damascus, 2600 Talents; in that of Susa, 50000 Talents of Gold uncoined; in that of Pasagardis, 60000 Talents; in that of Ecbatana, 26000 Talents; in that of Perspolis, 120000 Talents; in all 204600 Talents; besides the infinite riches of the Treasury of Babylon, yielded into his hands by Bagophanes, and other places of note, not particularly specified: An huge and most un-speakable sum! Fourthly, in that the gold and riches which Alexander, now a Conqueror, sent from Persia to Macedon and Greece, (besides which every Captain and common Souldier had provided and laid up for his own maintenance) loaded ten thousand Mules, and five thousand Camels.

After this overthrow of the Persian Monarchy, the Persian lay Nation obscure 535 years, viz. from the 3635 year of the world, to the 228 year of C H R I S T: of which time they were 83 years under the Syrian Successors of Alexander; and 452 years under the Arfacidan Kings of Parthia. Mesa S. Napier, &c. as Herodian, "For after Darius had lost his Kingdom to Alexander the Macedonian, and after &c. as Herodian, "the Victor himself was dead also, the more potent Captains divided Asia among them. But discords "often arising, and the Macedonians puissance, by these often broils, not smally broken; Arfaces one of "the Parthian Nobility, periwaded the barbarous people of the East, and among them the Persians, to "cast off the Greek yolk, and stand for their liberty: he himself taking upon him the title of King, and "investing himself with a Diadem, A. M. 3718. The Persians by this revolt, got little or nothing, having indeed not changed the Tyranny, but the Tyrant only: these Parthian Princes lording it with as high an infolency, as ever the old Persian Monarchs, or the Kings of Syria did before. From this Arfaces, all the rest of his Successors, and those too of the family of Artabanus, or second race of Arfacidan Kings, took that name upon them: as the Roman Emperors that of Cesar, or the old Egyptian Kings the name of Pharaoh. Their usual stile was Rex Regum, or King of Kings: and by that stile with arrogance and insolence enough, Vologeses thus inscribed his letters to Vespasian the Roman Emperor, viz. Arfaces, Rex Regum, Flavio Vespasiano: giving himself the title of King of Kings, but the other nothing but his bare names only. To which, Vespasian without taking notice of the Parthians pride, returned his answer to him with this superscription, Fl. Vespasianus Regi Regum Arfacidi: whether with more scorn or modesty, it is hard to say. They also called themselves the Brethren of the Sun and Moon, which were the chiefest Gods they worshipped. Great Princes questionless they were, and kept the Romans harder to it, than all the Kings and States in the world besides: whose names and acts occur in these following Catalogues of

2. The Arfacidan or Parthian race of the Kings of Persia.

A. M.

- 3718 1 Arfaces, the founder of the Parthian family.
- 3741 2 Mithridates, or Arfaces the 2d. assaulted by Antiochus Magnus with an Army of 120000 men, but without success.
- 3761 3 Pamphilius.
- 3773 4 Phraartes, the Son of Pamphilius.
- 3783 5 Mithridates II, brother of Phraartes, subdued the Medes, and extended his Empire to Euphrates.
- 6 Phraartes II, slain in a war against the Scythians.
- 3857 7 Artabanus, Uncle to Phraartes the 2d.
- 8 Pacorus, the Son of Artabanus.
- 9 Mithridates III, brother of Pacorus.
- 3903 10 Horodes, brother of Mithridates, whom he overcame, and caused to be slain in his own light. He also vanquished M. Crassus, and slew 20000 Romans: and because Crassus was reported to be wondrous covetous, he caused molten gold to be poured down his throat. A miserable death, but in respect of the divine Providence, a most just revenge upon him for his sacrilege, in robbing the Temple of Hierusalem, as he marched towards the Parthians. The overthrow, and the disgrace which thereby hapned to the Romans, was not long afterwards recompensed by Ventidius, one of the Lieutenants of Mark Antony the Triumvir, who slew great numbers of them in a pitched field, and amongst others, Pacorus the Kings Son: the day of the battle being the same, in which Crassus had before been vanquished. After this Victory, for which Ventidius had the honour of a Triumph (and the first Triumph that ever the Romans had held for a Parthian Victory) he was in a fair way to have ruined this Kingdom, to have shrewdly shaken it at the least; had not Antony in an envious humour called him from that service. Finally, Horodes was slain by his Son Phraartes.
- 11 Phraartes III, a valiant Prince, but wicked and cruel, as the murder of his own father and many of his brethren doth clearly evidence. Against him marched Marcus Antonius with a populous Army, which wanted little of an absolute overthrow; of 16 Legions, scarce six returning home in safety. This King submitted himself and Kingdom unto Augustus, restoring the Roman enligens, and freeing the Captives taken at the defeat of Crassus. The only mark of the Parthians subjection, was their receiving Kings at the appointment of the Senate and Emperours of Rome; which also was of no long continuance.
- 12 Phraartes IV, Son of Phraartes the 3d, whom he slew and succeeded.
- 13 Horodes II, Son of Phraartes the fourth, slain in a conspiracy.

14. Vonon

- 14 Vonon, substituted in the place of Orodes, but outed by
- 15 Tiridates, who was also dispossessed of his life and Kingdom by Artabanus, the people flocking to him as a man of courage, and being offended with the two last Kings, because they either had received the Kingdom, or at least the Confirmation in it, from the Roman Emperours. Which Artabanus, though descended either from a female, or some of the Collateral line of the former family, yet being not direct heir thereof, he is looked on as a stranger to the blood of the Arfacidan the family of Arfaces giving place to that of this Artabanus, of which family we have the names of twelve Kings successively reigning: the most considerable of them being Chofroes, the 8th. King of this line, from whom the Emperor Trajan gained Armenia, and Mesopotamia, adding them to the Roman Empire. Members whereof they did continue till regained to the Persian Crown, by Sapores the 9th. King of the next Persian Dynaity. But for those twelve Kings of this house, they are these.

The third Dynaity of the Kings of Persia, and the second of the Parthian Race.

- new race of the Parthians, whose overthrow by the valour of Artaxerxes the first Persian King of the 4th Dynaity, occasioned the translation of the Diadem to the natural Persians; after it had continued in two Parthian families, for the space of 470 years. Which Translation, as it was wrought by the irresistible power of God, who only hath the disposing of Crowns and Scepters; so in the way of second causes it may be principally referred to the barbarous massacre of this people, by Antoninus Caracalla the Roman Emperor; Who having negotiated a marriage with the daughter of this Artabanus, and going (as he gave it out) to solemnize the nuptials, was met by the old King accompanied with the flower of his Nobility, and the choicest of his Souldiers, and other Subjects, in Triumphal Ornaments. Which honourable train was no sooner come near his Army, but he commanded his Souldiers, (on a watch-word given) to put them all to the Sword, the King himself hardly escaping with his life. Caracalla being dead, and Macrinus succeeding in the Throne, the Parthians set upon him to revenge that slaughter. But understanding after a long fight of three dayes continuance, that Macrinus had slain Caracalla, they made peace with him: but were so weakened and unable to hold their own, that it made the Persians once more think of recovering to their own Nation, the Regal power. For Artaxerxes, a noble and generous Persian (his name perhaps suggesting some high thoughts unto him) did so well husband the opportunity, that he slew Artabanus the last King of the Parthians, and once more brought the royal seat into Persia. Yet was not this so easily effected, the Parthians notwithstanding their former losses, maintaining another cruel fight for three days together; so difficult was it to vanquish that Nation, when their forces were broken; impossible when they were entire. Artaxerxes, proud of this success, sent a peremptory embassie to Alexander Severus, the then Roman Emperor, to have all the Provinces of Asia, which had formerly belonged to the Persian Monarchy, re-delivered to him: a matter not so easily granted as demanded. For Severus to suppress so insolent an Enemy, marched towards Persia with an Army Romanly appointed; which, to find his Enemy more work, he divided into three parts: whereof the first was to march into Media, the second into Persia; the third himself led in the mid-way between both, to succour both, or be succoured by both, as occasion required. But his device succeeded not happily; for his two Armies being by the Persians broken, he with much danger and haste retired back with the third. This was a good beginning for the Persian Kingdom; the establishment followed not long after: Valerianus the Emperor being vanquished, and taken prisoner by Sapores, the second King of this race. So that now the name of the Persian grew so terrible to the Romans, that Constantine the Great, transplanted many of the Colonies and Garrisons of the North-west part of the Empire, into the East; to keep the Persian from growing too far upon the Roman Provinces; and removed also the seat of the Empire higher unto them, from Rome to Constantinople. And thus having shown the beginning and establishment, the foundation and building of the new Kingdom of the Persians: take along with you the Catalogue of their Kings, until they once more lost the sovereignty of their own Nation, and became slaves again to more barbarous Masters.

The fourth Dynaity, or race of the Persian Kings.

27 Barnarius.
630 28 Hormisdas II. the 28. and last King of the race of Artaxerxes, or the fourth Dynasty: of whom besides the two first Kings, whose Acts are spoken of before, the most remarkable were, 1 Vararanes the second, in whose time Carnus the Emperor passing over Eufrates, and laying siege to Ctesiphon, was there slain by a Thunderbolt. 2 Narsetes, the son of Vararanes, who first discomfited Galerius, one of the Casars, in the Empire of Diocletian, and totally ruined his Army: for which Galerius being forced to lacquey it by the Emperors Charlot in his Purple Robes, was so highly shamed, that to recover his credit he set upon Narsetes once again, routed him, and took Prisoners his wives and children. 3 Sapores the second, the Son of Misdates, who began his reign before his birth. For his Father dying without issue, left his wife with Child: which Child the Magi having signified by their art to be a male, the Persian Princes caused the Crown and Royal Ornaments to be set upon his Mothers belly, acknowledging him thereby for their future King. A great and puissant Prince he proved; holding continual war with Constantine, and his Successors, till the death of Valens; and gaining from them the best part of Mesopotamia: but withal a great Persecutor of the Christians, of whom no fewer than 20000 are said to have suffered in his time. 4 Idigertes, a Prince so esteemed of by Arcadius, the Eastern Emperor, that he made him Protector of his Empire, during the minority of his Son Theodosius: which trust he Royally performed, and was a great friend unto the Christians in his own dominions. 5 Cabades, first outed of his Kingdom by Zamafpes, and reitored again, was the first Persian King who permitted the free exercise of the Christian Religion. He flew Zelzibers, a King of the Huns coming to his aid against the Romans, because he had before promised to assist the Emperor; and rooted the Manichean Sect out of his estate. 6 Cofroes the Son of Cabades, surnamed the Great, a constant Enemy to the Romans, from whom he conquered a great part of Syria, and took and sacked the City of Antioch. But finding the war brought home to his own doors, by Mauritius, who was afterwards Emperor, and his own Countries in a flame, he took such thought of it, that he died of a Fever. 7 Cofroes the second, as great an Enemy to the Emperor Heraclius, from whom he took all that was left of Mesopotamia, Syria, and the Holy Land, with the City of Hierusalem itself; most of it recovered by Heraclius: in despite of whom he caused all the Christians in his Kingdom to turn Nestorians. 8 Hormisdas the second, the last of the Dynasty, who being first weakened by Civil and Domestick diffentions, was vanquished by Hannur and his Saracens, Anno 634, burying to the glory of this renowned Nation in the grave of oblivion, or at least subjection.

The Saracenic Caliphs, having added this Kingdom to their huge Empire, appointed here their Deputies, whom they honoured with the name of Sultans: not one Supreme for the whole Kingdom, but several Governours or Sultans, for each several Province: called by new names, and moulded into many Toparchies, as Chorazan, Mouzenabar, Uzbek, and I wot not what; the Sultans acting of themselves, and warring upon one another, as their humors led them, without relation to the Caliph, or Lord in chief. During which bustles it so happened, that Mahomet, the Sultan of Persia (so called because he was the chief in command and power) picking a quarrel with his neighbour the Sultan of Babylon (Pisafiris he is called in some Christian Writers, by whom taken or mistaken for the Caliph himself) made war upon him. But finding him countenanced and supported by the power of the Caliph, invited the Turks, then possessed of some part of Armenia Major, to come in to his aid: by whose means he overthrew the Caliphs forces, and might have got the Sovereignty of Persia unto himself, if he had used his victory and his friends, with any tolerable discretion. But denying to pay these Turks their wages, and send them home, he occasioned them to make head against him, under the conduct of Tangrolipix, their principal Leader; to whom being once in arms, several discontented persons of the natural Persians, did unite themselves. Encouraged with which additions, and being furnished with Horse and Armour, and other necessaries, by the spoil of the Country, they give battle to the Sultan himself: whom having vanquished and slain, Tangrolipix by the joint consent of both Armies is made King of Persia, the Founder of

The fifth Dynasty, or the Turkish Race of the Kings of Persia.

- 1030 1 Tangrolipix, of whom sufficiently before.
2 Axin, the Son of Tangrolipix, by whom Calm Muses, his neer Kinsman, was sent with great forces against the Christians; whom he dispossessed of a great part of Asia Minor.
3 Balak, Sultan of Persia, in the beginning of the wars in the Holy Land, undertaken by the Western Christians; against whom he is reported to have sent his forces. Of whose Successors I find nothing till the time of 1198 4 Cassanes, the last King or Sultan of the Turks, vanquished in the year 1202. by the Cham of Partary. Which makes me very apt to think, that after the death of Axin, or his next Successor, the Turks lost the sovereignty of Persia, though they kept the possession of some parts of it; the Sovereignty thereof being recovered by the Caliphs of Babylon: and that it was so held by both, till the Tartars dispossessed the one, and destroyed the whole progeny of the other, as before was noted. And this I find to be the opinion of Benjamin Tudelensis, a learned Jew, which had travelled most part of the East; to whose judgement herein I subscribe, as most found and rational.

The

The Sixth Dynasty, or the Tartarian race of the Kings of Persia.

- 1260 1 Haalon, or Ulab-Kukhan, by Occata the great Cham, made King of Persia; exterminated the whole race of the Caliphs of Bagdes.
1266 2 Hakkakibon, the son of Haalon.
1282 3 Nicador Oglan, by Haalon called Tangador, who made himself a Mahometan, and was named Hamed, the brother of Hakkakibon.
1284 4 Argon-Khon, the eldest Son of Hakkakibon.
1292 5 Geniotkhon, brother of Argon-Khon.
1295 6 Badukhan, the Uncle of the last, of which three there is little memorable.
1296 7 Gazan, the Son of Argon-Khon, who made Casbin his Imperial seat.
1305 8 Alyapin, who transferred the Court to Tauris, and is said to have been the founder of Sultania, a chief City of Media; the brother of Gazan.
1317 9 Abusaid, Son of Alyapin the last of the race of Haalon, that reigned in Persia. After whose death, Anno 1337. (being the 736. of the Mahometan Hegira) the more potent Princes of the Tartars seized on the several parts and Provinces of it; every one calling himself King of that part or Province, which he was possessed of. And amongst them Gempas the Sultan or Soldan of Parthia, (though a Persian born) put in for a share, and made himself Master of his own Province, and some parts adjoining: made on that ground by some of our Christian writers (who very imperfectly have transmitted to us the affairs of this Country) the sole King of Persia. In this confusion it continued till the coming of Tamerlane, who like a furious Whirlwind driving all before him, composed the differences, by getting all unto himself. But as Philosophy doth teach us, that no violent motion is of long continuance; so the course of business and the success of actions may instruct us also, that a Kingdom forced to bow under the command of a prosperous Army, is not so well assured to the Victor; but that fury of the war once past, it may return again to its former liberty, or open a more easy passage to some new Invader. And so it fared with the conquests and successes of Tamerlane, whose issue quickly lost this Kingdom, and almost all the rest of his other purchases: leaving but little memory of their names and actions. For partly by his own imprudence, in cantoning his Estates amongst his Children; and partly by the weakness of his Successors in the Realm of Persia, this Kingdom did relapse immediately to the same confusions in which he found it; having almost as many Sovereign Kings, as Provinces. Most of them Homagers perhaps to the Kings of the house of Tamerlane, and those who afterwards succeeded in the Title of Kings of Persia, of the Turcoman or Armenian Dynasty: not yet reduced unto this Crown, notwithstanding the great and prosperous successes of the Sophian Family. But for the Kings of the race of Tamerlane, who only in their times had the honour to be called Kings of Persia, (and well enough content with that:) such as they were, we find them in this order following.

- 1405 10 Mirza Charock, the fourth Son of Tamerlane, succeeded in his appointment in the Realm of Persia.
1447 11 Olegbeg, Son of Mirza Charock, vanquished and slain by his own Son.
1450 12 Abdalatife; slain not long after by his own Souldiers.
1451 13 Abdulla, the Son of Olegbeg, and brother of Abdalatife, vanquished by 1453 14 Abusaid II. descended from Moroncha, the third Son of Tamerlane, succeeded on the death of Abdulla.
1461 15 Zenzes, whom some call Jooncha, others Malaonchres, discomfited and slain in battle by Ussan-Cassanes, Anno 1472. which was about 70 years from the death of Tamerlane.

The seventh Dynasty of the Turcoman, or the Armenian race of the Kings of Persia.

- 1472 1 Ussan-Cassanes, by some called Asymbeim, by others more truly Ozem-Azambec, was the Son of Tracheton, one of those poor Armenian or Turcoman Princes, dispossessed by Bajazet the first, and reitored by Tamerlane; Encroaching on his neighbours, he was warned to desist by Zenzes last Persian King; with whom encountering in a pitched field he overcame him, and got that Kingdom by the victory.
1478 2 Jacub, the second Son of Ussan-Cassanes, having put by his elder Brother, attained the Throne; and repulsed the Mamalucks out of Mesopotamia and Assyria, which they had invaded: He was after poisoned by his wife.
1490 3 Julaver, a Kinsman of Jacub, succeeded him in the estate, which he held only three years, and then left it to 1493 4 Baisinger, a Prince of the same blood; who living in adultery with the wife of Jacub, had conspired his death. 2.
1495 5 Rustan, assaulted by Aider, or Secnider, of the Sophian faction, who then began to be of power.
1498 6 Alamat, or Hagaret, the last King of this Turcoman or Armenian race; first vanquished Secnider at the battle of Derbent, and cut off his head: but was after overthrown and and slain by Hysmael the son of Aider; upon the the quarrel and occasion which here fol-loweth.

M. hem: the Impollor and first Emperour of the Saracens, by his last Will and Testament, bequeathed the succession unto that Estate, to Hali his neer Kins-man, and Husband of Fatime his Eldett Daughter. But Abndezar, Hannmar, and Osmen, three powerful men, and the Chief Commanders of the Army in the time of Mahomet, successively followed one another in the Supreme Dignity. After their death, Hali enjoyed that honour for a little while, supplanted first, and afterwards vanquished and slain by Mubuvias, a great man of war, who succeeded in it; and to secure himself therein, slew Hafem or Ossan, the son of Hali, and eleven of the sons of that Ossan; the twelf called Musa Ceredine, elcaping with life. From him descended lineally one Guine, the Lord of Ardeville in Media; who considering that there had been no Caliph in long time before, began to plot the establishing of that high honour in his own family, as the right Heirs to it. A man of so great reputation among the people, that Tamerlane having made a Conquest of Persia, thought it no dishonour to his greatness, to bestow a friendly visit on him. Dying, he left his hopes and projects to his son, called Aider, who afterwards for the purity of Religion pretended by him, had the adjunct of Tzophy; the word so signifying in that language: who also proved of such esteem and power with all sorts of men, that Ussan-Cassanes, the first King of the Armenian or Turcoman race, thought fit to make him Husband unto one of his Daughters. But on the contrary, Jacub the son of Ussan, and some of his Successors, seeing him grow unto such power and estimation with the common people; and fearing what he could do, and not what he would do, endeavoured to deprefs him by all means that might be. Which he not able to remedy, as the Case then stood, practised to add unto his party under the popular pretence, of reforming things that were amiss in their Religion; and grew so powerful in the end, that he gave battel unto Ruffan and Alamat, the two last Kings of the former race. But Alamat having got the victory, caused him to be slain; and delivered Hysmael and Solyman his two sons, into the hands of Amazar, a chief Commander of his own, by him to be kept in perpetual prison. But Amazar, a man of a more ingenious disposition, afforded them not only liberty, but also good education: insomuch that Hysmael Sophi, a towardly young Gentleman, undertook revenge for the death of his Father, which work he fulfilled, having overcome and slain King Alamat, and his son Elvan. After this Victory, he being Crowned King, or Shangh of Persia, altered the form of Religion: making Hali, and himself the true Successors of Mahomet; but condemning Abndezar, Hannmar, and Osmen, with the Turks, as Rebels and Schismatics.

Hence proceeded the bloody Wars, which to the Persians loss, have hapned between them and the Turks: the Persians burning whatsoever Book or Monument they finde concerning those three; and the Turks holding it more meritorious to kill one Persian, than seventy Christians. Strabo in his Commentaries, writing purposely of the Acts of Hysmael, saith, that the Jews on some fond conceit, were periwaded that he was the Messiah, they had so long looked for: But it proved quite contrary, there never being Prince that more vexed and grieved them.

The eighth Dynasty, or Sophian race of the Kings of Persia.

- 1505 1 Hysmael Sophi, the founder of this family, overthrown by Selimus the first, in the Calderas fields. 20.
- 1525 2 Tamas, the Son of Hysmael, vanquished by Solyman the Magnificent, who took from him the Countries of Chaldaea, Assyria, and Mesopotamia, with some part of Media. 53.
- 1578 3 Aider, the second son of Tamas, obtained the Kingdom, imprisoning his elder brother; but his cruelty being much feared, he was made away by the practice of Periancona, his own Sister, having only reigned 15 days.
- 4 Hysmael II. eldest son of Tamas, restored unto his Fathers Throne; but murdered with the privy of his Sister also, who found him of too rough a nature for her to govern; having reigned neer two years.
- 1579 5 Mahomet Codabanda, advanced unto the Throne by his Sisters faction, (as being of a milder and more tractable nature) at his first entrance caused her to be beheaded for the former murders. During his time, not fully settled in the State, Amurath the 3d. by his Lieutenants won from him almost all Armenia, Media, and great part of Georgia. 7.
- 1585 6 Alas, the second son of Mahomet, having treacherously practised the death of Mirza, his elder brother, succeeded his Father, recovered almost all which the Turks had gained, and added the Kingdoms of Ormus, Heri, Candabor, and Hyrcania, to the Crown of Persia.
- 7 Soffie, the Nephew of Alas by his son Mirza, (whose eyes he caused to be put out on a false suspicion) at the age of fifteen years succeeded: committed by his Grand-father during his minority to the protection of Emangoly, Chawn, or Duke of Shiras. A Prince, who since he came to age, hath had a good hand against the Turks, attempting the recovery of Bagdad and other places, which had been taken from them in time of Alas.

The Government of these Persian Kings, though it be despotical and severe, hath a great deal less of the Tyrant in it, than any other of the Mahometan Kings or Princes: these cherishing their Brethren, maintaining Nobility amongst them, and encouraging industry; which makes them to be better served than the Turk, or Tartar; to both whom they are far inferiour both in power and treasure. Their Officers

Officers of State, and men of principal employment, for the most part Eunuchs (as generally in all the Empires of the East): such Persons being thought most trusty, because abtracted from the obligations of wife and children, they study more the Princes service than their own advantages. Their forces consist most of Horse, to which they are inclined more generally, than to serve on foot; and yet the greatest body of Horse which they have brought at any time into the field, came not to above 30000; but those well furnished and appointed, maintained on Lordships and Estates after the manner of the Turkish Timariots. The Foot-Souldiers of his own Countries, but poor and raw, and very seldom stand their ground, that defect being for the most part supplied by Mercenaries. The inconveniency of which being found by Sultan Abas, he served himself of children bought of Christian Parents neer the Euxine Sea (from whence the Egyptian Sultans had their Mamaluks) whom they call by the name Cozal-Bassas, or Red-caps, so named from the colour of their Turbans: trained up by them in their Religion and warlike Discipline, as the Turks, their Janizaries; yet far inferiour to the Turks, against whom if they have prevailed since the time of Abas, they may ascribe the greatest part of their good fortune to those Divisions and Rebellions, which in these late times have been frequent in the Turkish Empire. And as for their Sea-forces, they are inconsiderable. For though they have large Sea-coast both on the Persian Bay, the Caspian Sea, and the Southern Ocean; yet are they very poor in shipping: suffering the Moscovite to ingross the trade of the Caspian Sea; the Portugals, to manage that of the Southern Ocean; as formerly that also of the Persian Bay, till the taking of Ormuz.

The Revenues of this Kingdom in the time of Hysmael the first Sophi, were exceeding great: insomuch that Tamas his Successor, to ingratiate himself with all sorts of people, released them of all kinds of Customs imposed on Merchandise, either imported or exported. And this they say amounted to the sum of 90000 Tomans yearly: which, reckoning every Toman at 20 Crowns, made up a million and 800000 Crowns of annual income. Which notwithstanding, his Revenue was computed at four or five millions of Crowns yearly; raised out of Domain lands, the tenth of fruits, the profit of mines, and the fine paid by every subject when he sets up shop. But Tamas finding this not to be sufficient to maintain his Royalty, doubled the value of his money, and thereby for the present his Revenues also. Since that they have been much empaired by the Conquests made upon them by the Turks; who had got from them so much land as maintained 40000 Timariots, and yielded to the Grand Signeur one million of yearly income: whether improved again or not to their former height, I am not able to determine.

And so much for Persia.

O F

OF TARTARY.

TARTARIA is bounded on the East, with China, the Oriental Ocean, and the Straights of Anian (if such Straights there be), by which parted from America; on the West, with Russia, and Podolia, a Province of the Realm of Poland; on the North, with the main Scythick or Frozen Ocean: and on the South, with part of China, from which separated by a mighty wall, some part of India, the River Oxus, parting it from Bactria, and Margiana, two Persian Provinces; the Caspian Sea, which separates it from Media, and Hyrcania; the Caucasian Mountains, interposing betwixt it and Tercomania; and the Euxine, which divideth it from Anatolia, and Thrace. So called from the Tartars, a puissant and mighty people now possessed hereof; the reason of whose name we shall shew hereafter.

It containeth all those great and spacious Provinces, which the Antients called Seres, Scythia intra Imaum, Scythia intra Imaum, Sace, Sogdiana, the greatest part of Sarmatia Asiatica, and part of Sarmatia Europea: extending it self the whole length of Asia from the River Tanais, to the Eastern Ocean; taking in Taurica Chersonesus, and some other parts of Europe also. So that if we measure it by miles, it is said to contain 5400 from East to West, and 3600 from North to South: a greater quantity of ground than the Turkish Empire, but of less fertility and accompt.

In measuring by the way of degrees, it reacheth from the 50 degree of Longitude, to the 195. which is 145. degrees from West to East: and from the 40th. degree of Northern Latitude, unto the 8th. which is within ten degrees of the Pole it self. By which accompt it lieth from the beginning of the first Climate, where the longest day in Summer is 15 hours, till they cease measuring by Climates; the longest day in the most Northern parts hereof, being full six moneths; and in the winter half of the year, the night as long.

The Countrey lying under such different Meridians, and such distant Climes, must needs be such, as no general Character can be given of it; and therefore we shall defer that with the names of the Rivers, and chief Mountains, to the description of the several and particular Provinces. But for the people, being much of the same nature in every part, we may take the measure of them here. Affirmed to be of square Stature, broad faces, hollow eyes, thin beards, thick lips, flat noses, ugly countenances, swart of complexion, not so much by the heat of the Sun, (which keeps far enough off) as their natural sturdiness. Barbarous everywhere in behaviour, especially in those parts which they call Asiatica, and Antiqua: but withal very strong of body, swift of footmanhip, vigilant in time of service, and patient of all extremities both of cold and hunger. The women suitable to the men, scorning or wanting ornaments to set themselves out; or when they do, they seldom go beyond copper, feathers, or such precious gew-gaws.

In behaviour they are rude and barbarous, as before was said; eating their Enemies when they take them, as in way of revenge; first letting out their blood which they receive into Cups, and use it as wine unto the feast. Though swift of foot, yet generally they love to ride, though it be but on Oxen; about whose necks, as about Horses, when they travel, they use little bells, with which musick they are much delighted. Their speech, even in their common talk, is a kind of whining, and their singing little better than the howling of Wolves. They eat commonly with unwashed hands, the dirt and grease about their fingers serving as a sauce for their meat, which they devour greedily, and with little chewing; and for their ordinary drink use Mares milk. Homely of habit, made of the coarsest stuff, and reaching no lower than the knee: and if they go the charge of furs, contrary to the custom of other people, they wear the hairy side outwards, and the skin next their own bodies; only to shew the richness of their Apparel. And yet so proud in this beggary, that they account the Christians but as Dogs, condemn all the rest of the world, and think their Cham the only considerable Prince; by whose name they swear, as by their Gods.

In matter of Religion it is hard to say, whether Mahometanism, or Paganism, be of most extent: some parts hereof being wholly Pagan, some wholly Mahometan, and some mixt of both. But of the two the Pagan is the better Gentleman, as being of the elder house, and of more Antiquity: the Sect of Mahomet not being entertained amongst them, till the year 1246.

And yet these have not so prevailed, as to extinguish the remainders of Christianity, of which there are amongst them many several Churches. The Christian faith first planted amongst the Scythians, by the preaching of Saint Andrew, and Saint Philip, two of the Apostles. Overgrown in these later Ages by the Sect of Nestorians, either by the diligence of their Preachers, or for want of others to instruct them in more Orthodox Tenets. Before the prevailing of the Tartars, besides the Circassian Christians, of whom more anon, there are in the most remote parts of Tartary, whole Kingdoms of that Religion; as namely that that of Tenduch, then the chief of all: besides some numbers of them in Tangut, Cauchintees, Cassar, Samarcan, Karhim, Suchair, Ergimul, and Caraiam; where in the time of Paulus Venetus, who surveyed these parts about the year 1270. they lived intermingled with the Pagans. Not to diminish since the conquest of those Countries by the Tartars, but that they are of a considerable number, especially in Cathay it self: where they are said to have a Metropolitan in the City of Cambalu (the principal City of that Empire) and he so honoured by the great Cham, that for a time they receive their Crowns from no hands but his.

As for the Tartars, they are by the Chronologer Genebrard, said to be the off-spring of the Ten Tribes, whom Salmanasser led away captive; and that especially for three reasons. The first is, that the word Tartar, by which name (saith he) they ought rather to be called, than by that of Tartari, signifieth in the Syriack and Hebrew tongues, a Remnant. But unto this it is answered, that the name of this people is derived from the River Tartar, as some; or from the Region called Tartar, where they first dwelt, as most think: and again, that though the Hebrew and חורר signifie a remnant, yet can it not properly be applied to the Tartars; who so infinitely exceed the Jews, that they cannot be thought to be a remnant of them. Secondly, he alledgeth for proof thereof, that this people use circumcision, the character of the Jewish Nation. And hereunto it is replied, that circumcision was common to many people, besides the Jews, as to the Egyptians, Ethiopians, &c. and that rather as a national custom, than a religious ordinance; and again, that the Tartars cannot be proved to have received circumcision, before they received Mahometanism. Thirdly, there is brought to confirm this opinion, a place of Esdra, cap. 13. lib. 2. where it is said, that the Ten Tribes (that they might the better keep Gods Statutes) passed over the River Euphrates; and after a journey of one year and a half, came into a Country called Arsareth. To re-fell which, those of the contrary opinion find no better course, than by shewing the impossibilities of it. For the Tartars (when their name was first known) were meer Idolaters, had no remembrance of the Law, observed not the Sabbath, nor any other point of Jewish Religion; and so the Ten Tribes retired not hither to keep Gods Statutes. Secondly, Euphrates lyeth quite West from Affrica, and those places, to which Salmanasser transplanted the Israelites; and so it could not be passed over in a journey towards the North. And Thirdly, it is very improbable, that the Ten Tribes should either be so simple, as to leave Affrica, where they were peaceably settled; or so valiant, as to force a passage through those Countries of Scythia; which neither Persians, Greeks, or Romans were able to withstand in the best of their fortunes.

To let pass therefore all imaginations of a foreign Pedigree, the truth is, that they were no other than a Ruder and more Northern brood of Scythians; who pressed by want, or otherwise oppressed by the King of Tenduch, unto whom they were subject, armed themselves against him, obtained a memorable victory, and settled Cingis their chief Captain in the Royal Throne, Anno 1162. After which, growing of more power, and enlarging their dominions further; they united in the name of Tartars all the Scythian Nations: as Mahomet did those of the three Arabias, in the name of Saracens; or as in former times, the many several Tribes of the German Nations, were united in the names of Franks, or Almans. Not known in Europe by this name, till their many great and signal victories had made them formidable; which was about the year 1212. within very little of which time they had made themselves Masters of a larger Empire, than that of Macedon, or Rome, in their greatest glories. But being of a hasty growth, it decayed as suddenly; the greatest part of their European purchases, being conquered from them by the Dukes of Moscow, and the Kings of Poland, as their acquets in Asia, and Africk, by the Turks and Persians. Yet still are they possessed of so large a Territory, that were they not distracted into several States; or did those several States depend upon one Supreme: that one Supreme might very easily give law unto all his Neighbours, and make the Turks and Persians, tributaries, as in former times. But laying aside these speculations, of what they might do if united under one command: let us now look upon them as they are divided into these five parts, that is to say, 1 Tartaria Precopensis, 2 Asiatica, 3 Antiqua, 4 Zaghai, and 5 Cathay.

I. TARTARIA PRECOPENSIS.

TARTARIA PRECOPENSIS is bounded on the East, with the River Tanais, now Don; on the West, with the River Borysthenes, now called Nieper, by which last parted from Podolia, a Province of Poland; on the North, with part of Russia; and on the South, with some part of the Euxine Sea: by this accompt lying totally within Europe.

It had the name of Precopensis, from Precopia a chief Town thereof. By some called Tartaria Minor, to distinguish it from the greater body of that people: the Inhabitants hereof most commonly passing by the name of Crim-Tartars, from the Town of Crim, in which their Cham or Emperor doth reside most usually. The Country by them now possessed, part antiently of Sarmatia Europea, was inhabited by a warlike Nation called the Tauri: from whom those parts hereof which lie betwixt the Empire of Russia, and the two Rivers Tanais, and Borysthenes, were called Tauri-Scythia; that which shooth out into the Sea, encompassed with the Euxine on the one side, and Palmus Montis on the other, being called Taurica Chersonesus. In the description whereof at this place and time, as formerly I made bold with some part of Asia, to lay together the estate of the Russian Empire: so now to satisfy for that trespass, I shall make bold with part of Europe, to lay together the discourse and affairs of Tartary.

The whole Countrey plentiful of fruits, and the soil indifferently disposed to tillage and grazing, though more accustomed unto the last: the people more delighting in their herds of cattel, than in the tillage of their Garners. Camels, Horses, Oxen, Sheep, and Goats they have plenty of; great store of de-

Tartaria

if he did, he added by that action somewhat to his own honour, but nothing to the Roman Empire: this people being never reckoned amongst their Provinces. Nor hear we any thing by name, of their infesting the Roman Territories (as the other barbarous Nations did): except they passed in the account of the Goths, Avars, Huns, Avars, or other of the Scythian, or Sarmatian people; by which the majesty of that Empire was trod under foot. But what the Perfians, Greeks, and Romans were not able to do, was with ease effected by the Tartars: who in the time of Jochata, or Haccata, the next to Cingis, under the conduct of Batu, or Roysa, one of their most renowned Commanders, subdued all these parts; together with Russia, on the North, Bulgaria, and Hungaria on the East. Subject at first to the command of the Great Cham of Cathania, as the rest of the Tartarians were, they came at last to have a Prince of their own; one Lochtan Cham, descended from the aforesaid Batu, and (as it was pretended) of the blood of Cingis. They grew at last of so great power, by conquering the Asiatick Tartars which lay nearest to them, that Mahomet the Great thought fit to keep them down before grown too strong for him: and therefore under colour of taking in the City of Capha, then possessed by the Genoese, made himself master of the greatest part of the Taurican Chersonese, and the Port of Tanaïs; thereby commanding both Maeotis and the Euxine Sea. In the time of Selimus the first, who had married a daughter of this Crim-Tartar, (for so they call him) and was aided by him with an Army of 15000 men against his Father; the Turks and these Tartarians grew into a League. The chief conditions of it were, that the Tartar should aid the Turk upon all occasions, with 60000 horse, if it were required; that they shall not make war with any of their neighbours, (except the Moscovite without leave of the Turk; that they shall pay yearly to the Grand Signior in the way of tribute, 300 Christians; that the new Cham, upon the death or deposition of his Predecessor, shall receive from the Great Turk a Royal Banner, in token of his Confirmation in that estate; that in reward of these services, the Crim-Tartar shall have yearly from the Grand Signior 5500 Ducates, in the way of pension; and succeed finally in the Turkish Empire, if ever the male issue of the house of Ottoman should chance to fail. According unto this agreement, the Tartars have been aiding to the Turks from time to time, against the Perfians, Poles, Hungarians, Moldavians, and indeed whom not? and that with great and puissant Armies; the Great Cham sometimes arming 150000 of his own Subjects (leaving but one man in an house to attend their cartel); and sometimes adding 50000 Circassians, and others of the Asian Tartars. And for the Moscovite, whom he is left at liberty to assault by this Capitulation, he hath had so hard an hand upon him, that in the year 1571. he pierced as far as to the City of Mosco, and set fire on the Suburbs: which flaming into the City built most of wood, and then reckoned to be 30 miles in compass, within the space of four hours burnt the greatest part of it, and therein no fewer than 800000 of all sorts of people: A quarrel not to be composed; the Tartar not only laying claim to the Kingdoms of Casan, and Astrachan, which the Russe possesseth; but even to Moscovia it self, as hath there been shewn. Nothing so punctual is the Turk on his part, to perform the contract; who not content to have the Tartar for his friend, or at the worst his Homager, hath of late times attempted to make him his Slave or Vassal. For Amurath the third, quarrelling Mahomet the Crim-Tartar for a design to intercept Osman Bassa, in his way from Perfia to Constantinople; authorised the said Osman to war upon him: by whom the poor Crim and his two Sons, betrayed by some of his own Counsellors (corrupted with Turkish Gold) were strangled with a Bow-string; Islan a brother of the Crim, first sworn a Vassal to the Turk, put into the place; and over him a Turkish Beglerbeg or Bassa, to command in chief. What hopes he hath of succeeding in the Turkish Empire, if the house of Ottoman should fail, hath been already taken into consideration, in our discourse upon that subject.

What the Revenue of this Prince is, it is hard to say; his Subjects having little money, and living most upon the bartery of their Cattel. But besides what he hath in Lands or Customs, and the 5500 Ducats yearly which he receiveth from the Turk; he hath the tenth of all the spoils which are got in the wars, and a Checkine for every Captive, for some two or three (whosoever taketh them) according unto their estates.

As for his power, what he can do in Horse, we have seen already; and as for Foot, and Ammunition, and other necessities, he is supplied with them by the Turk, (who doth sometimes espouse his quarrels); by whose assistance they have brought the Moscovites to some extremities. And upon confidence of the favour and protection of the Grand Signior, the Cham then being, upon the death of Stephen Bathori, (whom Amurath the 3d. commended to the Crown of Poland) sent Ambassadors to negotiate his election to that Kingdom: and to induce them thereunto, promised them in his letters amongst other things, that their Pope should be his Pope, their Luther his Luther; and that rather than put them unto any charge to find his Table, he could live with Horse-flesh. His Embassy entertained with Laughter, as it well deserved.

2. TARTARIA DESERTA.

TARTARIA DESERTA is bounded on the West, with Precopensis, and the Empire of Russia; on the East, with Antiqua, and Zagathay; from which last parted by the River Span, which falleth into the Caspian Sea about the middle of it, and with the great Lake of Kien, from East to West: on the North, with the Scythick or frozen Ocean; and on the South, with part of the Euxine Sea, the Caucasian Mountains, and some part of the Caspian.

It took this name from the many Deserts which are in it; and is called also Asiatica, to difference it from Precopensis, which is wholly in Europe: or because it taketh up the whole Continent of Sarmatia Asiatica, according to the bounds thereof laid down by Plolomy, except some part hereof incorporated into the Russian Empire.

The

Deserta.

The Country of it self sufficiently fruitful, if well manured; and were it in the hands of a laborious and industrious people, would yield large increase: as appears by the ill husbandry of the Tartars, who sow nothing on it but Adill and Punicum (grains unknown to us) and yet without giving it any tillage, receive very plentiful returns of both. But the Tartar being a Nation that hateth Agriculture, and laugheth at Christians for living on the tops of Reeds, (so they call our bread) neglect all that which is not of a rank pasture for their Herds and Cattel; moving from one place to another, as the Grafs, fableth them; which maketh it so full of Deserts, and so empty of Towns, as to deserve the name of Tartaria Deserta.

The people or Inhabitants of it are of several sorts; derived from three several Originals, and disposed in three several parts. 1. The Samoyeds, dwelling towards the Northern Ocean, who are wholly idolaters, now reckoned as a part of Zigathay, and there we shall hear further of them. 2. The Circassians, bordering on the Euxine, for the most part Christians; and 3. The Tartars, planted betwixt both, being all Mahometans. These again subdivided into several Tribes, which they call their Hordes: of which the most considerable are, 1. the Nagarian Tartars, 2. the Zavolhenses, 3. the Thumenenses, 4. the Kirgessi; besides the Hordes or Kingdoms of Casan, and Astrachan, added unto the Empire of Russia, where described already; and others of inferior note, not here considerable.

But before we come to speak of these people in their several places, we must first look upon the whole Country, as presented to us under the name of Sarmatia Asiatica: bounded by Polomy as before, save that it did extend more Westwards; and was unknown to him in the Northern parts of it; now possessed by the Moscovite. So populous in the time of that Author, that he giveth us the names of fourty several Nations which did then inhabit it; and of about as many Towns of good estimation. Of which there are but few or none remaining; and for the names of some of the principal of them, we shall have them presently.

Rivers of most note in it, 1. Marabius, 2. Rhomblus the Greater, and 3. the Lefs; 4. Anticus, 5. Theophanius, 6. Psathis, 7. Thysiris, 8. Corax, and 9. Vardanes; all of them falling into the Euxine, and Maeotick Fennes, 10. Odonis, 11. Alnata, and 12. Rha, paying their Tributes to the Caspian or Hyrcanian Sea. Of these the principal is Rha, by the modern Latines called Volgo, by the Tartars Edi; rising in Russia, not far from the City of Mosco, (where we have described it.) Most memorable, besides the seventy Mouths or Channels, wherewith it openeth into the Caspian, for a Medicinal and wholesome root growing on both sides thereof; which the Physicians call Rha, by the name of the River; and for distinctions sake Rha Punicum, to difference it from Rhabarb, or Rha Barbarum, as of a different nature from it; this last being purgative, and the other more apt to bind. 13. Ob, a River unknown to Plolomy, rising out of the Lake of Kien, a Lake in bigness like the Sea, and full of many little Islands (most of them inhabited.) Which River at its first parting from this Lake, is said to be of 8 miles breadth; and growing still bigger and bigger, emptieth it self at last into the Northern Ocean; the present boundary betwixt the Russian, and the people in the North of this Country.

Principal Mountains of this part 1. Corax, giving name unto the River issuing out of it. 2. Montes Hippici, extended towards the Caspian Sea. 3. Montes Cerannii, lying in the furthest parts hereof (then known unto my Author) to the North and East. 4. Caucasus, or Caucasii Montes, extended from the Euxine to the Caspian Seas; and parting Sarmatia Asiatica, from Colchis, Iberia, and Albania. A chain of Hills of which Aristotle saith, acumine & latitudine omnium maximis, &c. that for height and breadth they are the greatest of the East; the tops whereof are lightened by the Sun-beams in midnight till almost day-break, when it is dark night in the valleys beneath. Not passable for horse or foot (except they creep along by the Euxine shore) but at one place only, called Sarmatia Pyle, or the Gates of Sarmatia; by others named Caucasie Porte, from the Hills adjoining. Situate in the 81 degree of Latitude; and not far from the Caspian Sea: but that so intricate and narrow, that very small force may keep it against strong Armies. So carefully did Almighty God in his heavenly Providence, shut up this fierce and barbarous people, from the rest of Mankind, by such unfordable Waters, and impassible Mountains: not to be freed out of this Prison, till he thought good to use them, as the Executioners of his wrath and vengeance, for the punishment of sinful and impenitent Nations. This said, we will consider those particular Nations, which before we named, and are now possessed of it in their several places.

1. Opposite to the Precopenses lie the CIRCASSIANS, extended from the Cimmerian Bosphorus and the Fennes of Maantia, towards the Eastern shores of the Euxine Sea, for the space of 500 miles; and reaching 200 miles towards the North. The name imposed on them by the Tartars; whereas before, they were called by Pliny, Zige, by some writers Zychi, conceived to be the Zinchi of Plolomy.

The Country very fitly feared for trade and Merchandise, as having a fair and large Sea-coast, with many Rivers opening into it (nine of those spoken of before passing thorow these tracts:) and not a few capacious Bays, and commodious Havens. Of which the principal were Sinus Cerceticus, or the Bay of Ceretic, Synada, and Batu, two known Havens, and specified by my Author with the adjunct of Portus. But these conveniences not much looked after by the present Inhabitants, who are more inclined to ransoms, than to trades, or Merchandise. A stout and Military people, trained to their weapons from their childhood; and sold as soon as trained to it by unnatural Parents. For from these parts did the Mammalukes of Egypt fetch their first Original; and from hence supply themselves with a perpetual Seminary of slaves and Souldiers raised by degrees unto the highest dignities of that slavish Empire; And from these parts the Persian Sophies are supplied with their Coxzel-Bassas, disciplined and instructed by them like the Turkish Janizaries.

Deserta.

The Christian faith was here planted in the year 860. or thereabouts, by the Ministry of Cyril (or Chirvill) and Methodius; employed in that service by the Patriarch of Constantinople. In which respect their Churches are of the Greek Communion, conform thereto in rites and doctrine, and of the jurisdiction of that Patriarch: but differing from them very much in matters practical. For it is ordinary with these half Christians, not to baptize their children till eight years old; to hear divine service standing without their Churches, into which they very seldom enter (especially the Gentlemen) till the 40th. or (as some say) the 60th. year of their age: dividing the whole course of their life betwix God and the Devil, in dedicating their youth unto Theft and Robbery, their old Age (when they can no longer commit those villanies) to the difficult business of repentance.

Places of most observation amongst the Ancients, 1 Cimmeria, a Town and Promontory, so called from the Cimmerii, once the chief people of these parts, of whom more anon; situate on the very shore of the Bosphorus, from hence denominated. 2 Phanagoria, in old times a well-traded Empory; situate on a little Island raised out of the Sea, by the care and industry of the Greeks, who had here a Factory. 3 Apathurgus, by Pliny called Apaturnum, memorable for a Temple of Venus surnamed Apaturia (which name she gave unto this place:) because (saith Strabo) when the Giants assaulted her, she craved help of Hercules, who slew them all one after another. 4 Gerusa, by Pliny honoured with the title of Civitas; of Hercules, who slew them all one after another. 5 Oennontia, near the mouth of the River Thesys; the Gargaza of Diodorus, now called Saint Georges. 6 Amphacis, bath the name of a City also. The names of their chief Havens we have seen before. But few of these, or any other mentioned by the ancient Authors, being now visible in their ruins: the chief of those which are now extant, are 1 Locoppe, 2 Conioe; but of no great note.

The people anciently though divided into the several Tribes of the Thersagete, Zige, Turca, the Hunnas, Avares, and Maotes, all noted Nations; besides the Coaxira, Zinchi, Tyrambe, Pselii, and others as obscure as they; were better known by the name of Cimmerians, in which those several tribes concentrated. Descended in the right of that common original, from Gomer the Son of Japhet, first planted in the Mountainous places of Albania: his posterity known by the name of Gomerii, afterwards Cimmerii, left there a memorial of themselves in the Mountains called Cimmerini. But that Country proving both too barren, and too narrow for them, some of them passed into Phrygia Major, where they built the City Cimmerii, not unknown to Pliny in whose time it was extant: and others in some tract of time, keeping the Euxine on their left hand, fixed themselves in these parts; here giving name to the Town and Promontory Cimmerion, to the Cimmerian Bosphorus, and generally to all the people descended of them. From these particularly, as Mesech, Magog, and Tubal; the Sarmatians both of Europe and Asia, the Moscovites, and perhaps the Scythians, are to fetch their Original: all of them great and puissant Nations, and all involved promiscuously in the name of Scythians. Renowned for no other action more than the memorable expedition, which they made into Media in the Greater, and Lydia in the Lesser Asia: the Cimmerians by themselves alone, or by them as principal; the rest of these Sarmatians in a body together as a Scythian People. Distressed with want, or to disburden their small Country of superfluous multitudes, these Cimmerii in the time of Nabulassus, King of Affria, communicating their design with the rest of the Scythians, to enlarge their quarters; holding along the course of the Euxine Sea, and passing thorow the Country of Colchis, first seized on some parts of Pontus and Paphlagonia. Where having fortified the Promontory on which Sinope was after built; and leaving there their carriages, and the weakest of their train, with sufficient guards, they marched into Lydia, reputed (as it was indeed) for a wealthy Region. There they possessed themselves of Sardis, the Royal City, and after of the rest of the Country, or the most part of it; Ardis, the Son of Giger, who then reigned in Lydia, not being able to withstand them. Both betides being wearied with long war, and grown more pliant by degrees unto one another (as in like case betwixt the Saxons, and the Danes) it proved no difficult matter for Halyattes, the grand-child of Ardis, to compound the business: assigning to the Cimmerians all the rest of the Country, or the most part of it; and settling his Lydians in the rest. By this transaction there were so good correspondences betwixt the Nations, that when Cyaxares, King of the Medes invaded the Country of these Cimmerians, under colour of the invasion which the Scythians had made in Media; Halyattes did espouse the quarrel, and appeared in their aid. In following times, growing into confidence of one another, and mixt in Marriages and blood, they became one people; or at least passed not under the account of strangers, or the name of Aliens. Such end had this most notable expedition of these Cimmerians; not much remembered after this, for the like undertakings. Yet here they held their own, though in other names, governed by many petty Princes, but all associated with Mithridates against the Romans: that King being so great amongst them, that his Son Machabes having married into some of their families, was made King of Bosphorus. But Machabes having made his peace with Laelus, the Romans never looked this way. Nor hear we much of them in succeeding times, till the invasion of the Tartars, by whom subdued, they acknowledge at first the Great Cham for their Sovereign Lord: whose power declining, they have successively been subject to the Crim-Tartar, the Turk, and Moscovite; but most commonly to the Crim-Tartar, as their nearest neighbour, and most able to hurt them. And him they furnished on command, with 50000 horse for the Grand Signers service: yet so, that they supply the Persian with his Coxzel-Bassus, and some mes serve under him for pay, as they do, under any which will entertain them. Governed like the Swissers, by their several Commonalties: yet so, that every Commonality hath some principal man (which the Swissers have not) whom they call Morfeys (that is Dukes) to direct and order them.

2. Betwixt these and the River Volga dwell the ZAVOLHENSES, one of the greatest

Hordi

Deserta.

Hordi or Tribes of all the Tartars; and therefore called Horda Magna. Of these the Crim, or Precopenes were a Caffling only; proceeding out of this great Swarm or Nest or Hornets, though afterwards they became their masters. Of the Country or the People we say nothing here, having sufficiently spoken of both already. Their chief Town hath the name of Bolgar, situate on the River Volga, and from thence so named: Volgar, and Bolgar differing but little in Orthography, and not much in sound.

This Country, as I take it by the situation, should be that which Plutarch calleth Mithridatis Regio: whether so called in honour of him by the Princes of the neighbouring Cimmerians, with whom he had contracted alliance; or that he had made any Congress there, or from some other Prince of the same name, I determine not. And in this tract were those two Pillars, advanced unto the honour of Alexander, in Plutarch called Columna Alexandri, in whose time they stood without defacement: there being also Ashes erected to him, or in memory of him, near the Banks of Tanais, occurring in the same Author by the name of Ara Alexandri. Which probably occasioned the error of Qu. Curtius, who brings Alexander in pursuit of the Scythian war, as far as Tanais: whereas it is apparent by the course of his actions, that he never got beyond the River Jaxartes; distant from Tanais no less than 2000 miles.

This Tribe first governed by its own King, whom they called Ulu-Cham, was in the year 1506. subdued by the Crim-Tartar, and made subject to him. Afterwards conquered by Bassins the Great Duke of Moscovy, who thereupon assumed the title of King of Bolgar: which his Successors still preserve, with the Town it self; well garrisoned to keep open the whole course of the River Volga, by which they manage the great trade of the Caspian Sea. But for the main body of this people, they returned again to their obedience to the Crim, as being a limb of the same body with him; and are subject unto his commands: though by reason of their neighbourhood to the Moscovite, and commerce with that Nation, they frame themselves both to their language, habit, and behaviour.

3. East of the Zavolhenses, on the other side of the Volga, dwell the NOIHACENSES, or NAGAIANS, spreading as far as the borders of Zagathay, and declining Southward towards the Caspian Sea, and the Montes Hippici: Accompted the best men of war of all the Tartars, but more fierce and cruel than the rest: void of all Arts, not having, or contemning Money, or the use of Corn. Hest-flesh and Mares Milk, their best diet; the flesh either roasted by the Sun, or heated by continual hanging at their Saddle-bow. And with such cheer (nor worse nor better) did Azim Can, one of the Princes of this Tribe, entertain Jenkinson and other English men in their travells to the Caspian, from the River Volga. Their chief Town, if possibly it deserve that name, is called Scharajirzik, the Residence of one of their Princes; and the next, Sellibare, where the said Jenkinson found the Cham, as in the prime place of his abode. The Government is by several Morfeys, the Heads or Chiefs, no doubt, of their several Clans: agreeing well enough together against the Moscovite; whom they infect with frequent inroads, and put him to the charge of continual Garrisons at Casan, Astrachan, and Wiatka. Their wars for the most part only Predatory, rather to get some present booty, than out of any hope to enlarge their dominion; and therefore commonly pacified, and sent home with presents. The Great Duke is so good a Statesman, as to think the expence of Money cheaper than that of Blood; especially when he hath to deal with such an Enemy, who hath neither any Town of consequence, or fixt place of dwelling, and consequently nothing to be got but blows. Their Morfeys, formerly more in number, were of late times reduced unto three; of which he of Scharajirzik was the Chief; to whose direction, and appointment (especially in matters which concerned the publick) the other two do commonly submit themselves.

4. Betwixt these Nagaians, and the Circassians, lie those Tribes which they call the KIRGESSI, spreading as far as to the mouths or influx of the River Volga: but intermixt with the Heselites, and Bschurides, two other of the Tartarian Tribes, but of less power. Their life for the most part in continual motion, removing with their wives and families from one place to another; and governing themselves in their removes, by the light of the Pole-star. Partly Mahometan, partly Gentile; but the Gentiles make the greater number: not burying their dead bodies, as in other places, but hanging them upon a Tree, though they stink again: certain enough that they will be devoured or sweetened, before they return back to the same Station. Much reverence yet they give their Priests, by whom sanctified and besprinkled in their publick meeting, with a certain mixture, compounded of Blood, Milk, Earth, and Cow-dung, a most sweet Consecration, but good enough for them that desire no better. And yet with these the Moscovite is fain to hold fair compliance, and to send them every year some presents; for fear they should joyn with the Nagaians, or otherwise disturb him in his Caspian Trade down the River Volga.

5. The THUMENSES or THUMEN TARTARS lie more North than any of these Tartarians; having on the South, the Zavolhenses, and the territory of Wiatka in the Empire of Russia. A warlike people, and living near a dangerous neighbour: for which cause they do not straggle so abroad in petty companies, as the others do, but keep together in great bodies: For the most part much delighted in Negromancy, and Conjurations. In which the Devil besetles them, that he suffereth them to raise tempests; and sometimes, by Diabolical illusions, to defeat their enemies. The only Hord of all Deserta, which still continue in obedience to their natural Lord, the great Cham of Cahay (if such Cham there be.) And unto these we may adjoyn the Molgomozans, all Gentiles, and the most barbarous of all: living in Caves, and feeding upon Worms, and Mice, and Serpents, and such other vermine as would be poison unto any but such Molgomozans, who are more poisonous than those Creatures.

These Hordi, together with the Kingdoms of Casan, and Astrachan, and such of the Russian Provinces as lie on the East of Tanais and the River Dniina, make up that Country which anciently passed under the name of Sarmatia Asiatice: inhabited originally, by the Descendants of Gomer, Mesech, Tu- bal, Magog, the Sons of Japhet, spreading themselves more Northwards as they grew in numbers, out of Albania, Iberia, Colches, and the Pontick, or Cammerian Nations. Divided into the Tribes or Families of the Olanda, Gerri, Samocolchi, Sucani, Seci, Scimnite, Agartie, Merdi, Canapfeni, Chanider, Basilici, Hyperborei, Hippophagi, and others of as little note: these last so called from their eating of horses, which dyet they have left unto their Successors. So like in manners and conditions, to the neighbouring Scythians, that they passed commonly by that name, and by that name are memorable for the great expedition by them made into Asia the Greater; at such time as the Cimmerians fell into Asia Minor. For passing without opposition thorow the Sarmatian Straights, where they might have been easily kept out; and leaving behind them the more barren Country of Albania, they fell into Media: where they were encountered (but victorious,) by Phraartes, then King of the Medes. Who finding that he was not able to remove them by force, assayed it by cunning; and first perswaded them to look towards the South, as into richer Countries, and more like to yield them full content. Hereupon, full of prey and presents, they marched towards Egypt, but were met in Syria by Psammiticus the Egyptian King, who had heard of their coming; and thought it best to entertain them on the way, and not to bid them welcome at home to his greater cost. Out-lying the Median (as of the two, the richer Prince) he loaded them with gifts and treasures, and so sent them back again into Media, from whence they came: where for many years they afflicted that people, and the neighbouring Provinces, doubling their tributes, and using all kind of infolencies: till in the end; Cyaxares, the Son and Successor of Phraartes, acquainting some of his most faithful subjects with his design, caused the better part of them to be plentifully feasted, made them drunk, and slew them; recovering thereby the possession of his whole estate. Afterwards, imitated by the English in their Hock-tide slaughter. Such of them as escaped this blow, and were not willing to be subject to the Kings of Media (as many of them were): were suffered to return home by the same way they came; where at their coming, they found foul work made by their wives and their slaves, the story whereof we had when we were in Russia. After this we hear nothing of them in the stories of the Greeks, and Romans, unless those Amazons, who attended their Queen Thalestris, when the belittled avilite on Alexander, were rather of these Sarmatian Amazons, than of those of Pontus and Thermodon, as I think they were: the nearness of their dwelling to Hyrcania, in which place they found him, inducing me to his opinion. But possible enough it is, (though it be not certain) that some of these Sarmatian tribes, though by other names, hearing of the successes of the Huns, Avars, and other barbarous Nations, which made havoc of the Roman Empire, might joyn themselves unto them, and make up their numbers: those nations being else too small to compound such Armies, as by them were brought into the field against the Romans, without such like helps. What their estate hath been since subdued by the Tartars, hath been shewn already.

3. ZAGATHAY.

ZAGATHAY is bounded on the East, with the Mountain Imans, by which it is parted from Cathay; on the North, with the main Scythick or Frozen Ocean; on the West, with Tartaria Deserta, from which separated by the River Scane, and the Lake of Kity; and on the South, with the Caspian Sea, and the River Oxus, by which divided from the Empire of Persia. So called from Zagathay, a brother of one of the great Chims, on whom it was conferred for his better maintenance; the Scythia intra montem Imamm of the ancient writers.

The Country spreading out so far, on all sides, as before appeareth, comprehendeth all those Provinces and tracts of ground, which anciently were called 1 the Country of the Saca, 2 Sogdiana, with 3 Zagathay, specially so called, 4 and Turchestan, included antiently in the name of Scythia intra montem Imamm; and 5 the Terra incognita, which Ptolomy makes to be the Northern boundary of that part of Scythia. By taking a survey of all which particulars, we shall find the temper of the whole.

1. SACA, or the Country of the Sacans, is bounded on the East, with the Mountain Imans; on the West, with Sogdiana; on the North, with Zagathay, properly and specially so called; on the South, with the River Oxus, by which parted from Bactria. So called from the Saca, the Inhabitants of it; but the reason of their name I find not.

The Country antiently either barren, or ill manured; full of vast Forests, wide Deserts, and the like uninhabitable places. Few or no Cities in it, and not many villages (ciuitates autem non habent, as my Author hath it) the people living most part in Caves, or otherwise wandering up and down with their droves of cattle; called for that reason Nomades by some antient writers. The name not proper to these only, but common to all those who followed the like roving life, as the Sarmatians, wild Arabians, Saracens, and the Inhabitants of Libya and Nuvidia in Africa. Only one fortified place they had, which from the materials of it had the name of Turris Lapidea, (λιθινὴ πύργος, in the Greek) or the Castle of Stones; Part hereof being peopled for the most part by Camels, or travelling only with those Creatures, had the name of Camelorum Regio.

Divided it was antiently into many Tribes, the Carate, and Comari, near the River Jaxartes; the Missigete, and Comeda, near the Hills called Alcatanus; the Byle and Grynei, more within the Country. All joyned in one by the name of Saca; and by that name made a very fortunate Progress into Armenia (to which they had an easie passage by the Northern banks of the Caspian Sea) and therein gave name unto the Province called Sacafena. But proceeding into Cappadocia, and there slain by the Persians in the middle of their Feakings, they left there also some resemblance of their name, in an annual festival called Saca; celebrated by the Persians, in memorial of their good success in the war against them. Such as stayd here, being overcome by Cyrus the first Persian Monarch, did so good service to that Prince, Sogdiana.

Prince, that Amorges the King of these Saca, is said to have rescued him from the hands of the Scythians, by whom otherwise he had been slain, or taken Prisoner. In the declining of that Kingdom, they were subdued by Alexander at the end of his Scythian, and Sogdian wars; who hereabouts, by Cohortanes a noble Persian, was presented with a Bevy of beautiful Ladies; one of the which was that Barsine whom he made his wife, and had by her that Hercules, whom Polysperchon and his faction proclaimed King of Macedon. Not memorable in the following times for any thing which they did or suffered; as they have been made by the opinion or mistake of others; who building Castles in the Air, will needs derive the Saxons (our famous Ancestors) from this Original: as if they were called Saxons, quasi Saca-fones; or the Sons of the Saca. A fancy in my poor conceit, of no ground at all. For either the number of these Saca, when they left these parts, must be great, or little. If little, how can we conceive it possible; they should force their way through those valiant Nations of both Sarmatias, who to the last maintained their liberties and estate against the Romans? If great enough to force their passage (for stout and provident Nations use not to give passage to great Armies, but they pay dear for it) how can we think it possible they should be shut up in a corner of Germany, betwixt the River Albis and the Cimbrick Cher-fonse? The Saxons then, whatsoever they were, were no Sons of the Saca; and what in likelihood they were, hath been elsewhere shewn.

2. SOGDIANA bath on the East, the Saca; on the North and West, Zagathay specially so called; on the South, the River Oxus, parting it from Margiana. So called from a chain of Mountains named Montes Sogdii, being the chief of all this Country, though of themselves a spur or branch of the Mountain Caucasus.

The Country indifferently fruitful, and very rich in pasturage, because very well watered. For besides Oxus, and Jaxartes, which are common unto them and others; they have many Rivers of their own. The principal of which, 1 Dymus, and 2 Araxates, both navigable, and capable of very good ships; both also running down the hills with a headlong course, and passing thorough the champaign Country, empty themselves at last in the lake called Oxiana; as is affirmed by Ammianus, but as Ptolomy saith, into Jaxartes.

Places of most consideration are, 1 Drepfa, the Metropolis or mother-City of this people. By Pliny called Panda, by Solinus Darapsa; situate on the River Oxus. 2 Oxiana, on the same River, and from thence denominated. 3 Marcuca, on the same River also. 4 Alexandria, called for distinctions sake, Alexandria Oxiana, which name declareth both the founder and the situation. 5 Alexandria, for the same cause of distinction, named Alexandria ultima: either because the last City which he built in these parts, or because it lay furthest off on the borders of the Scythians; against whose invasions or irruptions it was said to be built. 6 Tribarra, one of the chief hereof in the time of Ammianus Marcellinus. 7 Cyroschata, more memorable, and not less antient, than any of those named before, by Qu. Curtius called Cyropolis; built by Cyrus, to fortifie his borders against the Scythians. It held out against the great Macedonian, a long time: and he himself coming nigher to the walls, than discretion would permit an ordinary General, had such a blow on the neck with a stone, that he fell to the ground, his eyes swimming in his head, and his whole Army giving him for slain. But reviving he took the Town by a mine, and levell'd it with the ground, in revenge of so great a danger.

The antient Inhabitants hereof were the Oxydrace, and Candari, dwelling at the foot of the Sogdian mountains; the Oxiani, and Chersasmii, near the banks of Oxus; the Jasi, and Tachori, near the River Jaxartes; the Drepfiani in the East parts bordering on the Saca; whose chief City was Drepfa; descended from their several roots, but all called Sogdians. Conquered by Alexander, not without danger to his own person, as before was said; at the solicitation of Spitamenes a noble Persian, it rebelled again: Who being suppressed, and the Country in some measure quieted, Arimazes, a native of the Province, renewed the war. Who followed with 30000 men, encamped upon the top of an hill, in a place of such notable advantage, that Alexander, neither by force nor fair words, could get him out of it. He therefore dealt with 5000 of his youngest and most active men, on the promise of great reward, to climb the hill; and without any noise, to shew themselves at the back of the Enemy. Which having performed with the loss of 30 of their company, Alexander sent one Copbes to Arimazes, to let him know that the whole Army of Macedon was at his back: who terrified with what he saw, more with what he feared, gave up the place, and was scourged and crucified for his labour. So necessary in the Art of war-fare is a peece of wit. After this time, it ran the same alterations and change of fortunes, as the Persians did; till they were conquered by the Tartars, unto whom still subject.

3 ZAGATHAY specially so called, is bounded on the East, with Cathay; on the West, with Turchestan, and part of the Caspian Sea; on the North, with the Country of the Sarmydes, the Terra Incognita of the Antients; on the South, with the Saca, and Sogdiana. Antiently part of Scythia intra montem Imamm; and took this new name from Zagathay, the first Prince hereof, since the time of the Tartars.

The Country reasonably fruitful, but not so rich in the natural temper of the soil, as the industriousness of the people, more civil far than any other of the Tartars; studious of good letters, lovers of Arts, as well ingenious as Mechanick; will skilled in Manufactures, and very seldom without the confluence of foreign Merchants. Populous, and well-stored with Towns and Villages; both for their own more commodious dwelling, and the entertainment of others.

Chief Rivers of it, 1 Jaxartes, now called Chesel, the principal of all this Country: great of it self, but made much greater by the waters of 2 Dais, another River of good note, rising out of the mountain called Norofus, and falling with many others into Jaxartes; mixt with those streams they are dischannelled in the Caspian Sea. 3 Jartus, and 4 Polytimetas, falling into Oxus. Others there are nels of the Serican temper. Or else, we must correct the Copies of Ptolemy, by the History of Arrianus Marcellinus, who instead of Anthropophagi, placeth the Althropagi in the self same tract. The other Nations not distaind with the like reproaches, are the Singgi and Anali, nor far off the Auzacian mountains; the Piale near the River Ochardai; the Gerani, and Rhabbani, their nearest neighbours; the Thraani dwelling towards the East, the Baba and Ostovor more towards the South. These with the residue, governed by a Common-Council of 5000 men, every one of which was to find an Elephant for the service of the Common-wealth, as was said before. And more than this we hear not of them in the way of Story; the Natives never going abroad to their wares, and having little speech with Strangers, when they come amongst them. Being vanquished by the Chana, a Scythian Nation, from whom it is like that it took the name of CATHAY; (for in this we go by conjecture) they continued under Kings of their own, till subdued by the Tartars, against whom they made such stout resistance, being besieged by Cingis in their principal City, that when they wanted stones to cast out of their engines, they supplied that want with molten silver; and held it out so long, that Cingis finding victuals to grow short in his Camp, commanded that every tenth man should be eaten. But at the last being undermined, the Town was taken, the Citizens massacred, and their King or Emperor (as some call him) slain: after whose death, and not before, Cingis assumed the title of Chan, or Emperor. The residue of their Story we shall have hereafter.

SCYTHIA EXTRA IMANUM was bounded on the East with Serica, on the West with Iman, on the South with India extra Gangem; and on the North with the Countries comprehended in the name of Alay, which Ptolemy hath given us in the notion of the Terra Incognita. Called Scythia because planted by a brood of the Scythians. Extra Imanum was put to it, to difference it from that part of Scythia which lay on the West side of that Mountain, nearest unto the Greeks and Romans. But now the Mountain, and the Country, have the name of Alay.

To look upon it as it standeth by the name of Scythia extra Imanum, we find not any thing delivered of the Rivers or Mountains of it, but what is common unto them with the neighbouring Nations: the Mountains called Auzacii, Cashi, and Ennodorus, being common unto this with Serica; as Iman joyntly to both the Scythias, which it divided antiently the one from the other: though now this last be reckoned to belong to Cathay alone, because the Tartars on both sides of it, profess themselves subjects to that Chan. This the most famous Mountain in the East of Asia, beginning at the shores of the Scythick or Frozen Ocean; and extending thence directly Southwards unto Cape Comari, a Promontory of the Southern or Indian Seas. By which account it divideth the Greater Asia into East and West, as Taurus doth into North and South, which Mountain it crosseth in right Angles, about the Longitude of 140. as before was said. That part hereof which lyeth on the South of Taurus, was by the Ancients called Bitigio; and by the modern is named Gates: of which we shall speak more when we come to India. That on the North of Taurus, called Iman properly, was antiently most memorable for dividing the vast Countreys of the Scythians, into Scythia intra Imanum, and Scythia extra Imanum; a division much observed by the old Geographers: now chiefly memorable for being the Sepulchre of some of the Chans of Tartary; most generally known by the name of Alay, but by some called Belgion.

Chief Towns hereof were 2 Auzacia, at the foot of the hills so named. 2 Chaurana, the chief City of the Chauranai. 3 Sata. 4 Issodon Scythica, so called to difference it from the other of that name in Serica. These with the rest, and all the Country, as far as it was known in the days of Ptolemy, inhabited by the Alti, Hippophagi, or horse eaters, a diet still used by the Tartars or modern Scythians. 2 The Issodons who are said by Pomponius Mela to make carousing cups of their Fathers heads, first trimmed and guilded. 3 the Cauranai, and 4 the Chata, who being (as it seemeth) the most potent Nation, caused all the rest to be called by the name of Cathay, communicating that name also to the conquered Seres. Besides the possessions of which Tribes, there was also the Regions of Achissa, Cusisa, and Auzanatis; these last so called from the Mountains upon which they stand. More then this we have not to say of this Country by the name of Scythia, there being nothing memorable of it in the course of story, or worth the observation in the way of Chorography.

ALAY is bounded on the South with Cathay, specially so called, and part of China; on the North with Tartaria Antiqua; on the West with the great Mountain Iman; and on the East with the Nations or Countries of the Eastern Tartars. So called from its neighbourhood to that mighty Mountain, which the Tartars in their Language call by the name of Alay.

The Country utterly unknown to the ancient Writers, and not much canvassed or travelled by our Modern pens. In which respect I shall now trouble my self no further, than by giving a brief touch on the several parts of it. Of which the most that can be said, will be but little for the information of the judicious Readers; who are not to be bettered by the names of places, if there be not something in them of further use. Now for these Provinces the principal of them are, 1 Cascar, 2 Chesmur, 3 Lop, 4 Camul, 5 Tainfu, 6 Caindu, 7 Carazan, 8 Cardandan, 9 Erginul, 10 Tanguth.

1. CASCAR, bordering on the North-West of China, a Mahometan Country, but admitt'g of some Christians also; the largest Kingdom in all Alay, except Tanguth only, and furnished with many Towns or Cities both of Trade and Note, the principal whereof are, 1 Hiachan, the Royal City of this Country, and a Mart famous for concourse of Merchants, and variety of Merchandises. 2 Cialie, the chief Town of a Province or Kingdom so named, but subject to the King of Cascar, who in the year, 1603. was called Mahomet Chan, a Prince of some credit in those parts, but neither equal in Power to the King of Tanguth. The people generally rude and barbarous, in so much that some parts here of both sexes do indulge themselves this mutual privilege, that if the husband or the wife be absent above twenty dayes, the other party is at liberty to marry again.

2. CHESMUR.

2 CHESMUR, the Inhabitants whereof are generally both Idolaters and Inchanters, causing the dumb Idols to speak, the winds to rise, and the Sun to be darkned. For studying which black Arts (if they come to them by study) they have many Monasteries; in which their Hermits or Monasticks live a strict kind of life, and are very abstemious.

3 LOP, memorable for a great Desert of thirty dayes journey; so true a Desert; that whosoever doth not mean to be starved, must carry all his victuals with him. Dangerous to Travellers, if not before-hand made acquainted with their danger: the evil spirits uling to call men by their names, and make them go astray from their company, where they perish with famine, or are devoured with wild beasts. The chief Town hereof called Lop, giving name to both.

4 CAMUL, an Idolatrous Country, the people whereof accompt it a great honour to them to have their wives and sisters at the pleasure of such as they entertain. From which brutish custom when restrained by Mango Cham, they petitioned him at three years end to be restored again to their former liberty; protesting they could never thrive since they left that custom. Which desire of theirs was at last granted, and is still in use.

5 TAINFU, more civil than the rest, the people being very industrious and good Artificers; making the most part of the Arms which are used by the Chan; and some also which they sell to Merchants.

6 CAINDU, with a Town in it of the same name, of great resort by Merchants (such as we commonly call pitt Chinmen) for Womens veils here made, with very great Art, of the Barks of Trees. And it is well that they have Veils to hide their shamefulness, the Women of this Tract being prostituted unto every Traveller.

7 CARAZAN, inhabited by a barbarous and savage people, who in the day time live in dens for fear of Serpents, with which (and some of them 10 paces long, and ten spans in thickness) they are much infested; and in the night go forth to prey upon Wolves and Lions. They have an use, that when any stranger cometh into their houses, of an handsome shape, to kill him in the night: not out of desire of spoil, or to eat his body; but that the soul of such a comely body, might remain amongst them.

8 CARDANDAN, near Carazan, and as savage as that. The people whereof draw black lines on their bodies, which they count for the greatest Ornament. In case of sickness they send not to the Physician, but the next Inchanters; who taking Counsel of the Devil, apply some remedy; or if they think the man past cure, they tell him that his offences are grown too great to admit of help; and so put him off.

9 ERGIMUL, possessed by an Idolatrous people, but mixed with some Mahometans, and Nestorian Christians. In which Country they have certain Bulls as big as Elephants, with mains of fine white hair, like silk, some of which they tame; and betwixt them and their Kine engender a race of strong and laborious beasts, not inferior in that kind to Oxen. Here is also found a beast of an exquisite shape, but not bigger than a Goat, which at every full Moon hath a swelling under the belly; which being cut off by the Hunters, and dried in the Sun; proveth to be the best Musk in the World.

10 TANGUTH, the greatest and most potent of all the rest, bordering on the North of Cathay; specially so called, and (like to that) inhabited by an industrious and laborious people, amongst whom the Art of Printing is said to have been extant a thousand years. Blessed heretofore with a great increase of Christianity; but now the Gentiles or Idolaters make the greatest part, with some Mahometans amongst them. And for the serving of those Idols, they have not only many large and beautiful Temples, built in the manner of Christian Churches, and capable of 4 or 5000 persons; but also many fair Monasteries for the use of their Volaries, and Recluses. They are possessed of many Towns most of them well fortified, and planted with good store of Artillery. The chief of which, 1 Sachian, bordering on the Desert of Lop, inhabited by some of all three Religions; in which it is affirmed that they first used the Art of Printing. 2 Campion, the Metropolis, or Mother City of this Country; where the Christians in the time of Paulus Venetus, had three fair Churches: now over-numbered by the Gentiles, who have here many Monasteries for the use of their Idols, and many Religious persons dedicated to their service only. Who though they live more honestly than the rest of their Order, and hold it an impiety to tempt a woman to the act of lust; yet if the woman make the offer, they hold it no small sin to refuse her curtesie. 3 Santa, a Town in the middle way betwixt Campion and Succuir, as being 5 dayes journey from the one, and 6 dayes journey from the other; by which we may conjecture at the long extent of this Kings Dominions. 4 Succuir, situate amongst Mountains clothed with Rhubarb, from whence conveyed by Merchants over all the world; but so neglected by the Natives, that did not the foreign Merchant bring it into request, they would scorn to gather it. This once a Kingdom of it self, made subject afterwards with Tanguth, to the Chan of Cathay, or the great Chan of Tartary: But the fury of this Tartarian tempest, being overblown, the Kings of Tanguth did not only recover their whole world. For this cause every day as soon as he hath dined, he causeth his Trumpets to be sounded, by that sign giving leave to the other Kings and Princes of the earth, to go to dinner. A fine dream of universal Monarchy. At the death of the Chams, the seven chief Princes assemble to crown his son; whom they place on a black course cloth: telling him, if he reign well, heaven shall be his reward; if ill, he shall not have so much as a corner of that black cloth to rest his body on: then they put the crown on his head, and kissing his feet, swear unto him fealty and homage. And at the Funeral of these great Monarchs, they use to kill some of his Guard Souldiers, whereof he hath 12000 in continual pay; saying, Ita & domino nostro servite in alia vita. Paulus Venetus reporteth, that at the obsequies of Mango Cham, no fewer than 10000 were slain on this occasion.

These Chams are for the most part severe Justicers, and punish almost every small fact with sudden death; but their especially: Inasmuch that a man in Cambalu taking a pail of milk from a womans head, and beginning to drink thereof, upon the womans out-cry was apprehended, and cut asunder with a sword; so that the blood and the milk came out together. Nor are Adultery or Lying punished with less than death, and so ordained to be by the Laws of Cingis, their first Emperor: a wiser man, than possibly could be expected from so rude a Country, and of so little breeding in the knowledge of Books or Business; the Tartars being utterly without the use of Letters, till the conquest of the Huyri, a Cathian nation, but of Christian faith.

What forces the Great Cham, in the height of their power, were able to draw into the field, may be conjectured at by the Army of Tamerlane, consisting of 1200000 Horse and Foot, as was said before. And looking on them as confined within Cathay, we shall find them not inferior to the greatest Princes. For Cublay Cham, long after the division of this great Estate, which was made by Tamerlane, had in the field against Naiian his Uncle, and one Caiadas, who had then rebelled, an Army of 100000 Foot, and 360000 Horse: there being 500000 Horse on the other side. Which made almost a million of men in both Armies. And this is probable enough, if report be true touching the Chams of Zagathay, and those of Tur-Chistan, (before reduced under the obedience of the other) of which the first is said to have been able to raise 300000 Horse, and the last an hundred thousand more. For standing forces, he maintains 12000 Horse, distributed amongst four Captains, for the guard of his person; besides which he hath great forces in every Province, and within four miles of every City, ready to come upon a call, if occasion be: so that he need not fear any outward invasion, and much less any homebred Rebellions. But on the other side, admitting this for truth which before is said, we find him of no power at Sea, by he is Land-locked (as it were) from all Trade at Sea; or if he have any Port in the North-east parts of this long Country, where it joyneth on Tartaria Antiqua, it is so far off, and so much out of the way, that it adds nothing to his power, and not much to his purse.

Of the Revenues of the Cham, I can make no estimate, but may conclude them to be what he list himself: he being the absolute Lord of all, the Subject without any thing he can call his own. But that which ordinarily doth accrew unto him, is the tenth of Wool, Silk, Hemp, Corn, and Cattel. Then doth he draw into his own hands all the Gold and Silver, which is brought into the Country; which he causeth to be melted, and preserved in his treasury: imposing on his people in stead of money, in some places Cockle-shells; in others, a black coin made of the bark of trees, with his stamp upon it. And besides this he hath to himself the whole trade of Pearl-fishing, which no body upon pain of death dare fish for, but by leave from him. So that his treasury is conceived to be very rich, though his Annual income be uncertain, or not certainly known.

Hitherto I have prosecuted the affairs of this mighty Monarch upon the common credit of approved Authors; yet must confess I am not very well satisfied in the truth and reality of the thing itself: it being rather my opinion, that there is no such man at this present time as a great Cham of Tartary, with Sovereign Power and Jurisdiction over all the other members of that vast body; but that this Empire being broken in pieces by the Sons of Tamerlane, the conquered Countries did by little and little return again to their former Governments, or else were seized on by the Viss Chams or Governors of the several Provinces. For first I consider it as impossible that there should be such a mighty Monarch, of such absolute authority, such an infinite power, and such unlimited Revenue; and yet that for the space of an hundred years and more we should hear neither tale nor tidings of them, no not so much as of their names, especially in an active age, and when this great building of the world, hath such Caisements in it. For it must needs seem strange to a rational man, that neither Jenkinson who passed into Persia by the Caspian Sea, nor Sir Robert Shirley who spent much time in the Persian Court, nor Sir Thomas Roe, or Sir Diddmore Cotton (the first Embassadour to the great Mongul, the other to the Persian Sophie) should tell us any thing of this Prince, if such Prince there be; or that the Travellers of our Nation who have rambled over all parts of India, the next neighbouring Country, should bring us home no tidings of him, or the Jesuites, with all their diligence should not find him out. Secondly, I consider it is a thing improbable, that if there were any such mighty Prince, keeping his Royal Court in the City of Cambalu, so near unto the Kingdom of China, he should permit the beggerly Nations of the Eastern Tartars to conquer that rich and mighty Empire in so short a time, he in the mean season sitting still as a dull spectator, neither considering his own danger, nor putting in for a share of so great a booty. Thirdly, I observe that in the treating of a Marriage between Xanchius the great King of the Eastern Tartars, now reigning in China, with a daughter of the King of Tanguth; the King of Tanguth is called Prince of the Occidental, or Western Tartars, by which name the Chineses call all the Tartars inhabiting the vast Countries of Altay and Cathay, specially so called, (as being Westward of themselves; and the Eastern Tartars;) which

Title

Antiqua.

Title the King of Tanguth had not merited or durst have assumed unto himself, if there had been any such great Cham then reigning in Cathay, and residing in Cambalu, as our Authors speak of. And fourthly, I observe it as a matter probable, that as at the breaking of this Empire into pieces upon the death of Tamerlane, the Precopenses, or European Tartars submitted to a Prince of their own Nation, under the Power and Government of whose Successors, they do still continue; and much of the Asiatick Tartary being subdued by the Moscovites, the neighbouring Tartars did return to their ancient Government by Hordes or Tribes; that so the Kings of Tanguth might not only recover their own Inheritance, but by degrees possess themselves of the greatest part of all Altay, if not of some part of the Proper Cathay also. And therefore that some of the last great Chams mentioned in the former Catalogue, are no other then the Kings of Tanguth, or the Chams of Zagathay, in whom (if any where) remaineth the Succession of the House of Cingis.

From these Premises I conclude, that all which hath before been spoken touching the great power, authority, and revenue of the great Chams of Tartary, must either be referred unto the times of their greatest glory, when their Empire was entire, or not much dismemored; or else relate, with some qualifications, to the Chams of Zagathay, or the Kings of Tanguth. But these are observations and considerations, with the conclusion issuing from them, I willingly submit unto better Judgments.

OF

them; so strait, that a man standing in the middle, may see either end: each end being shut up with a Gate of great strength and beauty; and those Gates fortified and strengthened with thick plates of iron. Generally greater and more stately than those of Europe, but defective in that point of elegance which the Magnificent Churches and more sumptuous buildings for the dispatch of publick business, in these parts abound with; and their private houses for the most part are also low, and destitute of Porches, Windows, Galleries, the principal ornaments and graces of Architecture. Nor are their Cities built on any for resort, or trade, but for strength and safety, environed with deep and broad ditches, the walls of brick or stone, strong above belief, planted with Ordnance and Artillery in convenient places: and every night the Gates not only locked, but sealed; not to be opened till unsealed by the principal Magistrate. So like they are to one another that we may say with Ovid on the like occasion.

— *Facies non omnibus una,
Nec diversa tamen, qualem decet esse fororum.*

Which I find thus Englished by G. Sandis,

Amongst them all no two appear the same,
Nor differed more then Sitters well became.

But not to rest our selves on this general Character, let us take a more particular view of some of the principal. And in that list we find, 1 Quinsay, called Sunkien by the Natives, situate somewhat towards the South, on the Western borders of this Kingdom, where it confineth on Cashy; of this Town many things are reported beyond all belief, as namely, that it contained once in circuit an hundred miles, and had in the midst of it a Lake of 30 miles compass; in which Lake were two goodly Islands, and in them two magnificent Palaces, adorned with all necessities, either for majesty, or convenience; in which are celebrated the publick Feasts, and the marriages of the better sort; The Lake nourished with divers Rivers, the chief being Polysanga, and Cacamaican; on which Rivers 12000 Bridges are said to have lifted up their stately heads: and under whose immense Arches, great Ships with sails spread abroad, and top and top gallant, might and did usually pass. It is also said to have had ten Market-places, each of them four miles asunder, and every one in form quadrangular, the sides thereof half a mile in length. Here were said also to be twelve Companies of Trademmen or Artizans, each Company having 12000 shops, and in all a million and 600000 Families. But whatsoever it was in the former times, certain it is that at this time (if it hath at this time any being at all) partly on the removal of the Court from hence to Cambalu by the Tartars; and since to Nankin and Pekin by the Princes of the house of Hombu and partly the fury of the Wars, and partly by the violence of Earth-quakes; it hath lost no small part of her ancient beauty and renown. 2 Unguen, famous for the abundance of Sugar there made. 3 Nankin, seated 9 leagues from the Sea, on the great River of Kiang, whereon ride for the most part the Kings ships, besides such as belong to private men. The Town in compass no fewer than 10000 of the Kings ships, besides such as belong to private men. The Town in compass 30 miles, being girt with three fair brick walls, having large and stately Gates: The streets in length two leagues, wide and paved; the number of houses is about 200000 so that it may equal four of the fairest Cities of Europe. 4 Pekin or Paglia, in the middle of the Province so named (being one of the four Northern Provinces, which take up the whole breadth of this mighty Kingdom) where the King continually resideth; and that, either because the air hereof is more healthful and pleasant, than any of the other; or because it lieth near unto the Tartars, with whom the Chinois are in perpetual War: so that from hence the dangers which may by their invasions happen unto the Country, may with more convenience be either prevented, or resisted. The City said to be inferior to Nankin for bulk and beauty, but to exceed it in multitude of Inhabitants, Souldiers, and Magistrates, occasioned by the Kings abode. Environed on the North with two walls, of so great breadth, that twelve horsemen may run abreast upon them; on the North with one wall only, but that so strong and vigilantly guarded, that they fear a little annoyance on that side as they do on the other. But the greatest Ornament hereof is the Royal Palace, compassed about with a triple wall, the outwardmost of which would well environ a large City, within which space, besides the many lodgings for Eunuchs and other Courtiers, are Groves, Hills, Fountains, Rivers, and the like places of pleasure, larger in circuit, but not comparable for the Arts of Architecture to the Royal Palaces of Europe: First built by some of the Tartar Kings of this Country in imitation of the Royal Palace of Xaindu, mentioned in Chatay, honoured sometimes with the residence of the Chims themselves, which as it gave unto the City the name of Pekin, that is to say, the Court or City of the King, in the language of China, so gave it occasion unto some Writers to make this and Cambalu the same, both names being of the same signification, though in divers Languages. 5 Canton, supposed to be the Cattigara of Ptolomy; by the Chinois called Quamchen, the least of the Metropolitan Cities of this Country, but beautified with many triumphant Arches, a navigable River, large streets, and many goodly Bridges. Fortified with deep trenches, 83 Bulwarks, and seated in so rich a soil both for Fowl and Cattel, that here are said to be eaten daily 6000 Hogs, and 12000 Ducks, besides proportionable quantity of other victuals. If this be one of the least of their Metropolitans, what may we fantasie of the greatest? A Town in which the Portugals drive a wealthy trade, being permitted in the day-time to come within the City itself; but at night excluded, and forced to find lodging in the Suburbs. By reason of which restraint they have settled their Mart at Macao the Port Town to this; where they have their Factor, and many families; the Town being almost wholly peopled by them. 6 Leatung, the chief City of Leatung, (another of the four Northern Provinces) and the first Town taken by the Eastern

Tartars

Tartars in their attempts upon this Kingdom, by this door 'making themselves' an entrance into all the rest. 7 Ninguyuen made the Metropolis of Leatung after the taking of Leatung by the Eastern Tartars: 8 Sigan or Sigan, the chief City of Xenfi another of the four Northern Provinces, and honoured sometimes with the Kings residence. 9 Xuoking on the south side of the River Cienhang, one of the fairest Cities of China; so environed with sweet Waters, as a man may contemplate its beauty, as rounding it in a Boat; consisting of large and fair streets paved on both sides with white square stones; and in the middle of them all runs a Navigable Channel whose sides are garnished with the like ornament; and of the same stone there is also built many fair Bridges, and triumphant Arches; the houses being all of the same stone also, which render it the neatest (though not the biggest) City in this mighty Kingdom: 10 Suchuan, about two dayes journey from the Sea, seated in Marishes like Venice, but more commodiously, because those Marishes are of fresh water; the streets and houses founded upon Piles of Pine-tree; with many bridges, and conveniences for passage both by land and water. Well traced, as the fittest Center for dispersion of Merchandise from all the other Ports of the Kingdom: by the multitude and frequency of Ships, almost denying faith to the eyes, which would think all the Ships of China to be here assembled. So infinitely rich, that the small Region whereof it is the head containing but eight Cities more, payeth 12 millions to the King yearly income. 11 Hamsu, or Hanchen on the North side of the River Cienhang, out of which furnished with a Channel of great length and breadth, by which it trades into the Northern parts of this Kingdom; the Metropolis of the Province of Chequian, about two dayes journey from the Sea, in compass less than Nankin, but better builded: no place in it taken up with Gardens, Orchards, or other pleasures; but all employed for shops, houses, and other edifices. So beautified with Triumphant Arches, erected to the honour of deserving Magistrates, that in one street there are 300 of great mass or workmanship. The Temples magnificent and many; the bank-sides of the Channels watering every street, beset with trees of shade, and most excellent fruits: and in the middle of the City a round high Mountain, which gives the eye a gallant prospect into every street. And not far off a pleasant Lake, of great breadth and length, the banks whereof are beautified with Groves and Gardens, and the Lake itself even clothed with Vessels of all sorts, on which the Citizens use to feast, and entertain their idle time with Plays and Spectacles. Two Cities so replenished with all kinde of pleasures, that the Chinois use it for a Proverb, Thien Xam, thien thum, Hamsu hum, that is to say, Look what the Hall or Presence-Chamber is in Heaven, that Hamsu and Suchuan are on earth. 12 Fochea, beautified amongst many other stately Structures, with a Magnificent Tower erected on 40 marble Pillars, of great elegance, cost, and bigness, every pillar being 40 spans in height, and 12 in breadth: not to be parallel'd, as some say, by any the like work in Europe. 13 Lochian, in which are 70000 families. 14 Colans, famous for the best Porcellaine. 15 Sciannay, by some called Thienin, a station to which an incredible number of Ships resort, both by Sea and River from all parts of this Kingdom; seated within 24 hours sail of the Isle of Japan, and therefore defended with strong Garrison, and a Navy. Situate in a pleasant and wholesome soil, the whole Country so set forth with trees, as if it were one continued Orchard. So populous, that it containeth 40000 households, most of which get their livelihood by weaving Cottons: it being supposed that here are 200000 persons which attend that Manufacture. 16 Chinchiansu, whence by a River made by hand, there is a passage to Suchuan; the water of which never freezeth, and for that cause so clogged with ships in time of winter, that the passage is stopped with the multitudes of them. 17 Zuanchen a most rich and beautiful City environed with large waters, and the only Southern Port within the Land, to which Ships or Boats may have access. 18 Caiton or Caifang, seated upon the River Kiang, a City once of three Leagues in compass, whose harbour was seldom without 500 Ships, and sometimes honoured with the Seat or Residence of the Kings themselves; most miserably destroyed Anno 1642. by Zunchinus the late King of this Country, who breaking down the dams and sluices to let in the River, for the dislodging of some Thieves and Out-laws, who had then besieged it, gave it so great and forcible a passage towards the Town, that it bare down the greatest part of the houses of it, and therein drowned above 300000 of the Natural Citizens; before which time the Metropolis or chief City of the Province of Honan. 19 Kaiangchen on the South-side of the River Croccus, the richest and the fairest City in these parts of the Country, commodiously seated to command that River. 20 Chatking the head City of the Province of Quangung, for the strength and conveniency of its situation thought fittest for the seat of Tungty, the last declared Emperor of the Chims against the Tartars. 21 Quelin the chief City of the Province of Quangfi. 22 Taitung the Metropolis or chief City of Xanfi or Cansay, another of the four Northern Provinces, but not else observable for any thing I finde of it, either in point of Trade or Story. 23 Nanchang a chief City of the Province of Kianfi, of which little memorable; and less of 24 Cergiron, but that it is like unto the rest in form and structure.

Besides the Provinces before mentioned, there are three others not directly under the dominion of the Kings of China, though depending on it, that is to say, 1 the Province of Suchuen, 2 the Island of Canton, 3 the Island of Cheuxan.

1. The Province of Suchuen, lieth on the Southwest of this Kingdom of the same nature both for soil and air with the rest of China, but possessed by a more warlike people; the women here being trained up to fears of Arms, and so well practised on their weapons, that when the Queen hereof went to the aid of the Emperor Vanley against the Tartars, Anno 1618. she took with her a small Army of 3000 women, performing Actions not unworthy the bravest men: the chief City hereof is called Cingm, of great capacity, and so exceeding populous withal, that Changhienchungm (that most barbarous Tyrant) caused no fewer than 600000 of them (men, women and children, all indifferently) to be slaughtered in one day before his face. The whole Country governed for a long time by its own Kings of the same Tai-mingian mingian race with the Kings of China, from whom having received their investiture, they were afterwards of absolute authority over their own subjects, who acknowledge no other King but him. And in this State it did continue, till the year 1644. when Changhienchungus, whom before I named, entering into this Country with his rabble of Rogues made a Conquest of it, murdered the young King, Son to the Amazonian Queen, which before we spake of: dispeopled the great City of Chingus, butchered at one timetwenty thousand Priests, at another time eighteen thousand Students; and finally committed such unspeakable outrages, that the Tartars in meer pity to that wretched people, sent an Army against him, by which he was vanquished, and slain; this Province thereupon submitting to the Tartars as their great deliverers.

2. Corea, is an Island of the Eastern Ocean, not far from the North-East of China, over against the fall of the River Talo. The quality of the soil, the dimensions of it, and what Cities it containeth in it, I have no where found. The people far more warlike than those of China, by reason of the ill neighbourhood of the Japonites, with whom they have always either open wars, or uncertain peace. Invaded by those Islanders and in danger to be conquered by them, they made an offer of their Country to the King of China; who having repulsed the Invaders, restored their Country freely to them, without laying any other Imposition on them, than of love and gratitude, which obligations those of Corea have discharged most fully. For when Vanley the late Emperour of China was first invaded by the Tartars, they sent unto his aid twelve thousand men well Armed, and exercised in the Wars; increasing their supplies in the time of Thrinkins, who next but one succeeded Vanley. Drawing the whole storm upon themselves by those friendly aids, they were accordingly assisted by the King of China, whose forces came so seasonably in the heat of a Battel between the Coreans and the Tartars, that the Tartars after a long and terrible fight, were driven out of the Island, but with such incredible loss on all sides, that few or none escaped of the Army of China, seventy thousand of the Coreans slain, and the Tartars leaving fifty thousand of their men behinde them; after this they were unmolested, till the fatal and final Conquest of the Kingdom of China, when seeing the Tartars Lords of all, and no possibility of resistance, they submitted to them, about the year 1648. upon condition of retaining their Hair and Habit, which no extremity of personal danger, or fear of publique desolation, could compell them to alter.

3. Cheuxan, is an Island of the same Seas, on the South of Corea opposite to the City of Nympus in the Main Land of China; an Island which being heretofore a dwelling place of poor Clowns and Fishermen only, is now become a potent Kingdom. For Lu. Regulus, chosen by a party of his own to succeed to the broken Crown of China, and finding no hopes of withstanding the great power of the Tartars, retired himself into this Island with his friends and followers, followed not long after by great multitudes of the Natural Chinise, who chose rather to forsake their Country, than to conform in hair and habit to the will of the Tartars; Infomuch that there are now found in this Island threescore and ten Cities, with a strong and formidable Army, which hitherto hath contemned all the Tartarian Power and Forces, and watch for some happy occasion to advance again their Kingdom in China.

The ancient Inhabitants of the Sina, in the time of Ptolomy, were towards the North, the Semantini, bordering a mountain of that name, and the only one remembered in all this Country: more Southward, the Acadria, and Aspiethra; Towards the Sea the Anabasta, and Ichthyophagi (these last so called from living wholly upon fish.) United into one body by the name of Sina, and known by that name to the Romans, in the time of Ptolomy, who boundeth them on the North with Serica, on the West with India extra Gangem, and on the East and South with a Terra Incognita: which though it make up the least part of the Modern China, Serica touching only on a Corner of the Northwest of it, and the main Ocean washing it on the East and South: yet the Arabians in their Tzinin, and our late Latine Writers in their Sina and Sinenium Regnum, do from hence give the denomination to this mighty Kingdom. How far they stretched beyond the bounds laid down by Ptolomy, and whether they subdued the Eastern and more Northern Nations, or were Conquered by them, it is hard to say; nor is it easie to resolve, from what original these and the rest of the Inhabitants do derive themselves, whether from the Indians, or the Scythians: or that it was primitively planted by some of the posterity of Noah, before the enterprise of Babel: which last may probably be concluded from the extream populousness of the Country, the many magnificent Cities; their Industry and Ingenuity in all Arts and Sciences, not to be taught them by their neighbours, more ignorant in those things than themselves. And hereunto the Chronicles of China seem to give some ground, which tell us of three hundred and forty Kings, which for the space of four thousand years have therein reigned. For as their Chronicles inform us, (if they may be credited) the Countrey being without Rule or settled Government, was first reduced into order by one Pitey, the Son of Ezelem; by whom the people were instructed in Physick, Astrology, Divination, and the Art of Tillage: to which, this Pitey, having found out the way of cutting or sawing Timber, added the use of Ships and Houses, and many other the effects of Mechanical hands. Having by the valour of Lincheon one of his Commanders, subdued a great part of the Countrey, he drew them into Towns and Villages; distributed them into Offices, and several Trades, disposing those of the same Trade into Streets by themselves; and commanding that no man without leave from himself, or his Officers, should follow any other Trade than that of his Father. He prescribed them also the fashion of their Garments, taught them the art of making and dying Silks: and having reigned an hundred years, left the Kingdom well established unto his Posterity. Of this race there are said to have been 217 Kings, who held the State 2257 years. The

The last of them was that Tzaintzon, who being ill-neighbourd by the Scythians (not yet called Tartars) is said to have built that vault wall spoken of before: extended 400 Leagues in length, and at the end of every League a strong Rampart or Bulwark, continually garrisoned, and well furnished with all warlike necessaries. He being slain by some of his Subjects, burdened and waited with his work, the race of Pitey ended; and that of Anchosan succeeded, a Prince of much prudence, but greater courage. In his line it continued under 25 Kings, but frowly shaken towards the close by a Civil War, betwixt Tynthey the 23. of his house, and his Nephew Lampy. Hardly well settled under Quinty the last of this house, when Tzolun, a great Tyrant of the other faction, set upon him, and slew him. And so the majesty of the blood-royal being trod under foot, the Crown was also tossed from one hand to another, and made a prey unto the strongest: there being of the race of this Tzolun, eight Kings, reigning 62 years; Of the race of Dian, five Kings, who reigned thirty one; Of the race of Izoy, three only, who reigned thirty seven; Of the race of Tenco, one and twenty, who held the Crown 294 years; and eight there were who reigned 120 years, of the house of Tamtzon. Of other upstart families to the number of five, were fourteen Kings also, who governed only for the space of 66 years: And then one Zaitzon, deriving himself from Vuey, the first King of this Countrey, obtained the Kingdom; and seventeen of his Posterity, for the space of 320 years, governed with much peace and honour. Forfar, the last King of that Royal Family, foretold by Prophecy that he should be deprived of his Kingdom by one who had an hundred eyes, neglected the Advertisment, as unworthy credit: but it fell out agreeable to that prediction, when vanquished by Chifan-baan (which word signifieth an hundred eyes) Lieutenant unto Ufan, a Tartarian Prince, but Fendatary and Vassal to the Great Cham. China thus made a Province of the Tartarians, was governed for the space of 93 years, under nine Tartar Kings, Tributaries to the Great Cham, and dependants on him: the Chams themselves many times passing into China, and abiding there according as their pleasures or affairs did invite them to it, which occasioned such a continual intercourse betwixt those of China and Cathay, that they have much participated ever since that time, of the manners and customs of each other. But here it is to be observed, that the Tartars spent almost as much time in the Conquest of China, as they did in the possession of it; the war being first begun, Anno 1206. finished 1268. the Tartars being totally outed when they had reigned here 90 years only, that is to say, Anno 1358. or thereabouts. For then it hapned that a mean person called Hugh, considering with himself the discontentedness of the Chinise under so long Bondage, the luxury of the Tartars, effeminated with the pleasures of that Countrey, and the unwarlike temper of Gino Cham, then reigning over all in the City of Cambalu, raised to himself so strong a party, that in short time he drove the Tartars out of all; forcing them to betake themselves to those parts of the Eastern Tartars, which now make up the Kingdom of Ninche.

1. Finally turning towards the West, he not only recovered back th China such parts thereof (as had been layed unto Cathay, and incorporated with it by the Tartars; but growing thereby a formidable neighbour to the Cham himself: Advanced for this great service to the Crown of China, Anno 1269. he took unto himself the name of Hungus (our late Writers commonly call him Hombu) which signifieth as much as the famous Warrior, and gave unto his children, and their posterity, the name of the Taingian Family; which they still continue. For the recovery of this Country, great Tamurlane mustered up his Forces, and though Hombu brought into the field 350000 horse and foot, yet nothing could resist the powerful genius of that mighty Conquerour, who obtained here a signal Victory with the death of 60000 Chinise: But wisely moderating his prosperity, and mainly bent upon his war against the Turks, he thought it his best and safest way to let the people of China have a King of their own, imposing on him a fine of 300000 Crowns in ready Money, a certain Annual Tribute (long time after paid) with certain other conditions, which as they were pleasing to the Victor, so they were not destructive to the vanquished. By means hereof it came to pass, that such a long communication in affairs of State, having passed between China and Cathay (those of China in old times lording it over part of the Cathayans, as the Cathayans in late times did over the Chinise) there grew a great resemblance between both Nations, in manners, conditions, arts and manufactures, as before is said, which circumstances layed together, may afford some reason why in some Writers, easily misguided by such probabilities; Cathay and China have been reckoned to be one and the same. Nor did the Empire of the Chinise extend in old times, onely over part of Scythia, but also over part of India, and some of the Oriental Islands. But the Princes of the house of Hombu finding their own Kingdom large enough to content their desires; abandoned all the Accessories and Out-parts of their Dominions: prompted thereunto, not only by their own moderation, but by some misfortunes which befell them. For as we finde that the Romans having by the fury of two violent tempests, lost no fewer than 206 of their Ships and Gallies, resolved to abandon (and for a long time did forbear) the Seas, which had used them so unkindly: So the Chinise having received a great overthrow, and loss of 800 Ships, nigh unto Zoilan, they freed all the Islands from obedience unto them, and contented themselves with the bounds which nature had bestowed on them. And of their moderation herein, we have a very rare example. For when the people of Corea, a small Island abutting on the confines of China, were invaded by the Japonites; they submitted themselves unto the King of China: who having repulsed the enemy, and thereby freed his own Countrey from danger, presently redelivers over unto the Coreans, their Town and liberty. A rare fact of a contented people. Which whether it favoured of greater moderation or magnanimity, I am not able to determine. In this family hath the Realm continued under 15 Kings, for the space of 266 years and upward, reckoning from Hombu unto Bong: who being the twelfth of this line, succeeded his elder brother, unfortunately slain with a fall from an horse. Reported for a Prince of good disposition, great judgement, and a severe Juticiary. This Bong (otherwise called Vanly) begun his Reign, Anno 1573. governing this King-comprehendeth all the Tartarian Countreys beyond Imans, it being well known that Campion and Succir are two Cities of Tanguth, and not of the proper Cathay, or Cathay especially so called. In the third rank of proofs they instance in the similitudes, or resemblances betwixt both Countreys, and both people, which are so great and visible in temperature of Air, fertility of soyl, and pleasantness of situation, in customs, in ingenuity, Arts and Manufactures, as may be thought to carry an Identity, or sameness with them; which sameness or identity they do also finde, in Pequin the chief City of China and Cambalu, the supposed chief City of Cathay, being two words of the same fence and signification though of divers sounds; for Pequin signifieth the Court or City of the King in the Chinian language, and Cambalu signifieth the Court or City of the Cham, in the language of Tartary. The like they also have observed of the Royal Palaces, adjoining to the said two Cities, to like in the vast greatness and extent of the outer walls, the Parks and Forrests intermingled, the magnificent form and structure of the inner Palaces, with all the rest of the particulars before recited, that a man might very well conclude them to be one and the same, adding withall that such an immense, and unparalleled work, as the great Cham Palace called Xaindu, must needs require more hands and a longer time, than the great Cham (considering their continual wars, and little intervals of leisure) could bestow upon it. But their 4 head proofs, which seems indeed to be the strongest, they derive first from the Testimony of Benedicta Goes above mentioned, who without taking notice of any such Countrey as Cathay, in so long a journey, telleth us that at Ciales a City of the Kingdom of Cascar, and not far from China, he was first informed that Cathay and China were the same; 2ly. From the Testimony of an old Mahometan Pilgrim, who returning from Meccha by Lahor (the Royal seat and City of the great Mongull) affirmed there that he had lived long in Cambalu the chief City of Cathay, which Kingdom had in it one thousand and fifty Cities, the King thereof being a very mighty Prince, and having a strength of 400 Elephants brought thither from Malacca and Pegu, and that much Merchandize was brought into that Countrey by Sea: which if it be not meant of China (to which the story may agree in all particulars) must needs be one of the loudest lyes that ever came from the mouth of a Mahometan, or a Pilgrim either; our Geographers finding very few Cities or Towns of note in Cathay specially so called, no access thither by Sea for any Merchandize, nor any way to bring those Elephants from Pegu and Malacca, which the Pilgrim dreamt of. 3ly. A clearer Testimony of some other Mahometans repaireing to Pequin every fifth year, either as Merchants or Embassadors, or as both together; by whom the Jesuites there living were informed, that in the Dominions of the Persian, and the great Mongull, from whence they came, the Kingdom of China was called by no other name, than by that of Cathay, they knowing no other Countrey of that name, but China only. And 4ly. from the asseverance of Pantogia, another Jesuite; who in his letters dated from Pequin much blameth our ordinary maps for placing Cathay next to China; whereas (saith he) China or Sinai is Cathay, as this Pequin where we now are is the City of Cambalu; which two last evidences coming from the pen of one who had lived many years in China; and not conducting any way to the advancement of the Catholique cause, must needs be thought to carry some great credit, and authority with them.

These reasons if they be of force and moment to the point in hand, we must then act Penelope part, unravelling all the web which before was woven, Atque iterum in lana omne redibit opus, in the Poets language; which that we may the better do, and with as little defacements to the whole piece as possibly we can, I shall thus proceed. First then it is to be conceived that Cathay specially so called was an aggregate body, containing many several Kingdoms, and distinct Eitates, though Homagers to the Kings of Cathay or dependants on them: as anciently in the Realm of France, besides the Kings of France themselves, there was a King of Burgundy, a King of Metz, a King of Soissons, a King of Orleans; and after that a Duke of Normandy, a Duke of Bretagne, a Duke of Aquitaine, and Earl of Champagne, and Earl of Tholouse, all absolute and uncontrollable in their own Eitates. And then the Kingdom of Tanguth which we placed in the Southern parts of Altay, must be made one of the Kingdoms of Cathay; and Demercan whom we ranked in the Catalogue of the Chams of Tartary, must be brought a peg lower, and looked on as a King of Tanguth only, and no more than so. 2ly. It must be taken for granted, that the Tartars having conquered the Realm of Cathay, and afterwards, by the help of that people, subdued China also, caused all the Northern parts of China to be called Cathay, as being in the same latitude and parallels with it, and much of the same nature and complexion, both for Soyl and Air; giving unto the Southern parts (which was the true and proper Countrey of the Sine) the name of Mangi, transferred afterwards by some Authors to the Countrey generally: and having thus extended the name and Territory of Cathay, the first foundation of their greatness, they fixed their Regal seat in the City of Pequin, which by a new Tartarian name (but of the same fence and signification) was from thence called Cambalu. Thus in the first place the French Kings of the Caroline Family, communicated the name of France (East France it was most commonly called) to the greatest part of Germany, then conquered by them; the Cassilians of Spain extended the name of Castile on every side, as they got ground upon the Moors, till it became the largest Province of any one name in all that Continent; and Roger Earl of Cicily, having conquered the Eastern parts of Italy (which now make up the Kingdom of Naples) commanded it to be called the further Cicily, and himself to be Crowned King of both, by the name of King of both the Cicilies. And in the second place, the Dukes of Zweibrucken in high Germany, are by the French called Dukes De Deux-ponts, by the late Latine Writers Duces Bipontani, all in the same fence and signification; the Town of Schertzogen Bosch is by the French called Bois le Duc, by Latine Writers Sylva ducis; and here at home the Military Towns or Stations of Leodorum, Colonia, Presidium, ad Lapidem, and Portus Magnus, were turned by the conquering Saxons (the former significations being still retained) into Bedford, Colchester, Warrick, Stoneham, and Portsmouth, commonly now called Portsmouth; Castrum Alatum into Edinburg by the Picts or unconquered Britains. 3ly. We may take it for a truth unquestioned, that Hombu having expelled the Tartars out of Mangi, or the Southern parts, and fixed his Royal seat at Nanquin, on the South side of the River Kiang (though paying both fine and tribute to victorious Tamurlane) did afterwards on Tamurlanes engagements beyond the Mountains, and the canonizing of that great Empire amongst his children, expell them out of the North parts also; his Successors thereupon removing the Court to Pequin (from hence forth known again by its true, proper, and Chinian name) the better to attend the motion of that dangerous Enemy, Jernsalem, commanded to be called Elia by the Emperour Adrian, and London named Augusta Tri-nobantum by some other of the Roman Emperours; returned to their old names again, as soon as that authority failed which imposed the new. And 4ly. as from this time forwards the Northern parts of China might still retain the name of Cathay, and being most traded by the Persian and Indian Merchants, might be best known by that name in their several Countreys: so by dividing this great Empire into so many parts, removing the Imperial Seat to Samerchand, on the other side of the mountains, erecting many new Eitates out of the ancient Prefectures, and Governments of Cathay it self, and parceling the remainder of it between the Kings of Tanguth, Cascar, and such other Princes of the Tartars, as were not wanting to themselves in those opportunities, the true Cathay might lose that name by little and little, which formerly it had communicated to those parts of China. Thus the Burgundians, Lombards, Vandals, Hungars, lost those names at home, in their ancient and native habitations, which still remain unto those Countreys that were conquered by them. These reasons and considerations I willingly submit to the Readers Judgment, being my self so great a Sceptick in this point that I dare determine nothing positively on either side. It is enough that I have layed the cause open without partiality, or byassing on either hand, before the Jurors; let them give up their verdict in it as they like the evidence.

INDIA is bounded on the East, with the Oriental Ocean, and some part of China, or as some others say, with a great Countrey called Mange (not much known unto us of Europe) interjected betwixt it and China; on the West, with the Persian Empire; on the North, with some branches of Mount Taurus, which divide it from Tarsary; and on the South, with the Indian Ocean. So called from the River Indus, the nearest of esteem and note in all the Countrey, towards these parts of the world.

It is conceived to be the largest Countrey of any one name in the world, except China and Tartaria; affirmed by Pomponius Mela, to be of such a great extent on the Sea-coasts of it, that it was as much as a Ship could sail in 40 days. Extended from 106, to 159 degrees of Longitude; and from the Aequator to the 44th degree of Northern Latitude. By which account it lieth from the beginning of the first, to the end of the sixth Clima: the longest Summers-day in the Southern parts being 12 hours only, and in the parts most North, 15 hours and an half.

Concerning the monstrous Fables which the ages foregoing have delivered to us of this Countrey, give me leave to say, that as the Poets used of old to fill up the times of which they were ignorant, with strange fictions, and prodigious metamorphoses; or as our modern Geographers, in the Maps of the world, fill up those unknown parts thereof, of which they can give us no certain description, with strange pictures and uncouth shapes of beasts and trees; so also the Writers in former ages have filled the more remote Countreys, of which they knew little, with such impossible and incredible relations. Hence there have been attributed to this India, the fables of men with dogs heads; of men with one leg only, yet of great swiftness; of such as live by vent; of men that had but one eye, and that in their foreheads; and of others, whose ears did reach unto the ground. It is reported also that this people by eating a dragons heart and liver, attain to the understanding of the languages of beasts; that they can make themselves, when they list, invisible; that they have two tubs whereof the one opened yields wind, the other rain, and the like. But these relations, and the rest of this strain, I doubt not but the understanding Reader knoweth how to judge of, and what to believe. For my part I am of the same minde with Cureus, Plura equidem transcribo quam credo; nec enim affirmare ausus sum quod dubito, nec subducere sustineo quae accipi: I may perhaps relate some things which I do not credit, but shall not let them pass without some censure; that so I neither may impose any thing on the Readers belief, nor defraud him of any thing conducible to his contentation.

The Countrey, (to report no more of it than it doth deserve,) enjoyeth an exact temperature of the air; two Summers, (or one as long as two,) and a double increase; blest with all things which are either necessary to the life of man, or of convenience and delight; particularly with Mines of Gold and Silver, and with precious stones; with spices of all sorts, and Civets; with the best medicinable drugs, metals of all kinds, except Copper and Lead; abundance of all sorts of Cattel, except horses. Somewhat defective also in Wheat and Vines, that so this Countrey might be beholding unto others, as well as others to this. Famed also for abundance of Camels, Apes, Dragons, Serpents, Rhinoceros, Elephants. These last more favouring of reason and humane ingenuity, or else more tractable and docile, than any brute Creature whatsoever. Of this we have a fair instance in the story of the Acts of Alexander. The Elephant which King Porus fate on, finding his Master strong and lusty, rushed boldly into the thickest of the Enemies Army: but when he once perceived him to be faint and weary, he withdrew himself out of the battel, kneeled down, and into his own trunk received all the Arrows which were directed at his master. The greatness of the Creature makes it yet more admirable, that either he should have soul enough of his own, to attune so vast a body; or being of such strength and bigness, should submit himself to the instructions of another: some of these Indian Elephants, as Aelianus hath affirmed, being nine Cubits high, and as many long; and in breadth or thickness about five Cubits. Nor doth the Sea afford less plenty or variety, than we find on shore: yielding abundance of the richest and fairest Pearls, huge shoals of fish, and amongst them the Whale or great Leviathan; exceeding the proportion of that land-monster the Elephant. For though the ordinary dimension of the Whale be but 36 Cubits in length, and eight in thickness: yet Nearchus in Arianus is said to have measured one, in these Indian Seas, which was of the length of 50 Cubits, and of breadth proportionable: not to say any thing of that incredible report of Pliny, who speaketh of some Indian Whales, which were nine hundred and threescore Foot, or four Acres long.

The people are of five sorts, and as many Religions, that is to say the Natural Indians, derived from the Original Inhabitants of it. 2ly Moors, or Arabians, who more than two hundred years ago, possessed
